After this ſucceſs, the beſiegers carried on their trenches to the village of Bouge, towards St. Nicholas's gate; the ſame being done alſo on that ſide near the Maeſe, as well above as below, with a deſign to draw two parallels along the river on the ſide next the ſuburbs of Jambe, and oppoſite to the caſtle-bridge. But, the French being apprehenſive of the deſign, they ſet fire to the ſuburbs, which ſomewhat retarded the approaches that general Coehorn had begun. On the 21ſt of July, a battery was finiſhed on that ſide next St. Nicholas's gate, and the trenches advanced an hundred paces towards the rivulet, that runs into the bottom which the French had ſwelled with water, and which was ſecured by a kind of half-moon. Next day they began to play upon a baſtion, and the works before St. Nicholas's gate, from a battery of eighteen pieces of cannon; and on the 23d the Brandenburgers battered the water-ſtop, in order to drain the moat, yet with little effect, becauſe it was lined with large free-ſtone. The great rains which fell about this time, very much incommoded the beſiegers, and interrupted their approaches. However, on the 25th they plied their batteries with ſucceſs, raiſed new ones, ſet on miners to the redoubt of Balart, near St. Nicholas's gate, and the next day forced the captain, who commanded in it, to ſurrender at diſcretion. On the 27th the king went into the trenches, and perceiving that the batteries had made great breaches in St. Nicholas's baſtion, the demi-baſtion of St. Roche, and at the end of the counterſcarp of the town, he diſpoſed all things for the general attack of the firſt counterſcarp, which was performed towards five o'clock that afternoon in this manner: The Engliſh and Scots, commanded by major-general Ramſey and brigadier Hamilton, came out of the trenches to the right, and attacked the point of the foremoſt counterſcarp, which incloſed the ſluice or water-ſtop. The enemy received them with a furious diſcharge, which however did not hinder them from going on briſkly; and, notwithſtanding the dreadful eruption of three or four fougades of bombs, that lay buried in the glacis, which put them at firſt into ſome diſorder, they returned more animated to the charge, and drove the enemy from that counterſcarp. But unluckily, whilſt the workmen were making a lodgment, ſome ſacks of wool took fire, whereby part of the lodgment was conſumed, and the Engliſh expoſed to the ſhot of the counter-guard and demi-baſtion of St. Roche, which they ſuſtained and anſwered with incredible reſolution, till the fire was extinguiſhed, and ſome traverſes caſt up. On the other hand, the Hollanders, ſeeing the Engliſh in ſo hot a place, immediately went up along the Maeſe towards the breach of the counter-guard, and ſo vigorouſly attacked the enemy with their hand granadoes, that the latter thought it ſafer to retreat than to defend themſelves, which very much eaſed the Engliſh. The Dutch lodged themſelves upon the counter-guard; and thus both they and the Engliſh preſerved the foremoſt covered way before St. Nicholas's gate, from the Maeſe to the water-ſtop, with part of the counter-guard. The valour and firmneſs of the confederates infantry in this action, is ſcarce to be parallelled; and it muſt be alſo acknowledged, that the French officers behaved themſelves like men of true courage, expoſing themſelves on the glacis of the counterſcarp and on the breach of the counter-guard, with their ſwords in their hands, in order to encourage their ſoldiers. The enemy did not throw many bombs, but they fired inceſſantly into the trenches with five or ſix pieces of cannon, which killed ſeveral perſons about the king, particularly Mr. Godfrey,[b] deputy governor of the bank of England, who, being come into the camp to wait on the king, about remittances of money for the payment of the army, had the curioſity to ſee this attack.

While this was doing on the town ſide, the elector of Bavaria was not idle between the Sambre and the Maeſe, but commanded an attack to be made towards the abbey of Salſines, where he deſigned to poſt himſelf. This was performed with ſo much vigour, that he not only forced the intrenchments near the Sambre, but made himſelf maſter of the fort of la Balance, near the head of thoſe intrenchments; repulſed four ſquadrons of horſe that came out of the caſtle; laid a bridge over the Sambre; paſſed that river amidſt the enemy's continual fire, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the abbey of Salſines, a poſt of great importance, and which favoured the attack of Vauban's line, that ſurrounded the works of the caſtle.

The elector, reſolving to ſtorm this line, ordered general Coehorn to diſpoſe all things for that purpoſe towards Salſines, and general Fleming to do the ſame on the other ſide of the Maeſe. On the 30th of July, by break of day, the elector, with the Spaniſh and Bavarian generals, and general Coehorn, began the attack towards Salſines, and aſſaulted the intrenchments in flank with about three thouſand foot, ſuſtained by ſome battalions, and one thouſand Spaniſh and Bavarian horſe. Major-general Swerin attacked the line in front with five hundred grenadiers, as many muſketeers, and one thouſand pioneers. And the Brandenburg generals, with five hundred grenadiers ſupported by two thouſand foot, and their grand muſketeers, gens d'armes, and horſe grenadiers, inſulted the enemies flank on the Maeſe ſide. The beſieged at firſt made ſome reſiſtance by the favour of a line of communication of one redoubt and two trenches; but being aſſailed on all ſides, and that too with extraordinary bravery, they were driven to the counterſcarp of Coehorn fort.

Animated with this ſucceſs, the beſiegers purſued thoſe, who fled, as far as the Devil's houſe, where the French had ſeveral cannon laden with cartouches, and about nine hundred men laid flat upon their bellies, who, ſuddenly ſtanding up, poured in vollies of ſhot upon the aſſailants. Theſe received the fire with incredible courage, forced the French to quit the counterſcarp of the fort, and made themſelves maſters of it. However, it being impoſſible for them to lodge themſelves there, they retired in good order. By this brave action, at the expence of about two hundred men killed or wounded, the beſiegers gained a lined redoubt, ſome advanced batteries, and Vauban's retrenchment from the Sambre to the Maeſe, which with immenſe labour the French had cut through the rock, and which they boaſted would coſt the allies five thouſand men before they could take it. This attack on the caſtle ſide, where the king was preſent, being over, he went to view the trenches on the town ſide, and finding that a mine had been ſprung, which had overturned good part of the water-ſtop into the ditch, whereby the water was lower by two feet, he ordered the miners to work on, in order to drain the moat, and all things to be ready to make a lodgment on the demi-baſtion. The two following days the beſiegers battered the works before St. Nicholas's gate with great fury, and threw many bombs, which did conſiderable execution; and particularly one fired by lieutenant-colonel Brown, which ſet on fire the enemies magazine in the demi-baſtion. On the 2d of Auguſt, towards evening, the lord Cutts with two hundred Engliſh grenadiers, and brigadier Dedam with a like number of Dutch, both which were to be ſuſtained by the battalions in the trenches, were ordered to attack the Saillant Angle, and the demi-baſtion, which they performed with great bravery, and, after ſome reſiſtance, a lodgment was made on the ſecond counterſcarp. The cannon having by this time widened the breaches, and all things being ready for a general aſſault, count Guiſcard, the governor, demanded to capitulate for the town, which being readily granted, the articles were agreed upon, and ſigned on the 4th of Auguſt by the elector of Bavaria for the allies, and by count Guiſcard for the beſieged. The ſame day the iron gate was delivered to the beſiegers, and on the 6th the French evacuated the town, and retired into the caſtle.

In the mean while Villeroy, having failed in his deſign upon prince Vaudemont, as alſo againſt Newport, marched towards Dixmuyde, and ordered Montal to beſiege it. The town was weak; but, conſidering the ſtrength of the garriſon, it might have held out a fortnight, or at leaſt have ſurrendered with leſs ignominy. But major-general Ellemberg, being a ſoldier of fortune, who had merited his preferment merely by his blunt courage in the open field, was preſently diſpirited, and at a loſs what to do, when he ſaw himſelf cooped up in a place ſurrounded by a royal army; ſo that after a ſlight reſiſtance of thirty-ſix hours, he yielded himſelf and his whole garriſon priſoners of war. Deynſe followed the example of Dixmuyde, and was ſurrendered to the French at diſcretion by colonel O'Farrel, without firing a gun. After the ſurrender of theſe two places, prince Vaudemont did not doubt but the French would advance towards Namur, and therefore deſired to be reinforced, that he might be able to obſerve them. The king ſent him Montigny's Engliſh brigade of horſe, and the two Dutch brigades of Dompre and Rhoe marched towards Bruſſels, whither the brigade of St. Paul was gone before, with orders to join Vaudemont, who deſigned to form an army on that ſide.

Villeroy, having ordered the fortifications of Dixmuyde and Deynſe to be razed, paſſed the river Lys at Wacker, and marched up the lines to the Schelde, which he alſo croſſed at Eſcanaffe, in order to continue his march to Ninove, giving out that he was going to the relief of Namur. Upon advice of this motion, Vaudemont decamped on the 4th of Auguſt from Ghent, and, paſſing the canal at Vilvoerd and the Burnt-bridge, pitched his camp at Dighem, having his own quarters at the caſtle of Beaulieu. The prince ſent to the French to demand the garriſons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe, conſiſting of ſix thouſand men. For, by a cartel ſettled between the two armies, all priſoners were to be redeemed at a ſet price, and within a limited time. But the French, having now ſo many men in their hands, did, without either colour or ſhame, give a new proof of their perfidiouſneſs, and broke the cartel on this occaſion, as they had often done at ſea; and indeed, as often as any advantages on their ſide tempted them to it. They not only refuſed to ſend back the garriſons, according to the agreement, but moſt of the ſoldiers were forced to enliſt themſelves in the French ſervice, or were ſent to Catalonia, and other remote parts. Theſe garriſons might have been ſaved, for if their officers had been maſters of a true judgment or preſence of mind, they might at leaſt have got a favourable compoſition, though the places were not tenable. The governors were at firſt believed to have betrayed their truſt, and ſold the garriſons, as well as the places to the French; but they were tried afterwards, and it appeared, that it flowed from cowardice and want of ſenſe, for which Ellemberg ſuffered death, and O'Farrel was broke with diſgrace.

The French king under pretence of revenging the inſults of the Engliſh fleet, which, under the command of the lord Berkley, had bombarded St. Malo, and ſome other towns on the French coaſt, ſent orders to Villeroy to bombard Bruſſels. Upon the French marching to Enghien with a great number of waggons laden with bombs and fire-works, prince Vaudemont immediately gueſſed their deſign, and would have prevented it, if the town could have been perſuaded, to give him the aſſiſtance that he deſired. Burghers, upon all ſuch occaſions, are more apt to conſider a preſent, though a ſmall expence, than a great, though imminent danger: ſo Vaudemont could not pretend to cover them, unleſs the confederate army, which might be reinforced by the detachment under the earl of Athlone and count Naſſau, ſhould advance and incamp in the plain of Gigot and St. Anne Pee. But, becauſe this could not be done neither, without giving Villeroy an apportunity to poſt himſelf between him and the king's camp at Namur, the prince prudently left the earl of Athlone and count Naſſau, with the forces under their command, between Waterloo and Genap, where the king had ſent them, to oppoſe the enemies paſſage at Brain le Chatteau. In the mean time Vaudemont poſted his infantry on the eminences about Bruſſels, between fort Monterey and the counterſcarp of Ixel, whereby he maintained the communication with the forces at Waterloo; ordered ſeveral battalions to the outworks before the gates of Flanders and Anderleck to ſecure the city; and extended the horſe and dragoons along the canal, to hinder the enemy from paſſing it.

After ſeveral marches and counter marches, the French appeared before Bruſſels on the 13th of Auguſt; and Villeroy, having taken his quarters at Anderleck, wrote a letter to the prince of Berghem the governor, to acquaint him, 'That the king his maſter, ſeeing the prince of Orange had ſent his fleet upon the coaſt of France, to bombard his ſea-port towns, and endeavour to ruin them, without getting any other advantage by it, had thought that he could not put a ſtop to ſuch diſorders, but by uſing repriſals; which was the reaſon, that his maſter had ſent him an order to bombard Bruſſels; and at the ſame time to declare that it was with reluctance his majeſty had put himſelf upon it; and that as ſoon as he ſhould be aſſured, that the ſea-ports of France ſhould be no more bombarded, the king his maſter likewiſe would not bombard any places belonging to the prince, againſt whom he was at war; reſerving nevertheleſs the liberty on both ſides to do it in ſuch places, as ſhould be beſieged. That his majeſty had reſolved upon the bombarding of Bruſſels with ſo much the more pain, as the electreſs of Bavaria was there. That if the governor would let him know in what part of the town ſhe was, the king his maſter had commanded him not to fire there. Concluding, that he ſhould ſtay for his anſwer till five in the evening; after which time he ſhould obey his orders without delay.' The prince of Berghem, after having communicated this letter to the elector of Bavaria, who was come in great haſte to Bruſſels upon this occaſion, ſent an anſwer to Villeroy, 'That the reaſon, which the king of France aſſigned for his orders to the marſhal to bombard Bruſſels, ſolely regarded the king of Great Britain, who was before the caſtle of Namur: That his electoral highneſs would acquaint the king with it, and ſend him an anſwer in twenty-four hours. And as for the conſideration, which his moſt Chriſtian majeſty had for the electreſs, that ſhe was at the royal palace.'

It ſoon after appeared, that Villeroy's meſſage was but an empty compliment; for, inſtead of allowing the governor time to get his Britannic majeſty's anſwer to the French king's propoſal, he began that very evening to fire upon the city with twenty-five mortar pieces, and eighteen pieces of cannon, that ſhot red hot bullets. It was not long before the fire broke out in ſeveral places, eſpecially about the town-houſe. The enemy continued firing without intermiſſion all that night, the day following, and the night after that; during which aroſe a high wind, which would have ſpread the flame through the whole city, if the inhabitants had not prudently blown up ſeveral houſes on the 15th of Auguſt. The ſame day, about noon, the French diſcontinued their firing, and ſoon after drew off towards Enghien. The lower town ſuffered the moſt by the enemy's bombs, and ſeveral houſes near the market-place were quite laid in rubbiſh. The damage was valued at ſome millions; and the electreſs, though ſhe was removed to the ſuburbs beyond the reach of the cannon, was ſo frightened with its continual noiſe that ſhe miſcarried of a boy.

The king, having received advice of the motions of the French army, marched the 10th of Auguſt early in the morning with two troops of horſe guards, the troop of horſe grenadiers, and ſeveral ſquadrons of Brandenburgers, leaving the duke of Bavaria to command the ſiege. The ſame evening he reached Waterloo, and joined the troops commanded by the earl of Athlone, count de Naſſau, and the marquis de la Foreſt; and, having had an interview with prince Vaudemont, returned on the 12th to his camp before the caſtle of Namur, where immediately after his arrival the beſiegers broke ground and carried on their trenches about one hundred and fifty paces before Coehorn fort, towards the Sambre, and made a good lodgment, Beſides the batteries already erected between the Sambre and the Maeſe, ſome others were ordered to be raiſed, both of cannon and mortars, as well in the ramparts, as in the gardens of the city, in order to batter Terra Nova and fort Coehorn all at once. On the 13th, the beſiegers began to play from no leſs than twelve batteries, when one of their bombs, falling upon the magazine of the Devil's houſe, blew up above a thouſand granadoes charged, ruined a great quantity of arms, and killed and wounded ſeveral perſons. The trenches were carried on with great ſucceſs, though the enemy endeavoured in the night time, both with their great and ſmall ſhot, to diſturb the workmen. But their batteries were ſoon ſilenced by thoſe of the Engliſh, which, it is confeſſed on all hands, made ſuch firing, as was never ſeen ſince gun-powder was firſt invented. The cannon and mortars anſwered one another in time, and formed a dreadful harmony; and ſhowers of red-hot bullets and bombs, that poured continually on the caſtle, ſo terrified the enemy, that none of them durſt look out of their ſhelters under ground, but ſuch as were obliged to be upon duty. Boufflers himſelf, being unuſed to this way of fighting, began to wiſh himſelf in the open field, and formed a deſign to break through the confederates camp with his cavalry, but the king, having notice of it, ordered ſtrong guards to be placed at all places, where the Sambre could be paſſed; and, the ſame being done all along the Maeſe by general Fleming, the marſhal muſt now ſhare the fate of his garriſon. However, on the 18th, towards midnight, they made a ſally with two hundred dragoons mounted, and five hundred grenadiers. Of the latter one hundred and fifty made the attack on the right-hand, but were repulſed by the count de Rivera, and the reſt on the left, where lord Cutts had juſt poſted the advanced guard to ſecure the workmen. The dragoons fell upon lieutenant-colonel Sutton, who, being poſted in the plain of Salſines, with about forty fuzileers, let them come on till they were near him; then gave them a round volley, and retreated to his body; but, the dragoons preſſing on him, he commanded his men to give them another volley. The French received it undauntedly, preſſed on, and, if their grenadiers had charged at the ſame time, would doubtleſs have cauſed a great confuſion in the trenches; but the Spaniſh and Bavarian horſe, who were near, fell upon the enemy with ſo much vigour, that they drove them to the very paliſſadoes of the caſtle, killing ſome, and taking others priſoners.

After the bombardment of Bruſſels, Villeroy, being conſiderably reinforced with all the troops, that could be ſpared out of the garriſons, and the forces from the ſea-coaſts, marched directly towards Namur, with an army, as the French themſelves gave out, of no leſs than ninety thouſand men, and with which they confidently boaſted to raiſe the ſiege of the caſtle. Upon the enemies advancing from Enghien to Soignes, prince Vaudemont, in conjunction with the earl of Athlone, and a reinforcement of ten battalions and eighteen ſquadrons, which the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel had brought up from the Rhine, poſſeſſed himſelf on the 8th of Auguſt of the ſtrong camp of Mazy, within five Engliſh miles of Namur. The Frency army being in the mean time come as far as Flerus, they gave the beſieged a ſignal of their approach, by the diſcharge of ninety pieces of cannon, which was anſwered by a great light ſet on the higheſt part of the caſtle. This obliged the king to leave the care of the ſiege to the elector of Bavaria and the duke of Holſtein Ploen, and to repair to the army on the 26th of Auguſt, with a reſolution to oppoſe the French, who ſeemed now fully bent to attack him, being lately reinforced by a detachment from Germany, and other troops, under the command of the marquis d'Harcourt. On the 29th of Auguſt, Villeroy advanced towards the confederates, then ſtill incamped near Mazy, but found them ſo well poſted, that he thought fit to retire in the night without noiſe. The next day he moved along the Mehaigne, extending his right to Perwys and his left to the abbey of Boneffe. Whereupon the king cauſed his army to move towards Oſtin and Long Champ to obſerve them: and ſent orders to the marquis de la Foreſt, who commanded a body of reſerve in the plain of Boneffe, to return to the main army. The enemy perceiving, that the confederates had made a halt on the hill behind Long Champ, ſent ſeveral ſquadrons of the French king's houſhold over the Mehaigne, in order to charge the marquis de la Foreſt, between whom and the French there happened a ſmall ſkirmiſh, as far as a defile, which being ſecured by the dragoons of Dopft, the enemy went no further, but repaſſed the Mehaigne in great haſte. All theſe marches and counter marches of Villeroy, did not hinder the king from detaching the day before three thouſand grenadiers from his army, to be employed in the general aſſault of the caſtle, which he had concerted with prince Vaudemont, the elector of Bavaria, and other general officers.

On the 30th of Auguſt, the day appointed for this memorable action, the beſiegers began early to batter the breaches of Coehorn fort and Terra Nova, and continued till eleven of the clock, when the elector ſent count Horn, accompanied by the earl of Portland, to ſummon the beſieged. The batteries having ceaſed firing, count Horn called to the enemy, and told count de Lamont, commander of the French foot, (who appeared on the next baſtion, attended by the marquis of Gramont and St. Hermine,) that the marſhal de Villeroy, after having been three days in ſight of the confederate army, had thought fit to retire towards the Mehaigne without fighting: That the garriſon could not expect now to be relieved: And that his electoral highneſs, being willing to ſpare the lives of ſo many brave men on both ſides, had charged him to offer honourable terms to count Guiſcard, if he would ſurrender; but that he gave him but a quarter of an hour to deliberate upon the propoſals. Count Lamont took upon him to acquaint count Guiſcard and marſhal de Boufflers with Count Horn's meſſage, and promiſed to bring back a ſpeedy anſwer; but not returning in half an hour, count Horn grew impatient, and told the marquis of Gramont, that he already outſtaid his time, and therefore deſired him to ſend ſome perſon to the governor for an immediate anſwer. A ſecond meſſenger, upon this was ſent away; but he tarrying alſo above a quarter of an hour, and ſeveral officers of the garriſons being come to view the breach of Terra Nova, the earl of Portland did not think it convenient to wait any longer. Thus the parley was broke, and the batteries played inceſſantly againſt the breaches till between one and two, when the general aſſault began in the following manner.

The ſignal being given, lord Cutts[c], at the head of three hundred grenadiers, ruſhed out of the trenches of the ſecond line, which were ſeven or eight hundred paces diſtant from the breach of Terra Nova, where he was commanded to lodge himſelf; and colonel Marſilly marched on his right to poſſeſs himſelf of the line of communication next Coehorn fort. Count de Rivera, major general of the Bavarians, with three thouſand men, marched out of the trenches of the firſt line in order to attack the breaches of Coehorn fort. Major general la Cave advanced to attempt the ſame fort at the point; and major general Swerin marched againſt the Caſotte with two thouſand Brandenburghers. The Engliſh grenadiers under lord Cutts, hurried on by their native ardour, and animated by the example of their leader, and of colonel Windſor, colonel Stanhope, Mr. Thompſon, and ſeveral other Engliſh gentlemen, who expoſed themſelves as volunteers, ran faſter towards the enemy, than they could be followed by the battalions of Coulthorp, Buchan, Hamilton, and Mackay, who moved from Salſines to ſupport them. The grenadiers mounted the breach without oppoſition, the enemy not expecting to be attacked on that ſide by reaſon of the great diſtance of the trenches. But as ſoon as the French ſaw, that thoſe bold adventurers were not ſuſtained, they brought down two thouſand of their beſt foot and dragoons into the ſpace between the Coehorn and the Terra Nova, to fall on the Engliſh in flank and in rear; which obliged them to make a ſpeedy retreat. The beſieged made a ſhew of purſuing them, but by this time, three of the forementioned regiments being come up to their aſſiſtance, the French retired through the breach of Terra Nova, after having ſurpriſed and defeated the five hundred men under colonel Marſilly. The colonel himſelf being wounded was made priſoner, and ſoon after killed by a cannon ball from the beſiegers batteries, with the French officer, who had carried him into the caſtle. The Engliſh, having borne ſix ſeveral diſcharges, had ſeveral men killed and wounded; and among the latter was the lord Cutts himſelf, who received a ſhot in his head, which diſabled him for ſome time.

Whilſt this paſſed on the ſide of Terra Nova, count de Rivera with the Bavarians, inſtead of marching to the left of the platform went a little too much to the right, towards the covered way, which was well paliſſadoed, and thick ſet with muſketeers, who made a terrible fire. Through this miſtake, inſtead of ſtorming the two ſmall breaches of the angle of the platform, according to the ſcheme made for this attack, the Bavarians attempted to force the covered-way before the great breach; whereby they remained expoſed for two hours to the enemies double fire, which killed them abundance of men, and amongſt them count Rivera himſelf, with moſt of the officers of the Bavarian guards.

The lord Cutts, impatient to return to the engagement, could ſcarce ſtay to have his wounds dreſſed. He put himſelf again at the head of his brave countrymen; but finding the aſſault of the Terra Nova not poſſible to be retrieved, and obſerving that the Bavarians, notwithſtanding the loſs of their leader, had fixed themſelves upon the outermoſt retrenchment of the point of the Coehorn next to the Sambre, and maintained that poſt with great obſtinacy, but could not gain any more ground, he reſolved to make good their attack. To effect this, he ordered, that a detachment of two hundred men ſhould be made out of ſuch, as were moſt forward to ſignalize themſelves, whom he ſtill encouraged by promiſes of rewards; that thoſe ſhould be ſuſtained by the regiment of Mackay, and that the other Engliſh forces ſhould rally and follow as ſoon as poſſible. Being come to the place of action, he detached a party of thoſe two hundred choſen men, headed by lieutenant Cockle of Mackay's regiment, whom he ordered to attack the face of the Saillant Angle, next to the breach, ſword in hand, without firing a gun; to paſs the paliſſadoes, and enter the covered-way; and there to make a lodgment, if they found any place capable of it. And at the ſame time he commanded the enſigns of Mackay's regiment to march ſtrait to the paliſſadoes, and place their colours upon them. All this was ſo well executed, that lieutenant Cockle, breaking through the paliſſadoes, beat the enemy from the covered-way, lodged himſelf in one of the batteries, and then turned their own cannon againſt them. On the other hand, whilſt Mackay's enſigns advanced to the paliſſadoes, the Bavarians renewed their attack with undaunted vigour; and ſo this poſt was made good. The troops were already ſo fatigued by an aſſault, that had laſted ſeveral hours, that the beſiegers contented themſelves to have gained the covered-way, before the breach of the Coehorn, and the Saillant Angle towards the Sambre, and to make a lodgment there, without any further attempt upon the breach. However, this ſeaſonable reinforcement, which the lord Cutts brought to the Bavarians, had this further good effect, that it kept the enemy employed in the defence of this moſt important poſt; which very much facilitated major-general La Cave's enterprize upon the covered-way before the ravelin, and upper part of the Coehorn, and ſo up towards the Caſotte, where he lodged himſelf without any conſiderable loſs. On the other hand, major-general Swerin, who commanded the right attack of all before the Caſotte, made up boldly towards the covered-way and retrenchment between the Caſotte and the Maeſe; drove the enemy from their poſts; ſecured all the avenues; and made a very good lodgment all along this covered-way and retrenchment of about three hundred paces; which he extended to the left, turning in towards the Coehorn about a hundred and forty paces more, to join it to that of major-general La Cave, that reached to the ravelin of the Coehorn. Thus, although, for want of a due correſpondence among the ſeveral attacks, either by the failure or miſtake of the ſignals, the beſiegers miſcarried in their deſign of this general ſtorm, which was to have taken the caſtle, with all its prodigious outworks, all at once, yet they were now maſters of one of the greateſt lodgments, that ever was made in one aſſault, being near an Engliſh mile in extent. Such a vaſt lodgment could not be done in a moment; neither could the aſſault, which laſted till evening, be maintained without conſiderable loſs on both ſides. The beſiegers, by their own confeſſion, had two thouſand men killed or wounded, and among them many perſons of note. Count de Rivera; the colonels Coulthorp, Marſilly, and Lindroot; the baron de Heckeren; lieutenant-colonel Fabricius, of du Theil's regiment; and captain Mitchel of the Engliſh guards, were counted among the ſlain; and among the wounded were reckoned the prince of Holſtein Norburgh, and the lord Cutts; the prince of Heſſe-Homburgh; and nine colonels, Eppinger, Zinzenburgh, Caunits, count Horne, count Dona, Luzelburgh, Melun, count de Denhoff, and Hamilton; ſeveral officers of the Engliſh guards, particularly the colonels Winâſor, Stanhope, Evans, Mr. Thompſon (to whom the king gave a company of guards for his bravery); beſides a great many lieutenant-colonels, majors, captains, and ſubaltern officers of other regiments. The loſs of the beſieged in this action did not exceed ſix hundred men either killed or wounded. The elector of Bavaria expoſed himſelf to a degree not to be imagined, riding from place to place, and giving his orders, where the diſpute was moſt obſtinate, ſo that ſeveral perſons were killed and wounded about him. Neither was his electoral highneſs contented to encourage the officers and ſoldiers by his own example, but he animated the firſt by extolling their valour, and the latter by the more powerful incentives of immediate rewards, diſtributing handfuls of gold amongſt them. All the troops of the ſeveral nations behaved themſelves with equal intrepidity; however, it is remarked, that the Engliſh were the moſt bold and preſſing, the Bavarians the moſt firm, and the Brandenburghers the moſt ſucceſsful. In acknowledgment of which ſervice the king wrote with his own hand the following letter to the elector of Brandenburgh, afterwards king of Pruſſia:

"You intereſt yourſelf ſo far in the public good, that you muſt needs receive a particular ſatisfaction in hearing of the ſurrender of the caſtle of Namur, eſpecially conſidering, what ſhare you had in that enterprize, which could not poſſibly have ſucceeded without the aſſiſtance of your troops, whom I cannot enough commend, nor can be leſs pleaſed with the admirable conduct of your generals. They have gained to themſelves the greateſt glory and reputation by this action. And I aſſure you, it is impoſſible for any one to be more ſenſible of an obligation, than I am of that you have laid on me by aſſiſting me in an undertaking of ſuch conſequence, which God has vouchſafed to bleſs, and which, I hope, will be a conſiderable advantage to all the Allies. And you may aſſure yourſelf I ſhall omit no occaſion of giving you effectual proofs of my gratitude.'

The 31ſt of Auguſt was wholly ſpent by the beſiegers in perfecting the lodgment, which they had made the day before, and in preparing all things for a ſecond general aſſault; but the next day, the beſieged having demanded a ceſſation of arms to bury their dead, which was readily granted, the count de Guiſcard came upon the breach a little before the truce was over, and deſired to ſpeak with the elector of Bavaria. The elector having mounted the breach, the count offered to ſurrender the Coehorn fort; but the elector anſwering, that, if he would capitulate, it muſt be for the whole, count Guiſcard replied, that the marſhal de Boufflers commanded in the caſtle, and that he would let him know; and deſired, that in the mean while the ceſſation of arms might be continued; to which the elector having agreed, Boufflers conſented to treat for the whole, and an adjutant was immediately diſpatched, to give the king an account of it at Oſtin. The adjutant met the king with prince Vaudemont, coming to the ſiege in his coach, to give directions concerning a further attack. Upon his arrival hoſtages were exchanged, and propoſitions brought from the caſtle, the chief of which was, that they might have ten days to expect ſuccours. This being denied, the French, after ſome debates among themſelves, were contented to receive ſuch terms, as the elector, with the king's conſent, would grant them, being ſuch as are uſual upon the ſurrender of a ſtrong fortreſs, whoſe garriſon had made a gallant defence. The capitulation was agreed on that very night, and ſigned the next morning; and part of the outworks were given up preſently after to the Allies, the beſiegers having three days more allowed them to evacuate the caſtle. It is remarkable, that Guiſcard obliged Boufflers to ſign the articles, becauſe he had commanded in the caſtle during the ſiege: Whereas the count had only commanded in the Coehorn and the outworks; and that this perhaps was the firſt capitulation, that was ever ſigned by a marſhal of France; which was ſo much more to the honour of the confederate arms, that they took this almoſt impregnable place in ſight of another marſhal of France, who was advanced to relieve it with an hundred thouſand men, but was only a ſpectator of the bravery of the former, and of the conſummate prudence of the king of Great-Britain, under whoſe conduct and direction all was happily atchieved; it being univerſally acknowledged, that no ſiege was ever carried on with more regularity.

The 1ſt of September, the two armies obſerved one another; but the next day Villeroy being informed of the ſurrender of the caſtle of Namur, by a triple diſcharge of all the artillery, and three ſalvos in a running fire along the lines of the confederate army, he retired from his camp at Gemblours, and paſſed the Sambre near Charleroy with great precipitation. Upon advice of this motion the king ordered ſeveral brigades towards Salſines, and a bridge to be laid over the Sambre, to oppoſe the enemy, in caſe they ſhould make any attempt between the Sambre and the Maeſe, whilſt the French garriſon was ſtill in poſſeſſion of the Terra Nova. But it appeared that Villeroy had quite laid aſide all thoughts of fighting; for, having ſent two thouſand men to reinforce the garriſon of Dinant, he marched with the reſt of his army towards the lines near Mons.

On the 5th of September, the day prefixed for the French to evacuate the caſtle, the horſe and foot, that were incamped between the Sambre and the Maeſe, were commanded to make a lane on both ſides from the breach of Terra Nova, through which the garriſon was to march out up the hill, and ſo down again to the Maeſe, to the way that leads to Givet, whither it was agreed they ſhould be ſafely conducted. About ten of the clock in the morning the garriſon, which from fourteen thouſand was reduced to five thouſand five hundred and thirty-eight men, began their march. Marſhal Boufflers's guard de corps went out firſt; then his domeſtics, and next himſelf, with count de Guiſcard, the governor, at the head of the king's and Alfeld's dragoons, as many as were mounted, between eighty and ninety in all. The king was incognito in a coach, and the elector of Bavaria, the landgrave of Heſſe, and the chief officers of the army on horſeback to ſee them paſs within two hundred paces of the breach, and were ſaluted by the French marſhal and count with their ſwords. This civility was ſcarce over, when monſieur Dyckvelt, accoſted Boufflers with a meſſage, which ſomewhat diſcompoſed his countenance; and, as they were riding up to the top of the hill, monſieur de L'Etang, brigadier of the life-guards, made up to the marſhal, with about twelve of the gentlemen of that corps, and arreſted him in his Britannic majeſty's name, by way of repriſal for the garriſons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe, which, as has been ſaid, were detained and ill treated by the French, contrary to the cartel. The marſhal ſeemed at firſt very much incenſed, alledging, in a broken ſpeech, 'That the laws and cuſtoms of war were violated, and particularly the capitulation lately ſigned by the duke of Bavaria, wherein he was expreſsly mentioned: That the king of France, his maſter, would reſent his treatment of a man of his character, and revenge it to the utmoſt of his power: And that, for his own part, he had defended the place like a man of honour, and did not deſerve it.' To this monſieur Dyckvelt replied, 'The the French king, his maſter, by detaining the garriſons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe, contrary to their capitulation (by which they were made priſoners of war, and conſequently ſhould have been diſcharged within the limited time, paying their ranſom, which was offered) had forced his Britannic majeſty to that way of demanding ſatisfaction for that infraction: That the marſhal's being arreſted was not out of any diſreſpect to his perſon, but rather the contrary; for, when it was propoſed to the king of Great-Britain to detain the whole garriſon by way of repriſal, his majeſty had expreſſed ſo much value of his perſon, that he looked upon him as a ſufficient caution to anſwer for ſix thouſand men, the number of the two garriſons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe; but at the ſame time he had his majeſty's order to offer him his liberty, if he would paſs his word for ſending back the ſaid garriſons, or to return himſelf a priſoner within a fortnight.' To which Boufflers anſwered, 'That he could not paſs his word of honour in a matter, which he could not execute himſelf: That, if he were at the head of fifty-thouſand men, he would not ſuffer himſelf to be arreſted; but now he muſt ſubmit.' Having ſaid this, he put up his ſword, and went back with his domeſtics to Namur, where the earl of Portland gave him a viſit, and told him as from himſelf, 'That he made no doubt of his releaſement upon his parole of honour.' But the marſhal anſwered, 'That, in regard he knew not the reaſons why his maſter detained thoſe garriſons, he could not engage for any thing.' From Namur he was conducted to Maeſtricht, and treated in both places with all the civility and reſpect due to his quality. His confinement was not long; for upon the return of the captain of his guard, whom he ſent to give the French king an account of what had happened, and the marſhal's engaging his word, that the garriſons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe ſhould be ſent back, as ſoon as he himſelf ſhould be ſet at liberty, the king ordered the governor of Maeſtricht to releaſe him, and give him a guard to conduct him ſafe to Dinant.

The taking of Namur was reckoned one of the greateſt actions of the king's life, and indeed, one of the greateſt that is in the whole hiſtory of war. It raiſed his character much, both at home and abroad, and gave a great reputation to his troops: The king had the entire credit of that matter; his general officers having a ſmall ſhare in it, being moſt of them men of low genius, and little practiſed in things of that nature. Coehorn, the chief engineer, ſignalized himſelf ſo eminently on this occaſion, that he was looked on as the greateſt man of the age; and out-did even Vauban, who had gone far beyond all thoſe, that went before him, in the conduct of ſieges: But it was confeſſed by all, that Coehorn had carried that art to a much farther perfection during this ſiege. The ſubaltern officers and ſoldiers gave hopes of a better race, that was growing up, and ſupplied the errors and defects of their ſuperior officers.

The officers were tried and proceeded againſt by councils of war, according to martial law; they were raiſed in the army by ill methods, and maintained themſelves by worſe; corruption had broke into the army, and oppreſſion and injuſtice were much complained of; the king did not approve of thoſe practices; but he did not inquire after them, nor puniſh them, with a due ſeverity; nor did he make difference enough between thoſe who ſerved well, ſold nothing, and uſed their ſubalterns kindly, and thoſe who ſet every thing to ſale, and oppreſſed all that were under them; and, when things of that kind go unpuniſhed, they will ſoon make a great progreſs.

The news of the ſurrender of the caſtle of Namur no ſooner reached England, but it filled the hearts of all the well-affected to the government with great joy; and the king's expreſſing his juſt reſentment for the affront put upon him, by the detaining the garriſons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe, was highly applauded. The lord juſtices having appointed a day of public thankſgiving for the ſucceſs of his majeſty's arms, the ſame was religiouſly obſerved in London, and throughout all England. But, amidſt theſe rejoicings, the diſaffected remained, as it were, thunderſtruck; and indeed their diſappointment was very great; for not only their hopes of ſeeing the confederates attempt upon Namur baffled were defeated, but many of them were ruined by the loſs of conſiderable wagers, which they had laid upon it. Among theſe wagerers was the famous Dr. Davenant.

The king, having left the command of the army to the elector of Bavaria, went to Dieren, and from thence to Loo, his uſual receſs for diverſion and buſineſs; whilſt both armies continued in the field till the 25th of September, and then began to ſeparate. The French king's houſehold returned into their quarters, and moſt of the reſt of his troops retired within the lines. As for the Allies, their forces were diſtributed into ſeveral neighbouring garriſons, except ſome detachments, which marched towards Newport, under the command of the prince of Wirtemberg, for the ſecurity of that place. And thus ended the campaign in Flanders.

Nor was there any action upon the Rhine, where both armies were ſo equal in ſtrength, that they could only lie on the defenſive; neither ſide being ſtrong enough to undertake any thing. M. de l'Orge commanded the French, and the prince of Baden the Imperialiſts. L'Orge was ſinking as much in his health as in his credit; ſo a great body, as has been ſaid, was ordered to march from him to Villeroy, whilſt another equal to that, commanded by the landgrave of Heſſe, came and joined the king's army before Namur.

In Italy, there was nothing done in the field by force of arms: But an affair of great conſequence was tranſacted, in a very myſterous manner; the duke of Savoy, after a very long blockade, undertook the ſiege of Caſal; but he was ſo ill provided for it, that no good account of it could be expected; the king had ſo little hopes of ſucceſs, that he was not eaſily prevailed on to conſent to the beſieging it, but either the French intended to gain the pope and the Venetians, and, in concluſion, that duke himſelf, with this extraordinary conceſſion; or, ſince our fleet was then before Thoulon, they judged it more neceſſary to keep their troops, for the defence of their coaſt and fleet, than to ſend them to relieve Caſal; ſo orders were ſent to the governor to capitulate, in ſuch a number of days, after the trenches were opened: So that the place was ſurrendered, though it was not at all ſtreightened: It was agreed, that it ſhould be reſtored to the duke of Mantua, but ſo diſmantled, that it might give jealouſy to no ſide; and the ſlighting the fortifications went on ſo ſlowly, that the whole ſeaſon was ſpent in it, a truce being granted all that while. Thus did the French give up Caſal, after they had been at a vaſt expence in fortifying it, and had made it one of the ſtrongeſt places in Europe.

The Engliſh fleet was all the ſummer maſter of the Mediterranean. The French were put under great diſorder, and ſeemed to fear a deſcent: for Ruſſel came before Marſeilles and Thoulon oftener than once, and contrary winds forced him out again, but with no loſs. Though it was his opinion, that nothing could be done there, yet the honour of commanding the ſea, and of ſhutting the French within their ports, gave a great reputation to our affairs.

In Catalonia, the French made no progreſs, they abandoned Palamos, and made Gironne their frontier. The Spaniards once pretended to beſiege Palamos, but they only pretended to do it; they deſired ſome men from Ruſſel, for he had regiments of marines on board: They ſaid they had begun the ſiege, and were provided with every thing that was neceſſary to carry it on, only they wanted men; ſo he ſent them ſome battalions; but, when they came thither, they found not any one thing, that was neceſſary to carry on a ſiege, not ſo much as ſpades, not to mention guns and ammunition: So Ruſſel ſent for his men again. But the French of themſelves quitted the place; for as they found the charge of the war in Catalonia was great, and though they met with a feeble oppoſition from the Spaniards, yet ſince they ſaw, they could not carry Barcelona, ſo long as our fleet lay in thoſe ſeas, they reſolved to lay by, in expectation of a better occaſion. We had another fleet in our own channel, that was ordered to bombard the French coaſt; They did ſome execution upon St Malo's, and deſtroyed Grandville, that lay lay not far from it: They alſo attempted Dunkirk, but failed in the execution; ſome bombs were thrown into Calais, but without any great effect; ſo that the French did not ſuffer ſo much by the bombardment as was expected. The country indeed was much alarmed by it; they had many troops diſperſed all along their coaſt; ſo that it put their affairs in great diſorder, and we were every where maſters at ſea. Another ſquadron, commanded by the marquis of Caermarthen (whoſe father was created duke of Leeds, to colour the diſmiſſing him from buſineſs, with an increaſe of title) lay off from the iſles of Scilly, to ſecure our trade, and convoy our merchants: He was an extravagant man, both in his pleaſures and humours; he was ſlow in going to ſea; and when he was out, he fancied the French fleet was coming up to him, which proved to be only a fleet of merchant ſhips: ſo he left his ſtation, and retired into Milford Haven: by which means, that ſquadron became uſeleſs.

This proved fatal to our trade, many of our Barbadoes ſhips were taken by French cruizers and privateers: two rich ſhips, coming from the Eaſt-Indies, were alſo taken, an hundred and fifty leagues to the Weſtward, by a very fatal accident, or by ſome treacherous advertiſement; for cruizers ſeldom go ſo far into the ocean. And to complete the misfortunes of the Eaſt-India company, three other ſhips, that were come near Galway, on the weſt of Ireland, fell into the hands of ſome French privateers. Thoſe five ſhips were valued at a million, ſo here was great occaſion of diſcontent in the city of London. They complained, that neither the admiralty, nor the government, took the care that was neceſſary for preſerving the wealth of the nation. A French man of war, at the ſame time, fell upon our factory on the coaſt of Guinea; he took the ſmall fort we had there, and deſtroyed it; theſe misfortunes were very ſenſible to the nation, and did much abate the joy, which ſo glorious a campaign would otherwiſe have raiſed; and much matter was laid in for ill humour to work upon.

The king, having ſettled with the States General the ſtate of the war for the next year, embarked in the Maeſe, aboard the William and Mary yatch, and the next day ſafely landed at Margate, being attended in his paſſage by a ſquadron of Engliſh and Dutch men of war, commanded by ſir Cloudeſly Shovel. That night the king lay at Canterbury, and next day came through London and Weſtminſter to Kenſington; the people expreſſing their great joy for his ſafe return, by loud acclamations, illuminations, and bonfires.

The king was no ſooner arrived at Kenſington, but he called a council, wherein it was debated, whether a new parliament ſhould be ſummoned, or the old one be brought together again, which by the law, that was lately paſſed, might ſit till Lady-day. It was urged, that the happy ſtate, which the nation was in, had put all men, except the merchants, in a good temper. None could be ſure, that affairs ſhould be in ſo good a ſtate the next year; ſo that now probably elections would fall on men, who were well affected to the government. A parliament, which ſaw itſelf in its laſt ſeſſion, might affect to be froward, ſince the members, by ſuch a behaviour, might hope to recommend themſelves to the next election. Beſides, if the ſame parliament ſhould be continued, probably the inquiries into corruption would be carried on, which might divert them from more preſſing affairs, and kindle greater heats; all which might be more decently dropped by a new parliament, than ſuffered to lie aſleep by the old one. Theſe conſiderations prevailed, though it was ſtill believed, that the king's own inclinations led him to have continued the parliament one ſeſſion longer; for he reckoned, that he was ſure of the majority. Thus this parliament was brought to a concluſion, and a new one was ſummoned by proclamation to meet at Weſtminſter, the 22d of November.

The late ſucceſs of the king's arms inclined many perſons to chuſe members well affected to him. The Jacobites were ſo decried, that few of them were elected; but many of the ſourer ſort of whigs, who were much alienated from the king, were choſen. Theſe were generally men of eſtates, but many of them young, hot, and without experience.

During the elections for the new parliament, the king made a progreſs to the north, in the courſe of which he ſtudied to conſtrain himſelf to a little more openneſs and affability, than was natural to him: but his cold and dry way had too deep a root, not to return too frequently upon him. He began his progreſs with the diverſions at Newmarket, and where he received the compliments of the Univerſity of Cambridge; and having ſtayed there three days, on the 21ſt of October went to Althorp, in Northamptonſhire, a ſeat of the earl of Sunderland, which was the firſt public mark of the high favour, that earl was in. Whilſt there, he made a viſit to the earl of Northampton at Caſtle-Aſhby, and to the earl of Montague at Boughton, and was ſplendidly entertained at both places. From Althorp he went to Stamford, and in his way took a view of Burghley-houſe without ſeeing the owner; and proceeded to Lincoln, attended by ſeveral of the nobility and a great train of gentlemen, who reſorted from all the neighbouring parts to ſee him; and having heard prayers at the cathedral, he purſued his journey to Welbeck, the duke of Newcaſtle's ſeat in Nottinghamſhire. Here Dr. Sharp, archbiſhop of York, with his clergy waited upon him the 2d of November, and congratulated his happy ſucceſs and ſafe return; expreſſed their gratitude for his care of the church, w[illegible] he ſhewn himſelf truly Defender of the Faith; aſſured him of their fidelity and loyalty; prayed for all bleſſings to attend him; and recommended themſelves to his protection, which his majeſty aſſured them of, and of all other demonſtrations of grace and favour. The next day the king left Welbeck, and came that evening to the earl of Stamford's at Broadgate. On the 4th of November, he went to the lord Brooke's, at Warwick caſtle; from whence he departed the next day, and dined, with the duke of Shrewſbury at Eyefort, arrived in the evening at Burford, and three days after came to Woodſtock [d]. From this place he went on the 9th of November to Oxford, and was met at ſome diſtance from thence by the duke of Ormond, chancellor of that univerſity, the vice-chancellor, and the doctors in their habits, as alſo by the magiſtrates of the city in their formalities; and, the compliments of both being made to him, they proceeded to the eaſt gate of the ſchools, the conduit of the city running all the while with wine. The king alighting paſſed directly to the theatre, where Mr. Charles Codrington, fellow of All-Souls college, and afterwards governor of the Leeward iſlands, ſupplied the place of the univerſity orator, who happened to be indiſpoſed, and expreſſed the public thanks of the univerſity in an elegant ſpeech [e]. The chancellor on his knees made the uſual preſents, of a large Engliſh bible and common-prayer-book, the cuts of the univerſity, and a pair of gold fringe gloves. And becauſe it was expected, that the king would do the univerſity the honour of dining amongſt them, a magnificent banquet was prepared, with great variety of muſic. But, the duke or Ormond having communicated to him, a letter addreſſed to his grace by a nameleſs perſon, and dropped in the ſtreet the day before, wherein information was given of a pretended deſign to poiſon him at this entertainment, the king reſolved neither to eat nor drink, and immediately took coach for Windſor, declaring, as a reaſon of his ſhort ſtay, and his not going to ſee the colleges, 'That this was a viſit of kindneſs, not of curioſity, he having ſeen the univerſity before.' However this abrupt departure of the king might be reſented by the univerſity, they choſe for one of their repreſentatives ſir William Trumbal, ſecretary of ſtate.

The parliament being met the 22d of November, and the commons having choſen Mr. Foley again for their ſpeaker, the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"IT is with great ſatisfaction, that I meet you here this day, being aſſured of a good diſpoſition in my parliament, when I have had ſuch full proofs of the affection of my people, by their behaviour during my abſence, and at my return. I was engaged in this preſent war by the advice of my firſt parliament, who thought it neceſſary for the de-

[d] The king lay at Mr. Cary's, an old gentleman of near a hundred years of age, who had been ſervant to James I, Charles I, Oliver Cromwell, Charles II, James II, and was then ſervant to king William; of whom the following ſtory is told. "The king being informed of a humour of his in ſhewing his pictures, deſired to ſee them, and pretending not to know whom they were drawn for, aſked, of the firſt in order, who that was? 'That, replied Cary, was my good old maſter king James I, I ſerved him ſeveral years.' 'Who is the next,' ſays his majeſty. 'That, ſir, replied Cary, is my good maſter king Charles I, he was a good maſter to me, let them ſay what they will of him.' 'Pray who is the next,' the king ſaid. 'Why truly ſir, replied Cary, That is my maſter Oliver Cromwell, he too was my very good maſter; and ſo was the next there, king Charles II; and the next, king James II; and ſo now is your majeſty, whoſe picture there is ſtill room for." Whether the king gave him his picture does not appear, but he was pleaſed at the old gentleman's ſimplicity in his way of ſetting out his pictures, which it ſeems had been all given him.

[e] He was ſon of colonel Codrington, governor of the Leeward Iſlands, of which himſelf was alſo afterwards governor. He was alſo captain of a company of guards, and behaved very gallantly at the ſiege of Namur. He was a man of learning and wit, as well as bravery; the ſame to whom Creech dedicated his Latin edition of Lucretius with notes, and who left a fine library, and ten thouſand pounds in money to his college.

The

fence of our religion, and the preſervation of the liberties of Europe. The laſt parliament with great cheerfulneſs did aſſiſt me to carry it on; and I cannot doubt, but that your concern for the common ſafety will oblige you to be unanimouſly zealous in the proſecution of it. And I am glad, that the advantages which we have had this year, give us a reaſonable ground of hoping for further ſucceſs hereafter.

"Upon this occaſion I cannot but take notice of the courage and bravery, which the Engliſh troops have ſhewn this laſt ſummer, which, I may ſay, has anſwered their higheſt character in any age. And it will not be denied, that, without the concurrence of the valour and power of England, it were impoſſible to put a ſtop to the ambition and greatneſs of France.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I think it a great misfortune, that, from the beginning of my reign, I have been forced to aſk ſo many and ſuch large aids of my people; and yet I am confident you will agree with me in opinion, that there will be at leaſt as great ſupplies requiſite for carrying on the war by ſea and land this year, as was granted in the laſt ſeſſion; the rather, becauſe our enemies are augmenting their troops, and the neceſſity of increaſing our ſhipping does plainly appear.

"The funds, which have been given, have proved very deficient.

"The condition of the civil liſt is ſuch that it will not be poſſible for me to ſubſiſt, unleſs that matter be taken into your care.

"And compaſſion obliges me to mention the miſerable circumſtances of the French proteſtants, who ſuffer for their religion.

"And therefore, gentlemen, I moſt earneſtly recommend to you to provide a ſupply ſuitable to theſe ſeveral occaſions.

"I muſt likewiſe take notice of a great difficulty we lie under at this time, by reaſon of the ill ſtate of the coin, the redreſs of which may perhaps prove a further charge to the nation. But this is a matter of ſuch general concern, and of ſo very great importance, that I have thought fit to leave it entirely to the conſideration of my parliament. I did recommend to the laſt parliament the forming ſome good bill for the encouragement and increaſe of ſeamen. I hope you will not let this ſeſſion paſs without doing ſomewhat in it; and that you will conſider of ſuch laws, as may be proper for the advancement of trade, and will have a particular regard to that of the Eaſt Indies, leſt it ſhould be loſt to the nation. And, while the war makes it neceſſary to have an army abroad, I could wiſh ſome way might be thought of to raiſe the neceſſary recruits, without giving occaſion of complaint.

"My deſire to meet my people in a new parliament has made the opening of this ſeſſion very late; which I hope you will have ſuch regard to, as to make all poſſible diſpatch of the great buſineſs before you, and will call to mind, that by the long continuance of the laſt ſeſſion, we did not only loſe advantages, which we might have had at the beginning of the campaign, but gave the enemy ſuch an opportunity, as might have proved very fatal to us. And I am the more concerned to preſs this, becauſe of the great preparations, which the French make to be early in the field this year.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have had ſuch experience of your good affections, and I have ſuch an entire ſatisfaction in the choice, which my people have made of you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, that I promiſe myſelf a happy concluſion of this ſeſſion, unleſs you ſuffer yourſelves to be miſled into heats and diviſions, which being the only hope our enemies have now left, I make no doubt but you will entirely diſappoint by your prudence and love to your country."

Both houſes in their reſpective addreſſes, with great zeal and unanimity, congratulated the glorious ſucceſs of his majeſty's arms abroad and his ſafe return home; and likewiſe returned thanks for the truſt and confidence, which he repoſed in their affections; aſſuring him, that they would ſupport him againſt all his enemies foreign and domeſtic, and effectually aſſiſt him in the proſecution of the preſent war, in which he was engaged for the ſafety of England and liberty of Europe [f].

Before the proceedings of the parliament are related, it will not be improper to take a view of the difficulties that lay in their way. In defence of the new ſettlement the nation was involved in a very burdenſome war, with a formidable monarch, who, having eſpouſed the quarrel of the late abdicated king James, was uſing his utmoſt endeavours to reinthrone him. But, beſides this open enemy, there was a great deal to fear from the diſcontented at home. For, tho' the body of the nation was infinitely pleaſed with the late revolution, yet a conſiderable number, partly out of principle, partly out of intereſt, were impatient of their deliverance, which, in their opinion, was accompliſhed by unjuſtifiable means. Not only the Roman catholics, but a great number of proteſtants, and ſuch as were the creatures and dependents of the late government, were become enemies of the preſent ſettlement; and by open as well as clandeſtine ways, endeavoured to diſtreſs or ſubvert it. And all methods, which wit and malice could ſuggeſt, were employed to weaken the reputation of the government, and to increaſe the fears of the people. The public miniſters were traduced and expoſed to contempt. The loſſes, which befel the nation, were attributed to treachery or negligence, and highly aggravated; while, on the other hand, the advantages, which the king at any time obtained, were extenuated and ſlighted. The parliament, reſolving to carry on the war with vigour, were obliged to lay great taxes on the people; and, the war continuing ſo long, they could not be inſenſible of the burden. Of this the diſcontented took the advantage, and repreſented in all companies, that the government muſt of neceſſity ſink under its own weight; and theſe heavy taxes, by reducing the nation to extreme poverty, would inevitably prove its deſtruction. They never ceaſed declaiming on this popular ſubject, in hopes to make the people weary of a government, which was repreſented ſo burdenſome; and at laſt perſuade them rather to let in the deluge, than to be at the expence of maintaining their banks.

Beſides the profeſſed adherents to king James's intereſt, there were others, who, though great aſſerters of the late revolution, and averſe enough to a ſecond, yet, from ſome private diſguſts, perſonal quarrels, and diſappointments, grew ſour and uneaſy; and in order to gratify their reſentments, endeavoured to bring the adminiſtration into contempt. They were for breaking the confederacy, and againſt raiſing ſuch large ſums of money for carrying on the war. They were for diſtreſſing the government, but not for overturning it. In ſhort, they were againſt all things, which the known enemies of the preſent ſettlement were againſt, and for all things, which they were for, except the reſtoration of the late king; that is, they were for all means, that could certainly bring about the end, but not for the end itſelf. However, under this plauſible pretence of declaring againſt great taxes, and other popular oppoſitions, they thought to recommend themſelves to their country as great patriots; ſuppoſing, that the character of a patriot was, without diſtinction of times or perſons, to be ever againſt the court; though they could not but be ſenſible, that the preſervation of their religion, laws, and liberties, was inſeparably interwoven with that of the preſent ſettlement; that the face of affairs was ſo far altered by the revolution, that the intereſt of their country was plainly the ſame with that of the court; which appeared as well by the oppoſition that was made to it by all thoſe, whom theſe men themſelves ever looked upon as the greateſt promoters of popery and arbitrary power, as by the principles of liberty, by which the government was firſt ſet up, and without which it could not ſtand.

The French after taking of Namur (a blow which wounded them in ſo ſenſible a part) grew very diffident of the iſſue of the war. They expreſſed by their behaviour and language, how much their hopes of ſubduing England by open force were abated: and they could not but foreſee, that, if king William could appear in the field the next ſummer in the [f] The ducheſs of Marlborough, in the account of her conduct, (p. 113.) relates a particular, which ſhews that the reconciliation between the king and the princeſs of Denmark was not real. The princeſs, whilſt the king was congratulated upon his taking Namur, ſent him the following letter on that occaſion.

"SIR,

"Though I have been unwilling to give you the trouble of a letter upon any other occaſion, yet, upon one ſo glorious to your majeſty as the taking of Namur, I hope you will give me leave to congratulate your good ſucceſs which don't pleaſe me ſo much upon any other account, as for the ſatisfaction, that I am ſenſible your majeſty muſt needs feel in this great addition to the reputation of your arms. And I beg leave, Sir, to aſſure you, that, as no body is more nearly concerned in your intereſts, ſo nobody wiſhes more heartily for your happineſs and proſperity at home than,

"Your, &c,

"ANNE."

To this handſome compliment the king returned no anſwer.

It

ſame circumſtances, as he did the laſt, it would be very hard, if not impoſſible, for them to oppoſe his arms. To prevent this they had two things to wiſh and promote; one was to embroil the nation's affairs by creating mutinies at home, the other to ruin it's credit, and thereby diſable the king from carrying on the war abroad. The firſt they hoped would be effected by the ill ſtate of the coin; for to attempt it's cure, they judged, would alike produce ſuch inteſtine diſorders, as would prove the ruin of the nation. For this reaſon they engaged their friends in England to exert themſelves with the utmoſt diligence, to aggravate the inconveniencies of not recoining the ſilver money, if that ſhould be neglected; or to embarraſs, as much as they were able, the methods of recoining it, in caſe that ſhould be agreed on, and thereby make it grievous and inſupportable. And in caſe this great buſineſs ſhould, contrary to all probability, be accompliſhed without the confuſion, that was expected to follow, they were inſtructed to leave no arts untried, whereby they might deſtroy the public credit, and particularly that of the Bank of England, which was then the great ſupport of the nation, and was by experience found to be ſo the following ſummer, when it contributed ſo much to the ſupport of the army. If either of theſe deſigns, and much more if both ſucceeded, they were well ſatisfied it would be impoſſible for the king to appear in Flanders the next ſpring in that formidable manner he did the year before. Add to all this, that at this time, though it was plain by the event, that the nation had treaſure enough to ſupport the war, yet the ways of coming at it were grown very difficult. The former parliaments choſe rather to eſtabliſh funds for public ſupplies, than to uſe any methods of raiſing them within the year; divers branches of the king's revenue were by his own conſent ſubjected to great anticipations, and the moſt eaſy and obvious funds were already ſettled, and ſufficiently loaded; ſo that by the continuance of the war it became much harder for this than for the preceding parliaments, to find out ways to defray the charges of it. Such was the poſture of affairs, when this parliament met.

Four days after the meeting of the parliament the bill for regulating trials in caſes of high-treaſon, which had been ſo long purſued, was brought into the houſe of commons, and at laſt carried by the tories. The deſign of it ſeemed to be to make men as ſafe in all treaſonable conſpiracies and practices as was poſſible; it being enacted, 'that all perſons, indicted for high-treaſon, or miſpriſion of ſuch treaſon, ſhall have a copy of the whole indictment, but not the names of the witneſſes, five days at leaſt before they ſhall be tried; and ſhall be admitted to make their defence by council learned in the law, not exceeding two. That no perſon ſhall be indicted or attainted of treaſon, or miſpriſion of treaſon, but by the oaths and teſtimony of two lawful witneſſes, either both to the ſame overt-act, or one to one, and the other to another overt-act of the ſame treaſon, unleſs the party in open court confeſs the ſame, or ſtand mute, or refuſe to plead, or peremptorily challenge above thirty-five of the jury. That where two or more diſtinct treaſons of divers kinds ſhall be alledged in one bill of indictment, one witneſs to one, and another witneſs to another, ſhall not be deemed two witneſſes. That no perſon ſhall be proſecuted for any ſuch crime, unleſs the indictment be found within three years after the offence committed; provided and excepted, that any perſon deſigning or attempting to aſſaſſinate or poiſon the king may be proſecuted at any time, notwithſtanding the ſaid limitation. That all perſons, indicted of ſuch treaſon, or miſpriſion of treaſon, ſhall have copies of the pannel of the jurors, two days at leaſt before their trial, and ſhall have like proceſs to compel their witneſſes to appear for them, as is uſually granted to witneſſes againſt them. That no evidence ſhall be admitted of any overt-act, that is not expreſsly laid in the indictment. And that this act ſhall not extend to any impeachment or other proceedings in parliament; nor to any indictment for counterfeiting his majeſty's coin, his great ſeal, privy ſeal, ſign manual or ſignet.'

All theſe things were in themſelves juſt and reaſonable; and, if they had been moved by other men, and at another time, they would have met with little oppoſition. This act happened to paſs but a few days before the diſcovery of the aſſaſſination-plot, and the benefit of it was claimed and enjoyed by ſome of the conſpirators. It was obſerved, that thoſe members of both houſes, who chiefly promoted it, had been concerned in the illegal proſecutions for treaſon in the late reigns. When the bill was ſent up to the lords, the clauſe ſo often inſiſted on was again added, that to the trial of a peer all the peers ſhould be ſummoned, which was not eaſily carried; for thoſe, who wiſhed well to the bill looked on this as a device to have it dropped by the commons, as no doubt it was, and therefore they oppoſed the clauſe; but, contrary to the hopes of the court, the commons were ſo deſirous of the bill, that, when it came down to them, they agreed to the clauſe, on account of which the ſame bill had been ſo often rejected, and the act received the royal aſſent [g].

The many protections given to the ſervants of parliament-men, and the taking men into cuſtody upon complaints of the breach of thoſe protections, was really become a grievance to the ſubject; and therefore it was ordered, That all protections and written certificates of the members of this houſe be declared void in law, and be forthwith withdrawn and called in, and that none be granted for the future; and that if any ſhould be granted by any member, ſuch member ſhall be liable to the cenſure of this houſe; and that the privileges of their menial ſervants be obſerved according to law; and that, if any menial ſervant ſhall be arreſted and detained contrary to privilege, he ſhall, upon complaint thereof, made to the ſpeaker, be diſcharged by order from him: And that no perſon ſhall be taken into cuſtody upon complaint of any breach of privileges of this houſe, before the matter be firſt examined; which order was not to extend to any breach of privilege upon the perſon of any member of this houſe.

The next thing to be conſidered was the ſupply for the year 1696. The demand was ſtill very high, and there was a great arrear of deficiencies; however all was readily granted, amounting to five millions, twenty-four thouſand eight hundred fifty-three pounds [h], and lodged on funds that ſeemed to be very probable.

Purſuant to that part of the king's ſpeech relating to the civil liſt, and to the diſtreſſed condition of the French proteſtants, the commons alſo ſettled a fund for raiſing 500,000l. for the civil liſt, and 15,000l. a year for the French proteſtants [i].

The ill ſtate of the coin was the greateſt difficulty the nation now laboured under, a miſchief which the laſt parliament had attempted to cure, but which, through the application of too gentle remedies, was become almoſt deſperate. The diſaffected obſerved it with joy, and had their eyes and hopes long fixed on the effects this might produce. The jacobites propoſed to themſelves great matters from the deſtruction of credit and trade, which they doubted not would ſoon be the conſequence of this grievance; which though the friends to the government were fully convinced ought to be redreſſed; yet how to effect it, in ſuch a conjuncture, without bringing the nation into the utmoſt confuſion, was a very difficult taſk.

Purſuant to the clauſe in the king's ſpeech, the commons took the affair of the coin into conſideration, and there were great and long debates about the proper remedies. The firſt queſtion was, Whether it was neceſſary or expedient to recoin the ſilver money? The recoining was warmly oppoſed by the party, who hoped to embroil the matters. They alledged, 'this was no fit conjuncture for it, whilſt the nation was engaged in a burdenſome and doubtful war, by which the kingdom had already greatly ſuffered, and of which it

[g] It is remarkable, that, while this bill was depending in the lower-houſe, the lord Aſhley, afterwards earl of Shaftſbury, and author of the Characteriſtics, who was then a member of that houſe, and very zealous for the bill, and particularly that part of it, which allows council to a priſoner, and prepared a ſpeech in it's behalf, which thoſe, to whom he ſhewed it, thought a very proper one on the occaſion. But, when he ſtood up to ſpeak it in the houſe of commons, the great audience ſo intimidated him, that he loſt all memory, and was unable to proceed. The houſe, after giving him a little time to recover his confuſion, called loudly upon him to go on, when he proceeded to this effect: 'If I, Sir (addreſſing himſelf to the ſpeaker) who riſe only to give my opinion on the bill now depending, am ſo confounded, that I am unable to expreſs the leaſt of what I propoſed to ſay: what muſt the condition of that man be, who without any aſſiſtance is pleading for his life, and under apprehenſions of being deprived of it?' This ſudden turn of wit (which by ſome was imagined to be premeditated, though it really was not) is ſaid to be of ſervice in promoting the bill. Gen. Dict. Hiſt. and Crit. vol. IX. p. 179.

grew every day more ſenſible. That therefore the people, on whoſe good affection the government ſo much depended, ſhould not be provoked by freſh grievances greater than any they had yet felt, as thoſe would certainly be, that muſt ariſe from the calling in the ſilver coin. That, if this was done, however things might be managed and accommodated at home, it were impoſſible to maintain either the commerce or the war abroad; for neither the merchant could be paid his bills of exchange, nor the ſoldier receive his ſubſiſtence. That this was to lay the ax to the root, and to dig up the foundations of the government. That, if this deſign was proſecuted, trade muſt ſtand ſtill for want of mutual payments; whence ſuch diſorder and confuſion would certainly follow, as would diſcourage and diſhearten the people in the higheſt meaſure, if not drive them to a perfect deſpair, as deſpair would to the moſt terrible extremities. That therefore the recoining the money at this time was by no means to be attempted without hazarding all.'

It was alledged by thoſe of the contrary opinion, at the head of whom appeared Mr. Charles Montague, chancellor of the Exchequer, 'That the miſchief would be fatal, if a preſent remedy was not found out and applied. That, by reaſon of the ill ſtate of the coin, the change abroad was infinitely to the nation's prejudice. That the ſupplies, that were raiſed to maintain the army, would never attain their end, being ſo much diminiſhed and devoured by the unequal change and exorbitant præmium, before they reached the camp. That this was the unhappy cauſe, that the guineas advanced to thirty ſhillings, and foreign gold in proportion. That therefore to the nation's great loſs, not only the Dutch, but indeed all Europe, ſent that commodity to this market, and would continue to do ſo, till the nation ſhould be impoveriſhed and undone by plenty of gold. That we muſt exchange for their gold our goods or ſilver, till at laſt we ſhould have only guineas to trade withal, which no body could think our neighbours would be ſo kind to receive back at the value they were at here. That therefore this diſeaſe would every day take deeper root, infect the very vitals of the nation, and if not remedied, would ſoon become incurable. That our enemies muſt be extremely intimidated by ſo great an action, and would ſooner be induced to agree to honourable terms of peace, in caſe they ſaw us able to ſurmount this difficulty by retrieving the ill ſtate of the coin, on which their hopes of the nation's ſpeedy ruin ſo much depended. And that it would juſtly create a mighty eſteem abroad of the greatneſs and wiſdom of the parliament of England, which was able to conquer ſuch an obſtinate and almoſt inſuperable evil in ſuch a juncture of affairs [k].'

This matter being fully debated, the parliament reſolved to call in and recoin the ſilver money, chuſing to run the hazard of ſome great inconveniencies, by attempting the cure of the diſeaſe, than by their longer neglect of it to expoſe the kingdom to apparent ruin.

The next ſtep was to conſider, 'Whether the ſeveral denominations of the new money ſhould have the ſame weight and fineneſs with the old; or, Whether the eſtabliſhed ſtandard ſhould be raiſed?' This queſtion produced many debates. Thoſe who were for raiſing the ſtandard, alledged, 'That the price of an ounce of ſilver bullion was advanced to ſix ſhillings and three-pence; and therefore the ſtandard ought to be raiſed to an equality. That the raiſing of the ſtandard would prevent the exportation of the coin, which of late had been much practiſed, to the great prejudice of this kingdom. That it would prevent its being melted down; and that thereby people would be much encouraged to bring in their plate and bullion into the Mint.'

The other party, who were for preſerving the old ſtandard, urged, that the worth of money was relative, and to be rated by the meaſure of ſuch goods, labour, advice, ſkill, or other aſſiſtances, as could be purchaſed from another by our parting with it. That the value of money among foreigners, who lived under different municipal laws, was intrinſic, and conſiſted in its weight and fineneſs. That common conſent had given it this value for the common conveniency of ſupplying one another's wants. That the weight and fineneſs was the only worth, that other nations regarded in our coin, as we in theirs; all money being between ſubjects of different governments of no greater value, excepting the workmanſhip, than ſo many pieces of uncoined bullion. That therefore, ſhould our ſtandard be altered, we ſhould ſtill be upon the ſame foot with our neighbours; for, if we were to pay them for their goods, or exchange our money with theirs, whatever denomination we gave our money, they would in their change ever reduce it to an equality with theirs, and proportion the quantity and goodneſs of their commodities to the weight and fineneſs of the money they were to receive for them; ſo that, in reſpect of our foreign commerce, there was no reaſon to alter our ſtandard. That at home, if the ſtandard were raiſed, great confuſions would attend it; the landlord would be defrauded of a great part of his rents, and the creditor of his debts. That the ſeamen and ſoldiers would be wronged in their pay; and many the like injuries and inconveniences would happen. That it was no anſwer to ſay, that they might buy as much goods and conveniencies of life with this coin raiſed above its ſtandard, as they could before, becauſe, by degrees, the ſeller would infallibly raiſe the price of his goods, in proportion to the new raiſed ſtandard; and that of this there was an inſtance before them, all commodities being raiſed in their price, while guineas were paid for thirty-ſhillings. That whereas it was alledged, that the price of bullion was riſen to ſix ſhillings and three-pence, and therefore the ſtandard of the ſilver coin ought to be raiſed likewiſe; it was replied, That it was a thing impoſſible, that the price of ſilver could riſe and fall in reſpect of itſelf; That it was an unchangeable truth, than which no mathematical demonſtration could be clearer, that an ounce of ſilver would ever be worth another ounce of the ſame fineneſs, and no more; allowing ſome inconſiderable diſparity upon the account of the coin, if one ounce be in money, and the other in bullion. That it was true indeed, that the people commonly gave 6s. 3d. for an ounce of bullion; but that they gave only clipped pieces, that had no more than the ſound of ſhillings and pence, but were by no means the things themſelves; that is, they were not the ſtandard ſhillings of due weight and fineneſs, and were no more ſo in the juſt ſenſe of the word, than an ell is an ell, when the third part of it is cut off. That the caſe was ſo plain, that when they demanded of thoſe, who affirmed an ounce of bullion [k] The ſad ſtate of the money appears from the printed report concerning, 'An eſſay for the amendment of the ſilver coins, London 1695. The author firſt computes all the ſilver money coined in the reigns of Elizabeth, James I, and Charles I.

	l.	s.	d.
The ſilver ſterling monies coined in the reign of Eliz. excluſive of ſome baſe Iriſh monies, amounted to	4,632,932	3	2
The ſilver monies coined in the reign of James I. are computed at	1,700,000
In king Charles I's reign was coined of ſilver money	8,776,544	10	3
In all	15,109,476	13	5

Then he conſiders, how far this ſum is to be abated.

Firſt, all queen Elizabeth's crowns, half-crowns, groats, quarter-ſhillings, half-groats, three-half-penny pieces, three-farthing pieces, and half-pence, are wholly ſunk.

Secondly, great numbers of her ſhillings and ſixpences are melted down or loſt.

Thirdly, the crowns, groats, two-pences, pence, and half-pence of James I, and Charles I, are quite gone: with many of their half-crowns, ſhillings, and ſixpences. So that he reckons, there was not left above a third part of the whole, coined in thoſe three reigns l. 5,036,492

To this he adds the unmelted coins of Charles II, James II, and king William, which he ſuppoſed to amount to about 563,508

So the whole of the ſilver money clipped and unclipped, hoarded and current, then was 5,600,000

Of this ſum he reckons four millions conſiſted of clipped money, and the remaining million ſix hundred thouſand pounds to be unclipped, and lying in hoards or current in the remote countries.

The author proceeds to compute, how far the clipped pieces may have been diminiſhed in the weight. In order to this, he obſerves, that 1001. ſterling in ſilver, according to the ſtandard of the Mint, ought to be thirty-two pounds, three ounces, one penny-weight, and twenty-two grains Troy. Now there had been brought in promiſcuouſly, in the months of May, June, and July 1695, five hundred ſeventy-two bags, of one hundred pounds each,

	lb.	oz.	pw.	gr.
Which 572 bags, according to the ſtandard, ſhould have weighed, Troy weight,	18,451	6	16	8
But upon examination they weighed only	9,480	11	05	0
Deficiency	8,970	7	11	8
The weight of a hundred pounds ſterling, according to the ſtandard	32	3	1	22
The medium of the weight of each hundred pounds of the clipped money,	16	8	18	00
The medium of the deficiency,	15	6	3	22

Hence it appears, that the current ſilver coinswere diminiſhed near one half, about the proportion of 10, to 22. Conſequently, if there were four millions of clipped money to be re-coined, it would make but about two millions. So there would be a loſs of about that ſum. The real loſs proved to be 2,200,000l. as will be ſeen hereafter.

The preſent ſtandard for gold is twenty-two carats (or half ounces) of fine, and two carats of alloy. For the ſilver, eleven ounces two penny-weights fine, and eighteen penny-weights alloy. So that, in a pound Troy of ſilver, which is coined into ſixty-two ſhillings, there are eighteen penny-weights of alloy; and, in a pound Troy of gold, which is coined into forty-four pounds ten ſhillings, there is one ounce of alloy.

This

to be worth ſix ſhillings and three-pence, whether they meant ſix milled ſhillings and three-pence, they knew not what to reply; for this alteration of the value of bullion was merely in relation to diminiſhed money. And, to make it yet more evident, they urged, that it was matter of fact, that, with five ſhillings and two-pence of new milled money, they could buy as much bullion as they pleaſed; while thoſe who bought it with clipped pieces, paid ſix ſhillings and three-pence. That whereas it was urged, that the raiſing the ſtandard would prevent the exportation of our money, it was anſwered, that there was no other way poſſible to keep our money at home, than by out-trading our neighbours; that is by ſending them more commodities, or of greater value, than thoſe, which we received from them. For if, upon the balance, we were found in their debt, there was no way left but to pay it in coin or bullion; and that therefore, whatever denomination we gave our coin, we muſt be neceſſitated to ſend it abroad, if the commodities we exported could not pay our debts. And that all the other arguments for raiſing the ſtandard would ſink to the ground; in caſe theſe two, on which the reſt were built, had no reaſonable foundation.

After the debates on this ſubject, the commons reſolved to recoin the clipped money, according to the eſtabliſhed ſtandard of the Mint, both as to weight and fineneſs; and to make it more eaſy to the people, they voted a recompence for the deficiency of the clipped money; and that the loſs of ſuch clipped money ſhould be borne by the public, and a fund of 1,200,000l. ſettled for that purpoſe. Accordingly, for raiſing that ſum, a tax for ſeven years was laid upon all dwelling-houſes, except cottages (now called the window-tax) namely, two ſhillings yearly upon each houſe; four ſhillings upon every houſe having ten windows; and eight ſhillings upon ſuch houſes as have twenty windows over and above the two ſhillings.

The parliament was not inſenſible of the inconveniencies that would attend the calling in and recoining of the clipped money, the principal of which would be a ceſſation of payments, and thereupon an interruption of commerce. It was plain, that England could not ſubſiſt, unleſs ſome expedient was found out to ſupport its trade till the new money returned from the Mint; and ſince gold alone was not ſufficient for that purpoſe, to fix upon ſuch an expedient was a very difficult thing. They therefore agreed to call in the money by degrees; that, while ſome denominations of coin were ſuppreſſed, others might be current; hoping, that, before the laſt old money ſhould come in to be recoined, ſo much of the new might circulate from the Mint, as might ſufficiently anſwer the neceſſities of the nation. They reſolved therefore, firſt, 'That a day be appointed, after which no clipped crowns or half-crows, as alſo money clipped within the ring, be allowed in payment, or paſs, except only to the collectors of his majeſty's revenues or taxes, or upon loans or payments into the exchequer. Secondly, That a day be appointed, after which no clipped money ſhould paſs in any payment whatſoever. Thirdly, That a day be appointed for all perſons to bring in their clipped money, to be recoined into milled money; after which no recompence ſhould be made for the ſame.' The next day, an addreſs was ordered to be prepared, to deſire his majeſty to regulate the currency of clipped money, according to the preceding reſolution; which addreſs being drawn up, and reported by Mr. Montague, and afterwards preſented by him to the king, his majeſty cauſed a proclamation to be iſſued out accordingly. It is to be remarked, that the lords had already addreſſed the king to the ſame effect.

The days appointed by the king's proclamation for putting a ſtop to the currency of clipped money were ſo ſhort, that an immediate ſtop was thereby put to trade. This was partly occaſioned by the backwardneſs of the people to receive any old money, though allowed at preſent to paſs, upon an apprehenſion, that at laſt it would be left upon their hands; partly from the ſlowneſs of recoining in reſpect of the people's wants, though otherwiſe diſpatched with all the expedition imaginable in ſo great an affair; and partly by reaſon of the unequal intrinſic value between the new milled money, and thoſe pieces or denominations of the old, which were allowed to be current. For while the hammered money, and pieces not clipped within the ring were permitted to paſs for the preſent neceſſity of trade, nobody was willing to make payments in new money, which ſo much exceeded the old in its intrinſic worth' And therefore the new ſilver money, as faſt as it iſſued from the Mints and Exchequer, was in a great meaſure ſtopped in the hands of the firſt receivers; for none were diſpoſed to make payments in the new ſilver coin at the old ſtandard, when they could do it in clipped pieces ſo much below it. And thoſe, who had no payments to make, kept their new money as medals and curioſities in their cheſts; and there is reaſon to believe, that, at firſt, a great quantity of new money, by the help of the melting-pot, went abroad in ingots to purchaſe gold, which at this juncture was a very profitable commodity in England. Theſe inconveniencies being repreſented to the commons, the houſe in a grand committee conſidered the ſtate of the nation, and how to prevent the interruption of commerce, during the recoining of the clipped monies. After ſome debates on ſeveral days, the commons reſolved, 'Firſt, that the recompence for ſupplying the deficiency of clipped money ſhould extend to all clipped money, which was ſilver, though of a courſer alloy than the ſtandard. Secondly, that the collectors and receivers of his majeſty's aids and revenues be enjoined to receive all ſuch monies. Thirdly, that a reward of five pounds per cent. be given to all ſuch perſons, as ſhould bring in either milled or broad unclipped money, to be applied in the exchange of the clipped money throughout the kingdom. Fourthly, that a reward alſo of threepence per ounce be given to all perſons, who ſhould bring in wrought plate to the Mint to be recoined. Fifthly, that, for the ſooner bringing in the clipped money to be recoined, any perſons might pay in their whole next year's tax of four ſhillings in the pound in clipped money, at one convenient time appointed for that purpoſe. Laſtly, that commiſſioners be appointed in every county to pay or diſtribute the milled and broad unclipped money, and the new coined money, and to receive the clipped money.' Theſe reſolutions were formed into a bill, with a clauſe to prohibit the melting down and exportation of our coin or bullion, and to prohibit the uſe of plate in public houſes; which laſt article proved the beſt expedient to ſupply the Mints with bullion, there being at this time ſcarce any public houſe in England, that had not ſilver tankards and other utenſils of the ſame metal, which the owners choſe rather to carry to the Mint, and turn into ready money, than to keep ſo much uſeleſs and dead ſilver at home[1] [1695-6.] The lords having made ſeveral amendments to this bill, moſt of which, after ſome debates and conferences between both houſes, were diſagreed to by the commons, the chancellor of the exchequer, according to order, preſented to the houſe another bill 'For remedying the ill ſtate of the coin of this kingdom,' which paſſed both houſes and received the royal aſſent.

Upon a petition to the commons by divers merchants and traders, to deſire that the difficulties and loſſes in their trade and payments, occaſioned by the riſe of guineas, might be taken into conſideration; the houſe firſt ordered a bill to be brought in, 'For taking off the obligation and encouragement of coining guineas for a certain time;' and then proceeded to the lowering their value, wherein they met with ſome oppoſition. The reaſons againſt the ſinking the price of guineas were, that the people were eaſy and pleaſed with it: that abundance of people would be loſers, in whoſe hands the guineas ſhould at laſt be found, which would raiſe great diſturbance and clamour in the nation; that therefore it ought to be conſidered, how far it was fit to incenſe the common people in this juncture of affairs, who had already ſuffered ſo much by the war.

Thoſe, who were for reducing the price of guineas, argued, that there was as great reaſon to bring down guineas, as there was to recoin the ſilver money at the old ſtandard. And here they reckoned up the miſchiefs mentioned before on that head. That however the parliament might be obliged to manage by the neceſſity of affairs, and to ſuffer for a time the guineas to paſs at that exceſſive rate, that in ſome meaſure there might be a currency of money, while the Mints were employed in new coining the ſilver; yet now they were obliged to ſink the price nearer the old ſtandard, that the ſilver money might not be ſtopped and hoarded up as faſt as it iſſued out from the Mints. And that, whatever loſſes and inconveniencies the people might ſuffer by reducing of guineas, yet the miſchiefs that aroſe, and would daily increaſe from not doing it, infinitely overbalanced thoſe on the other ſide. Upon this the commons reſolved to lower the price of guineas; and, that they might do it with leſs grievance and diſquiet to the people, they at firſt reduced them from thirty to eight and twenty ſhillings; afterwards to twenty-ſix, till at laſt a clauſe was inſerted in the bill 'For encouraging the bringing plate to the Mint,' whereby they were ſettled at two and twenty ſhillings, from which they naturally ſunk to their former price of one and twenty ſhillings and ſix-pence. However, it is to be obſerved, that though the parliament lowered the value of the guineas, hoping by that means to bring

[1] This was grown to ſuch an extravagance that one ale houſe, near the Royal Exchange, had in ſilver tankards, to the value of above five hundred pounds.

bring out the new money into circulation, yet by the artifice and management of ſome men the people were made to believe, that the price of gold would be raiſed at the next ſeſſion; upon which many perſons, who had great ſums of guineas, kept them cloſe in their cheſts. By this means, though the circulation of the new money was a little promoted, yet that of guineas, by which the nation chiefly ſubſiſted, was conſiderably obſtructed; the new ſilver money too, which the people were likewiſe induſtriouſly perſuaded to believe would be advanced in value, when the parliament ſhould come next together, was for that reaſon in a great meaſure hoarded up, to the great damage of commerce.

Another evil aroſe during the recoining of the money, a general loſs of credit which indeed ſhook the ſtate. But this was cured by a ſeaſonable and wiſe remedy, which the parliament applied the next ſeſſion; and on the other hand ſuch diligence was uſed, not only in the Mint of the Tower, but likewiſe in thoſe, which the king cauſed to be ſet up in York, Briſtol, Exeter, and Cheſter, that at laſt this great undertaking of the higheſt difficulty, yet of abſolute neceſſity, was happily accompliſhed, to the immortal honour of the parliament in general, and in particular of Mr. Charles Montague, who had the chief management of this weighty and arduous affair, which was executed with an order and juſtice, and quiet and exactneſs, beyond all men's expectation; ſo that the nation was freed from a great and threatening miſchief, without any of thoſe effects, which were generally apprehended from it, and, in leſs than a year's time, England, that had for ſo many years the worſt money of any nation in Europe, had then the beſt, to the great diſappointment of the jacobites, who had conceived great hopes of throwing the nation into confuſion.

The proceedings in parliament upon another affair gave the king no ſmall uneaſineſs. The 14th of December, the lords, in a conference, communicated to the commons an addreſs to his majeſty, in relation to an act of parliament made in Scotland for erecting a company trading to Africa and the Eaſt-Indies; to which addreſs the commons gave their concurrence; and a committee was appointed to examine, What methods were taken for obtaining that act? Who were the ſubſcribers to that company? And who were the promoters and adviſers of it? Both houſes attended the king with their addreſs, wherein they repreſented to him, 'That, having taken into their conſideration the ſtate of the trade of this kingdom, they found, that, beſides many other diſadvantages and difficulties it now lay under, an act of parliament, which had lately received his majeſty's royal aſſent in his kingdom of Scotland, for erecting a company trading to Africa and the Indies, was like to bring many great prejudices and miſchiefs to all his majeſty's ſubjects, who were concerned in the wealth or trade of this nation. That the ſaid act did provide, "That all ſhips, merchandize, and other effects whatſoever, belonging to that company, ſhould be free from all manner of reſtraints or prohibitions, and of all cuſtoms, taxes, ceſſes, ſupplies, or other duties impoſed, or to be impoſed by act of parliament, or otherwiſe, for the ſpace of twenty one years." And farther, "That the ſaid company, its members, officers, ſervants, or others belonging thereto, ſhould be free, both in their perſons, eſtates, and goods employed in the ſaid ſtock and trade, from all manner of taxes, ceſſes, ſupplies, exciſes, quartering of ſoldiers tranſient or local, or levying of ſoldiers, or other impoſitions whatſoever, during the ſpace of twenty-one years." That by reaſon of the great advantages granted to the Scots Eaſt-India company, and the duties and difficulties, that lay upon that trade in England, a great part of the ſtock and ſhipping of this nation would be carried thither; and by this means Scotland might be made a free port for all Eaſt-India commodities; and conſequently thoſe ſeveral places in Europe, which were ſupplied from England, would be furniſhed from Scotland much cheaper than could be done by the Engliſh; and therefore this nation would loſe the benefit of ſupplying foreign parts with thoſe commodities, which had always been a great article in the balance of their foreign trade. Moreover, that the ſaid commodities would unavoidably be brought by the Scots into England by ſtealth, both by ſea and land, to the great prejudice of the Engliſh trade and navigation, and to the great detriment of his majeſty in his cuſtoms. And that, when that nation ſhould have ſettled themſelves in plantations in America, the Engliſh commerce in tobacco, ſugar, cotton, wool, ſkins, maſts, &c. would be utterly loſt, becauſe the privileges of that nation, granted to them by this act, were ſuch, that that kingdom muſt be the magazine for all commodities, and the Engliſh plantations, and the traffic there, loſt to this nation, and the exportation of their own manufactures yearly decreaſed. That beſides theſe, and many other obſtructions, that the act would unavoidably bring to the general trade of this nation, another clauſe in the ſaid act, whereby "His majeſty promiſed to interpoſe his authority to have reſtitution, reparation, and ſatisfaction made for any damage, that might be done to any one of the ſhips, goods, merchandize, perſons, or other effects whatſoever belonging to the ſaid company, and that upon the public charge;" did ſeem to engage his majeſty to employ the ſhipping and ſtrength at ſea of this nation, to ſupport this new company, to the great detriment even of this kingdom.' To this addreſs the king made anſwer, 'That he had been ill ſerved in Scotland, but he hoped ſome remedies might be found to prevent the inconveniencies which might ariſe from this act.'

Soon after this, the king turned out both the ſecretaries of ſtate in Scotland, and the marquis of Tweedale: and great changes were made in the whole miniſtry of that kingdom, both high and low; particularly the lord Murray, ſon of the marquis of Athol, was made ſecretary of ſtate.

However, this buſineſs did not ſtop here; for the committee appointed by the commons to examine by what methods this act was obtained, having made their report, and delivered a copy of an oath 'de fideli,' taken by the directors of the Scots Eaſt-India company, and of the journal of the proceedings of the directors; and the report, oath, and journal being examined; as alſo the petition preſented to the houſe by the Engliſh Eaſt-India company, it was reſolved, That the directors of the company of Scotland trading to Africa and the Indies, adminiſtering and taking here in this kingdom, an oath 'de fideli,' and under colour of a Scots act of parliament, ſtiling themſelves a company, were guilty of a high crime and miſdemeanor; and that the lord Belhaven, William Paterſon, David Nairne, James Smith, James Cheiſly, William Shepherd, Robert Blackwood, James Balfour, James Fowlis, Thomas Coutts, Abraham Wilmer, Daniel Van Mildert, Robert Williamſon, Anthony Merry, Paul Docminique, Robert Douglas, Thomas Skinner, Hugh Frazer, James Bateman, Walter Stewart, and Joſeph Cohen d'Azevedo be impeached of the ſame. While the impeachments were drawing up, Roderick Mackenzie endeavoured to to ſuppreſs the evidence, which he had given againſt theſe perſons, for which he was ordered into cuſtody, but he made his eſcape; nor could he be apprehended, though the king, at the requeſt of the commons, iſſued out a proclamation for that purpoſe.

When it was underſtood in Scotland, that the king had diſowned the act for the Eaſt-India company, from which it was expected that great riches ſhould flow into that kingdom, it is not eaſy to conceive how great, and how general an indignation was ſpread over the whole kingdom; the jacobites ſaw what a game it was like to prove in their hands; they played it with great ſkill, and to the advantage of their cauſe, in the courſe of many years; and continue to manage it to this day. There was a great deal of noiſe made of the Scotch act in both houſes of parliament in England by ſome, who ſeemed to have no other deſign in that, but to heighten our diſtractions by the apprehenſions that they expreſſed. The Scotch nation fancied nothing but mountains of gold; and the credit of the deſign roſe ſo high, that ſubſcriptions were made, and advances of money were offered, beyond what any believed the wealth of that kingdom could have furniſhed. Paterſon came to have ſuch credit among them, that the deſign of the Eaſt-India trade, how promiſing ſoever, was wholly laid aſide; and they reſolved to employ all their wealth, in the ſettling a colony, with a port and fortifications in Darien, which was long kept a ſecret, and was only truſted to a ſelect number, empowered by this new company, who aſſumed to themſelves the name of the African company, though they never meddled with any concern in that part of the world. The unhappy progreſs of this affair will appear in its proper time.

The loſſes of the merchants gave great advantages to thoſe, who complained of the adminiſtration; their conduct, with relation to our trade, was repreſented as at beſt a neglect of the nation, and of its proſperity. Some, with a more ſpiteful malice, ſaid, it was deſigned, that we ſhould ſuffer in our trade, that the Dutch might carry it from us: and, how extravagant ſoever this might ſeem, it was often repeated by ſome men of virulent tempers. And in the end, when all the errors, with relation to the protection of our trade, were ſet out, and much aggravated, the commons proceeded to conſider the ſtate of the nation in relation to trade, and reſolved, 'Firſt, That a council of trade be eſtabliſhed by act of parliament, with powers for the more effectual preſerva-

tion of the trade of this kingdom. Secondly, That the commiſſioners conſtituting the council be nominated by parliament. Thirdly, That the commiſſioners ſhould take an oath, acknowledging, that king William was rightful and lawful king of this realm; and that the late king James had no right or title thereunto; and that no perſon had any right or title to the crown, otherwiſe than according to the act of ſettlement made in the firſt year of his majeſty's reign, &c.' Of theſe and ten more reſolutions, the firſt and ſecond, with ſome others, were indeed approved; but ſeveral, and eſpecially the fourth, whereby king William was to be acknowledged 'rightful and lawful king,' and which occaſioned a warm debate, were rejected by the houſe. And a bill was ordered to be brought in, upon the reſolutions agreed to; though it was oppoſed by thoſe, who looked on the eſtabliſhment of a council of trade by an act of parliament, as a change of our conſtitution in a very eſſential point. They urged, that the executive part of the government was in the king; ſo that the appointing any council by act of parliament, began a precedent of their breaking in upon the execution of the law, in which it could not be eaſy to ſee how far they might be carried. It was indeed offered, that this council ſhould be much limited as to its powers; yet many apprehended, that, if the parliament named the perſons, how low ſoever their powers might be at firſt, they would be enlarged every ſeſſion; and, from being a council to look into matters of trade, they would be next impowered to appoint convoys and cruizers. This, in time, might draw in the whole admiralty, and that part of the revenue or ſupply, which was appropriated to the navy; ſo that a king would ſoon grow to be a duke of Venice. And indeed thoſe, who ſet this on moſt zealouſly, did not deny, that they deſigned to ingraft many things upon it.

The king was ſo ſenſible of the ill effects, which this would have, that he ordered his miniſters to oppoſe it, as much as poſſibly they could. The earl of Sunderland, to the ſurprize of many, declared for it, as all that depended on him promoted it. He was afraid of the violence of the republican party, and would not venture upon provoking them. The miniſters were much offended with him for taking this method to recommend himſelf at their coſt. The king himſelf took it ill, and declared to biſhop Burnet, that, if the earl went on, driving it as he did, he muſt break with him; and imputed it to his fear. For the unhappy ſteps, which he had made in king James's time, gave his enemies ſo many pretences for attacking him, that he would venture on nothing, that might provoke them. Here was a debate plainly in a point of prerogative, how far the government ſhould continue on its antient bottom of monarchy, as to the executive part; or how far it ſhould turn to a commonwealth; and yet, by an odd reverſe, the whigs, who were now moſt employed, argued for the prerogative, while the tories ſeemed zealous for public liberty; ſo powerfully does intereſt biaſs men of all forms.

Another affair was, about this time, brought before the houſe of commons, which touched the king in a very ſenſible part. The earl of Portland had begged of the king the lordſhips of Denbigh, Bromfield, and Yale, in the county of Denbigh; which, before he went laſt to Holland, he readily granted, not only to him, but to his heirs for ever. The warrant coming to the lords of the treaſury, who were the lord Godolphin, ſir Stephen Fox, ſir William Trumball, and Mr. John Smith, the gentlemen of the county, upon one or two days notice, were heard before their lordſhips. Sir William Williams alledged, 'That theſe lordſhips were the antient demeſnes of the prince of Wales: That the Welſh were never ſubject to any but to God and the king; and that none ſhewed their allegiance more than the Welſh. That on the ſtatute for granting of fee-farm rents, there was a particular exception of the Welſh rents, which imported, that the parliament took the Welſh revenues not to be alienable; yet, upon creation of a prince of Wales, there were miſes of 800l. payable out of thoſe lordſhips to the prince of Wales [m], and, though there were none now, yet he hoped and doubted not but to ſee one of the preſent king's own body.' Sir Roger Puleſton alledged, 'That the revenues of theſe lordſhips did ſupport the government of Wales, by paying the judges and others their ſalaries; and, if given away, there would be a failure of juſtice.' And Mr. Price, afterwards baron of the Exchequer, urged, 'That the grant was of a large extent, being five parts in ſix of one county, which was too great a power for any 'foreign ſubject' to have, and the people of the country too great to be ſubject to any foreigner [n].' Let it be conſidered (added he) 'Can it be for his majeſty's honour or intereſt (when the people hear this, and underſtand it) that he daily gives away the revenues, and more, the perpetuity of his crown-revenues to his foreign ſubjects? Good kings, after a long and chargeable war, were accuſtomed to tell their people, that they ſorrowed for the hardſhips the nation underwent by a long war and heavy taxes; and that now they would live on their own. But it is to be feared, if grants are made ſo large and ſo frequent, there will be nothing for the king or his ſucceſſors to call his own to live upon.' The lord Godolphin having aſked by way of objection, 'Whether the earl of Leiceſter had not thoſe lordſhips in grant to him in queen Elizabeth's time?' Sir Robert Cotton anſwered, 'he believed he could give the beſt account in that caſe. That the earl of Leiceſter had but one of thoſe lordſhips, and that was Denbigh. That he was ſo oppreſſive to the gentry of the country, that he occaſioned them to take up arms, and to oppoſe him; for which three or four of his (ſir Robert Cotton's) relations were hanged; but that it ended not there, for the quarrel was kept ſtill on foot, and the earl glad to be in peace, and to grant it back to the queen; ſince which time it had ever been in the crown.' Then the lord Godolphin ſaid, 'They had offered many weighty reaſons, which ſhould be repreſented to his majeſty.' From the Treaſury the gentlemen of Wales attended the grant to the privy-ſeal, where their reaſons and complaints againſt it were heard and received with great candour. Yet, notwithſtanding all this, the grant being only ſuperſeded, but not recalled, ſir Thomas Groſvenor, ſir Richard Middleton, ſir John Conway, ſir Robert Cotton, ſir William Williams, ſir Roger Puleſton, Edward Vaughan, Edward Brereton, and Mr. Robert Price, addreſſed themſelves by petition to the houſe of commons. Upon this occaſion Mr. Price, a member of that houſe, made a remarkable ſpeech, wherein beſides enlarging on the arguments he had before uſed, [m] Miſes were certain tollages or tributes, paid at the creation of a prince of Wales. Thus, in the county Palatine of Cheſter, it was a certain tribute, paid by the inhabitants of that county, on the change of every owner of that earldom, for the enjoyment of their liberties. And they have there a Miſe-book, in which every town and village is rated ſo much towards the Miſe.

[n] The other arguments, he made uſe of againſt the grant, were as follow: 'That there were fifty mean lordſhips held under thoſe manors; above fifteen-hundred freeholders; waſtes and commons of many thouſand acres; mines of lead and copper of great value, and that the preſent rents amounted to 1,500l. per ann. beſides other great advantages, which a mighty favourite and a great courtier might make out of this country. That courts were kept in all thoſe lordſhips in the king's name. That all or moſt of the gentlemen of that country were tenants to the king, and ſuitors to this court, and thereby obliged to the king by a double allegiance, that is, as ſubjects and tenants; and, if the king gave away one, it was to be feared, it would leſſen the bounds of the other, ſince it is obſervable, 'That intereſt and property have an aſcendant over duty.' That thoſe manors were formerly lordſhips-marches; that, when William the conqueror had brought England under ſubjection, but could not ſubdue the Welſh country, he gave to the Norman lords ſome neighbouring lands in Wales, and furniſhed them with men and arms; and what ground they could get from the Welſh by inſurrection, or conqueſt, theſe Norman lords were to hold as lordſhips-marches, which were made boroughs or palatinates; and what they got or uſurped by their power, they maintained by ſeverity or oppreſſion. That under theſe vaſſalages the Britons continued until the 27th of Henry VIII's reign, when the ſtatute of Timon was made, and they eſteemed it their happineſs to be under the Engliſh laws and government, none having more eminently ſignalized their conſtant loyalty to their rightful king, than themſelves. But, if his majeſty ſhould think fit to diſunite them by this grant, and put them under a foreign ſubject, it was putting them in a worſe poſture than their former eſtate, when under William the conqueror and his Norman lords. That the Britons were always men of courage and ſincerity, and yet of reſentment. That though Henry IV. and Henry V. were martial princes, and had an hatred againſt the Britons, becauſe they perſevered in their duty to Edward II. who was their 'rightful' though 'unfortunate' king, and made moſt reproachful laws againſt them; yet it was worth remark, that thoſe kings had never peaceable or happy days, till they had reconciled themſelves to thoſe great people. That this is a revenue, that belongs to the prince of Wales; and, in want of ſuch, it veſts in the crown rather an uſufructure than a property, till a prince be created, to whoſe creation the revenue is annexed by theſe, though unuſual words in the law, 'To him and his heirs, who ſhall be kings of England,' by the ſtatute of the 21ſt Jacob. 29. That in the preamble of that ſtatute it was doubted, whether Charles prince of Wales and duke of Cornwall could grant leaſes of the duchy lands for three lives, or any longer than his own life; though the ſtatute adds, he had the inheritance in a ſpecial form of limitation, differing from the ordinary rule of inheritance of the common law; and therefore it was neceſſary to have confirmed in parliament, the uſe that was made of that ſtatute in this caſe. That, if the prince of Wales and duke of Cornwall, who had an inheritance in their revenues, could not grant eſtates without parliament, for any longer time than their own lives; how then could his preſent majeſty, who was our king by 'modern contract,' and had but an eſtate for life in poſſeſſion in the crown by the act of ſettlement, grant away the inheritance and abſolute fee of the principality of Wales? That, if the aid of parliament was neceſſary to help in one caſe, it was more neceſſary in the other. That it was well known in former reigns there had been frequent 'acts of reſumption,' which always paſſed, when the people groaned under the weight of heavy taxes, and the nation in war. That, if that was a reaſon for the legiſlative power to paſs a bill of reſumption, it was ſtill as good reaſon for his majeſty not to grant, ſince the nation was both in a war, and under the heavieſt preſſure of taxes hiſtory bears teſtimony of.'

againſt the grant, (which doubtleſs was unadviſedly made, and the oppoſition to it very juſt in thoſe, that had nothing in view but to ſave thoſe lands from alienation) he took occaſion not only to inveigh againſt the Dutch in general, but to reflect even on the king's perſon, title, and government.

The reſult of this affair was, that the commons unanimouſly preſented the following addreſs to the king.

"WE your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the knights, citizens, and burgeſſes in parliament aſſembled, humbly lay before your majeſty, that whereas there is a grant paſſing to William earl of Portland and his heirs of the manors of Denbigh, Bromfield, and Yale, and divers other lands in the principality of Wales, together with ſeveral eſtates of inheritance enjoyed by many of your majeſty's ſubjects, by virtue of antient grants from the crown.

"That the ſaid manors, with the large and extenſive regalities, powers, and juriſdictions to the ſame belonging, are of great concern to your majeſty and the crown of this realm; and that the ſame have been uſually annexed to the principality of Wales, and ſettled on the princes of Wales for their ſupport: And that a great number of your majeſty's ſubjects in thoſe parts hold their eſtates by royal tenure under great and valuable compoſitions, rents, royal payments, and ſervices to the crown and princes of Wales, and have by ſuch tenure great dependence on your majeſty and the crown of England, and have enjoyed great privileges and advantages with their eſtates under ſuch tenure. We therefore moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty to put a ſtop to the paſſing this grant to the earl of Portland of the ſaid manors and lands; and that the ſame may not be diſpoſed from the crown but by conſent of parliament; for that ſuch grant is in diminution of the honour and intereſt of the crown, by placing in a ſubject ſuch large and extenſive royalties, powers, and juriſdictions, which ought only to be in the crown, and will ſever the dependence, which ſo great a number of your majeſty's ſubjects in thoſe parts have on your majeſty and the crown, by reaſon of their tenure, and may be to their great oppreſſion in thoſe rights, which they have purchaſed and hitherto enjoyed with their eſtates; and alſo an occaſion of great vexation to many of your majeſty's ſubjects, who have long had the abſolute inheritance of ſeveral lands (comprehended in the ſaid grant to the earl of Portland,) by antient grants from the crown."

The king, in anſwer to this addreſs, expreſſed himſelf thus:

Gentlemen,

"I have a kindneſs for my lord Portland, which he has deſerved of me by long and faithful ſervices; but I ſhould not have given him theſe lands, if I had imagined the houſe of commons could have been concerned. I will therefore recal the grant, and find ſome other way of ſhewing my favour to him."

The debates about creating a council of trade by act of parliament were going on, and it probably would have paſt both houſes, when the diſcovery of a conſpiracy turned men's thoughts another way: So that all angry motions were let fall, and the ſeſſion ended with greater advantages to the king, than could otherwiſe be expected.

On the death of the queen, the jacobites began to think that the government had loſt the half of it's ſtrength, and that things could not be kept quiet at home, when the king ſhould be beyond ſea. Some pretended, they were for putting the princeſs of Denmark in her ſiſter's place; but this was only a pretence, to which ihe gave no ſort of encouragement: King James lay at the bottom. And therefore, ſhortly after the queen's deceaſe, they entered upon ſchemes to remove the king likewiſe. The ſame week wherein he had given them the fulleſt and moſt extenſive pardon, that ever was known, they were contriving to ſeize his perſon. For about this time ſeveral meetings and conſultations were held by Mr. Charnock, captain Porter, captain Waugh, major Matthews, Mr. Donelagh, Mr. Goodman, and ſir William Perkins, to ſettle the method of executing this deſign; and the places, where theſe conſpirators, or the greateſt part of them met, were Mr. Goodman's houſe in Brownlow-Street, the chocolate-houſe in St. James's Street, and the Fountain Tavern by the Temple-Gate. And that they might quiet their minds, which it ſeems were not perfectly delivered from all ſenſe of guilt and horror at ſuch a barbarous enterprize, they ſent over to ſollicit the late king James to grant them a commiſſion, which they flattered themſelves would be ſufficient to authorize their attempt, and make it look more like a military action, than a foul murder. But, it ſeems, it was not thought fit to grant any ſuch commiſſion at that juncture, in which things did not perhaps appear ripe enough for their purpoſe; at leaſt, it was ſo delayed, that the conſpirators ſeemed uneaſy to be held ſo long in ſuſpenſe, and therefore reſolved immediately to execute their deſigns, notwithſtanding their expectations of a commiſſion from St. Germain's were diſappointed. And now, however weak and impracticable it might ſeem, they projected a deſign to attack the guards, ſeize the king, and forthwith hurry him to Deal, where a veſſel was to be provided to receive, and thence carry him into France; and, in caſe of reſiſtance, they propoſed to deſtroy him, and then pretend it was done by a random ſhot. In order to this, they proceeded ſo far as to view the ground about Turnham-Green, and to fix on a place proper for their deſign; but they had not time enough to compleat this affair before the king embarked for Flanders, and thereby obliged them to defer their intended villany, till his return in the winter.

But the conſpirators could by no means ſit down ſatisfied with being idle in the mean time, and therefore many meetings and conſultations were held in various places, where it was conſidered and debated, what were the moſt proper and expeditious means of reſtoring James. And it was agreed on at a meeting at the old King's-head in Leadenhall-ſtreet, where were then preſent the earl of Ayleſbury, the lord Montgomery, ſon of the marquis of Powis, ſir John Fenwick, ſir John Friend, Mr. Goodman, captain Charnock, and captain Porter, that a truſty meſſenger ſhould be ſent to St. Germain's, who ſhould perſuade king James to procure eight thouſand foot, a thouſand horſe, and a thouſand dragoons, in order to make a deſcent upon England, with which auxiliary forces the conſpirators, who were then ready to riſe in arms and join them, undertook to ſet the crown again upon king James's head. The perſon choſen for this errand to St Germain's was captain Charnock, who expreſſed his willingneſs to undertake the affair, provided they would let him know what aſſurances he might give that king of their readineſs to ſerve him, in caſe he came with ſuch a power as they demanded. The conſpirators unanimouſly aſſured him, that, if the late king landed, they would ſerve him with two thouſand horſe. Charnock replied, that he would be the meſſenger, but deſired they would give him another meeting, that he might be ſatisfied this was their ſettled reſolution, and ſuch as the late king might depend upon. This was granted, and a ſecond meeting appointed a few days after at Mrs. Mountjoy's houſe in St. James's-Street, where the conſpirators renewed their aſſurances, that they were ready to aſſiſt and join king James with the above mentioned body of horſe, in caſe of an invaſion. Charnock, ſhortly after went over to France, and communicated to king James their requeſt. But whether his friends were diffident of the intereſt and ſtrength of the conſpirators, or whether they were willing to ſee the iſſue of another campaign, ſuppoſing, if it proved ſucceſsful, it would greatly facilitate their invaſion of England; it is certain, the conſpirators were told by king James, that he was ſenſible of their fidelity and ſtedfaſtneſs in his intereſt, for which he thanked them; but as to the aſſiſtance, which they deſired him to procure, his anſwer was, that the French king could not, at that time, ſpare ſo great a number of his troops as they demanded. This anſwer not being ſatisfactory, it was thought neceſſary to ſend over a man of quality, who ſhould preſs the matter with more authority: So the earl of Ayleſbury was prevailed on to go. He was admitted to a ſecret converſation with the French king: and this gave riſe to the invaſion, which, though deferred for this time, was very near being executed the next winter, as will preſently appear [o].

[o] If ſir John Fenwick did not ſlander king James, they at this time propoſed a ſhorter and more infallible way, by aſſaſſinating the king; for he ſaid, that ſome came over from France about this time, who aſſured their party, and himſelf in particular, that a commiſſion was coming over, ſigned by king James, which they affirmed, they had ſeen, warranting them to attack the king's perſon. This, it is true, was not yet arrived; but ſome affirmed, they had ſeen it, and that it was truſted to one, who was on his way hither; therefore, ſince the king was ſo near going over to Holland, that he would probably be gone before the commiſſion could be in England; it was debated among the jacobites, whether they ought not to take the firſt opportunity to execute this commiſſion, even though they had it not in their hands: It was reſolved to do it, and a day was ſet for it; but, as Fenwick ſaid, he broke the deſign; and ſent them word, that he would diſcover it, if they would not promiſe to give over the thoughts of it: And upon this reaſon,

In the mean time the treaſonable commerce went on with St Germain's; for which purpoſe they maintained boats of their own on the coaſts of Kent; all care was taken to ſupport the ſpirits of the party, and all artifices and methods of application were uſed to ſpread a malignant ferment among the people, which might make them uneaſy under the government, and diſpoſe them to a change.

The ſucceſs of king William's arms, at the ſiege of Namur, was ſo far from diſcouraging them from carrying on their conſpiracy, that it ſeemed rather to puſh them on to accompliſh it with greater expedition. For being jealous, that the next campaign might ſtill increaſe the reputation of his majeſty's arms, and diminiſh that of his enemies, they reſolved to haſten the execution of their deſigns; ſo that the fears, which they entertained of the king's ſtill getting greater advantages in the field, ſeemed to have given birth to the intended invaſion and aſſaſſination. In order to accompliſh their ends, great ſtores of arms were bought up and concealed in convenient places; great numbers of horſes were provided to mount their troops, which they had liſted. Officers were appointed, and commiſſions received from king James, by which pretended authority they were to act.

In ſuch a poſture were their affairs at home. In the mean time the negotiation was maintained between the conſpirators and king James. And at this time the French court ſeemed inclined to comply with their deſires, by lending that king a good body of their troops. Meſſengers went to and fro with packets of letters to concert affairs, and to give intelligence of the forwardneſs of the invaſion on the one ſide, and the inſurrection on the other. The time fixed upon to put the deſign in execution was very favourable and encouraging; for now there were few regular troops in England or Scotland, his majeſty's forces being almoſt all employed in carrying on the war againſt the French king in Flanders. And, as for the militia of the country, the conſpirators had thoſe undiſciplined troops in contempt, not imagining, that they could make the leaſt ſtand againſt a veteran army. They believed therefore they could make a deſcent on a weak and almoſt defenceleſs country; neither did they apprehend any oppoſition, that could be made at ſea to prevent their invaſion; for they knew, that a ſtrong convoy was ready in England, and had received ſailing orders to make the beſt of their way to reinforce admiral Rooke at Cadiz, whoſe ſquadron was looked upon as inferior in ſtrength to that of the French then putting to ſea from Toulon.

The French fleet, which had been ſo long ſhut up within Toulon, was now fitting out and ordered round to Breſt. Our fleet, that lay at Cadiz, was only a ſquadron left there by Ruſſel (who was come home with many of the great ſhips) and therefore, not ſtrong enough to fight the French, when they ſhould paſs the ſtreights. But a large fleet was ordered thither, and would have ſailed in December, had it not been kept in our ports, by contrary winds, till February. This was then thought a great unhappineſs, but it appeared afterwards, that our preſervation was chiefly owing to it. However, we were all this while in great pain for Rooke, who commanded the ſquadron at Cadiz, and was like to ſuffer for want of proviſions and ſtores, which this fleet was to carry him; beſides the addition of ſtrength this would bring him, in caſe the Toulon ſquadron ſhould come about. We were only apprehenſive of danger from that ſquadron, little imagining we could be in any at home, till that fleet was brought about. It is true, the jacobites talked and writ now with more than ordinary aſſurance; and advertiſements came from many places, that ſome very important thing was ready to break out. But the king had been ſo accuſtomed to alarms, and reports of this kind, that he had now ſo little regard to them, as ſcarce to be willing to hearken to thoſe, who brought him ſuch advertiſements. He was ſo much ſet on preparing for the next compaign, that all other things were little conſidered by him. But to return to the plot.

It muſt be obſerved, that two ſorts of men, the papiſts, and that kind of proteſtants, who are neareſt to them in principles and affection, were enemies to the king and his government. Now thoſe proteſtants were ſubdivided into two parties, one of which had the lord Melfort for their head, the other the earl of Middleton. The firſt was the hot and violent ſort, who had the papiſts generally on their ſide. Theſe men earneſtly deſired and laboured to bring back king James as an abſolute conqueror, without any capitulation or agreement. The other party, though diſaffected to the government, and very deſirous of that king's return, yet were not tranſported to that extravagant degree of deluſion, as to be willing to ſacrifice their religion, rights, and liberties, to the will of an unlimited maſter; and therefore, in their conferences with the others about the means of reſtoring king James, they always offered ſuch methods and ſchemes, as had a ſhew at leaſt of ſecuring their religion and liberty, in caſe he prevailed; and thoſe, who thus contended for his reſtoration on terms and compoſition, were fiercely oppoſed by the other faction, who ſtill rejected their overtures, and declaimed loudly againſt all limitations propoſed to hinder deſpotic power in their prince. Great heats and animoſities roſe between theſe two parties. The firſt was moſt acceptable to king James and his court; but the laſt were moſt conſiderable for their number and intereſt. To humour therefore the laſt, the earl of Middleton, who was ſent over to St Germain's to manage their affairs, was made ſecretary of ſtate; and the lord Melfort, as if under ſome diſgrace, was ordered to withdraw from court, that the other party might believe, that they had the aſcendency, and that their method of reſtoring king James was beſt accepted and chiefly inſiſted on; though there is ground to conclude, that all this was nothing but artifice and colluſion, the lord Melfort being ſtill in the ſecret of king James, and ſtill correſponded underhand with him. And now by this concerted invaſion and inſurrection it plainly appears, that the violent and bigoted party of the lord Melfort were in the greateſt eſteem; that their ſcheme of bringing back the king without terms was moſt approved; while the others were impoſed on by ſpecious aſſurances, that the terms and limitations, which they offered, were very agreeable, while there was no manner of care taken, after the intended deſcent ſhould be made, and the kingdom over-run by a foreign army, to ſecure either their religion or their liberties.

The former intended invaſions (as hath been related) were always preceded by declarations from king James, promiſing to maintain the conſtitution in church and ſtate, and protect the rights and liberties of the ſubject, and offering pardon for paſt offences, provided he was not oppoſed after his landing. But now the ſcene is changed; no obliging declaration is ſet forth, nor any promiſe of pardon is publiſhed. He no longer pretended to return upon a proteſtant intereſt, but by the power of a foreign army, wholly compoſed of old and experienced troops; no Engliſh nor Iriſh, of whom there were then conſiderable numbers in France, being allowed to ſhare in this enterprize, as being looked upon not ſo proper to be employed in ſubduing their own country; and therefore, whatever that deluded party might imagine, it is evident, that nothing leſs was deſigned, than an entire reduction of theſe kingdoms by a foreign power, the conſequences of which muſt unavoidably have been the utter extirpation of the proteſtant religion, and the irrecoverable ſubverſion of our laws and liberties.

About the beginning of February 1695-6, the duke of Berwick, who was natural ſon to king James, was diſpatched into England to concert affairs with the conſpirators here, and to give them aſſurance, that king James was ready to make a deſcent upon England, at the head of an army; and having diſcharged his commiſſion, and laid the matter ſo well that he thought it could not miſcarry he went back to France, and met king James at St Dennis, who was come ſo far on his way from Paris. He ſtopped there, and, after a long conference with the duke of Berwick, he ſent him firſt to his queen at St Germain's, and then to the king of France, and he himſelf called for a notary, and paſſed ſome act; but it was not known to what effect. When that was done, he purſued his journey, and came poſt to Calais, to ſet himſelf at the head of an army of about twenty thouſand men, that were drawn out of the garriſons which lay near that frontier. At Calais he was met by the marſhal de Boufflers, who came from Flanders to confer with him on this important occaſion, and to give ſuch orders and advice, as he judged neceſſary to render the expedition ſucceſsful.

There came, every winter, a coaſting fleet from all the ſeaports of France to Dunkirk, with all the proviſions for a campaign; and it was given out, that the French intended a very early one this year. So that this coaſting fleet was ordered to be there by the end of January. Thus tranſport ſhips, as well as an army, were brought together in a very ſilent manner; and monſieur Gaberet was come up as high as Calais with a ſquadron of men of war, which, when reinforced by the conjunction of Du Bart's fleet from Dunkirk, was looked upon as a ſufficient convoy.

ſon, he believed, he was not let into the ſecret of the following winter. This his lady told biſhop Burnet from him, as an article of merit to obtain his pardon. But he had truſted to their word very eaſily, it ſeems, ſince he gave the king no warning to be on his guard; and the two witneſſes, he ſaid he could produce to vouch this, were then under proſecution, and outlawed: So that the proof was not at hand, and the warning had not been given as it ought to have been. Burnet, Vol. II. 148.

This

This was the poſture of affairs on the other ſide of the water. In the mean time the jacobites on this ſide were ready to take up arms, to receive and aſſiſt king James. The tranſportation of horſe being a matter of great trouble as well as expence, the conſpirators in England engaged to aſſiſt him at their landing with ſeveral regiments of horſe and dragoons; for which purpoſe commiſſions had been ſent over from king James, and delivered to ſeveral of the conſpirators, to empower them to raiſe men, and, as their officers, to command them. In purſuance of this pretended authority, many troops were liſted, and their under officers named. Sir John Friend received a commiſſion for a regiment of horſe, which was very near compleated; his lieutenant colonel, major, and captains being named, and the troops almoſt full. Sir William Perkins had likewiſe a commiſſion for a regiment of horſe, and had engaged a conſiderable number to ſerve him in it. He declared, that his own troop was wholly compoſed of old ſoldiers; and that ſeveral other gentlemen, well experienced in military affairs, had promiſed to follow him as volunteers: colonel Tempeſt, as Charnock told Porter, had a commiſſion for a regiment of dragoons, which was ſaid to be in great forwardneſs; ſir John Fenwick had four troops ready; colonel Parker was to command another regiment, and Mr. Curwin another. There was one more to be raiſed in and about Suffolk, where the malecontents boaſted they had great intereſt. Many commiſſions were delivered to thoſe, who were named for their under officers. King James having ſent them word, that he was ready to make a deſcent, the conſpirators were very diligent in preparing to join him. Some of them took journies into ſeveral parts of the kingdom, to acquaint the diſcontented party, that king James was on the point of invading the nation; and therefore incited them to riſe in arms, to give him aſſiſtance, and to engage as many of their friends, as they had intereſt in, to do the ſame. At the ſame time, the conſpirators in London were very active, and determined to puſh on their deſign to execution.

But, notwithſtanding all theſe preparations, and the various circumſtances that ſeemed to favour the intended invaſion, it was reſolved, to put nothing to the hazard, till they had made their ſucceſs ſure, by the murder of the king; as if no hopes were left for ſubduing him any other way. The aſſaſſination therefore of king William was concerted and agreed upon by the Engliſh court at St. Germain's as a thing of abſolute neceſſity to give ſucceſs to the invaſion, and the next point conſidered was a fit perſon to manage an affair of this nature and conſequence. Colonel Parker, a perſon of a diſſolute life, a hot and reſtleſs temper, and diſtinguiſhed from others by his remarkable and uncommon wickedneſs, was, by bloody principles and inveterate hatred to the king and his friends, qualified above all men for this undertaking. He (as hath been ſaid) almoſt ever ſince the king's acceſſion to the throne, had been carrying on ſome deſign againſt his life, was engaged in one in the year 1691, and after in the ſame year in another with Grandaval and Du Mont, and after that in 1693 with Goodman, Porter, and Charnock. This man, though in great eſteem with the conſpirators, and perfectly qualified for ſuch a work was not fixed upon for this expedition; for, conſidering how well he was known in England, they might juſtly apprehend, that his very being in England might alarm the people, who would preſently imagine, that ſome miſchief was in agitation, whenever that violent man appeared in this country. Sir George Barclay therefore was choſen as the moſt proper perſon to be intruſted with the conduct of this enterprize. He was a native of Scotland, an experienced officer, of known courage, cloſe and reſerved, and of a competent underſtanding; and withal ſuch a furious bigot in his religion, as to believe, that for the propagation of it any the moſt diſhonourable and inhuman actions might lawfully be committed. This gentleman, having received his commiſſion from king James, and and from Mr. Carrol, ſecretary to his queen, had eight hundred pounds to provide men, horſes, and to diſcharge other expences, in conducting and carrying on this conſpiracy; though he afterwards complained of the ſmallneſs of the ſum for accompliſhing of ſo great an undertaking, having firſt given out, that he was gone to Paris to be cured of the foul diſeaſe, left St. Germain's on or about the 10th of December 1695, in order to his embarkation for England. He was brought over, together with major Holmes, by captain Gill, and landed in Romney marſh about the beginning of Jannary following. Upon his arrival at London, he applied himſelf to the perſons, in whom he had reaſon to confide, and ſuch as he had the greateſt aſſurance to believe would be ready to engage in this deſperate deſign. Theſe were Harriſon, alias Johnſon, a prieſt; captain Charnock, captain Porter, and Sir William Perkins. Sir George Barclay had all the encouragement that could be, to impart his deſign to them, who before had ſhewn a forward inclination to attempt the king's perſon.

Theſe were the principal perſons whom ſir George addreſſed himſelf to. To theſe he communicated the buſineſs, which he came over about, that is, the aſſaſſination of the king; and acquainted them, that, as he was ſent by the late king James to conduct and accompliſh this buſineſs, ſo he had brought over with him the king's commiſſion for his warrant and authority. Charnock and Porter were aſſured by him, that he had ſuch a commiſſion, and ſir William Perkins and Harriſon ſaw and read it. He likewiſe acquainted them, that about twenty officers and troopers out of king James's guards were ordered to come over, and were to be employed in this affair, as was obſerved before. Theſe perſons readily complying with this deſign, to facilitate the invaſion and reſtoration of king James, ſir George ſets them immediately to work, to engage as many more bold and deſperate fellows, as would make up a number ſufficient for that purpoſe, which as they judged ought to be at leaſt forty. This the conſpirators chearfully undertook, and with great diligence endeavoured to procure the men, whom he defired. Harriſon demanded of Blaire, who ſometime after viſited him in his lodgings at Somerſet-houſe, whether he knew any ſoldiers or men of courage, for that was their phraſe for ruffians and cutthroats; 'for ſaid he, ſomething may be done in a little time, that may prove an introduction to king James's reſtoration.' Blaire anſwered, that he knew ſome ſuch perſons, but then defired to be informed, how the buſineſs could be effected. The other replied, after ſome diſcourſe about burning the victualling office, to retard the going out of the Engliſh fleet, that he had been told by an able and experienced ſoldier, that with an hundred good horſe he could put an end to the war in a fortnight's time. Blaire anſwered, that then it muſt be done in ſome diſhonourable way, which he durſt not ſo much as harbour in his thoughts. The prieſt perceiving the ſqueamiſhneſs of the ſoldier, ſhrunk up his ſhoulders, and ſo the converſation ended. But, ſome time after, when Blaire objected to the aſſaſſination as a wicked deſign, that had no authority from God or man to ſupport it; Harriſon acquainted him, that there was a ſufficient warrant, and that himſelf had ſeen it; and then demanded of him, if he thought it proper that it ſhould be ſhewn to every body? Blaire replied, That he did not imagine, that ſuch a thing had been in king James's nature, and then took his leave.

However Harriſon attempted Richard Fiſher with more ſucceſs; for having told him, that king James had ſent over a commiſſion by ſir George Barclay to kill the prince of Orange, Fiſher declared his readineſs to embark in this enterprize, and about the 3d of February he was introduced by Harriſon into the company of ſir George Barclay, having firſt defired him, in caſe he knew ſir George, to take no notice of him. Harriſon acquainted ſir George Barclay, that this was the gentleman he promiſed to bring to him; that he might confide in him, and ſpeak freely to him. Upon which ſir George immediately propoſed to him the aſſaſſinating of his Majeſty. Fiſher, without heſitation, conſented, and they preſently entered upon debate about the beſt manner of accompliſhing their purpoſe; and, in order to it, Fiſher took upon him to provide five horſes and arms for himſelf and four more. In the mean time Charnock, Porter, and ſir William Perkins loſt no time, but laboured with great application to engage the number of aſſaſſins, for which they had undertaken. Porter's quota was ſeven men and as many horſes; Charnock's ſix or ſeven; ſir William Perkins undertook for five horſes, three to be mounted by men of his own, and the other two by ſuch men as the conſpirators ſhould procure: then ſir George Barclay ſaid, that Lowick and others, who were lately arrived from France, would likewiſe join with them and compleat the number. And now having ſucceeded in the firſt ſtep, and a ſufficient number being undertaken for, they had many conferences in different places about the beſt way of putting their deſigns in execution.

The places where they met and held their conſultations, were captain Porter's lodgings in Norfolk-ſtreet, the Globe-tavern in Hatton-garden, the Nag's-head in St. James's-ſtreet, the Cock in Bow-ſtreet, the Old-Griffin in Holbourn, the Sun-tavern in the ſtrand, &c. But the place, which ſir George frequented, and whither many of the conſpirators came to receive orders from him, was the Piazza in Covent Garden.

At their ſeveral debates various methods were propoſed of executing their purpoſe. One way ſuggeſted was to attack the guards, and in the mean time to kill the king, as he went on ſome ſunday from Kenſington to St. James's chapel; which was offered one time in this manner, that ſix men on foot ſhould be poſted in the little houſe at Hyde-Park-Gate, who ſhould iſſue out, and by ſhutting the gate, make a ſtop, and then the conſpirators might fall on, and attack the guards with ſword in hand. Another time it was propoſed to ſhoot one of the leading horſes, whereby his majeſty's coach might be forced to ſtay in it's paſſage through the gate, and then to aſſault and murder him by one party, while another engaged the guards. Another propoſal was to attempt the king's perſon, when they ſhould be informed that he was gone to Mr. Lattin's houſe at Richmond, a place where the king ſometimes retired for the air and recreation. The reaſon of this propoſal was, that during his ſtay there he was uſually but weakly guarded. At another time they diſcourſed of ſeizing the king in his palace at Kenſington by night, which was to be done by ſecuring the garden with about forty men, who were to be provided with ladders for that purpoſe. Some inſiſted, that their deſign would be beſt effected by laying an ambuſcade near the king's houſe at Richmond, where a number of foot ſhould be poſted, in a neighbouring wood, ready to iſſue forth, and attack him as he paſſed by in his coach, while the reſt of the conſpirators aſſaulted the guards, to prevent their giving him any aſſiſtance.

Though this method was warmly contended for by ſome, and well enough liked by ſir George, yet they were at laſt controuled, and the propoſal was rejected. For the ſcheme which the greateſt part approved, and in favour of which ſir George Barclay did at length declare, whoſe orders the reſt were obliged to obey, and which was at laſt agreed upon among them all, as the final reſult of their debates, was this: They reſolved to attack the king on his return from Richmond in the evening after his hunting, it being his frequent practice to go thither on Saturdays for his diverſion. The place, which they choſe for this bloody buſineſs, was the lane betwen Turnham-Green and Brentford; and the particular part of that lane agreed upon was the end next to Turnham-Green, through which the king uſed to paſs in his return from Richmond.

The execution of their deſign was projected and reſolved upon in the following order: The conſpirators were to be formed into three parties, ſir George Barclay, the commander in chief, was, with a choſen party of eight or ten, to aſſault the coach, by diſcharging a blunderbuſs or muſketoon loaden with ſix or eight balls, and their other fire-arms, to murder the king, and all that were with him in the coach; while the other two parties, of which one was to be commanded by Charnock and Porter, the other by brigadier Rookwood, were to attack the king's guards with ſword in hand on either ſide of the lane. And that they might act with great circumſpection, and be yet further ſatisfied, that this was a proper place, wherein to execute their deſperate deſign, they ſent King, Porter, and Knightly, to ſurvey the place they had fixed upon.

Accordingly, theſe three perſons rid the next day to Turnham-Green, and after having with great attention ſurveyed the place, and the nature of the ground on each ſide the water, they returned to the reſt of the conſpirators, who were then at the Nags-head Tavern in St. James's-ſtreet to impart to them their obſervations. The report they made was ſo pleaſing to the reſt of their company, that they were all confirmed in their opinion, and abundantly ſatisfied in their choice of the ground. Thus had theſe men agreed upon the ſcene, where to act their tragedy, and concerted the manner of effecting it! That their deſign might be carried on and accompliſhed with great caution and ſecurity againſt any contingency, they appointed two orderly men, Chambers and Durant, to lodge near the guards at Kenſington, and to attend conſtantly there, that they might be ready to give the conſpirators notice whenever the king went abroad. Chambers was appointed to bring his intelligence to Charnock, and Durant his to ſir George Barclay. Chambers had orders to advertiſe them when the king, and Durant was to inform them when the guards went forth; and ſir George Barclay and Charnock undertook to convey timely notice to the reſt of the conſpirators, that they might all aſſemble at the time and place appointed, and every man take the poſt aſſigned him.

It was further agreed and reſolved upon for the accompliſhing of their purpoſe, that when they ſhould receive intelligence that the king was gone towards Richmond, to drop out of town by three or four in a company, the better to avoid ſuſpicion, and afterwards, for the ſame reaſon, to diſperſe themſelves in ſmall parties in the ſeveral inns marked out for them about Brentford, and Turnham-Green, and the neighbouring places, where they might be diſpoſed of with the moſt convenience and the leaſt obſervation, and ſo without any alarm and diſturbance might wait for the king's return from Richmond, and then be all ready to execute their deſign. Moreover, care was taken, that, when the king was at Richmond, a truſty perſon ſhould wait at Kew-Ferry, who ſhould give notice, when the guards returned thither to wait for the king, to the end that every man might prepare himſelf, and be in readineſs.

Having thus fixed on the place, provided their men, and agreed on the order and method of executing their conſpiracy, they at laſt appointed the time of doing it; Saturday the 15th of February 1695-6 was the firſt day that was agreed upon; and then, if Durant and Chambers ſhould bring them intelligence from Kenſington, that the king was gone to Richmond, on that morning they determined to make haſte to their poſts appointed at Turnham-Green, and to attack the guards, and aſſault the king at his return.

It was but a few days before the 15th of February, on which day the conſpirators reſolved to execute their deſign, when ſome of them began to reflect with horror upon it, and reſolved to eaſe their unquiet minds, and to prevent the execution of the plot by a timely diſcovery.

The firſt of the conſpirators, who diſcovered the treaſon, was captain Fiſher, who came to the earl of Portland on the 11th of February, and acquainted him with the deſign of taking away the king's life, and named ſeveral of the perſons, who were concerned in it; but he could not then inform the earl, in what manner it was concerted, nor what day was appointed for it. But he aſſured his lordſhip, that, as ſoon as he ſhould be informed more particularly, he would wait upon him, and give him further ſatisfaction. Accordingly, the 13th of February, Fiſher returned, two days after, to the earl, and acquainted him, that the 15th of February was the day agreed upon by the conſpirators to attempt his majeſty's life, and then told him in what manner, and in what place, they intended to do it.

The ſecond, who made the diſcovery, was Mr Pendergraſs, an Iriſh officer, who knew nothing of the affair till Thurſday the 13th of February; for that day he came to London out of Hampſhire, being ſent for by captain Porter, who imparted to him the deſign of aſſaſſinating the king, and endeavoured to engage him in it. Though Pendergraſs was exceedingly ſtartled at ſuch a propoſal, he ſeemed to comply, and promiſed to make one of the party; but, the very next day in the evening, he went to the earl of Portland, not knowing that Fiſher had been with him before on the ſame errand, and told him, that he came to reveal to him an important ſecret, namely, a deſign againſt his majeſty's life. He told the earl that indeed he was a Roman catholic; but that he did not think, that any religion could juſtify ſo great a wickedneſs; and therefore, from principles of chriſtianity and probity, he thought himſelf obliged, by revealing the matter, to prevent the king's falling into the hands of the conſpirators. But he acquainted him at the ſame time, that the conſpirators were his friends; and that from one of them he had received great obligations; and therefore, though he thought himſelf bound in duty and conſcience to make this diſcovery, to preſerve his majeſty's life, yet he likewiſe thought himſelf under obligations of honour and gratitude not to betray his friends; and therefore declared, that his reſolution was not to make known their names, nor to appear an evidence againſt them. He then deſired lord Portland, as he tendered his majeſty's life, to prevail with him not to go to Richmond on the morrow, aſſuring him, that the conſpirators had prepared all things to aſſault him in his return. It ought to be remembered, for the reputation of this gentleman, as to the credibility of his teſtimony, that the meer abhorrence of ſuch a deſign was the only motive, that induced him to make it known to the court.

The king being informed of the diſcovery, which Fiſher and Pendergraſs had made to the earl of Portland, received but little impreſſion from it. He was not eaſily brought to credit theſe informations, till a variety of circumſtances, in which the diſcoveries agreed, convinced him of the whole deſign; and it was with great difficulty, that he was prevailed with by the lord Portland to lay aſide his going to Richmond, that Saturday, and remain in his palace at Kenſington.

The next man, who voluntarily gave information of this conſpiracy, was Mr. de la Rue, a Frenchman, who declared, That he had frequented the company of the conſpirators, and made himſelf intimate with them, on deſign, when this horrible ſcheme was ripe for execution, by a timely diſcovery to defeat it. He applied himſelf to brigadier Leviſon, and acquainted him with the intended villainy ſome few days after. Fiſher and Pendergraſs had been on the ſame deſign with the earl of Portland; but not one of the three was in the leaſt acquainted with the intentions of either of the others, to reveal the conſpiracy. And though de la Rue gave his information without knowing, that Fiſher and Pendergraſs had done the like; yet his ſtory ſo fully confirmed that of the other two, agreeing exactly with them in all the material particulars, that the king, notwithſtanding his great averſion to believe this plot, which ſo nearly concerned his own life, was, by this concurrent teſtimony of la Rue, at laſt perſuaded of the truth of it.

On Friday, the 21ſt of February, at night, the king admitted Pendergraſs and de la Rue ſeverally into his preſence, and heard them relate what they had told the lord Portland, concerning the conſpiracy. Pendergraſs diſcovered the plot in general, to prevent his majeſty's falling into the hands of the conſpirators; but withal declared, as he had done before to the lord Portland, that it was his ſettled reſolution not to mention names, or, at any time, to become an evidence againſt them. He continued in this reſolution with great ſtedfaſtneſs, till the king uſed ſuch convincing arguments, as prevailed with him to recede from it. The king told him, that he had indeed ſhewn himſelf a man of probity and honour: that he had great obligations to him for the timely care, which he had taken to reveal a deſign, that ſo nearly concerned his life. But he ſhewed him withal, that, unleſs he went further in his diſcovery, and made him acquainted with the names of the conſpirators, he would not put him in a condition of preſerving himſelf againſt them. That the detection of the truth in general might indeed render him ſuſpicious of all men, but would be no ſecurity againſt any, who intended to take away his life; and that the conſpirators might change the method and order of their deſign, as well as the time and place of execution. And therefore that Mr. Pendergraſs, by diſcovering the conſpiracy, while he concealed the names of the conſpirators, would fall ſhort of his own intention, which was to preſerve the king's life; it being impoſſible, that his majeſty could be in ſafety, unleſs the deſperate undertakers of his deſign againſt him were known and ſecured. By this method of reaſoning Pendergraſs was at laſt overcome; and being convinced of the abſolute neceſſity of going further in this diſcovery, to enable the king to provide for his ſafety, he wrote down the names of many of the conſpirators, which he delivered to the earl of Portland, but not till the king had given his honour, that he ſhould not, unleſs he pleaſed, be uſed as an evidence againſt them.

On Saturday, the 15th of February, the conſpirators concluding, that the king, according to his cuſtom, would go to Richmond to hunt, they had prepared all things, and were ready to mount for the execution of their project; but having received an account, that the king did not go abroad that day, they were obliged to wait for another opportunity; and therefore they reſolved to perpetrate their treaſon on the Saturday following.

On Friday, the 21ſt of February, ſir George Barclay, ſir William Perkins, Porter, and Charnock, who were the principal conſpirators concerned in the aſſaſſination, met at the Sun-Tavern in the Strand, where they had a long diſcourſe concerning their diſappointment, the Saturday before. Some of them were afraid, that the ſecret had taken air, and their plot was diſcovered to the government. On the other hand, ſome believed, that the deſign was not revealed, and uſed this argument for their opinion, that, if the buſineſs had been diſcovered, they ſhould not have been there aſſembled, as they then were. Upon which, the diffidence and jealouſy of the others being removed, it was again reſolved, that, if the king went abroad to hunt the next Saturday, they would then endeavour to accompliſh their deſign, in the way and method, which they had fixed upon for the Saturday before.

The ſame Friday in the evening, the conſpirators, who belonged to ſir George Barclay's party, met at the two Black-Poſts in Maiden-Lane, where Harris, King, Richardſon, Caſſels, Maxwell, and Hundford, then were. Captain Counter came to them, and ſaid, that they muſt be ſure to be all in readineſs the next morning; and therefore ordered them by no means to ſtir out. Upon which Caſſels, after having uſed a dreadful imprecation, ſaid, he reſolved to have the plunder of the field, crying out, 'To-morrow is the day, boys!' Upon which King ſaid, if it did not ſucceed on the morrow, he would entertain no further thoughts about it. Hundford demanded, How they ſhould make their eſcape after the execution of their deſign? Caſſels replied, that he muſt keep with the party, to which he was ordered. The like anſwer ſir George Barclay gave to thoſe, who aſked him the ſame queſtion; that is, when they had killed the king, they ſhould keep together till they came to Hammerſmith, and then diſperſe and go into town by ſeveral ways and in ſmall companies, where they would have no need of lying long concealed; for the invaſion would immediately follow, and then they ſhould be at liberty. But, notwithſtanding this, ſome of the conſpirators, who reflected more coolly upon the affair, and the danger that attended it, were diſſatisfied in their minds, that no better proviſion was made to ſecure their retreat.

The next day, being Saturday the 22d of February, which was the ſecond day agreed upon for the execution of the deſign, Porter's party, as they were appointed, came to him to receive their orders. Firſt came de la Rue, and Porter told him, that all parties were ready to march in the afternoon, provided the king went out a hunting; an account of which they expected from Chambers and Durant, who were poſted at Kenſington. Soon after came Cranburn, Keys, Pendergraſs, and King, the laſt of whom belonged to ſir George Barclay's party. Pendergraſs was choſen out of Porter's number to be one of the eight, who, under ſir George, were to aſſaſſinate his majeſty. King came to Porter with a meſſage from ſir George Barclay. Then Porter, taking a piece of paper, wrote down a liſt of his men, which he ſent by Cranburn, whom he called his quarter-maſter, to captain Charnock. After a ſhort ſtay Cranburn returned, and brought back the paper, which he carried, and at the foot of Porter's liſt was added the liſt of Charnock's men, both which made up about eighteen. Then one of the conſpirators told Porter, that he thought their number had been greater, meaning the parties of Charnock and Porter. To which Porter anſwered, that they had been diſappointed of five or ſix. And indeed Kenrick excuſed himſelf upon the account of his arm, which he pretended was broke. Sherburn aſked too many queſtions to be truſted; and Plowden, though he appeared, the Saturday before, did not, according to his promiſe, appear now; and one or two more recommended by Lowick had failed them. Then Porter declared, that theſe men, with thoſe of ſir George Barclay, would make up forty; which King declared were enough of all conſcience to do the buſineſs. Cranburn at his return acquainted them likewiſe, that Chambers, had ſent intelligence to Charnock, that the king was to go out a hunting between ten and eleven o'clock, which was communicated and received with great joy; and then Porter declared that Pendergraſs was to be one of the eight, who were to attack the king's coach; and ſaid aloud, that he had a ſpecial piece for him, that would carry eight balls. Upon which King in a jocoſe manner ſaid to Pendergraſs, 'I hope you will not be afraid of breaking the glaſs windows.' In the mean time major Holmes was very diligent in getting ready ſir George Barclay's party. He ſent Harris to Counter's lodgings, to receive orders; who told him, that he was to be of Rookwood's party; and Rookwood, being at the ſame time there, gave Harris a liſt of names, and told him laughing, that he would make him his Aid de Camp. In the liſt was Harris's own name, the names of Hare, Hundford, and Blackburn, with captain Rookwood's name at the top. Then Rookwood deſired him to get thoſe men ready, which he did accordingly.

All things were now prepared, and the conſpirators ready to mount, and paſs, to avoid obſervation, out of town by two or three in a company, and to quarter in the inns about Turnham-Green and Brentford, where they were billeted, and had orders to wait till the king's return from Richmond, and then to make their attack in the order agreed on. But on a ſudden, to their mortification, notice was given, that the king did not go abroad that day. This account was given by Chambers to Charnock, and the news of it was likewiſe conveyed to Porter and his party. Soon after Keys came to them, who were now gone to dine at the Blue-Poſts in Spring-Gardens, and told them, that the guards were returned, and the king's coaches were come back to the Mews; and that it occaſioned great wondering among the people, that the king ſhould two Saturdays ſucceſſively put off his diverſion of hunting. This ſtruck a ſudden damp and conſternation among the conſpirators, who now concluded their deſign was diſcovered, and every one began to think of providing for his own ſecurity. But, notwithſtanding their danger, they did not part till they had drank ſeveral diſloyal healths. Durant had given the ſame intelligence to ſir George Barclay, who, upon their information, ſent word to his party, that the king, not intending to go abroad that day, there would be no occaſion for their ſervice; and ſoon after ſir George, looking on the deſign at an end, took care to withdraw, and conceal himſelf.

As none of the conſpirators were ſeized that night, they ſoon recovered their fright, and quieted themſelves. But, the next night, a great many of them were taken in their beds, and, the day following, the whole diſcovery was laid before the privy-council.

All this while king James, was waiting at Calais for ſome tidings of that, on which he chiefly depended; for upon the firſt

firſt notice of the aſſaſſination, he was reſolved to have ſet ſail, many regiments being embarked, and the artillery and ſtores ordered on board: ſo near was the matter brought to a criſis, when it broke out by the diſcovery made by the perſons abovenamed. Nay, ſo confident were they in France of a ſucceſsful expedition, that the duke of Orleans urged it as an argument to the duke of Savoy to make his ſeparate peace before the total overthrow of the confederates, which muſt of neceſſity attend the reſtoration of king James. Upon the firſt news of king James's coming to Calais, the duke of Wirtemberg diſpatched one of his aids-de-camp to king William, to give him notice of it, and to acquaint him that the duke had ſtopped all the ſhips in the harbour and canal of Oſtend, as well as of Bruges, in order to tranſport the forces under his command for his ſervice; and that, in caſe he did not quickly hear from him, he would run the hazard of bringing them over. This meſſenger, narrowly eſcaping the French at ſea, got to the Engliſh court on February the 22d; and immediately after the king received other expreſſes from the duke of Bavaria and prince Vaudemont, who were then at Bruſſels. And now it appeared how fortunate it was that the winds had been ſo long at ſouth weſt, and had detained our ſhips in port (which had been much lamented) for by that means we had a great fleet at Spithead ready to ſail: And we had another fleet, deſigned for the ſummer's ſervice in our own ſeas, quite ready, though not yet manned. Many brave ſeamen, ſeeing the nation was in ſuch viſible danger, came out of their lurking-holes, in which they were hiding themſelves from the preſs, and offered their ſervice; and all people ſhewed ſo much zeal, that, in three days, Ruſſel, who was ſent to command, ſtood over to the coaſt of France, with a fleet of above fifty men of war. The French were amazed at this; and, upon it, their ſhips drew ſo near their coaſts, that he durſt not follow them in ſuch ſhallow water, but was contented with breaking their deſign, and driving them into their harbours. King James ſtayed for ſome weeks there. But, as the French ſaid, his malignant ſtar ſtill blaſted every project, that was formed for his ſervice.

The court of France was much out of countenance with this diſappointment; for that king had ordered his deſign of invading England, to be communicated to all the courts, in which he had miniſters: and they ſpoke of it with ſuch an air of aſſurance, as gave violent preſumptions, that the king of France knew of the conſpiracy againſt the king's perſon, and depended upon it; for indeed, without that, the deſign was impracticable, conſidering how great a fleet we had at Spithead; nor could any men of common ſenſe have entertained a thought of it, but with a view of the confuſion, into which the intended aſſaſſination muſt have caſt us.

They went on in England ſeizing the conſpirators; and a proclamation was iſſued for apprehending thoſe that abſconded with a promiſe of a thouſand pounds reward, to ſuch as ſhould ſeize any of them, and the offer of a pardon to every conſpirator that ſhould take any of the reſt. This ſet all people at work, and in a few weeks moſt of them were apprehended [p]. Only Barclay was not found, who had brought the commiſſion from king James, though great ſearch was made for him. For, though the reality of ſuch a commiſſion was fully proved afterwards, in the trials of the conſpirators, by the evidence of thoſe who had ſeen and read it, all written in king James's own hand (ſuch a paper being too important to be truſted to any to copy) yet much pains were taken, to have found the very perſon who was entruſted with it. The commiſſion itſelf would have been a valuable piece, and ſuch an original, as was not to be found any where.

The military men would not engage on other terms; they thought, by the laws of war, they were bound to obey all orders, that run in a military ſtile, and no other: and ſo they imagined, that their part in it was as innocent, as the going on any deſperate deſign, during a campaign. Many of them repined at the ſervice, and wiſhed that it had not been put on them; but being commanded, they fancied that they were liable to no blame nor infamy, but ought to be treated as priſoners of war.

Immediately after the king's proclamation was publiſhed, George Harris, one of the perſons, who was ſent out of France by king James himſelf, to obey the orders of ſir George Barclay, and was actually engaged in the aſſaſſination, ſurrendered himſelf to ſir William Trumball, and confeſſed the double deſign of the aſſaſſination and invaſion, though he was not able to tell the particular circumſtances, that attended them. Among thoſe that were taken, Porter and Pendergraſs were brought in. Porter had been a vicious man, engaged in many ill things; and was very forward and furious in all their conſultations. The lord Cutts, who, as captain of the guards, was preſent, when the king examined Pendergraſs, but did not know his name, when he ſaw him brought in, preſſed him to own himſelf, and the ſervice he had already done; but he claimed the promiſe of not being forced to be a witneſs, and would ſay nothing: Porter was a man of pleaſure, who loved not the hardſhips of a priſon, and much leſs the ſolemnities of an execution; ſo he confeſſed all; and then Pendergraſs, who had his dependance on him, freely confeſſed likewiſe: He ſaid, Porter was the man who had truſted him; he could not be an inſtrument deſtroy him; yet he lay under no obligations to any others among them. Porter had been in the management of the whole matter: So he gave a very copious account of it all, from the firſt beginning. And now it appeared, that Pendergraſs had been but a very few days among them, and had ſeen very few of them; and that he came and diſcovered the conſpiracy the next day after it was opened to him.

When by theſe examinations the matter was clear and undeniable, the king communicated it, in the following ſpeech to both houſes.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I Am come hither this day upon an extraordinary occaſion, which might have proved fatal, if it had not been diſappointed by the ſingular mercy and goodneſs of God; and may now, by the continuance of the ſame providence, and our own prudent endeavours, be ſo improved, as to become a ſufficient warning to us, to provide for our ſecurity againſt the pernicious practices and attempts of our enemies.

"I have received ſeveral concurring informations of a deſign to aſſaſſinate me; and that our enemies, at the ſame time, are very forward in their preparations for a ſudden invaſion of this kingdom; and have therefore thought it neceſſary to loſe no time in acquainting my parliament with thoſe things, in which the ſafety of the kingdom and the public welfare are ſo nearly concerned, that I aſſure myſelf, nothing will be omitted on your part, which may be thought proper for our preſent ſecurity.

"I have not been wanting to give the neceſſary orders for the fleet; and I hope we have ſuch a ſtrength of ſhips, and in ſuch readineſs, as will be ſufficient to diſappoint the intentions of our enemies.

"I have alſo diſpatched orders for bringing home ſuch a number of our troops, as may ſecure us from any attempt.

"Some of the conſpirators againſt my perſon are already in cuſtody; and care is taken to apprehend ſo many of the reſt, as are diſcovered; and ſuch other orders are given, as the preſent exigency of affairs does abſolutely require at this time for the public ſafety.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"Having now acquainted you with the danger, which hath threatened us, I cannot doubt of your readineſs and zeal to do every thing, which you ſhall judge proper for our common ſafety. And I perſuade myſelf, we muſt be all ſenſible how neceſſary it is in our preſent circumſtances, that all poſſible diſpatch ſhould be given to the buſineſs before us."

[p] The conſpirators named in the proclamation were,

James duke of Berwick,
Sir George Barclay,
Major Lowick,
Captain George Porter,
Captain Stow,
Captain Walbank,
Captain James Courtney,
Lieutenant Sherburn,
Brice Blaire,
—— Dinant,
—— Chambers,
—— Boiſe,
George Higgons and his two brothers, ſons to ſir Thomas Higgons,
—— Davis,
Cardell Goodman,
—— Cranburn,
—— Keys,
—— Pendergraſs,
—— Bryerly,
—— Trevour,
Sir George Maxwell,
—— Durant, a Fleming,
—— Knightley,
Lieutenant King,
—— Holmes,
Sir William Perkins,
—— Rookwood.

It is ſaid, that more than one of the conſpirators ſhared the thouſand pounds reward with their friends, who took them for that purpoſe, there not being evidence ſufficient to convict them.

Upon

Upon this the two houſes immediately agreed to wait on the king, that very evening, at Kenſington with this addreſs.

Die Lunæ 24 Feb. 1695.

"WE your majeſty's moſt loyal and dutiful ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons, having taken into our ſerious conſideration what your majeſty hath been pleaſed to communicate to us this day, think it our duty, in the firſt place, to give your majeſty moſt humble thanks for having acquainted your parliament with the great danger your ſacred perſon hath been ſo nearly expoſed to, and the deſign of an invaſion from our enemies abroad. We heartily congratulate your majeſty's happy preſervation, and thankfully acknowledge the ſignal providence of God in it; and at the ſame time declare our deteſtation and abhorrence of ſo villainous and barbarous a deſign. And, ſince the ſafety and welfare of your majeſty's dominions do ſo entirely depend upon your life, we moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty to take more than ordinary care of your royal perſon. And we take this occaſion to aſſure your majeſty of our utmoſt aſſiſtance to defend your perſon, and ſupport your government againſt the late king James, and all your other enemies, both at home and abroad; hereby declaring to all the world, that, in caſe your majeſty ſhould come to any violent death (which God forbid!) we will revenge the ſame upon all your enemies and their adherents. And, as an inſtance of our zeal for your majeſty's ſervice, we will give all poſſible diſpatch to the public buſineſs. And we make it our deſire to your majeſty to ſeize and ſecure all perſons, horſes, and arms, that your majeſty may think fit to apprehend upon this occaſion,"

To this addreſs the king anſwered:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I thank you heartily for this kind addreſs. On my part you may be aſſured, that I will do all, that is within my power, for the conſervation of this kingdom, to which I have ſo many obligations. I will readily adventure my life, for the preſervation of it, and recommend myſelf to the continuance of your loyalty and good affection."

The ſame day the commons ordered a bill to be brought in, to empower his majeſty to ſecure and detain all ſuch perſons, as he ſhould ſuſpect were conſpiring againſt his perſon and government; as alſo a bill, that, whenever it ſhould pleaſe God to afflict theſe realms by the death of his preſent majeſty, the parliament then in being ſhould not be diſſolved thereby, but ſhould continue until the next heir to the crown in ſucceſſion, according to the act of parliament, ſhould diſſolve the ſame; and, if there ſhould be no parliament then in being, that the laſt preceding parliament ſhould immediate convene and ſit. As the parliament thus wiſely provided againſt that confuſion and diſorder, which might happen by the ceſſation of parliaments, and all commiſſions, on the king's deceaſe; ſo nothing could have been imagined more effectual for the ſecurity of the king's life againſt the malice and violence of his enemies; ſince by this means all hopes of eſcape and impunity were cut off, in caſe they ſhould ſucceed in their attempts. They likewiſe voted an addreſs to his majeſty, to deſire him to iſſue his royal proclamation to baniſh all papiſts from the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and ten miles from the ſame; and that he would give inſtructions to the judges going the circuits, to put the laws in execution againſt papiſts and non-jurors. And, as the greateſt teſt of their loyalty, they drew up this form of aſſociation, to be ſubſcribed by all the members.

"Whereas there has been a horrid and deteſtable conſpiracy formed and carried on by papiſts and other wicked and traiterous perſons, for aſſaſſinating his majeſty's royal perſon, in order to encourage an invaſion from France to ſubvert our religion, laws, and liberty; We, whoſe names are hereunto ſubſcribed, do heartily, ſincerely, and ſolemnly profeſs, teſtify, and declare, that his preſent majeſty king William is rightful and lawful king of theſe realms: And we do mutually promiſe to engage to ſtand by and aſſiſt each other to the utmoſt of our power, in the ſupport and defence of his majeſty's moſt ſacred perſon and government, againſt the late king James and all his adherents. And in caſe his majeſty come to any violent or untimely death (which God forbid!) we do hereby further freely and unanimouſly oblige ourſelves to unite, aſſociate, and ſtand by each other, in revenging the ſame upon his enemies and their adherents, and in ſupporting and defending the ſucceſſion of the crown, according to an act made in the firſt year of the reign of king William and queen Mary, intituled, 'An act declaring the rights and liberties of the ſubject, and ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown."

This aſſociation was the three following days ſigned by all the members, who came to the houſe; and becauſe ſome others had abſented themſelves upon pretence of health or buſineſs, but in reality to avoid ſetting their hands to the aſſociation, it was ordered, on the 27th of February, 'That ſuch members, who had not already, ſhould in ſixteen days ſign it, or declare their refuſal, notwithſtanding their leave to be abſent.' On the appointed day, March 16, the names of ſuch members were called over, as were abſent upon the laſt call of the houſe, and ſeveral of them being ſtill abſent, the ſpeaker was ordered to write to thoſe, who were in the country, and had not ſigned the aſſociation, or declared their refuſal to do ſo, to know what they would do, and return their anſwer by the firſt opportunity; and at the ſame time the clerk of the houſe was ordered to attend ſuch members, as were ill in town, with the aſſociation, in order to their ſigning the ſame, or receiving their anſwer or refuſal. The abſent members ſeeing themſelves ſo preſſed, and the nation at this time in ſo great a ferment againſt the diſaffected, thought it prudent to yield to the times, and either to ſubſcribe the aſſociation, or promiſe to do it upon their firſt coming up to town, though it were againſt their principles to own king William to be 'rightful and lawful' king. However, the aſſociation was on the 3d of April preſented to the king by the commons in a body, with this requeſt, 'That his majeſty would order both that, and all other aſſociations by the commons of England, to be lodged among the records in the Tower, there to remain as a perpetual memorial of their loyalty and affection to his majeſty.' Whereupon the king told them, 'That he took this as a moſt convincing and acceptable evidence of their affection. And, as they had freely aſſociated themſelves for his and their common ſafety, he did heartily enter into the ſame aſſociation, and would be always ready with them, and the reſt of his good ſubjects, to venture his life againſt all, who ſhould endeavour to ſubvert the religion, laws, and liberties of England.' And he promiſed them, that this, and all other aſſociations, ſhould be lodged among the records in the Tower. The next day, the commons made a reſolution, 'That whoever ſhould by word or writing affirm, that an aſſociation entered into by any member of this houſe, or any other perſon was 'illegal,' ſuch perſon ſhould be deemed a promoter of the deſigns of the late king James, and an enemy to the laws and liberties of this kingdom.

The lords reſolved on an aſſociation as well as the commons. The motion was much oppoſed by the earl of Nottingham, as that of the commons had been by ſir Edward Seymour and Mr. Finch. Their objections turned chiefly upon this, that 'rightful and lawful' were words, that had been laid aſide in the beginning of this reign; that they imported one, who was king by deſcent, and ſo could not belong to the the preſent king. They ſaid, that the crown and the prerogatives of it were veſted in him, and therefore they would obey him, and be faithful to him, though they could not acknowledge him their rightful and lawful king. Great exceptions were alſo taken to the word revenge, as not of an evangelical ſound; but that word was ſo explained, that theſe were ſoon cleared. 'Revenge' was to be meant in a legal ſenſe, either in the proſecution of juſtice at home, or of war abroad. And the ſame word had been uſed in that aſſociation, into which the nation entered, when it was apprehended, that queen Elizabeth's life was in danger by the practices of the queen of Scots. At laſt the aſſociation was carried in the houſe of lords, with this difference from that of the commons, that inſtead of the words 'rightful and lawful king,' theſe words were inſerted, 'That king William hath the right by law to the crown of theſe realms; and that neither king James, nor the pretended prince of Wales, nor any other perſon, hath any right whatſoever to the ſame.' This was done to ſatisfy thoſe, who ſaid, they could not come up to the words 'rightful and lawful.' And, the earl of Rocheſter offering theſe words, they were thought to anſwer the ends of the aſſociation, and ſo were agreed to. Ninety-two ty-two only of the commons, and fifteen of the peers, refuſed to ſign voluntarily.[q]

The aſſociation was carried from the houſes of parliament over all England, and was ſigned by all ſorts of people, very few only excepted. The biſhops alſo drew up a form for the clergy, according to that ſigned by the houſe of lords, with ſome ſmall variation; which was ſo univerſally ſigned, that not above an hundred over all England refuſed it.

Soon after this a bill was brought into the houſe of commons, declaring all men incapable of public truſt, or to ſerve in parliament, who did not ſign the aſſociation. This paſſed with no conſiderable oppoſition; for thoſe, who had ſigned it of their own accord, were not unwilling to have it made general; and ſuch as had refuſed it, when it was voluntary, were reſolved to ſign it, as ſoon as the law ſhould be made for it. This bill was intitled 'a bill for the better ſecurity of his majeſty's perſon and government,' and contained theſe heads: Firſt, 'That ſuch, as ſhould refuſe to take the oaths to his majeſty, ſhould be ſubject to the forfeitures and penalties of popiſh recuſants convict.' Secondly, 'To inflict a penalty on ſuch, as ſhould by writing or otherwiſe declare, that king William was not lawful and rightful king of theſe realms; or that the late king James, or the pretended prince of Wales, or any other perſon, than according to the act of ſettlement of the crown, had any right to the crown of theſe realms.' Thirdly, 'To ratify and confirm the aſſociation entered into by all his majeſty's good ſubjects, for the preſervation of his majeſty's perſon and government.' Fourthly, 'That no perſon ſhould be capable of any office or poſt of truſt, civil or military, who ſhould not ſign the aſſociation.' And, Fifthly, 'That the ſame penalties be inflicted on ſuch as come out of France, as upon thoſe, that go thither.'

About the ſame time an order paſſed in council for reviewing all the commiſſions in England, and for turning out of them all thoſe, who had not ſigned the aſſociation, while it was voluntary; ſince this ſeemed to be ſuch a declaration of their principles and affections, that it was not thought reaſonable, that ſuch perſons ſhould be any longer either juſtices of peace, or deputy-lieutenants.

The ſeſſion of parliament was ſoon brought to a concluſion. A fund was created, upon which the ſum of 2,564,000l. was to be raiſed, which the beſt judges did apprehend was neither juſt nor prudent. A new bank was propoſed, called the land-bank, becauſe the ſecurities were to be upon land: This was the main difference between it, and the bank of England: And, by reaſon of this, it was pretended, that it was not contrary to a clauſe in the act for that bank, that no other bank ſhould be ſet up in oppoſition to it. There was a ſet of undertakers, who engaged that it ſhould prove effectual, for the money for which it was given: This was chiefly managed by Foley, Harley, and the tories; it was much laboured by the earl of Sunderland; and the king was prevailed on to conſent to it, or rather to deſire it, though he was then told by many, of what ill conſequence it would prove to his affairs: The earl of Sunderland's excuſe for himſelf, when the error appeared afterwards but too evidently, was, that he thought it would engage the tories in intereſt to ſupport the government[r].

[1696] The moſt remarkable acts paſſed this ſeſſion, beſides what have been mentioned, are theſe:

A ſevere act was paſſed, for voiding all the elections of parliament-men, where the elected had been at any expence in meat, drink, or money to procure votes. This act was ſtrictly penned. Abuſes in elections were grown to moſt intolerable exceſſes, which threatened even the ruin of the nation.

Another act paſſed againſt unlawful and double returns; for perſons had been often returned, plainly contrary to the vote of the majority; and in boroughs, where there was a conteſt, between the ſelect number of the corporation, and the whole populace, both ſides had obtained favourable deciſions, as that ſide prevailed, on which the perſon elected happened to be; ſo both elections were returned, and the houſe judged the matter. But, by this act, all returns were ordered to be made, according to the laſt determination of the houſe of commons: Theſe were thought good ſecurities for future parliaments. Happy had it been for this nation, if the other act, againſt bribing at elections, had proved as effectual as this was.

An act, for the more eaſy recovery of ſmall tithes, was alſo paſſed for three years, but made perpetual afterwards by queen Anne.

To prevent marriages without licence or banns, an act was paſſed, by which the miniſter, in ſuch caſe, forfeits 100l. and the perſon ſo married, 10l. This was chiefly with a view to ſecure the ſtamp-money. For, upon every licence or certificate of marriage, there was a duty laid of five ſhillings.

It was cuſtomary in Wales, for widows and younger children, to claim a ſhare of their huſbands and fathers effects, called their 'reaſonable part,' notwithſtanding theſe effects were otherwiſe diſpoſed of by will or deed. As this occaſioned great troubles, diſputes, and expences, an act was now paſſed, aboliſhing that cuſtom, and enabling the inhabitants of Wales to diſpoſe of all their perſonal eſtate, as they ſhall think fit.

Though an act was paſſed this ſeſſion, for the further regulating elections of members of parliament, and preventing the irregular proceedings of ſheriffs and other officers elected, and in returning ſuch members: Yet another bill was brought in to regulate elections, which paſſed both houſes, but to which the king refuſed to give the royal aſſent. Upon this, the commons ſhewed ſome reſentment againſt thoſe that adviſed the king not to paſs the bill, and, on the 24th of April, the queſtion was put, that whoſoever adviſed his majeſty, not to give his aſſent to that bill, was an enemy to his country. But, as it was perceived, by the warmth of thoſe that were for the affirmative, that it was intended to make a difference between the king and parliament, a negative was put upon the queſtion by one hundred and forty-nine voices, two hundred and nineteen to ſeventy; however it was ordered, that the ſpeaker ſhould with the votes print the queſtion, together with the names on both ſides[s].

[q] Among the commons, that refuſed to ſign voluntarily, were,

Simon Harcourt,	Mountague lord Norris,
Henry lord Hyde,	Heneage Finch,
John Manley,	James Bertie,
John Tredenham,	William Bromley,
Francis Gwyn,	Sir Chriſtopher Muſgrave,
Sir Edward Seymour,	John Granville,
John How,	Robert Price,
Thomas Brotherton,	William Williams, &c.

See the whole hiſt. in Vol. II. p. 139. Oldm.

The Fifteen Peers were,

Hallifax,	Normanby,	Thanet,
Cheſterfield,	Winchelſea,	Scarſdale,
Craven,	Ayleſbury,	Feverſham,
Nottingham,	Spratt, biſhop of Rocheſter,
Lord Jefferies,	Watſon of St David's,	Lord Chandos,
Lord Ferrars

[r] Dr. Chamberlain, the famous man-midwife, is ſaid to have a hand in this project, which inſtead of advancing the landed-intereſt (as was intended) went near to ruin the public credit. The commons reſolved, Firſt, 'That a fund redeemable by parliament be ſettled in a national land-bank, to be raiſed by new ſubſcriptions.' Secondly, 'That no perſon be concerned in the bank of England, and in the national land-bann, at the ſame time.' Thirdly, 'That the duties upon coals and culm, and upon tonnage of ſhips,' (which by ſeveral petitions and otherwiſe the houſe had found to be grievous to the people) 'be taken off from the 17th of March 1696.' Fourthly, 'That for the making up the ſum of 1,724,000l. already voted by the houſe, and the monies to be made good for the duties upon coals and culm, and tonnage of ſhips, reſolved to be taken off, and for diſcharging what the duties upon ſalt were to anſwer from the 17th of March 1696, the ſum of 2,564,000l. to be raiſed upon this perpetual fund, redeemable by parliament.' Purſuant to theſe reſolutions, a bill was brought in, and, when it was committed, inſtructions were given 'to reſtrain the bank from lending money but upon land-ſecurity, or to the government in the exchequer; and to receive a clauſe, that, if the money did not come in by a certain time, his majeſty be enabled to borrow the ſame.' The next day the bank of England preſented a petition againſt this bill, and were afterwards, by order of the houſe, heard by their council, but without ſucceſs; ſo that the houſe went on with the bill, and on the 9th of April reſolved, firſt, that towards the ſupply to be granted to his majeſty, for making up the fund of intereſt of 2,564,000l. the capital ſtock of the intended national land-bank, certain duties upon glaſs wares, ſtone and earthen bottles, granted before to the king for a term of years, be granted to his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors. Secondly, That a duty be laid upon tobacco-pipes: And, Thirdly, That a further duty be laid upon all ſtone and earthen were. Which reſolutions were ordered to be inſerted in the bill for ſettling the national land-bank. Accordingly, the act was paſſed under the title of an act, continuing to his majeſty certain duties upon ſalt, glaſs wares, ſtone and earthen wares, and for granting ſeveral duties upon tobacco-pipes and other earthen wares, for carrying on the war with France, and for eſtabliſhing a national land-bank, and for taking off the duties upon tonnage of ſhips and upon coals. The ſubſcription was to be 2,564,000l. for the intereſt of which at 7 per cent. was to be raiſed, out of the abovelaid duties, 179,480l. This bank was to lend out 500,000l. a year upon land ſecurities, at 3l. 10s. per cent. per annum. In caſe the ſubſcription was not full by the 1ſt of Auguſt 1696, the bank was to ceaſe and determine.

[s] Beſides this bill, there were others that were begun, but not finiſhed, as a bill for 'regulating printing and printing-preſſes.' Secondly, A bill for reverſing a judgment given againſt ſir William Williams, 2 Jac. II. for what he did as ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, and for aſcertaining the rights and freedom of parliaments. Thirdly, A bill for ſettling and regulating the Eaſt-India trade. Fourthly, Another to regulate the trade of Africa. Fifthly, A bill to confirm the earl of Torrington's grant. Sixthly, Two bills to veſt in the crown all forfeited eſtates in England and Ireland, and to vacate all grants made thereof. Seventhly, A bill to prevent ſtock-jobbing. And, Eighthly, A bill for preventing papiſts from diſinheriting their proteſtant heirs.

Three days after, the king came and cloſed the ſeſſion, with the following ſpeech to both houſes.

" My lords and gentlemen,

" YOU have ſhewn ſo great concern for my perſon, and zeal for my government, and have done ſo much for the preſervation of the one, and for the ſtrengthening of the other, by the good laws, which have been made, and by the ſupplies you have provided for the ſeveral occaſions of this year, that the late deſigns of our enemies are, by the bleſſing of God, like to have no other effect, than to let them ſee, how firmly we are united ; and to give me occaſion to acknowledge your kindneſs, and to aſſure you of all the returns, which a prince can make to his people.

" My lords and gentlemen,

" The neceſſity of affairs requiring my abſence out of the kingdom for ſome time, I do earneſtly recommend to you, that in your ſtations you will be aſſiſting to thoſe, whom I ſhall leave to adminiſter the government; and that you will be careful in preſerving the public peace of the kingdom."

Then the lord keeper, by his majeſty's command, prorogued the parliament till Tueſday the 16th day of June.

Thus ended this memorable ſeſſion. After moſt of the conſpirators, who had not fled beyond ſea, were either taken or come in voluntarily, and all the examinations were over, ſome of them were brought to their trials. Mr. Robert Charnock was begun with. He was one of the two fellows of Magdalen-College, who in king James's time had turned papiſt, and was a hot and active agent amongſt them. He was a man of good parts, and, next to ſir George Barclay, was the chief manager and promoter of the intended aſſaſſination. This was ſo fully proved againſt him, that he was found guilty. He ſhewed great preſence of mind, with temper and good judgment, and made as ſtrong a defence as the matter could bear. Endeavours were uſed to perſuade him to confeſs all he knew; for he had been in all the plots from the beginning. His brother was employed to deal with him, and he ſeemed to be once in ſuſpence; but the next time, that his brother came to him, he ſaid, that he could not ſave his own life, without doing that, which would take away the lives of ſo many, that he did not think his own life worth it. This ſhewed a greatneſs of mind, which had been very valuable, had it been better directed. Thus this matter was underſtood at that time. But, many years after, the lord Somers gave biſhop Burnet a very different account of it. Charnock, it ſeems, ſent an offer to the king, of a full diſcovery of all the conſultations and deſigns of his party, and deſired no pardon, but only that he might live in ſome eaſy priſon; and, if he was found to prevaricate in any part of his diſcovery, he would look for the execution of the ſentence. But the king apprehended, that ſo many perſons would be found concerned, and thereby be rendered deſperate, that he was afraid to have ſuch a ſcene opened, and would not accept of his offer. With Charnock were tried lieutenant King, and Thomas Keys, formerly a trumpeter, and lately captain Porter's ſervant, who had little to ſay for themſelves; ſo that, upon a full hearing of the evidence, they were all three found guilty of high-treaſon, and executed at Tyburn on the 18th of March. Before the executioner did his office, the malefactors delivered each a paper to the ſheriffs, wherein they confeſſed the crime which they were accuſed of, but endeavoured to palliate it, and at the ſame time to juſtify both king James, the jacobites, and Roman catholics. Charnock particularly owned, 'That, to facilitate king James's invaſion of England, himſelf and ſome others did agree to attack the prince of Orange, and his guards. That, as for any order or commiſſion of king James's for aſſaſſinating the prince of Orange, he neither ſaw nor heard of any, but had had frequent aſſurances of that king's having rejected ſuch propoſals, when they had been offered. That he had heard, there was a commiſſion arrived for levying of war, which it was natural to believe, if the king was in ſuch readineſs to come over, as was reported; but that he never ſaw it. And, as to what regarded the body of the Roman catholics, he muſt do them the juſtice, that they had no manner of knowledge of this deſign, nor did he believe it was communicated to any other party of ſuch as were reputed the king's friends, but carried on merely by a ſmall number, without the advice, conſent, or privity of any parties whatſoever.' King's paper was to the ſame purpoſe: But the way, that they took to vindicate king James, rather faſtened the imputation more upon him. They did not deny, that he had ſent over a commiſſion to attack the prince of Orange, which, as Porter depoſed, Charnock told him he had ſeen. If this had been denied by a dying man, his laſt words would have been of ſome weight. But, inſtead of denying that, which was ſworn, he only denied, that king James had given a commiſſion for aſſaſſination. And it ſeems, great weight was laid on that word; for all the conſpirators agreed in it, and denied, that king James had given a commiſſion to aſſaſſinate the prince of Orange. This was an odious word, and perhaps no perſon was ever ſo wicked, as to order ſuch a thing in ſo crude a manner. But the ſending a commiſſion to attack the king's perſon was the ſame thing upon the matter, and was all that the witneſſes had depoſed. Therefore their not denying this in the terms, in which the witneſſes ſwore it, plainly implied a confeſſion, that it was true. But ſome, who had a mind to deceive themſelves or others, laid hold on this, and made great uſe of it, that dying men had acquitted king James of the aſſaſſination. Such ſlight colours will ſerve, when people are engaged beforehand to believe as their affections lead them.

The next, who were tried, found guilty, condemned, and executed on the 3d of April for the ſame complicated crime of the aſſaſſination and invaſion, were ſir John Friend, and ſir William Perkins. Friend had riſen from mean beginnings to great credit and much wealth. He was employed by king James, and had all this while adhered firmly to his intereſts. His purſe was more conſidered than his head, and was open on all occaſions, as the party applied to him. While colonel Parker was formerly in the Tower (as has been related) upon information of an aſſaſſination of the king deſigned by him, he furniſhed the money, that corrupted the keepers, and helped him to make his eſcape. He knew of the aſſaſſination, though he was not to be an actor in it. But he had a commiſſion for raiſing a regiment for king James, and he had entertained and paid the officers, who were to ſerve under him. He alſo joined with thoſe, who had ſent over Charnock in May 1695, with the meſſage to king James. Upon all this evidence, Freind was condemned. Sir William Perkins was a gentleman of eſtate, who had gone violently into the paſſions and intereſts of the court in king Charles II's time: He was one of the ſix clerks in chancery, and took all the oaths to the government, rather than loſe his place. He not only conſented to the deſign of the aſſaſſination, but undertook to bring five men, who ſhould aſſiſt in it; and he had brought up horſes for that ſervice, from the country; but had not named the perſons; ſo that this lay yet in his own breaſt. He was not to have acted in the buſineſs himſelf, for he had likewiſe a commiſſion for a regiment, and therefore was to have reſerved himſelf for that ſervice. He had alſo provided a ſtock of arms, which were hid underground, and were now diſcovered. Upon this evidence he was condemned. Great endeavours were uſed both with ſir John Freind and him to confeſs all they knew. Freind was more ſullen, as he knew leſs; for he was only applied to and truſted, when they wanted his money. Perkins fluctuated more; he confeſſed the whole thing, for which he was condemned, but would not name the five perſons, whom he was to have ſent in to aſſiſt in the aſſaſſination. He ſaid, that he had engaged them in it, and therefore could not think of ſaving his own life by deſtroying theirs. He confeſſed, that he had ſeen king James's commiſſion. The words differed a little from thoſe, which Porter had mentioned; but Porter did not ſwear, that he ſaw it himſelf, and only related what Charnock had told him concerning it. Yet Perkins ſaid, they were to the ſame effect. He believed, it was all writ with king James's own hand, he having ſeen his writing often. He owned, that he had raiſed and maintained a regiment, but he thought he could not ſwear againſt his officers, ſince he himſelf had drawn them into the ſervice; and he affirmed, that he knew nothing of the other regiments. He ſent for the biſhop of Ely, to whom he repeated all theſe particulars, and ſeemed much troubled with a ſenſe of his former life, which had been very irregular. The houſe of commons ſent ſome to examine him; but he gave them ſo little ſatisfaction, that they left him to the courſe of the law. His tenderneſs in not accuſing thoſe whom he had drawn in, was ſo generous, that this alone ſerved to create ſome regard for a man, who had been long under a bad character. In the beginning of April, Freind and he were executed together. At their execution, they delivered their confeſſions to the ſheriffs. Sir John Freind, though he denied his knowledge of the invaſion and aſſaſſination, yet ſeemed to own himſelf guilty, in endeavouring to juſtify himſelf by ſaying, 'That the cauſe, he he ſuffered for, he firmly believed to be the cauſe of God and true religion, and agreeable to the laws of the land, which he had ever heard to require a firm duty and allegiance. That as no 'foreign' ſo neither any 'domeſtic' power can alienate our allegiance; for it was altogether new and unintelligible to him, that the king's ſubjects can depoſe and dethrone him on any account, or conſtitute any, that have not an immediate right to his place; and that, as they ought not to do this, ſo, when it was done, to aſſiſt him in the recovery of his right was juſtifiable, and their duty. He profeſſed himſelf a member of the church of England, which he heartily beſought God almighty to bleſs and preſerve; to deliver this ſinful nation from the guilt of rebellion, blood, and perjury; to comfort the diſtreſſed king, reſtore him to his right, and his miſled ſubjects to their allegiance; and to bleſs his royal conſort and his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, that he might "grow in ſtature and in favour with God and man." Sir William Perkins confeſſed, 'That he was privy to a deſign upon the prince of Orange, but was not to act in it: and he was fully ſatisfied, that very few or none knew of it, but thoſe, who undertook to do it. That he had ſeen a commiſſion from king James to levy war againſt the prince of Orange; but, as for any commiſſion particularly levelled againſt his perſon, he neither ſaw nor heard of any ſuch. That he thought it for his honour to ſay, he was entirely in the intereſt of king James, being always firmly perſuaded of the juſtice of his cauſe, and looked upon it as his duty, both as a ſubject and an Engliſhman, to aſſiſt him in the recovery of his throne, which he believed his majeſty to be deprived of, contrary to all right and juſtice; in which opinion he he took the laws and conſtitution of his country for his guide. And, laſtly, that he died in the communion of the church of England, in which he was educated.' A very remarkable inſtance of the boldneſs of the jacobites, appeared on this occaſion. Freind and Perkins had not changed their religion, but ſtill called themſelves proteſtants; ſo three of the nonjuring clergymen, Mr, Collier, Mr. Snatt, and Mr. Cooke, waited on them to the place of execution; where they all three joined to give them the abſolution of the church, as it ſtands in the office of viſitation of the ſick, and accompanied the ceremony with a ſolemn impoſition of hands. The court was extremely offended at this conduct of theirs, which ſeemed to juſtify the conſpiracy, ſince the dying perſons owned the ill deſigns, in which they had engaged, and expreſſed no ſort of repentance for it. Fourteen of the biſhops therefore, who happened to be then in London, publiſhed a declaration, 'wherein they cenſured the performance of this office of the church, without a previous confeſſion made, and abhorrence expreſſed by the priſoners of the heinous crime, for which they died, as extremely inſolent and without precedent in the manner, and altogether irregular in the thing, being a manifeſt tranſgreſſion of the church's order, and profane abuſe of the authority of Chriſt, ſince Mr. Collier, and Mr. Snatt, and Mr. Cooke muſt either look on the perſons abſolved as impenitents or martyrs.' The lord chief juſtice Holt, likewiſe on the 7th of April, repreſented to the grand jury, in the court of King's-Bench, the pernicious practices of thoſe three abſolving prieſts, and the jury delivered a preſentment againſt them, ſetting forth, That they were enemies to his majeſty and his government, promoters and encouragers of the aſſaſſination and invaſion, and a ſcandal to the church. But though a bill of high miſdemeanour was found againſt them, and Cooke and Snatt were committed to Newgate; yet, through the lenity of this reign, no manner of puniſhment was inflicted on them; and Jeremy Collier, who kept out of the way, with great aſſurance publiſhed ſeveral papers, wherein he endeavoured to juſtify his practice, with reſpect to manner, form, and occaſion.

On the 21ſt of April, brigadier Rookwood, major Lowick, and Mr. Charles Cranburn, three other conſpirators, were brought to their trial, and were the firſt, who had the benefit of the ſtatute made this very ſeſſion, to regulate trials in caſes of high treaſon. But neither the copy of the indictment, which was delivered to them, nor the advantage of being defended by ſir Bartholomew Shower, and two other eminent lawyers did avail them much; for the evidence againſt them was ſo plain and poſitive, that they were all three found guilty, and received ſentence accordingly. Rookwood and Lowick were papiſts; they expreſſed their diſlike of the deſign, but inſiſted on this, that, as military men, they were bound to obey all military orders; and they thought that the king, who knew the laws of war, ought to have regard to this, and forgive them. Great interceſſion was made by ſome noblemen for the life of Lowick, but in vain. Cranburn called himſelf a proteſtant, but was more ſullen than the other two; to ſuch a degree of fury and perverſeneſs had the jacobites wrought up their party. They were all three executed on the 29th of April.

Mr. Knightly and Mr. Cooke (ſon of ſir Miles Cooke, one of the ſix clerks in Chancery) were the two laſt that were tried this year. Knightly confeſſed all, and upon that, tho' he was condemned, he had a reprieve, and was afterwards pardoned. Cooke was tried on account of the intended invaſion; for he was not charged with the aſſaſſination. His trial was conſidered as introductory to that of the earl of Aylesbury (who had been committed to the Tower) for the evidence was the ſame as to both. Porter and Goodman were two witneſſes againſt him. They had been with him at a meeting in a tavern in Leadenhall-Street, where Charnock received inſtructions to go to France with the meſſage to king James. All that was brought againſt this, was, that the maſter of the tavern, and two of his ſervants, ſwore, that they remembered well when that company was at the tavern, for they were often coming into the room where they ſat, both at dinner-time, and after it; and that they ſaw not Goodman there; nay, they were poſitive, that he was not there. On the other hand, Porter depoſed, that Goodman was not with them at dinner, but that he came to that houſe after dinner, and ſent him in a note; upon which he, with the conſent of the company, went out and brought him in. And then it was certain, that the ſervants of the houſe were not in that conſtant attendance; nor could they be believed in a negative, againſt poſitive evidence to the contrary. Their credit was not ſuch, but that it might be well ſuppoſed, that, for the intereſt of their houſe, they might be induced to make ſtretches. The evidence was believed, and Cooke was found guilty, and condemned. He obtained many ſhort reprieves, upon aſſurances, that he would tell all he knew. But it was viſible, that he did not deal ſincerely, and his puniſhment ended in a baniſhment.

As ſoon as the news came to Flanders, that the conſpiracy was happily diſcovered, the king ſafe, and England freed from the apprehenſions of an invaſion, the prince of Vaudemont and the other generals bethought themſelves of making ſome attempt, by way of revenge, upon the French, for their intended invaſion of England. In order to which, having drawn together a body of troops from ſeveral garriſons, the earl of Athlone, and lieutenant-general Coehorn marched from Namur with forty ſquadrons, thirteen battalions, fifteen pieces of cannon, and ſix mortars. While the earl, with the greateſt part of theſe forces, inveſted Dinant, Coehorn advanced with the reſt of the troops and all the artillery to Givet, where the enemy had laid up a large magazine: and, having got his batteries in readineſs by the 16th in the morning, he began to fire into the town with bombs and red-hot bullets, which ſet both the forage and houſes on fire. At the ſame time a detachment of ſoldiers were commanded to enter the town with large flambeaux in their hands; which they performed with great bravery, firing the cazerns and granaries, where the oats and other magazines lay; ſo that the whole town and magazine were entirely conſumed; and all this executed with the inconſiderable loſs of nine or ten men.

Not long after ſir Cloudeſly Shovel ſailed out of the Downs with ſeveral men of war and bomb-veſſels, and being come to Calais on the 3d of April, captain Benbow, notwithſtanding the vigorous oppoſition from the enemies boats and half-gallies, threw between three and four hundred bombs, moſt of which fell in the town, and amongſt the imbarkations in the pier, and ſet fire to the town in three or four places, and and to ſome veſſels in the port. Though the ſucceſs of this bombardment did not anſwer either the expence or expectation of the Engliſh, yet the damage done was not ſo inconſiderable as the French gave out; it being certain that ſeveral houſes were burnt and ſpoiled, beſides the church and convent and ſome part of the cazerns [t].

The republic of Venice was the laſt of the ſtates in Europe, not engaged in the war againſt England, that would acknowledge king William. After Ruſſel had appeared with a great fleet in the Mediterranean, and the republic ſaw a general peace could not be far off, they thought of ſending an embaſſy to London. On the 11th of April this year, arrived, as embaſſadors extraordinary from that ſtate, ſignior Soranzo and ſignior Venier, and, after making a ſplendid entry on the 22d, they had their firſt public audience the 1ſt of May. Soranzo the eldeſt of the embaſſadors was knighted, and, according to the cuſtom on the like occaſion, the king preſented him with his ſword.

[t] It is remarkable, that the French have raiſed a croſs and oratory near a ſhell, which to this day ſticks in the market place at Calais, ſays Boyer, vol. III. p. 172.

Before

Before the king went abroad, he conferred the following honours and preferments.

George Hamilton, third ſon of duke Hamilton, for his military ſervices in Ireland and Flanders, was created earl of Orkney, in the kingdom of Scotland.

Sir John Lowther, on the firſt of May, was created baron Lowther of Lowther, and viſcount Lonſdale in the county of Weſtmoreland; and the ſame day ſir John Thompſon, bart. was raiſed to the dignity of a baron of this kingdom by the ſtile and title of baron Haverſham of Haverſham in the county of Bucks. At the ſame time his majeſty conſtituted ſir Thomas Littleton one of the lords commiſſioners of the treaſury; Mr. Chriſtopher Muſgrave, clerk of the ordnance; and Mr. James Lowther, clerk of the delivery of the ordnance; and conferred the honour of knighthood on Theodore Janſſen, an eminent merchant of the city of London, for the zeal, which he had on all occaſions expreſſed for the government, particularly in the buſineſs of the bank of England. Not long after the lord keeper of the great ſeal of England, or the lord chancellor, the lord preſident of the privy-council, the firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, or lord treaſurer, the firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty, or lord admiral, the two principal ſecretaries of ſtate, and the chancellor of the exchequer, for the time being, and the earls of Bridgewater and Tankerville, ſir Philip Meadows, William Blaithwayte, John Pollexfen, John Locke, Abraham Hill, and John Methuen, eſquires, were declared commiſſioners of trade and plantations. Mr. Popple was made ſecretary to this board.

On the 1ſt of May, the king declared in council, that he had appointed the ſame perſons to adminiſter the government during his abſence, who had diſcharged that truſt the laſt year. The next day the king went from Kenſington to Margate, and on the 3d of May embarked on board his yatcht for Holland; but, the wind, which was then ſouth ſouth-eaſt, turning in the evening to the eaſtward, and there being an appearance of a ſtorm, he came on ſhore again. Two days after, the wind being more favourable and the weather fair, he went on board the Elizabeth, vice-admiral Aylmer commander, and on the 7th landed at Orange-Polder, and about midnight arrived at the Hague.

The ſummer paſſed over, both in Flanders and on the Rhine, without any action. The diſcovery of the plot, and the proceedings of the parliament upon it, took up ſo much time, that the king could not prevent the enemies taking the field before him. But the common ſcarcity of money kept both armies quiet. All the funds given for this year's ſervice proved defective, but that of the land-bank failed totally; and the credit of the bank of England was much ſhaken. About five millions of clipped money was brought into the exchequer; and the loſs that the nation ſuffered, by the recoining of the money, amounted to two millions, and two hundred thouſand pounds. The coinage was carried on with all poſſible haſte; about eighty thouſand pounds was coined every week: Yet ſtill this was ſlow, and the new money was generally kept up; ſo that, for ſeveral months, little of it appeared. This ſtop, in the free circulation of money, put the nation into great diſorder: Thoſe who, according to the act of parliament, were to have the firſt payments in milled money, for the loans they had made, kept their ſpecie up, and would not let it go, but at an unreaſonable advantage. The king had no money to pay his army, ſo they were in great diſtreſs, which they bore with wonderful patience: By this means, the king could undertake nothing, and was forced to lie on the defenſive. Nor were the French ſtrong enough to make an impreſſion in any place; the king had a mighty army, and was much ſuperior to the enemy, yet he could do nothing; and it paſſed for a happy campaign, becauſe the French were not able to take any advantage from thoſe ill accidents, that our want of ſpecie brought us under; which indeed were ſuch, that nothing but the ſenſe all had of the late conſpiracy, kept us quiet and free from tumults. It now appeared, what a ſtrange error the king was led into, when he accepted of ſo great a ſum, to be raiſed by a land-bank: It was ſcarce honourable, and not very ſafe at any time; but it might have proved fatal at a time, in which money was like to be wanted, which want would have been leſs felt, if paper credit had been kept up: But one bank working againſt another, and the goldſmiths againſt both, put us to great ſtreights; yet the bank ſupplied the king in this extremity, and thereby convinced him, that they were his friends in affection, as well as intereſt.

On the other hand, France was very uneaſy under ſo long and ſo deſtructive a war. The country was exhauſted, and they had neither men nor money. Their trade was ſunk to nothing, and public credit was loſt. The creation of new offices, which always was conſidered as a reſource never to be exhauſted, did not work as formerly. Few buyers or undertakers appeared. The French king's health was thought declining; he affected ſecrecy and retirement; ſo that both the temper of his mind, and the ſtate of his affairs, diſpoſed him to deſire a peace. Accordingly, this ſummer he made ſome ſteps towards it; and the ſtreights, to which both armies were reduced, ſeemed to favour his negotiations. Before the king's arrival at the Hague, monſieur Callieres was ſent with propoſitions to the States, for ſettling the preliminaries of a treaty, at the ſame time that d'Avaux was preſſing the king of Sweden to offer his mediation. The king of France addreſſed himſelf firſt to the Dutch, becauſe he ſuppoſed, that they could not but be weary of a tedious war, which had almoſt ruined their trade, the only ſource of their riches, and even ſubſiſtence, and would therefore ſooner hearken to peace, than either the emperor or the king of England. It is true, the Hollanders had an abſolute dependence upon his Britannic majeſty, not only becauſe he was their Stadtholder, but alſo becauſe, ſince their firſt ſettlement, they always found it, and eſteemed it their intereſt to keep cloſely united to England, in order to maintain a balance between the houſes of Bourbon and Auſtria, and preſerve themſelves from being cruſhed by either. Yet, as the French king was at laſt reſolved to acknowledge king William, (which reſolution he took ſoon after the intended invaſion miſcarried) ſo he believed, that the Dutch would not coldly entertain the propoſals, which he deſigned to make them, ſince, by removing this great obſtacle, the way ſeemed to lie open to a general peace.

The States of Holland finding by the French king's propoſals, and his offers to deliver up ſo many places, that there was room for an honourable and laſting peace, they gave Callieres a favourable reception, but yet refuſed either to grant him a paſſport, except by the concurring allowance of king William, or to treat without his and the conſent of their other allies. This was no more than Callieres expected; for though, at the treaty of Nimeguen, the French plenipotentiaries found a way to draw the Dutch to a ſeparate peace, by making them jealous of the prince of Orange; yet he was perſuaded, that the Hollanders were by this time too ſenſible of their former miſtake, to ſuffer the French to play the ſame game over again. However, Callieres having poſitive orders from his maſter not to acknowledge king William, till he had good aſſurances of the peace, he found out an expedient, which was, that the States and he ſhould not come to a final concluſion; but, if they found reaſon to agree upon any point, that the ſame ſhould be communicated to their allies. To this the Dutch readily conſented; and, amongſt other particulars, demanded, as preliminaries of the treaty, the reſtitution of Lorrain, and of the towns of Straſburg and Luxemburg. Callieres granted both in his maſter's name, but, upon condition, that Lorrain ſhould be reſtored to the duke of that name, on ſuch terms only as had been agreed to at Nimeguen. This was oppoſed by the preſident Canon, who took care of the duke of Lorrain's intereſts in Holland, under pretence, that, when his maſter entered into the grand alliance, the confederates engaged never to conclude a peace, till he had full ſatisfaction done him; urging, that, if the duke's dominions were not reſtored to him, but upon the terms of the peace of Nimeguen, he ſhould rather be a loſer than a gainer by the confederacy, ſince he could have made a better bargain with the French king, before he entered into the war. But as, in moſt alliances, great potentates ſeldom regard the concerns of thoſe petty princes, whom they have engaged in their quarrel, when they have no more need of them; ſo the Allies, after they had ſpoken once or twice in the duke of Lorrain's behalf, did not think fit to inſiſt any longer upon that affair; though Canon gave in ſeveral memorials, which were ſome time ſupported by the imperial miniſters, whoſe maſter was deſirous to prolong the concluſion of the treaty. On the other hand, that ſpirit of chicanery, and injuſtice, that had reigned ſo long in the French court, ſtill appeared in every ſtep that was taken towards a treaty; for they made uſe of equivocal terms in every paper, which was offered in their name. The States-general had felt the effects of theſe in former treaties too ſenſibly, not to be now on their guard againſt them. But the French ſtill returned to them; and, when ſome points ſeemed to be quite ſettled, new difficulties were ſtill thrown in. It was urged by them, that the popiſh religion muſt ſtill continue at Straſburg; and that the king of France could not in conſcience yield that point. It was alſo pretended, that Luxemburg was to be reſtored in the ſame ſtate, in in which it was when the French took it. Theſe variations did almoſt break off the negotiation; but the French would not let it fall, and yielded them up again. So that it was viſible all this was only an amuſement, and an artifice, by this ſhew of peace, to get the parliament of England to declare for it; ſince, as a trading nation muſt grow weary of a war, ſo the party, which they had among the Engliſh, would join in with the inclination, that was now become general, to promote the peace. For, though our affairs were in all reſpects, except that of the coin, in ſo good a condition, that the nation felt itſelf grow richer by the war, yet, during each campaign, we ran a greater riſque than our enemies did; for all our preſervation hung on the ſingle thread of the king's life, and on that proſpect the party, that were averſe to the government, had great hopes, and acted with much ſpirit during the war, which there was great reaſon to think muſt ſink with a peace.

To make the Spaniards the more willing to put an end to the war, the duke of Vendoſme, who this year commanded the French forces in Catalonia, reſolved to make them feel the power of his maſter's arms, by attacking them in their camp near Oſtalrick. In order to this he paſſed the river Ter, and underſtanding, that the Spaniſh cavalry, commanded by the prince of Heſſe Darmſtadt, had advanced out of the lines to obſerve him, fell upon them with great vigour. The Spaniards, ſeeing none but horſe appear againſt them, reſolutely ſtood their ground, and forced ſome of the French ſquadrons to retire. But, when they ſaw the number of the enemy increaſe, and a ſtrong body of infantry come up to ſupport them, they retreated in very good order under the cannon planted on their lines; where the French, eager of purſuit, met with ſuch a warm reception, as quickly obliged them to retire in their turn. In this action the Spaniards loſt near three hundred men, and the French about two hundred. Both the king and queen of Spain were about this time ſo ill, that, as is uſual upon ſuch occaſions, it was ſuſpected they were both poiſoned. The king of Spain relapſed often, and at laſt remained in that low ſtate of health, in which he ſeemed to be always rather dying than living. The court of France were glad of his recovery, being not then in a condition to undertake ſuch a war, as the Dauphin's pretenſions muſt have engaged them in.

The campaign on the Rhine was ſtill more inconſiderable than that in Catalonia. The French indeed, in the beginning of the ſpring, boaſted their paſſing the Rhine, and forced prince Lewis of Baden to intrench himſelf to avoid an engagement. But now, towards the end of the year, the prince in his turn croſſed the Rhine near Mentz, and, being joined by the Heſſian troops, advanced to Newſtadt, where the French were ſo ſtrongly intrenched, that all he could do was to cannonade them for ſeveral days. It was at the ſame time ſo contrived, that general Thungen ſhould have paſſed the Rhine not far from Philipſburg, in order to have attacked the French in the rear; but they, having notice of that deſign, detached the marquis d'Uxelles to diſappoint it. So that the Germans, after they had got ſome booty, and divers hoſtages for contribution, repaſſed the Rhine towards the beginning of October, and then marched into winter quarters.

The principal affair of this year, in relation to the grand confederacy, was managed in Italy. During the winter the court of France renewed their intrigues with the duke of Savoy, to engage him in a ſeparate peace. The Pope's Nuncio, and the Venetian envoy, ſeconded the deſigns of that crown, their maſters being deſirous of ſending the Germans out of Italy, and taking the duke out of the neceſſity of depending on thoſe, whom they called heretics. The management in the buſineſs of Caſal looked ſo dark, that the lord Galway, the king's general and envoy there, apprehended there was ſomething myſterious under it. But the duke would not own, that he was in any negotiation, till he ſhould have received the advances of money, that were promiſed him from England and Holland; for he was much ſet on heaping up treaſure, even during the war; to which end he had debaſed his coin ſo, that it was not above a ſixth part in intrinſic value of what it paſſed for. He was always beſet with his prieſts, who were perpetually complaining of the progreſs, which hereſy was like to make in his dominions. He had indeed granted a very full edict in favour of the Vaudois, reſtoring to them their former liberties and privileges, which the lord Galway took care to have expreſſed in the moſt emphatical words, and paſſed with all the formalities of law, to make it as effectual, as laws and promiſes can be. Yet every ſtep, that was made in that affair, was merely extorted from the duke by the interceſſion of the king and the ſtates-general, and by the lord Galway's zeal. But the French were grown ſo weary of the war, and found the charge of it ſo heavy, that they made the duke ſuch large and advantageous offers, that he reſolved to accept them, notwithſtanding his ſtrict engagements of honour to the Allies. However he wanted not plauſible reaſons to juſtify his conduct in this point; for though England and Holland had ever punctually paid in the ſubſidies, which they had promiſed, and even ſomething more; yet the emperor and king of Spain were greatly in arrears in their contributions and ſupplies. Indeed the Allies did not fail to aſſure him, that they would procure him conditions at the general treaty, as much, if not more advantageous, than thoſe, which France offered him at preſent. But thoſe were looſe and diſtant promiſes, and theſe of France certain and at hand, and ſupported beſides by threats from that crown to invade the reſt of his country next ſummer with a formidable army. However, though the duke urged the probability of the effects of this threatening, to juſtify his conduct to the Allies; yet it is certain, that a ſtronger motive inclined him to a ſeparate peace, and that was the marriage of his eldeſt daughter to the Dauphin's eldeſt ſon. It was not ſafe to conclude this treaty at Turin, where the duke was narrowly obſerved by the lord Galway; and therefore, to eſcape the ſagacity of that miniſter, he went towards the cloſe of the winter, with a ſmall retinue of his own naming, to our lady of Loretto, concealing a political journey under the pretence of a religious vow. This gave no ſmall umbrage to the lord Galway, who knowing him to be more a ſtateſman than a bigot, and being refuſed to accompany him, ſent ſpies after him. But, notwithſtanding all their vigilance, they could never get the leaſt notice of the treaty of peace, which the duke ſigned at Loretto, by the mediation of the agents of Rome and Venice, and a private meſſenger from the Marſhal de Catinat. By this treaty the French reſtored to the duke all the new conqueſts, which they had made, as alſo Pignerol demoliſhed; gave him four millions of livres towards the reparation of the damages, which he had ſuſtained during the war; engaged to aſſiſt him with eight thouſand foot and four thouſand horſe, to be maintained at the charge of the king of France; and that a marriage between the duke of Burgundy, and the princeſs, his daughter, ſhould be forthwith treated of, to be conſummated as ſoon as they ſhould be of age. As for the princeſs's portion, it was agreed, that the duke ſhould give her two hundred thouſand crowns of gold, towards the payment of which he was to give a diſcharge for one hundred thouſand crowns of gold, which remained due by France to the houſe of Savoy, as a part of the ducheſs royal's portion; and the remainder the French king promiſed to remit, in conſideration of this preſent treaty, of which the pope and Venetians were guarantees, and which was ſoon after ratified in France. [u]

As ſoon as the duke was returned from Loretto, his chief care was to conceal this engagement, not only from the miniſters and generals of the Allies, but even from his own. The marquis de St. Thomas was the only perſon, whom he had entruſted with this important negotiation, and who, in a diſguiſe, had taken many journies to Pignerol, to confer either with count de Theſſé, governor of that place, or with marſhal de Catinat, who came thither incognito upon the ſame account. But becauſe it is almoſt impoſſible for a miniſter of ſtate to abſent himſelf from court, without being miſſed, the marquis de St. Thomas's frequent diſappearing gave no ſmall ſuſpicion to the miniſters of the Allies, who cauſed him to be ſo diligently obſerved, that his clandeſtine journies to Pignerol were at laſt diſcovered. Though this was a convincing proof of the duke of Savoy's holding intelligence with the enemy, yet they managed him very tenderly, and never took notice of the matter. But not long after his return from Loretto, the king, having received information of the ſeparate treaty concluded there, acquainted the lord Galway with it, who immediately communicated this advice to the other miniſters of the Allies, and began his expoſtulations with the duke, ſhewing him the principal articles, which he had concluded with France. The duke was extremely ſurprized at this diſcovery, but perſiſted in denying it, till the French, advancing to his aſſiſtance, enabled him to throw off all diſguiſe, without fearing the reſentment of his Allies. For, to cover this defection from the Allies, it was further agreed, that Catinat ſhould draw his army together, before the duke could bring his, to make head againſt him; and that he ſhould be ordered to attempt the bombardment of Turin, that ſo the duke might ſeem to be forced by the extremity of his affairs, to take ſuch conditions as were offered him. Accordingly, towards the end of May, marſhal de Catinat came down from the mountains of Savoy into the plains of Turin, with an army of near fifty-thouſand men, and much ſuperior in number to the confederates. The duke of Savoy ſtill diſſembled; and, as if there had been no intelligence between him and the court of France, under the pretence of defending his places, he put all his own infantry into them, and ſent all the confederates forces to the camp at Montcallier, which he fortified by drawing a line from the Doero to the Po, in order, as was pretended, to ſecure his capital city againg a bombardment.

[u] Lambert in his memoirs (I. p. 1.) ſays, it was believed that France cauſed it to be reported, that the duke's pretence, for making a ſeparate peace, was king William's declaring to the count de la Tour, that the giving Pignerol to the duke of Savoy ſhould not be inſiſted on. This was only to cover the true ſpring of that peace, which was negotiated by ſurprize. The ſucceſs of the aſſaſſination-plot, in 1696, was thought ſo certain, that about the time it was to be executed, the court of France ſent a perſon of diſtinction to the duke of Savoy, who repreſented to him, that king William was juſt then killed. That he knew him to be the ſupport of the grand alliance, which would be now entirely broken, and therefore the duke ought to take care of himſelf. That France had a great regard for him, and would grant him advantageous terms. The duke was ſurpriſed at this news, which the other perceiving, told him with an air of aſſurance, that he muſt give an immediate and poſitive anſwer. The duke deſired half an hour to conſider, which being granted, he walked into his cloſet, and, the time being elapſed, he accepted the offers of France.

Of all the officers, in the French army, the marſhal de Catinat alone was acquainted with the treaty, which occaſioned ſome diſputes between him and the grand prior. The duke, the better to cover his deſign, ſent out daily German parties to harraſs the French foragers, which generally returned with advantage. This the grand prior bore with great impatience, and had often deſired leave of the marſhal to charge them, but had ſtill been denied. Provoked by theſe refuſals, and aſcribing the general's conduct either to want of courage or experience, in the height of his zeal for the French king's ſervice, he acquainted him with Catinat's proceedings, in a letter ſubſcribed by moſt of the other ſubaltern generals. The king ſmiled at this information, and ſent an anſwer, that the marſhal had obeyed his orders, and that, in a ſhort time, the event would fully juſtify his conduct. The grand prior queſtioned the king's meaning, of which he had no longer reaſon to doubt, when on the 12th of July, a truce was concluded for a month, and afterwards continued to the 15th of September. The duke of Savoy endeavoured to obtain the conſent of the Allies to this ſuſpenſion of arms; but, though they ſtill refuſed it, yet they behaved themſelves ſo, as if they had in effect accepted it. The duke had demanded ſo much time, that he might, at leaſt with ſome ſhew of honour, diſengage himſelf from his confederates; for, as early as the month of June, he had begun to throw off all diſguiſe; and having communicated to the miniſters of the Allies, the propoſals which France made him, and repreſented the great ſuperiority of the enemies army, he owned his inclination to accept them, palliating his breach of the treaty of confederacy with ſeveral plauſible reaſons. Moreover, he wrote to moſt of the potentates concerned in the grand alliance, to aſk their conſent; but though every one of them poſitively refuſed it, yet he did not ſtop here, but ſigned again openly the treaty, which he had ſecretly concluded ſome months before. The Allies, on their part, left no means untried to bring him back to their intereſt. They made him offers more advantageous than the former; and count Mansfield, whom the emperor had ſent expreſs on this important affair, propoſed a match between the king of the Romans and the princeſs of Savoy, with an augmentation both of troops and ſubſidies. But all the count's eloquence, which he exerted on this occaſion, was to no purpoſe, for the duke remained firm in his former engagement. Prince Eugene, who commanded the Imperial troops, though nearly related to the duke, was extremely provoked at this unexpected change; and prince Commercy, a youth of a violent ſpirit, was ſo enraged at it, that he ſent a challenge to the duke, who would have met him ſword in hand, but was with great difficulty prevented by ſome of his courtiers, who happened to be informed of the challenge. This quarrel was ſoon after made up, and theſe two princes parted very good friends. In this interval, the French hoſtages for the treaty, the count de Theſſé, and the marquis de Bouſole, arrived at Turin, with magnificent equipages; and at the ſame time the count de Tana and the marquis d'Aix, were ſent by the duke to Catinat's camp upon the ſame account.

One of the chief reaſons, which made the duke of Savoy conceal his ſeparate peace with ſo much precaution, was (as has been noted) his deſign of getting the remaining part of the ſubſidies due to him from the confederates. He was particularly informed of a conſiderable remittance from England to Genoa, which he wanted to have had in his own coffers; but, the lord Galway being acquainted in time with his new engagements, he ſtopped that money, of which he afterwards made uſe in the Milaneſe, for the payment of the troops under his command, and of ſome Bavarians and Brandenburghers, which he took into the Engliſh ſervice. It is reported, that ſome of the ſubaltern generals of the Allies had formed a deſign to ſeize on the city of Turin, of which they were already in poſſeſſion; and at the ſame time to ſecure the duke's perſon, in order to force him to break with France. Of this he was informed, but ſeemed little to mind or fear it; for, though he durſt not go to the camp at Montcallier, yet he paſſed and repaſſed daily by the Spaniſh and German guard, as he went out of Turin, and often viewed their incampment on the glacis of that city. After all, ſuch an enterprize might eaſily have been executed, but to go through with it would have been almoſt impoſſible, conſidering the weakneſs of the confederates, and the ſtrength of the French, who, by the help of the inhabitants and the duke's troops, would quickly have made themſelves maſters of all the places in Piedmont, and ſhamefully turned out the intruders. Accordingly, this project was diſdainfully rejected by the lord Galway, and the other generals in chief, who had more wiſdom than to violate the rights of ſovereignty in ſo unwarrantable a manner.

When the news of theſe proceedings reached Flanders, king William was incamped at Gemblours, where preſident de la Tour, the duke of Savoy's envoy, notified to him the ſeparate peace, which his maſter had made with the French king, and that the forces of the Allies were to depart his country within a limited time, or be forced to it by his troops aſſiſted by thoſe of France, but that it was in the power of the confederates to make a neutrality, which ſhould include all Italy, within the ſame time. The king, who was juſtly concerned, that the duke ſhould by letter have excuſed the matter to the emperor, king of Spain, and the electors of Bavaria and Brandenburgh, and not to himſelf, received count de la Tour's meſſage with great coldneſs, and with his uſual reſervedneſs turned the diſcourſe to other ſubjects.

The king of France, in conformity to the treaty, made a a ſolemn reſignation of all manner of pretenſions to Savoy, and the duke's territories, whilſt the troops of the Allies began to retire out of a country, where they were already looked upon as enemies; and to provide for the ſecurity of the Milaneſe, which the French forces, in conjunction with thoſe of Savoy, were to attack, in order to force the Spaniards to accept of the neutrality, that was offered them and the reſt of the confederates. The duke followed them cloſe, and, upon the expiration of the truce, entered the Milaneſe at the head of the French and his own troops, by virtue of his commiſſion of generaliſſimo from the French king; and four days after laid ſiege to Valentia. Thus, by an adventure not to be parallelled in hiſtory, the ſame general commanded two contending armies in one campaign. Nay, it is remarkable, that the duke, before the Allies departed his territories, gave the orders to them, and at the ſame time to the French, both parties acknowledging him for their chief; a ſtrain of policy unknown even to his anceſtors, though they ſhewed themſelves inconſtant enough between the houſes of France and Auſtria upon ſeveral occaſions.

The ſiege of Valentia was rather a political than a formal attack. For though the duke of Savoy, who had all honours paid him as generaliſſimo, was for making a vigorous attempt upon the place, becauſe it was agreed, that all the conqueſts made on the Spaniards ſhould remain in his poſſeſſion; yet, Catinat having private orders from the French king not to obey the duke any further than his intereſt ſeemed to require it, being unwilling to ſuffer a prince, who had been already ſo troubleſome a neighbour to France, to increaſe his power in Italy, he prolonged this ſiege as much as poſſible, in order to give the Allies time to come in and accept the neutrality, which was the chief thing, the French king had in view. Mean while the treaty was carrying on by the prince of Fundi for the emperor, the marquis de Leganez on the part of the Spaniards, the lord Galway for king William, and the marquis de St. Thomas for the duke of Savoy; and many conferences were held, before they could be brought to any concluſion. But though the Savoyards in good earneſt, and the French in appearance, were ſo eager to take Valentia; yet Catinat, for the reaſon beforementioned, having formed the attacks on the ſtrongeſt ſide, and the garriſon, which conſiſted of near ſeven thouſand men, Germans, Spaniards, and French proteſtants, making an obſtinate reſiſtance, the beſiegers, after thirteen days of open trenches, and the loſs of two thouſand men, had made no conſiderable progreſs; when unexpectedly the marqnis de Leganez's meſſenger brought the king of Spain's acceptance of the neutrality of Italy. In this the Spaniards made a haſty ſtep; for, had they ſtaid a little longer, the great and continual rains, which which began to fall as ſoon as the treaty was ſigned, would certainly have obliged the French to raiſe the ſiege, and forced the duke of Savoy to give them winter-quarters in Savoy. By this treaty it was agreed, 'That there ſhould be a neutrality or ſuſpenſion of arms till a general peace. That the Imperial and French troops ſhould depart out of Italy, and return into their own countries. That in lieu of winter-quarters, which the princes of Italy were otherwiſe obliged to allow the Imperialiſts, they ſhould furniſh them with three hundred thouſand crowns, that is to ſay, one third before their retreat, and the remainder at a time prefixed, upon ſufficient ſecurity: And that, as ſoon as the Imperialiſts ſhould begin to march off with ſome part of their troops, the French proportionably ſhould do the like.' Thus by the intrigues and artful negociations of France was concluded the particular peace of Italy; which undoubtedly was a great ſtep towards a general one, through the advantage, which that court reaped from this neutrality; ſince by it they not only ſaved great ſums of money, but were at liberty to turn their united forces againſt the reſt of the confederates. Indeed an accident, which fell out not long before, ſeemed to embroil the princes of Chriſtendom in new conteſts; and that was the death of John Sobieſki, the third of that name, king of Poland, who died of an apoplectic fit, in the 70th year of his age. His deceaſe, as it uſually happens in elective kingdoms, was attended with much confuſion among his ſubjects, and great animoſities between the competitors for his crown.

Thus ended the war in Piedmont, after it had laſted ſix years. Pignerol was demoliſhed; but the French, by the treaty, might build another fort at Feneſtrella, which is in the middle of the hills, and ſo would not be ſo important as Pignerol was, though it might prove an uneaſy neighbour to the duke of Savoy. The duke's daughter was received in France as ducheſs of Burgundy, though not of the age of conſent: for ſhe was but ten years old.

This year proved alſo fatal to Mary Anne of Auſtria, queen-mother of Spain, who died of a cancer in her breaſt. Her death was as conſiderable a loſs to the confederates in general, as to the Spaniards in particular, conſidering her prevailing influence over the Spaniſh counſels, to make them take ſuch reſolutions, as were conformable to the intereſts of the common cauſe. She was daughter to the emperor Ferdinand III; was born in 1634, and married in 1649 to Philip IV, king of Spain.

Our affairs at ſea went well, with relation to trade. All our merchant fleets came ſafely home, and we made no conſiderable loſſes. On the contrary, we took many of the French privateers; which now gained little in a way of war, that, in ſome of the former years, had been very advantageous to them. Upon the breaking out of the conſpiracy, orders were ſent to ſir George Rooke at Cadiz, to bring home the ſquadron under his command. The Spaniards murmured at this; though it was reaſonable for the Engliſh to take care of themſelves, in the firſt place. Sir George's arrival, the latter end of April, diſſipated the fears that the Breſt and Toulon ſquadrons might join and intercept him. For the Toulon ſquadron had alſo orders to come about; and they got into Breſt and other harbours, before ſir George being joined by ſome other men of war from the Downs, was ready to meet them. He left the French coaſts, and, on the 23d of May, went into Torbay; from whence he ſet out for London, to aſſiſt at the Admiralty-board, having reſigned the command to the lord Berkley. About three weeks after, lord Berkley ſailed towards Uſhant, to inſult the coaſt of France. To that end, he commanded the Burford and Newcaſtle with a fire-ſhip to land on the iſland of Guoy, and at the ſame time ſome ſmall veſſels were ſent along the ſhore. The fleet anchored near Belle-Iſle; and the boats were immediately manned, and ordered to land upon Horeal, one of the iſlands called the Cardinals; which they did, and burnt the town. They had the like ſucceſs on Hodicke, another of thoſe iſlands. Three Engliſh and two Dutch men of war, with the long-boats, and other ſhips, and ſeven-hundred ſoldiers and mariners, were ſent to join the men at Guoy, who, with their aſſiſtance, deſtroyed twenty villages, took as many ſmall veſſels, and killed and carried off one thouſand ſix hundred horſes and black cattle. Mean while ſir Martin Beckman, with the bomb-veſſels, and ten men of war, under the command of captain Mees, arrived before St. Martin's, a trading town on the iſle of Rhee. About two thouſand bombs and carcaſes were fired with ſuch ſucceſs, that the greateſt part of the town was burnt, or miſerably ſhattered. The French, recovering their ſurprize, brought cannon and mortars to the ſhore, and fired upon the Engliſh, who contenting themſelves with the miſchief they had done, ſailed away towards Olonne; where they had but little ſucceſs, through a miſtake in the ſituation of the place. Theſe loſſes, though not conſiderable in themſelves, put the French affairs into great diſtraction; and the charge which they were at, in defending their coaſt, was much greater than ours in attacking it, But it is very probable, that much greater advantages might have been made, if the fleet had not been ſo divided, that faction appeared in every order, and in every motion. Nor did the king ſtudy to remedy this, but rather kept it up, and ſeemed to think that this was the way to pleaſe both parties; though he found, afterwards, that, by all his management with the tories, he diſguſted thoſe who were affectionate and zealous to him; and that the tories had too deep an alienation from him, to be overcome with good uſage. Their ſubmiſſion, however, to him gained their end, which was to provoke the whigs to be froward and uneaſy.

The French thought the miſchief done upon their coaſt to be, in ſome meaſure, repaired by the famous Du Bart, who, with eight men of war, and four privateers, fell in with a great fleet of Dutch merchant ſhips, homeward bound from the Sound, under convoy of ſix or ſeven frigates; and having taken the frigates, and burnt four of them, deſtroyed about thirty merchantmen, and took ſeveral of the reſt. This was the ſtate of affairs at home and abroad this ſummer.

The 8th of September, the parliament of Scotland met at Edinburgh; and the lord Murray, ſecretary of ſtate, and lately created earl of Tullibardine, was appointed the king's commiſſioner. Scotland was now falling under great miſery, by reaſon of two ſucceſſive bad harveſts, which exhauſted that nation, and drove away many of their people; the greateſt number went over to Ireland. The parliament was very thin, to whom the commiſſioner made a ſpeech on the occaſion of their meeting; as did likewiſe the lord Polwarth, chancellor of Scotland. Two days after the king's letter was read, and then all the members ſigned an aſſociation, the ſame in ſubſtance with that in England. They reſolved to give the king a ſupply of 1,440,000l. Scots, to be raiſed by a land-ceſs, and an additional exciſe, for maintaining the ſtanding forces both by ſea and land. And, conſidering the danger this kingdom was in by the late conſpiracy, they ordered an act to be brought in, for ſecuring their religion, lives, and properties, in caſe his majeſty ſhould come to an untimely death; and another for obliging all in public truſt to ſign the aſſociation. Theſe acts being paſſed, which were great checks upon the enemies of the government, the parliament, on the 12th of October, was adjourned to the 8th of December.

On the 30th of May, the lord Capel, lord deputy of Ireland, dying after a long ſickneſs, the council, in purſuance of an act made in the 33d year of king Henry VIII, elected the lord chancellor Porter to be lord juſtice, and chief governor of that kingdom, till the king's pleaſure was known. The Iriſh parliament met at Dublin, the 27th of June, according to their laſt adjournment. In the lords houſe the king's commiſſion was read, appointing the lord chief juſtice Haly to be their ſpeaker; and the commons, at the ſame time, having expelled Mr. Sanderſon, the only member of the houſe, who had not ſigned the aſſociation, adjourned to the 4th of Auguſt; upon which day ſir Charles Porter, lord chancellor, and the earls of Montrath and Drogheda, now appointed lords juſtices and general governors of Ireland, ſignified the king's pleaſure to the parliament, that they ſhould farther adjourn themſelves.

On the 8th of December, ſir Charles Porter was ſeized with a fit of an apoplexy, and died immediately.

The king, being weary of a campaign, that afforded him no opportunity for action, left the army towards the latter end of Auguſt under the command of the elector of Bavaria, and went to his uſual diverſion of ſtag-hunting about his palaces of Dieren and Loo. On the 14th of September he ſet out from Loo, accompanied by the duke of Zell (a prince, whom he ever reſpected as a father, and loved as a brother) and the next day went to Cleves, where he was magnificently entertained by the court of Brandenburg, who were come thither on purpoſe to receive his viſit. Having ſpent two days at this agreeable place, the king and the duke of Zell went back to Loo, where three days after he was followed by the elector of Brandenburgh, in return of his viſit at that court. Having ſtaid three weeks longer at this place, the king went to the Hague, and embatked on board the William and Mary yatcht, attended by a ſquadron of men of war under the command of vice-admiral Aylmer. Two days after he landed at Margate, and arrived the ſame evening at Kenſington.

The parliament after ſeveral prorogations, being met at Weſtminſter on the 20th of October, the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I Have called you together as ſoon as was poſſible; and I think it a great happineſs that this year has paſſed without any diſadvantage abroad or diſorder at home, conſidering our great diſappointment in the funds given at your laſt meeting, and the difficulties, which have ariſen upon the recoining of the money.

"This is ſo convincing a proof of the good diſpoſition of my army, and of the ſteady affections of my people, that I cannot but take notice of it with great ſatisfaction. Our enemies have not been without hopes, that ſuch a conjuncture might have proved fatal to us. But, as they have failed in thoſe expectations, ſo I am fully perſuaded, that your unanimous proceedings in this ſeſſion will make them for ever deſpair of an advantage from any diſagreement among ourſelves.

"It muſt be confeſſed, that the buſineſs, which you have before you, will be very great, becauſe of the neceſſity of ſupplying former deficiencies, as well as making proviſions for the next year's ſervice.

"And, upon this occaſion, it is fit for me to acquaint you, that ſome overtures have been made in order to the entering upon a negotiation for a general peace. But I am ſure we ſhall agree in opinion, that the only way of treating with France is with our ſwords in our hands; and that we can have no reaſon to expect a ſafe and honourable peace, but by ſhewing ourſelves prepared to make a vigorous and effectual war. In order to which, I do very earneſtly recommend to you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, that you would conſider of raiſing the neceſſary ſupplies, as well for maintaining the honour of parliaments in making good the funds already granted, as for carrying on the war the next year; which I think ought not to be leſs than what was intended to be raiſed for that purpoſe the laſt ſeſſion.

"I muſt alſo put you in mind of the civil liſt, which cannot be ſupported without your help; and the miſerable condition of the French proteſtants does oblige me to mention them to you again.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It may deſerve your conſideration, whether there do not ſtill remain ſome inconveniencies relating to the coin, which ought to be remedied. And I hope you will find out the beſt expedients for the recovery of credit, which is abſolutely neceſſary, not only with reſpect to the war, but for carrying on of trade.

"I am of opinion, that there is not one good Engliſhman, who is not entirely convinced, how much does depend upon this ſeſſion; and therefore I cannot but hope for your unanimity and diſpatch in your reſolutions, which at this time are more neceſſary than ever for the ſafety and honour of England."

Whoever was conſulted in forming and drawing up king William's ſpeeches, the wiſdom and ſpirit of them are his own; and there are in them a temper and complacency, which cannot but affect all that heard or read them, let the neceſſity of his affairs oblige him ever ſo often to call upon his parliament for ſupplies, towards carrying on a war in which he engaged by their advice. The difference between this government and that of the princes who reigned immediarely before him, may be conceived in part even by their ſpeeches. The little deference thoſe princes ſhewed to parliaments, on almoſt all occaſions, was a proof of their diſpoſition to get rid of them, and rule without them. whenever it was in their power; as the complacency and temper in king William's ſpeeches were proofs that he looked upon himſelf as the father of his people, who could not well avoid making him ſuitable returns of duty and affection. Accordingly the houſe of commons unanimouſly voted, 'That they would ſupport his majeſty and government againſt all his enemies both at home and abroad; and that they would effectually aſſiſt him in the proſecution of the preſent war againſt France, and that an humble addreſs ſhould be prepared to be preſented to his majeſty purſuant to the ſaid reſolution.' This addreſs, being drawn up by Mr. Mountague, chancellor of the exchequer, was preſented to the king by the whole houſe, on the 23d of October, and was as follows:

"May it pleaſe your moſt excellent Majeſty,

"THIS is the eighth year, in which your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons in parliament aſſembled, have aſſiſted your majeſty with large ſupplies for carrying on a juſt and neceſſary war, in defence of our religion, preſervation of our laws, and vindication of the rights and liberties of the people of England, which we have hitherto preſerved, and by the bleſſing of God, upon your majeſty's conduct and good government, will ſtedfaſtly maintain and entail upon our poſterity.

"This hath coſt the nation much blood and treaſure, but the hopes of accompliſhing ſo great and glorious a work have made your ſubjects chearfully ſupport the charge. And to ſhew your majeſty and all Chriſtendom, that the commons of England will not be amuſed or diverted from their firm reſolutions of obtaining by war a ſafe and honourable peace, we do, in the name of all thoſe we repreſent, renew our aſſurances to your majeſty, that this houſe will ſupport your majeſty and your government againſt all your enemies both at home and abroad; and that they will effectually aſſiſt you in the proſecution and carrying on the preſent war againſt France."

To this the king returned the following anſwer:

"Gentlemen,

"The continuance of your zeal and affection is the thing in the world I value moſt; and I will anſwer it by all the ways I can think of, and will make your good, and the ſafety of the nation, the principal care of my life."

Theſe aſſurances of affection on the one ſide, of loyalty on the other, and of mutual confidence in both, being given, the commons entered upon the three great affairs, recommended to them from the throne; namely, the further remedying the ill ſtate of the coin; the providing a ſupply for the next year's ſervice; and the reſtoring of public credit; all which had a near dependence upon each other, and made the difficulties more intricate.

As to the coin, the commons reſolved, that they would not alter the ſtandard of gold or ſilver in fineneſs, weight, or denomination; and becauſe the circulation of guineas had been obſtructed of late, by reaſon of the want of other coin, and the act made the laſt ſeſſion to take off the obligation of coining gold, a bill was paſſed, which received the royal aſſent, for leave to import guineas, and coin gold, at the Mint. While guineas, for want of ſilver money, were current at thirty ſhillings, the Dutch and other foreigners imported as many as they could find into England, and laid them out in the moſt merchantable wares; by this means they made a gain of their guineas, of as much as the then currency of them was above their real value, which was ſo much loſs to the Engliſh, and, to prevent this inconvenience, the bill againſt importing guineas was paſt. But, now that the value of guineas was reduced to little more than the real value, that reaſon againſt bringing them in ceaſed. Two other acts were alſo paſſed; one for the further remedying the ill ſtate of the coin, and the other, for encouraging the bringing wrought plate into the Mint to be coined. By theſe acts, the hammered money and plate were to be received at five ſhillings and four-pence an ounce.

As to the ſupply, the commons having conſidered the ſtate of the war for the year 1697, both in relation to the navy and land-forces, which at their deſire, had been laid before them, they granted the ſum of two millions, three hundred and ſeventy-two thouſand, one hundred and ninety-ſeven pounds, for the maintenance of forty thouſand ſeamen, and of two marine regiments, and for the ordnary of the navy, and the charge of the regiſtry of ſeamen; and the ſum of two millions, five hundred and ſeven thouſand eight hundred and eighty-two pounds, for the maintaining eighty-ſeven thouſand, four hundred and forty men, to be employed in England and beyond the ſeas: and for the extraordinary ſervice of the officers of ordnance, the pay of the general officers, and the charge of the tranſports, hoſpitals, and other contingencies of the war. Beſides which, they voted the ſum of one hundred and twenty-five thouſand pounds for making good the deficiency in recoining the hammered money, ney, and the recompence to be given for bringing plate into the Mint[w].

To raiſe the ſums granted for the proſecution of the war, the commons had recourſe to the moſt equal of all impoſitions, a general poll-tax, laying a duty upon all perſons according to the true value of their real and perſonal eſtates, profeſſions, employments, &c. So that none were exempt from the tax, but ſuch as received alms; and at the ſame time they laid three ſhillings in the pound upon land[x].

But the great difficulty was to find a way to reſtore public credit. All tallies and funds ſettled by parliament, eſpecially ſuch as were remote, were exchanged for ready money at a very great loſs, and the government was obliged to make exceſſive diſcounts and allowances to bring treaſure into the exchequer. This great loſs of credit, which was like to have proved fatal to our affairs abroad the laſt ſummer, aroſe chiefly from two cauſes: The deficiencies of all the parliamentary funds (particularly the unhappy project of the land-bank, which totally failed, and did not produce one penny of above two millions and an half, with which it was charged) and the recoining of the ſilver. It is eaſy to imagine what ſtreights the nation was in, when the notes of the bank of England, which had been a great help to the public, were diſcounted at twenty, and tallies at forty, fifty, or ſixty per cent. The government had contracted a great debt; and theſe arrears were put upon the funds of the revenue, which had been granted, but for five years, and that term was now expiring. Great numbers of tallies were on funds very remote, and many had no funds at all. Hereby the truſt and good opinion of the people were ſo far loſt, that thoſe few, who had any money to lend, ſhewed the greateſt backwardneſs imaginable to bring it into the exchequer, when they could employ it in ſtock-jobbing to ſo great advantage upon the Royal Exchange; and therefore all loans to the government were procured on exorbitant premiums.

All men were amazed, and wondered what meaſures the parliament would take, in ſuch perplexing difficulties, hardly believing it poſſible to find out any expedient, that could be effectual to repair ſo great a miſchief. The enemies of the government had now the ſatisfaction of ſeeing it ſufficiently diſtreſſed, ſince our affairs could not be more embarraſſed than they were at this juncture. And, as the wiſeſt men without doors were at a loſs how to cure this evil, ſo the malecontents concluded, that it never would be cured, and therefore conſidered the government as deſperate, and triumphed in the expectation of a ſudden revolution. But this parliament, which was principally animated by the wiſdom, ſagacity, and eloquence of Mr. Mountague, chancellor of the exchequer, being fully convinced, that the reſtoration of public credit was a point of the utmoſt importance, inſtead of being diſcouraged by the difficulty of effecting it, were rather excited to undertake the work with greater zeal and application. They were made ſenſible, that one great ſpring of this miſchief, was the deficiencies of ſeveral aids and duties, which neither had been nor ever would be ſufficient to anſwer the principal and intereſt charged upon them, and that theſe dificiencies, and the remoteneſs of the courſe of payments, were the true reaſons, why the owners of ſuch tallies were frequently neceſſitated, for the procuring of ready money to diſpoſe of them at a great loſs; by which means the public credit was extremely weakened, commerce interrupted, and other public and private affairs exceedingly perplexed. The commons therefore came to a reſolution, 'That a ſupply be granted to make good the deficiencies of parliamentary funds;' and afterwards ordered an eſtimate to be laid before them of what ſums were wanting to ſatisfy and diſcharge all the principal and intereſt due on the ſeveral funds, and, the computation being made, the whole amounted to five millions one hundred and ſixty thouſand four hundred pounds. In order to diſcharge this immenſe arrear, the commons continued divers duties ariſing not only by the cuſtoms, but by continued and additional impoſitions; paper and parchments, births and marriages; windows; the ſubſidies of tonnage and poundage, after the day on which they would otherwiſe have expired, to the 1ſt day of Auguſt 1706; and appointed all the monies, which ſhould ariſe, and be brought into the exchequer from any of theſe taxes or duties thus continued, to be the general fund for making good all the deficient ones, by the ſatisfaction and payment of the principal and intereſt due thereupon. And that all occaſion of complaint might be removed, and equal proviſion made for all, the parliament directed, that all monies ariſing from the duties, appropriated for the general fund, ſhould be diſtributed and applied to pay principal and intereſt upon every one of the deficient funds, in proportion to the ſum, of which they were deficient; and that all the money, which ſhould be in ſuch a due proportion diſtributed, ſhould be paid out to all, who were intitled to receive the ſame, in ſuch courſe and order, as if the ſame were monies really ariſing by the reſpective deficient funds, and that without being diverted, miſapplied, or poſtponed. Beſides, to remove all doubts about the ſecurity intended to be given, in caſe, on the 1ſt of Auguſt 1706, or within three months then next enſuing, the whole produce of the ſeveral funds and revenues appropriated for a general fund, together with other grants then in being, ſhould not be ſufficient to diſcharge the ſum of 5,160,400l. intended to be diſcharged, that then what was deficient, ſhould be made good out of ſuch aids or revenues, as ſhould be granted in the next ſeſſion of parliament. Thus in one ſeſſion the parliament not only raiſed a ſupply of above five millions, for the ſervice of the next year, but alſo provided a ſufficient ſecurity for a debt of five millions more. Nor was this all, for the parliament likewiſe took into conſideration, by what means they might ſupport the credit of the bank of England, which was now ready to ſink.

To this end, it was agreed to engraft upon the capital ſtock of the bank 800,000l. more by new ſubſcriptions, at eight per cent. intereſt, to be paid by tallies and bank notes. Accordingly, a million was ſubſcribed and paid in that manner[y]. This expedient came from Mr. Mountague; and though many perſons, who were intereſted in it, could not preſently apprehend the reaſonableneſs of it, yet the advantages, which they afterwards received, fully convinced them, that no other way could have been found to reſtore their loſt credit. For, the value of two hundred thouſand pounds in bank notes being ſunk by the new ſubſcriptions, the reſt, as it was reaſonable to believe they would, began preſently to riſe in worth; and ſo likewiſe did the tallies, after ſo many as amounted to eight hundred thouſand pounds were paid in to enlarge the bank. Upon this the credit of the bank recovered immediately, till in a few weeks their notes, which bore no intereſt, were equal with money, and their bills, that bore intereſt, better than money. And by this means the face of affairs was quickly much changed for the better; credit began to revive, and money to circulate on moderate terms; foreign exchange was leſs to our diſadvantage, and ſoon after to an equality; and whatever hardſhips the people had undergone by reaſon of the war, and the recoining the ſilver money, which could not but occaſion many complaints; yet the greateſt part attributed this to the neceſſity of affairs, and began to hope, both from the proſpect of a peace, and the wiſdom of thoſe at the helm, that they ſhould enjoy more favourable times.

Another evil of no leſs difficulty or importance than the [w] For raiſing this ſum, a duty of ſixpence per ounce was laid upon all plate, that ſhould not be brought in; and a duty of twenty per cent. upon all paper, paſteboard, vellum, and parchment imported, and 17l. 10s. upon the ſame goods made in this kingdom, or in ſtock, for the term of two years.

[x] A duty of 15s. per cent. was alſo laid upon leather for three years. The old ſubſidy of tonnage and poundage was alſo doubled (dyeing wares excepted) for two years and three quarters, and an additional aid of one ſhilling in the pound upon land.

[y] The proportion was four fifths of the ſubſcriptions in tallies, and one fifth in bank notes, and an intereſt of eight per cent. was allowed, as well for ſuch tallies, that ſhould be brought in to enlarge their ſtock by new ſubſcriptions, as for thoſe tallies, which the company was then poſſeſſed of, provided they did not exceed the value of thoſe bank notes, which ſhould be paid in upon this engraftment on their ſtocks; and, for ſecuring the payment of this intereſt of eight per cent. the additional duty on ſalt was afterwards granted and appropriatad. The time of the continuance of the bank of England they thought fit to extend to the year 1710, and reſolved likewiſe, 'That, before the day were fixed for the beginning the new ſubſcriptions, the old ſtock be made one hundred per cent; and that what ſhould exceed that value, ſhould be divided among the old members. That all the intereſt due on thoſe tallies, which ſhould be ſubſcribed into the bank ſtock, at the time appointed for ſubſcription, to the end of the laſt preceding quarter on each tally, be allowed as principal. That liberty be given by parliament to enlarge the number of bank bills, to the value of the ſum, which ſhould be ſo ſubſcribed, over and above the 1,200,000l. provided they be obliged to anſwer ſuch bills at demand; and, in default thereof, to be anſwered by the exechequer out of the firſt money due to them. That no other bank be erected, permitted, or allowed by act of parliament within this kingdom, during the continuance of the bank of England. That, on ſuch new ſettlement, the bank of England be exempted from all manner of parliamentary taxes. That no act of the corporation ſhould forfeit the particular intereſts of any perſon concerned therein. That proviſion be made for the effectual preventing the officers of the exchequer, and all other officers and receivers of the revenue, by diverting, delaying, or obſtructing the courſe of payments to the bank. That care be taken to prevent the altering, counterfeiting, or forging any bank bills or notes; as likewiſe againſt the defacing, raiſing, or altering any indorſement upon any ſuch bill or note. That the eſtate and intereſt of each member in the ſtock of the corporation be made a perſonal eſtate. And, laſtly, that no contract or agreement, made for any bank ſtock to be bought or ſold, be valid in law or equity, unleſs the ſaid contract be actually regiſtered in the books of the bank within ſeven days, and actually transferred within fourteen days next after the making ſuch contract.'

loſs of credit, and which was one of the cauſes of that loſs, remained ſtill to be removed, the great ſcarcity of money. The parliament, to prevent diſappointments by ſettling funds, which might be deficient, came to a reſolution, 'That the ſupplies for the ſervice of the year 1697 ſhould be raiſed within the year.' But how could above five millions be raiſed within the year, while the ſilver money was called in and recoining; and there was not current coin enough in the nation to anſwer the occaſions of trade, and ſcarcely the conveniencies and neceſſities of life? This vote of parliament ſeeming impracticable, the enemies of the government made themſelves merry with it; and many, even of the king's beſt friends, imagined, that the parliament by this rather expreſſed their zeal and willingneſs, than their ability to ſupport the ſtate, and maintain the preſent ſettlement. But the parliament made money without bullion, and diſtributed great quantity of coin without the help of the Mint. This was done, by authorizing the lords of the treaſury to iſſue out bills from the exchequer at ſeveral times, to the value of above two millions; which bills were firſt appointed to be brought in and ſunk upon the poll-tax. But, before the ſeſſion ended, the parliament being convinced by the firſt collection of that duty, that it would prove very deficient, they appointed the exchequer bills to be brought in on any other of the king's revenues, excepting the land-tax; and allowed an intereſt of ſeven pounds twelve ſhillings a year upon the ſecond iſſuing the bills of the exchequer; whereas at firſt they bore no intereſt. By this the parliament laid a good foundation for paper-money to ſupply the place of our ſilver coin; for ſo many payments were at this time to be made into the exchequer, that, when the people had aſſurance given them, that the exchequer notes ſhould be received back again in the payment of the king's taxes, they were very well ſatisfied to take them, at firſt indeed at a ſmall diſcount, but not long after at an equality. A great number of theſe notes were only for five or ten pounds, which anſwered the neceſſities of commerce among the meaner people, for the common conveniencies of life; and that thoſe, who had advanced money in loans on any part of the king's revenue, might not be obliged to receive it back in notes, that were under the value of money, to ſtrengthen the reputation of theſe bills, the parliament authorized the lords of the treaſury to contract with any corporation or numbers of private men, and to allow them a competent premium, provided they obliged themſelves to exchange thoſe notes for ready money, when tendered to them for that purpoſe: which the lords of the treaſury did accordingly. The credit of the exchequer notes being thus ſecured, they daily roſe nearer to par, till at laſt the exceeded the value of money; and whereas the truſtees, with whom the government had contracted to exchange them, were at firſt allowed ten per cent. as a premium, they were afterwards contented to do it for four. Theſe bills, which the people were ſatisfied to receive, becauſe they knew the exchequer would receive them again as ſo much ready money, ſo well ſupplied the want of money till new coin was iſſued from the Mint, that trade and commerce were maintained, and mutual payments made ſo as anſwer the neceſſities of the government and the people. This project was likewiſe owing to Mr. Mountague, as well as that of recoining the money, which thoſe very men, who envied moſt his ſucceſs in the houſe of commons, and growing power at court, were afterwards contented to call a 'fortunate temerity.'

Whilſt the commons were employed in ſettling the funds for the ſupplies and arrears, they received a meſſage from the king, importing, 'That, his majeſty finding himſelf under great difficulties for want of money to ſupply the occaſions of the civil liſt, he had thought it neceſſary to remind the houſe of that part of his ſpeech, which related to that head, deſiring, that ſpeedy care might be taken to make effectual proviſion for it.' Upon this it was reſolved, that a ſupply of 515,000l. be granted for the ſupport of the civil liſt; to be raiſed by a duty of ſix-pence per buſhel upon malt for three years and a quarter [z].

The great buſineſs of this ſeſſion, which held longeſt in both houſes, was a bill relating to ſir John Fenwick, who had been concerned in the late aſſaſſination and invaſion plot. This affair was of ſuch a nature, that it deſerves to be related in a particular manner. Fenwick, endeavouring to fly over into France under the borrowed name of Thomas Ward, was ſeized at New Romney in Kent with Robert Webber, an attorney, and from thence brought up to London, and, on the 11th of June 1696, committed priſoner to the Tower, and afterwards to Newgate. As ſoon as he was apprehended, he wrote the following letter, with a black-lead pencil, to his lady, but directed to Mrs. Farrar, her woman, at the lady Carliſle's.

"What I feared is at laſt happened. Had I come alone, I had done it; but the other was betrayed from London. It is God's will; ſo we muſt ſubmit. I know nothing can ſave my life, but my lord Carliſle's going over to him (king William) backed by the reſt of the family of the Howards to beg it; and offering, that I will live abroad all his time, where I cannot hurt him; and that I will never draw ſword againſt him. I muſt leave it to you what elſe to ſay. All friends muſt be made; my lord Devonſhire may perhaps by my lady; my lord Godolphin and my lord Pembroke by my lady Montgomery; Mr. Nelſon by the archbiſhop of Canterbury; my lord Arran might engage his brother Selkirk to uſe his intereſt with Keppel. I believe, if my lord Carliſle would go, it were beſt, before my trial; or elſe they will cut me ſhort for want of time. If he can prevail with him for a pardon, he will procure it as well before my trial as after; at leaſt, he may prevail for a reprieve till ſome can come over to him. My lord alſo will have an opportunity to engage Bentinck, (the earl of Portland) and get my lord of Eſſex to join with him. I cannot think what elſe to ſay, but the great care muſt be the jury. If two or three could be got, that would ſtarve the reſt, that or nothing can ſave me. Money, I know, would do it; but alas! that is not to be had, nor ſhall I get enough for counſel. I beg of you not to think of being ſhut up with me: I know it will kill you; and beſides, I have no ſuch friend as you to take care of my buſineſs, though it would be the comfort of my life, the little time it laſts, to have you with me. And I have this only comfort now left, that my death will make you eaſy. My deareſt life, grieve not for me, but reſign me to God's will. You will hear, as ſoon as they bring me to town, where they put me, and then I would have a ſervant or ſomebody with me. I am interrupted, ſo I can ſay no more now. Engage ſir John Lowther, the new lord, who has more intereſt than any body. Let my lord Scarſdale engage Jermaine, to engage Overkirk for me. Speak to my lord Arlington. If my trial could be put off till the king comes back, there would be more opportunity to ſollicit him.' [a] This letter, being delivered to Mr. Webber, the companion of ſir John Fenwick's flight, was intercepted by the mayor of Romney, and brought to the lord juſtices. Sir John, who was ignorant of the miſcarriage, at the firſt examination before their excellencies, denied every thing, which he was charged with. But, the lord juſtices producing this letter, and telling him, 'he was not of the ſame mind, when he wrote it,' ſir John was confounded, and made no reply, being utterly ſilenced by ſuch a confeſſion of his guilt, atteſted under his own hand.

Fenwick's deſign of getting a jury, or making friends to the king for a pardon, being found impracticable, there was another expedient ſuggeſted by the earl of Peterborough, who, though he had been a great inſtrument in the revolution, yet, to gratify his private reſentment, adviſed ſir John to ſet up a counter-plot, by impeaching ſeveral of the king's beſt friends, as guilty of conſpiring againſt him. Accordingly ſir John, in his private treaty with the duke of Devonſhire, deſired an aſſurance of life, upon his promiſe to tell all he knew. But the king refuſed that, and would have it left to himſelf to judge of the truth and the importance of the diſcoveries, which he ſhould make. So, reſolving to caſt himſelf upon the king's mercy, he ſent him a paper, in which, after a bare account of the conſultations among the jacobites (in which he took care to charge none of his own party) he ſaid, that king James and thoſe, who were employed by him, had aſſured him, that the duke of Shrewſbury, the earl of Marlborough, the lord Godolphin, and admiral Ruſſel were reconciled to him, and were now in his intereſts, and acting for him: That the earl of Bath was to betray Ply-

[z] Becauſe the impoſitions already laid did not fully anſwer the ſums voted, the commons reſolved, that towards the ſupply granted for carrying on the war, and for the ſupport of the civil liſt, over and above the duties already payable, a further duty be laid upon all cyder, perry, liquors called ſweets, mum, wine, and upon all goods made of or mixed with wool, ſilk, or hair. And that, for making good the deficiency of the proviſion for payment of the intereſt of the tranſport-debt for the reducing of Ireland, a duty of four pounds per annum be laid upon all hawkers and pedlars for one year; and that every hawker and pedlar, travelling with an horſe, aſs, or mule, ſhould pay four pounds more per annum, for each horſe, aſs, or mule he ſhould ſo travel with.

[a] In this letter ſir John Fenwick pretends to have a very great affection and tenderneſs for his lady, aunt to the earl of Carliſle, mentioned in this letter; but it may well be ſuſpected, that his diſtreſs, and the need of her relations aſſiſtance to get him out of it, if poſſible, had that effect on his paſſion, which was diverted not long before by an amour with Mrs. Laſſels an actreſs, who appeared in mourning, as if ſhe had been his relict after his death.

mouth into the hands of the French king, and that commiſſary Crawford had ſent over to France a liſt of the forces in England. This was a diſcovery, that could ſignify nothing but to give the king a jealouſy of thoſe perſons; for he did not offer the leaſt ſhadow of circumſtance, either of proof or of preſumption, to ſupport this accuſation. The king not being ſatisfied with this, ſent an order for bringing him to a trial, unleſs he made fuller diſcoveries. He deſired to be further examined by the lords juſtices, to whom he, being upon oath, told ſome more particulars; but he took care to name none of his own ſide except thoſe againſt whom evidence was already brought, or who were ſafe and beyond ſea. Some few others he named, who were in matters of leſs conſequence, that did not amount to high-treaſon. He owned a thread of negotiations, which had paſſed between them and king James, or the court of France. He ſaid, that the earl of Ayleſbury had gone over to France, and had been admitted to a private audience of the French king, in which he had propoſed the ſending over an army of thirty-thouſand men, and had undertaken, that a great body of gentlemen and horſes ſhould be brought to join them. It appeared by his diſcoveries, that the Jacobites in England were much divided; ſome of whom were called 'Compounders,' and others 'Non-compounders.' The compounders deſired ſecurities from king James for the preſervation of the religion and liberties of England; whereas the others were for truſting him upon diſcretion, without aſking any terms, putting all in his power, and relying entirely on his honour and generoſity. Theſe ſeemed indeed to act more ſuitably to the great principle, upon which they all inſiſted, that kings have their power from God, and are accountable only to him for the exerciſe of it. Dr. Lloyd, the deprived biſhop of Norwich, was the only eminent clergyman, who went into this ſcheme; and therefore all that party had, upon Sancroft's death, recommended him to king James to have his nomination for Canterbury. Fenwick put all this in writing, upon aſſurance, that he ſhould not be forced to witneſs any part of it. When that was ſent to the king, all appearing to be ſo trifling, and no other proof being offered for any part of it, except his own word, which he had ſtipulated ſhould not be made uſe of, ſent an order to bring him to his trial. But, as the king was ſlow in ſending this order, ſo the duke of Devonſhire, who had been in the ſecret management of the matter, was for ſome time in the country. The lords juſtices delayed the matter till he came to town; and then the king's coming was ſo near, that it was reſpited till he arrived. By theſe delays ſir John gained his main deſign, which was to practiſe upon the witneſſes. His lady began with captain Porter, who was offered, that, if he would go beyond ſea, he ſhould have three hundred guineas in hand, more to be remitted to him upon his firſt landing in France, with an aſſurance of king James's pardon, and likewiſe an annuity of three hundred pounds a year, of which Fenwick was to pay one hundred. Captain Porter hearkened ſo far to the propoſition, that he drew thoſe, who were in treaty with him, together with the lady herſelf, who carried the ſum, which he was to receive, to a meeting, where he had provided witneſſes, who ſhould overhear all that paſſed, and ſhould, upon a ſignal, come in and ſeize them with the money; which was done and a proſecution upon it was ordered. The practice was fully proved, and the perſons concerned in it were cenſured and puniſhed. So captain Porter was no more to be dealt with. Mr. Cardell Goodman, who had been an actor, was the other witneſs. Firſt, they gathered matter to defame him, in which his courſe of life furniſhed them very copiouſly. But they truſted not to this method, and betook themſelves to another, in which they prevailed more effectually. They perſuaded him to go out of England; and by this means, when the laſt orders were given for Fenwick's trial, there were not two witneſſes againſt him: ſo that by the courſe of law he muſt have been acquitted. The whole was upon this kept entire for the ſeſſion of parliament. Admiral Ruſſel therefore, on the 6th of November, acquainted the houſe of commons, that his majeſty had given leave to lay before them the ſeveral papers, which had been given in by ſir John Fenwick, in the nature of informations againſt himſelf and ſeveral other perſons of quality; and he deſired, that thoſe papers might be read, that ſo he might have an opportunity to juſtify himſelf; or, if he did not, that he might fall under the cenſure of the houſe.

The papers being read, Fenwick was immediately ordered to be brought before the houſe; and, being interrogated by the ſpeaker concerning his inclinations to diſcover the deſigns and practices of the enemies of the government, he anſwered, that he did not know but what he ſhould ſay might hurt himſelf; and therefore deſired, that he might have ſome ſecurity, that his confeſſion ſhould not riſe up againſt him in a court of judicature; adding, that he would not offend either the king or the houſe. The ſpeaker ordered him to withdraw; after which the houſe debated, whether they ſhould acquaint him with their having his papers of informations. But they did not think fit to do it, becauſe they thought theſe papers were a contrivance, and made by others for him; that the beſt way, to get the truth out of him, would be for him to tell his own ſtory; and that, if the houſe ſhould let him know they had thoſe papers, he would only refer to thoſe papers, as he had lately done, when he was examined by the king and council. It was alſo debated, whether there ſhould be any threatening words uſed to him; but they thought that not proper, ſince his confeſſion ought to be free and natural. It was alſo mentioned, whether they ſhould take notice of his majeſty's conſent. But that was not thought fit neither, as being derogatory to the privileges of the houſe. Sir John being called in again, the ſpeaker acquainted him, that, the houſe having conſidered his excuſing his making a diſcovery, they thought he had no reaſon to apprehend, that the king ſhould be angry with him for making any diſcovery to the houſe; this being the proper place to enquire of all things, that relate to the king and government, eſpecially his majeſty's ſafety. That as to what he ſtood upon, that he ſhould not be prejudiced by what he ſhould diſcover there, they took notice he had already, notwithſtanding what he ſaid, diſcovered it to the king and council: That he had no reaſon at all to apprehend, that he ſhould ſuffer any thing, if he made a full and clear diſcovery: That no man, who dealt candidly with this houſe, ever did: That it was in his power to deſerve the favour of the houſe: That it was required by the houſe, that he ſhould make a diſcovery; and that this was the laſt time he was like to be aſked to do it. Sir John inſiſted upon his former excuſes, namely, his fear of the king's diſpleaſure, and of accuſing himſelf; which being once more over-ruled, he then demanded time to recollect himſelf, urging the cloſe reſtraint, which he had been under in priſon, and the badneſs of his memory. To this the ſpeaker made anſwer, that the houſe thought it a matter of great moment to the king and whole nation, that thoſe, who were their enemies, ſhould be diſcovered as ſoon as poſſible; and, this being within his knowledge, the houſe did not think it fit to give him time; but that, if they found by his diſcovery, that he dealt candidly with them, and had told them as much as he knew upon his memory, they would conſider of his requeſt of giving him time for the reſt. Then ſir John addreſſed himſelf in theſe words to the houſe: 'When I firſt ſpoke to the privy councillor, I propoſed to him, whether I might have a pardon without being an evidence againſt any man; and in that caſe, I would ſerve the king ſo as to tell him all I knew. It was upon honour, that I did it to him, and he took the words in writing from me, and ſent them to the king in Flanders. The king's anſwer was, that he made no objection as to my being an evidence, nor his giving me a pardon; but that I could expect no pardon till he knew what I could ſay. Upon that I was encouraged to do what I did for his majeſty's ſervice; and I have found in all my buſineſs ſince, whatever I do or ſay, the anſwer is, "It is not ſatisfactory," and I am where I was. When this was done, there was a meſſage ſent to me from the lords juſtices, that this was not ſatisfactory, and I muſt tell all I know. Now, when a man hath told all he knows, and this muſt be ſtill the anſwer, it is very hard. The king's anſwer was, that I ſhould more fully make good what I had ſaid. I did afterwards explain what I informed that honourable perſon, and ſtill it was not ſatisfactory. I hope I ſhall not find this from this honourable houſe. I am upon my life, and I hope this houſe will conſider of it. I know this houſe is good ſecurity, if I had it, but till I have it, I am under theſe circumſtances, and I may at laſt be told all is not ſatisfactory. I deſire the houſe to conſider of it.' The ſpeaker having preſſed ſir John to make a diſcovery, and finding by all his anſwers, that he did nothing but prevaricate with them, a motion was made for leave to bring in a bill to attaint him of high-treaſon; which after a debate was carried in the affirmative, by an hundred and ſeventy-nine voices againſt ſixty-one. Three days after the bill was preſented to the houſe, and after a long debate of ſeveral hours, the queſtion was put for the ſecond reading, which was alſo carried in the affirmative by a majority of one hundred and ninety-ſix votes againſt one hundred and four. The ſame day the houſe ordered, that ſir John Fenwick ſhould have a copy of the bill, and of the order for reading it eight days after; and that Mr. ſecretary Vernon ſhould then produce the letter written in Kent by ſir John Fenwick, of which he had informed the houſe. The next day the ſpeaker having acquainted the houſe, that he had received a letter from ſir John, wherein he made it his humble petition, 'that he might have the aſſiſtance of his counſel, ſir Francis Pemberton, ſir Thomas Powis, and ſir Bartholomew Shower, and of his ſollicitor, Chriſtopher Dighton,' the commons readily allowed ſir John Fenwick the counſel he deſired; and, after ſome debate, the ſollicitor likewiſe, though it was intimated, that he was a very great jacobite, and was ſuſpected to have been concerned in the eſcape of Goodman. The day before the attainder was to be read a ſecond time, ſir John Fenwick preſented another petition, wherein he prayed to be heard by his counſel againſt the paſſing of the bill. Whereupon the houſe ordered, that he ſhould be allowed two counſel at the bar of the houſe to make his defence. The ſame night William Fuller, the impoſtor, ſent a letter to the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, importing, 'That no perſon had been more actually engaged with ſir John Fenwick than himſelf, it having been his fortune ſeveral times to bring letters to him from the late king and queen at St. Germain's and to carry his anſwers. That he had alſo been with ſir John at the private conſults of the late king's adherents, ſo that, if he might be ſerviceable in detecting his treaſons, he ſhould be very ready to ſerve the government, and demonſtrate his integrity.' The ſpeaker acquainted the houſe the next day with the receipt of this letter; but Fuller's character was ſo well known to the houſe, that upon a queſtion for reading of it, it paſſed by a great majority in the negative.

This done, ſir John Fenwick was ordered to be brought to the bar; but it being a proceeding of that nature, that none of the ancienteſt members could readily give precedent of, it was neceſſary to ſettle ſome preliminaries, and the firſt queſtion was, Whether the mace ought to lie upon the table, when ſir John Fenwick was in the houſe? or whether the ſerjeant ought not to ſtand by him with it at the bar? Mr. Smith and the chancellor of the exchequer ſaid, that, ſir John being a priſoner, the mace ought to be at the bar; and then no member could ſpeak, but the queſtion muſt be aſked by the chair. And on the other hand Mr. Boyle, Mr. John Howe, ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, Mr. Brotherton, Colonel Granville, ſir William Williams, and ſir Thomas Dyke, maintained that the mace ought to be upon the table, becauſe the bill was to be read; that if the mace was not upon the table, their mouths were muzzled: That they were to act in their higheſt capacity as judges, and therefore ought not to paſs a vote, that the judges ſhould not aſk queſtions. After this debate it was carried, that ſir John Fenwick ſhould ſtand with the mace at the bar; and then a queſtion aroſe about the reading of the bill. Some members ſaid, that it could not be read, while the counſel was preſent: Others ſaid, that it was not neceſſary to read it, while ſir John Fenwick was preſent, he having had a copy of it. But at laſt it was thought reaſonable, it being in the nature of a charge upon him, that it ſhould be read to him, when preſent with his counſel. It was alledged, that this was done in the caſe of indictments, when the copies were delivered to the priſoners; and therefore it ſhould be read only as a matter of form, as a charge, to which he was to anſwer; but that it could not be reckoned a ſecond reading, according to the rules of the houſe, the mace being off the table; and ſo it ſhould be read again, when the counſel and the priſoner were withdrawn. Then the ſerjeant took the mace, and brought ſir John Fenwick to the bar; and counſel being admitted for him and for the bill, namely, ſir Thomas Powis and ſir Bartholomew Shower, for the priſoner, Mr. Serjeant Gould and Mr. ſerjeant Lovell, recorder of London, for the bill, the ſpeaker opened the matter; and addreſſing himſelf to ſir John Fenwick, laid before him the heinouſneſs of the crime, 'wherewith he ſtood charged, and how deſtructive it would have been, if it had ſucceeded, to the very being of this kingdom. And therefore, that he might not go unpuniſhed, if he was guilty, they had ordered a bill into the houſe to attaint him for high-treaſon, which had been once read, and would now be read to him at the bar; and then he would hear the evidence againſt him, and have liberty to make his defence. That, though he could not claim any right thereto, the houſe, to ſhew how ready they were to favour him, in giving him any reaſonable help, did allow him counſel to aſſiſt him in it. That he was likewiſe to acquaint thoſe, who were his counſel, that the houſe did reckon their own prudence would ſo guide them, as not to give any juſt offence to this houſe. That they ought not to queſtion the power of parliaments to paſs bills of attainder, when they judge it requiſite, of which the commons are more proper judges than any private perſon: and therefore they did not allow him to debate that point.' This ſpeech being ended, the clerk of the houſe of commons read the bill, importing, 'That whereas ſir John Fenwick was, upon the oaths of George Porter and Cardell Goodman, indicted of high-treaſon, in conſpiring to aſſaſſinate his majeſty's ſacred perſon, and encouraging the French king to invade this kingdom; and having obtained his majeſty's favour to have his trial delayed from time to time, upon his repeated promiſes of making an ingenuous and full confeſſion of his knowledge of any deſign or conſpiracy againſt his majeſty's perſon or government, and of the perſons therein concerned; he had ſo far abuſed his majeſty's great clemency and indulgence, that, inſtead of making ſuch confeſſion, he had contrived falſe and ſcandalous papers as his informations, reflecting on the fidelity of ſeveral noble perſons, divers members of the houſe of commons, and others, only by hearſay, and contriving thereby to undermine the government, and create jealouſies between the king and his ſubjects, and to ſtifle the real conſpiracy. And that whereas Cardell Goodman, one of the witneſſes againſt the ſaid ſir John Fenwick, to prove the ſaid treaſon, lately and ſince the ſeveral times appointed for the trial of the ſaid ſir John Fenwick, at one of which times the ſaid ſir John Fenwick had been accordingly tried, had it not been for the expectation of the ſaid diſcoveries ſo often promiſed by him, was withdrawn, ſo that the ſaid Cardell Goodman could not be had, to give evidence upon any trial: Be it therefore enacted by the king's moſt excellent majeſty, by and with the advice and conſent of the lords ſpiritual and temporal and commons in this preſent parliament aſſembled, and by the authority of the ſame, that the ſaid ſir John Fenwick be and is hereby convicted and attainted of high-treaſon, and ſhall ſuffer the pains of death, and incur all forfeitures, as a perſon attainted of high-treaſon.'

The bill being read, and the king's counſel, the ſerjeants Gould and Lovell, having, according to the ſpeaker's directions, opened the evidence, which they had for proving the charge, they were anſwered by the counſel for the priſoner, who alledged, 'That, if the others would only call in evidence to prove the ſuggeſtions of the bill, they were ready to anſwer; but if they called any evidence to prove ſir John Fenwick guilty of the conſpiracy by living witneſſes, they took upon them to ſay they were not ready for that, ſince they did not know whether they ſhould be allowed the liberty of producing witneſſes.' Being ordered to withdraw, the houſe debated the ſame a long time, not without many of the members making large excurſions from the matter in diſpute; which made the lord Cutts riſe and ſay, 'That he thought it a misfortune, that a matter of this nature had held them ſo long; and he conceived it a thing to be wiſhed, that every gentleman, who ſpoke upon this occaſion, would apply himſelf more cloſely to ſubſtance, and leſs to forms. That he meant to forms, conſidered merely as forms, for it ought to be true reaſon, that was convincing to them, and they ought not to tie themſelves up to any forms upon this occaſion, but ſuch as were grounded upon reaſon, That really he had not heard any thing, that fell from any gentleman, that ſhewed his doubt of the nature and aggravating circumſtances of the crime of the priſoner; but that it had conſiſted with the great candour and juſtice of this houſe, to ſhew their favour to the priſoner in allowing him counſel. That, when the counſel ſaid they were unprepared, if they meant they would prepare themſelves for more grounds of difference and chicanery, he would not give them further time. That he could not perceive there was any reality of argument in it, and that there was in reaſoning, as in religion, ſometimes a form without power.' After many other ſpeeches, the ſpeaker read theſe two queſtions: Firſt, 'That the counſel for ſir John Fenwick be confined to make their proof to what was ſuggeſted in the bill:' And ſecondly, 'That ſir John Fenwick be allowed further time.' But neither of theſe queſtions being allowed to be put, he then propoſed, 'That ſir John Fenwick be allowed further time to produce witneſſes in his defence, againſt the charge of high-treaſon; and that he give in a liſt of his witneſſes to the ſpeaker:' Which queſtion was put, and paſſed in the affirmative. Afterwards the ſpeaker put another queſtion, 'That the counſel, in managing the evidence againſt ſir John Fenwick, be allowed to produce evidence touching the allegations in the bill, and the treaſons, for which he ſtood indicted:' Which being likewiſe carried in the affirmative, and ſir John Fenwick acquainted from the chair, that the houſe allowed him three days longer to make his defence, he being withdrawn, the commons reſolved, that the bill for attainting tainting him of high-treaſon be read a ſecond time, on Monday the 16th of November.

Accordingly, on that day, the houſe proceeded further on this matter. The king's counſel produced their evidence, which was firſt captain Porter, who gave an ample relation of what he knew concerning ſir John's guilt; and who, notwithſtanding the counſel for the priſoner ſtrenouſly oppoſed it, was further examined about his being tampered with by Clancey, in order to take off his teſtimony in relation to the conſpiracy. Then the king's counſel produced the records of Clancey's conviction, and proceeded to Goodman's examination, taken under the hand of ſecretary Vernon, which they deſired might be read. This was ſtrongly objected to by the priſoner's counſel, as a thing not to be allowed, and impracticable, the law requiring perſons to appear, and give their evidence 'viva voce.' Upon this, the houſe entered into a warm debate, but at length it was carried by two hundred and eighteen voices againſt a hundred and forty-five, that Goodman's information ſhould be read; and that, afterwards, ſome of the grand jury ſhould give an account upon what evidence they found the bill of indictment, that was brought in againſt ſir John Fenwick.

The next evidence, that was produced, was the record of the conviction of Mr. Cooke; and, when the counſel on both ſides had ſpoken to it, and the houſe debated the ſame, it was carried by a hundred and eighty-one voices againſt a hundred and ten, that the ſaid record ſhould be read, and the king's counſel allowed to examine witneſſes, as to what was ſworn by Goodman at Cooke's trial. This being over, as alſo ſome queſtions concerning ſir John Fenwick's letter, it was reſolved, That the counſel for the priſoner might, if they had witneſſes to examine on his behalf, do it that night; but that, as to their obſervations, the houſe would give them time till next morning. They, having nothing but a record to produce, accepted of this; and, on the 27th of November, made as good a defence, as their client's cauſe would admit; but at length being withdrawn, and the priſoner ſtill declining to deal more clearly and candidly, in reſpect to his accuſation of ſeveral perſons of quality; it was reſolved, That Mr. ſecretary Vernon ſhould give in his evidence, in reference to ſir John's getting his trial delayed by offers of informations, and that in the preſence of ſir John and the counſel on both ſides.

Here the counſel having nothing to ſay, they were diſcharged from their farther attendance at that time; and, according to the order of the day, the bill being read a ſecond time, and afterwards opened by the ſpeaker, and no members riſing to ſpeak, he aſked, whether he ſhould put the queſtion of commitment? This occaſioned a very long and warm debate about the extraordinary method of proceeding; the power and juſtice of parliaments compared with other inferior courts of judicature, with ſeveral precedents of former bills of attainder, and other arguments, that fell in; but upon the whole matter, towards eleven at night, it was carried by an hundred and eighty-two voices againſt an hundred and twenty-eight, that the bill ſhould be committed. On the 20th of the ſame month, the houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee of the whole houſe, and ſeveral words having been offered as amendments, importing ſir John's being guilty, they were at laſt agreed on to be added to the bill. It was alſo propoſed to the conſideration of the ſaid committee, Whether the lords ſpiritual ſhould ſtand in the enacting part? But, upon looking into ſeveral acts of attainder, it appeared they were mentioned in all of them in the enacting part; and ſo they were left to ſtand in the bill by general conſent.

On the 25th of November, the bill was read the third time, and the debate ran as high as it had done five days before, about the commitment. Mr. Methuen, who ſtood up firſt, took notice, 'That the greateſt part of the former debate had run upon two things; on the one ſide, the inconveniency of bills of attainder, or at leaſt the having them ſo frequent; on the other ſide, that it is neceſſary to have them ſometimes, that no perſons might think they were out of reach, if they could evade the laws, that were made to puniſh ordinary offenders. That he thought both theſe points too general, and that this bill, as every other, ought to have it's fate upon the particular circumſtances of the caſe before the houſe. That whoever gave his affirmative to this bill, ought to be convinced, that ſir John Fenwick was guilty of high-treaſon; and alſo that there are extraordinary reaſons, why the nation did proſecute him in ſo extraordinary a manner. And that he thought neither of thoſe was ſufficient alone. That if, between the indictment and trial, Goodman ſhould have died, and there had been no other reaſon for attainting ſir John Fenwick but only the want of his evidence, he ſhould not have thought it a ſufficient reaſon, though the houſe ſhould have had an opportunity of being informed of this particular evidence, and believed him guilty. That, if ſir John Fenwick did not appear guilty, he did not think any reaſon of ſtate could juſtify this bill, though ſir John had prevaricated, and behaved himſelf to the diſſatisfaction of every body; and therefore he thought there muſt be both theſe. That, the houſe having heard the evidence, he would not repeat it, but rather come to thoſe things, that diſtinguiſhed ſir John Fenwick's caſe; only he muſt take notice, that they had given ſir John liberty to make his defence, and had fully heard him; which had altered the reaſon of a great many precedents cited from the lord chief juſtice Coke and other authors. That what diſtinguiſhed this caſe was the great danger, which the nation was in from this conſpiracy, which he found, by the general opinion of all perſons, was not thought yet at an end; and that there ſeemed likewiſe to be an opinion as general, that ſir John Fenwick could have contributed to their ſafety by a diſcovery. That the next circumſtance was, that ſir John Fenwick knowing the expectation the nation had from him, that he could have contributed to their ſafety, had made uſe of that to put off his trial, and at laſt had made ſuch a paper, as tended to the creating of new dangers. That, by this means, ſir John Fenwick, againſt whom there were two witneſſes, when he was indicted, had delayed his trial, ſo that now there was but one; and there was a violent preſumption, that this perſon was withdrawn by the practices of ſir John Fenwick's friends. That there was in his opinion as great a conſideration as any of theſe; that the public reſentment of the nation for ſuch his behaviour was the only means, which ſir John's practice had left the houſe to prevent the danger, that yet remained; and it ſeemed neceſſary for their ſafety to come the next beſt way to what he would have done for them by his diſcovery. That there had been great doubts raiſed againſt the evidence, which had been given, not ſo much whether it be ſuch evidence, as ought to incline the commons to believe him guilty; but whether it be ſuch as they ſhould hear in the capacity they were in? And whether, after it was found ſuch as it was, that is to ſay, not ſuch as would convict him upon another trial, they might ſo far credit it, as that it ſhould influence them to give their vote for this bill of attainder? That it was ſaid, that the commons were trying of ſir John Fenwick, that they were judges and jury, and they were obliged to proceed according to the ſame rules, though not the method of 'Weſtminſter-Hall, ſecundum allegata & probata.' But that the ſtate of the matter, as it appeared to him, was, that they were in their legiſlative power making a new law for the attainting of ſir John Fenwick, and for exempting his particular caſe from being tried in thoſe courts of judicature, and, by thoſe rules, which they had appointed for the trial of other cauſes; and trying of it themſelves (if they would uſe that word, though improperly) in which caſe the methods differed from what the laws made by themſelves require in other caſes; for this was never to be a law for any other. That, this being the ſtate of the caſe, it quite put the commons out of the methods of trials, and all the laws, that are for limiting rules for evidence at trials in Weſtminſter-Hall and other judicatures; for it muſt be agreed, that the ſame rule of evidence muſt be obſerved in another place, as well as Weſtminſter-Hall, that is, in impeachments; and that it had always been ſo taken. That the notion of two witneſſes being neceſſary had ſo much gained upon ſome members of the houſe, that they had ſaid, That this was required by the law of nature, the univerſal law of nations, nay, by the eternal law of God. That, if it was ſo, there would be no doubt, but it would oblige the commons; but he thought, that the reaſon, why any man deſerves to be puniſhed, is, becauſe he is criminal, let his crime be made evident any way whatſoever; for whatſoever makes the truth evident, is, and is accounted in all laws to be evidence. That the rules for examining whether any perſon is guilty or not, and the evidence, that is allowed as ſufficient, is different in all nations. That the trials in England differ from thoſe of all other nations, not only that the offenders are tried by a jury, which is particular to this nation, but that the witneſſes are to be produced face to face before the perſons accuſed; and beſides they had made laws that there ſhould be two witneſſes in caſes of high-treaſon, wherein they were the envy of all other nations. That the evidence, which is to be given againſt the criminals, differs in the ſame nation, when the offence differs. That there is a difference between the evidence, that will convict a man of felony, and the evidence, that is to convict a man of treaſon;

and that the evidence to convict a man of the same crime has been different in the same nation in different times. That by the common law of England, that evidence was sufficient to convict a man of any crime, which was sufficient to make the jury believe the person guilty. That thus, before the statute of Edward IV, a man might be convicted of treason by one witness, though that statute was made upon great reasons, and appears to be for the public good by the general approbation it has received; but that he did not think in their proceedings here they were bound by it. That some members argued thus: 'Shall we, who are the supreme authority (as we are part of it) go upon less evidence to satisfy ourselves of sir John Fenwick's guilt, than any other court? And shall we resort to this extraordinary way in this case? To this he answered, that, if it did shake the manner of trials below, he should be very unwilling to do it; but he did take it clearly, that it could not make the least alteration in the proceedings of any court, but, on the contrary, he thought there was no stronger argument for their resorting to this extraordinary way, than that of the care and caution, with which their law had provided for the defence of the innocent; for, if they considered all those laws, that had been made for that purpose, it was plain it must have been in the view of their ancestors, that many criminals might by this means escape. That their laws are made for ordinary trials, and for those things, that happen usually; but that there is no government in the world, where there is not resort to extraordinary power in cases, that require it. That the English government indeed had this advantange, that they could keep to rules, which others cannot. That in a very wise government (that of Venice) all the ways of punishing crimes of this nature are extraordinary. That persons are condemned there not only unheard, but before they are legally accused; and that is thought necessary there, which would not be endured here; and yet that government has continued so many hundred years, and no endeavours have been made to alter it, though so many families have suffered by it.

'That the next argument was from the precedent, which the commons were about to make; and that they had been told; 'Whatever the other precedents had been, what they did now would be a precedent for them and their posterity.' To this he replied, That, if this precedent should appear to posterity to be a precedent of an innocent man, or a person, whose guilt was doubted of, or one, whose guilt did not plainly appear; and this bill should be carried by a prevailing party, he did agree it was a very ill precedent. But if the case be, that this precedent would appear to posterity, upon the truth of the thing, to be a precedent made of a man most notoriously guilty; of a man, who had deserved this extraordinary way of proceeding, and this general resentment of the nation; and that nothing could have hindered this man from the common justice of the nation, but his having endeavoured to elude it in this matter; and if it appeared, that the commons would not be put off so, but that their indignation made an example of this man, he should not be sorry it should appear to posterity; but he believed posterity would (as he thought they ought) thank them for it. That, for his own particular, while he was innocent, he should not think his life in danger to be judged by four hundred English gentlemen, and the peerage of England, with the royal assent. That, when he reflected, he could not be of opinion, that the government could have procured a parliament to have passed a bill of attainder against my lord Russel, or Mr. Cornish, or even Mr. Colledge; he did not think all the power of the government could have prevailed to have done that, although they could prevail to have them condemned by the forms of law. That here he saw, that a great many gentlemen had opposed every step of this bill, for making an ill precedent, though these gentlemen did believe in their private consciences, that sir John Fenwick was guilty. That he could not see, that any person could be in danger by such a bill;' and therefore the conclusion, which he made for himself, was, 'That he was convinced in his conscience, that sir John Fenwick was guilty of high-treason; and that there were reasons so extraordinary to support this bill of attainder, that he did not see how any person, who was so convinced, could refuse to give his affirmative to this bill.'

This speech was answered by sir Godfrey Copley, who, after a short preamble, said, 'That it is the custom and law of this nation to require two positive witnesses to prove treason; and though he thought, without the utmost necessity, it was not prudent to deviate from that rule, yet he would not argue from thence, that the commons were tied up to it, it being certain, that the legislative authority, which has power to abrogate all laws now in being, cannot be tied up to any rules of human prescription; but there are the eternal rules of equity and justice, and right reason and conscience; and these he thought are unalterable, and never to be swerved from; and therefore he would take the liberty to see how far agreeable their proceedings were to these rules. That he looked upon it as a fundamental breach of these rules for an accusation to be given in against a man behind his back by he knows not whom, or by any, with whom he is not confronted and brought face to face. That he was one of those, who looked upon sir John Fenwick to be guilty, of which there was a proof by one witness, and to this they had added an indictment, that was proved. But that he thought that to be so far from giving strength to the evidence, that, in his opinion, the injustice, which attended it, made the scales lighter than they were before. For, if any bill or writing sworn behind a man's back may be used as part of evidence, he did by parallel reason argue, that the like may make up the whole at one time or other; and then the information of every two profligate knaves before a secretary of state, or a justice of peace, should be sufficient without any living testimony, to make a man run the hazard of his life. That he was not at all convinced of the necessity of the proceedings; but as he thought those, who brought this matter to the house of commons, wiser than himself, so he would not examine what reason they had to do it, though it was so little agreeable to him, that he wished it had not come thither. That it was not to be supposed, that the government was in hazard by such a man as sir John Fenwick, who was fast in Newgate; neither was it to be expected, that a man, who had been six months in prison, and nobody come to him, might make such a discovery, as might be worth their while. 'But, said he, suppose you had a man of invention and practice, what a spur do you put to it? May not a man of parts, when he has no other way to save himself; may not he form such a plot, as, should it gain belief, might make the best subjects in England tremble?' He added, that it was not for sir John Fenwick's life, that he argued, not thinking it of so great value to deserve so long and solemn a debate in this house, nor the consideration of so great an assembly after this manner; but that, if this method of proceeding be warranted by an English parliament, there is an end of the defence of any man living, be he never so innocent. That he had heard it mentioned, on the other side, that king James attainted (in Ireland) a great number of persons in a catalogue, in a lump. That he was not afraid of what arbitrary princes did, nor an Irish parliament; but he was afraid what should be done here, and was concerned for the honour of their proceedings, that it might be a precedent to a future parliament in an ill reign, to do that, which he was satisfied the commons would not now do[b].'

After these, and many other speeches, the question was put for passing the bill; and, the house dividing upon it, one hundred and eighty-nine were for the bill, and one hundred and fifty-six against it. Being then carried in the affirmative, the bill was sent up to the lords for their concurrence. The lords took a very extraordinay method to force their absent members to come to town. They sent messengers for them, to bring them up, which seemed to be a great breach on their dignity; for the privilege of making a proxy was an undoubted right belonging to that peerage; but those, who intended to throw out the bill, resolved to have a full house.

The bill met with great opposition; and the debates were the warmest, and lasted the longest, of any that had ever been.

The substance of the arguments in the house of lords, brought against this way of proceeding by bill of attainder, was, that the law was all men's security, as well as it ought to be their rule: If this was once broke through, no man was safe: Men would be presumed guilty, without legal proofs, and be run down, and be destroyed by a torrent: two wit-neſſes ſeemed neceſſary, by an indiſputable law of juſtice, to prove a man guilty: The law of God given to Moſes, as well as the law of England made this neceſſary: And, beſides all former ones, the law, lately made for trials in caſes of treaſon, was ſuch a ſacred one, that it was to be hoped, that even a parliament would not make a breach upon it. A written depoſition was no evidence, becauſe the perſon accuſed could not have the benefit of croſs-interrogating the witneſs; by which much falſe ſwearing was often detected: Nor could the evidence, given in one trial, be brought againſt a man, who was not a party in that trial: The evidence, that was offered to a grand jury, was to be examined all over again, at the trial; till that was done, it was not evidence. It did not appear, that Fenwick himſelf was concerned in the practice upon Porter: What his lady did, could not be charged on him. No evidence was brought, that Goodman was practiſed on; ſo his withdrawing himſelf could not be charged on Fenwick. Some very black things were proved againſt Goodman, which would be ſtrong enough to ſet aſide his teſtimony, tho' he were preſent; and that proof, which had been brought in Cooke's trial, againſt Porter's evidence, was again made uſe of, to prove, that, as he was the ſingle witneſs, ſo he was a doubtful and ſuſpected one: Nor was it proper, that a bill of this nature ſhould begin in the houſe of commons, which could not take examinations upon oath. Theſe were the arguments uſed by the Lords, as well as the commons, againſt the bill.

On the other ſide biſhop Burnet being convinced, that Fenwick was guilty, and that the method of proceeding by way of attainder, was not only lawful, but, in ſome caſes, neceſſary, and having, moreover by his ſearch into parliamentary proceedings, on ſuch occaſions, when he wrote the hiſtory of the Reformation, ſeen further into thoſe matters than otherwiſe he ſhould ever have done, he thought it incumbent upon him, when his opinion determined him to the ſeverer ſide, to open his reaſons in juſtification of his vote; which he did to this effect:

The nature of government required, that the legiſlature ſhould be recurred to, in extraordinary caſes, for which effectual proviſion could not be made by fixed and ſtanding laws. Our common law grew up out of the proceedings of the courts of law: Afterwards this, in caſes of treaſon, was thought too looſe; ſo the law, in this point, was limited, firſt, by the famous ſtatute in king Edward III's time; and then, by the ſtatute of king Edward the IVth's time, the two witneſſes were to be brought face to face with the perſon accuſed; and the law, lately made, had brought the method of treaſon to a yet further certainty. Yet, in that, as well as in the ſtatute of Edward III. parliamentary proceedings were ſtill excepted. And, indeed, tho' no ſuch proviſion had been expreſsly made in the acts themſelves, the nature of Government puts always an exception in favour of the legiſlative authority. The legiſlature was, indeed, bound to obſerve juſtice and equity, as much, if not more, than the inferior courts; becauſe the ſupreme court ought to ſet an example to all others. But they might ſee cauſe to paſs over forms, as occaſion ſhould require. This was the more reaſonable among us, becauſe there was no nation in the world, beſides England, that had not recourſe to torture, when the evidence was probable, but defective. That was a mighty reſtraint, and ſtruck a terror into all people; and the freeſt government, both ancient and modern, thought they could not ſubſiſt without it. At preſent, the Venetians have their civil juriſdictions, and the Griſons have their high courts of juſtice, which act without the forms of law, by the abſolute truſt, that is repoſed in them; ſuch as the Romans repoſed in dictators, in the time of their liberty. England had neither torture, nor any unlimited magiſtrate in it's conſtitution; and therefore, upon great emergencies, recourſe muſt be had to the ſupreme legiſlature. Forms are neceſſary in ſubordinate caſes; but there is no reaſon to tie up the ſupreme one by them. This method of attainder had been practiſed among us at all times. It is true, what was done in this way at one time, was often reverſed at another; but that was often the effect of the violence of the times, and was occaſioned often, by the injuſtice of thoſe attainders. The attainders of inferior courts were, upon the like account, often reverſed: But, when parliamentary attainders went upon good grounds, though without obſerving the forms of law, they were never blamed, not to ſay condemned. When poiſoning was firſt practiſed in England, and put in a pot of porridge in the biſhop of Rocheſter's houſe, this which was only felony, was by a ſpecial law, made to be high-treaſon; and a new puniſhment was appointed by act of parliament. The poiſoner was boiled alive. When the nun of Kent pretended to viſions, to oppoſe king Henry VIIIth's divorce, and his ſecond marriage; and ſaid, If he married again, he ſhould not live long after it, but ſhould die a villain's death; this was judged in parliament to be high-treaſon; and ſhe and her accomplices ſuffered accordingly. After that, there paſſed many attainders in that reign, only upon depoſitions, that were read in both houſes of parliament. It is true, theſe were much blamed; and there was great cauſe for it: there were too many of them; for this extreme way of proceeding is to be put in practice but ſeldom, and upon great occaſions; whereas many of theſe went upon ſlight grounds, ſuch as the ſuffering ſome paſſionate and indecent words, or the uſing ſome embroidery in garments and coats of arms with an ill intent. But that, which was indeed execrable, was, that perſons in priſon were attainted, without being heard in their defence. This was ſo contrary to natural juſtice, that it could not be enough condemned. In king Edward VIth's time, the lord Seymour was attainted in the ſame manner, only with this difference, that the witneſſes were brought to the bar, and there examined; whereas formerly they proceeded upon ſome depoſitions, that were read to them. At the duke of Somerſet's trial, which was both for high-treaſon and for felony, in which he was acquitted of the treaſon, but found guilty of the felony, depoſitions were only read againſt him; but the witneſſes were not brought face to face, as he preſſed they might be. Upon which it was, that the following parliament enacted, that the accuſers (that is, the witneſſes) ſhould be examined face to face, if they were alive. In queen Elizabeth's time, the parliament went out of the method of law, in all the ſteps of their proceedings againſt the queen of Scots. It is true, there were no parliamentary attainders in England during that long and glorious reign, upon which thoſe, who oppoſed the bill, had inſiſted much; yet that was only, becauſe there then was no occaſion here in England for any ſuch bill. But in Ireland, where ſome things were notoriouſly true, which yet could not be legally proved, that government was forced to have, on many different occaſions, recourſe to this method. In king James I's time, thoſe who were concerned in the gun-powder plot, and choſe to be killed, rather than taken, were by act of parliament attainted after their death which the courts of law could not do, ſince by our law, a man's crimes die with himſelf; for this reaſon, becauſe he cannot make his own defence, nor can his children do it for him. The famous attainder of the earl of Strafford, in king Charles I's time, has been much and juſtly cenſured, not ſo much becauſe it paſſed by bill, as becauſe of the injuſtice of it. He was accuſed for having ſaid, upon the houſe of commons refuſing to grant the ſubſidies, which the king had aſked, 'That the king was abſolved from all the rules of government, and might make uſe of force to ſubdue this kingdom.' Theſe words were proved only by one witneſs, all the reſt of the council, who were preſent, depoſing, that they remembered no ſuch words, and were poſitive that the debate ran only upon the war with Scotland; ſo that though 'this kingdom,' ſingly taken, muſt be meant of England, yet it might well be meant of 'that kingdom,' which was the ſubject then of the debate. Since then the words were capable of that favourable ſenſe, and that both he, who ſpoke them, and they, who heard them, affirmed, that they were meant and underſtood in that ſenſe, it was a moſt pernicious precedent, firſt to take them in the moſt odious ſenſe poſſible, and then to deſtroy him, who ſaid them, upon the teſtimony of one ſingle exceptionable witneſs. Whereas if, upon the commons refuſing to grant the king's demand, he had plainly adviſed the king to ſubdue his people by force, it is hard to tell, what the parliament might not juſtly have done, or would not do again in the like caſe. In king Charles II's time ſome of the moſt eminent of the regicides were attainted, after they were dead; and in king James's time the duke of Monmouth was attainted by bill. Theſe laſt attainders had their firſt beginning in the houſe of commons. Thus it appeared, that, theſe laſt two hundred years, not to mention much antienter precedents, the nation had upon extraordinary occaſions proceeded in this parliamentary way by bill. There were alſo many precedents of this method. And whereas it was ſaid, that an ill parliament might carry theſe too far, it is certain, that the nation, and every perſon in it, muſt be ſafe, when they are in their own hands, or in thoſe of a repreſentative choſen by themſelves. As on the other hand, if that be ill choſen, there is no help for it; the nation muſt periſh, for it is by their own fault. They have already too many precedents for this way of proceeding, if they intend to make an ill uſe of them. But a precedent is only a ground or warrant for the like proceeding upon the like occaſion. Two rules were laid down for all bills of this nature; firſt, that the

the matter be of a very extraordinary nature. Leſſer crimes had better be paſſed over than puniſhed by the legiſlature. Of all the crimes, that can be contrived againſt the nation certainly the moſt heinous one is, that of bringing in a foreign force to conquer us. This ruins both us and our poſterity for ever. Diſtractions at home, how fatal ſoever, even though they ſhould end ever ſo tragically, as ours once did in the murder of a king and in a military uſurpation, yet were capable of a criſis and a cure. In the year 1660, we came again to our wits, and all was ſet right again. Whereas there is no proſpect, after a foreign conqueſt, but of ſlavery and miſery. And, how black ſoever the aſſaſſinating a king muſt needs appear, yet a foreign conqueſt is worſe; it is aſſaſſinating the kingdom; and therefore the inviting and contriving that muſt be the blackeſt of crimes. But as the importance of the matter ought to be equal to ſuch an unuſual way of proceeding, ſo the certainty of the facts ought to be ſuch, that, if the defects in legal proof are to be ſupplied, yet this ought to be done upon ſuch grounds, as make the fact charged appear ſo evidently true, that though a court of law could not proceed upon it, yet no man could raiſe in himſelf a doubt concerning it. Antiently treaſon was judged as a felony ſtill is, upon ſuch preſumptions, as ſatisfied the jury. The law has now limited this to two witneſſes brought face to face. But the parliament may ſtill take that liberty, which is denied to inferior courts, of judging this matter, as an ordinary jury does in a caſe of felony. In the preſent caſe there was one witneſs 'viva voce,' upon whoſe teſtimony ſeveral perſons had been condemned, and had ſuffered; and theſe neither at their trial, nor at their death, diſproved or denied any circumſtance of his depoſitions. If he had been too much a libertine in the courſe of his life, that did not deſtroy his credit as a witneſs. In the firſt trial this might have made him a doubtful witneſs; but what had happened ſince had deſtroyed the poſſibility even of ſuſpecting his evidence. A party had been in intereſt concerned to inquire into his whole life, and in the preſent caſe had full time for it: and every circumſtance of his depoſition had been examined; and yet nothing had been diſcovered, that could ſo much as create a doubt. All was ſtill untouched, ſound, and true. The only circumſtance, in which the dying ſpeeches of thoſe, who ſuffered on his evidence, ſeemed to contradict him, was concerning king James's commiſſion; yet none of them denied really what Porter had depoſed, which was, that Charnock told him, that there was a commiſſion come from king James for attacking the prince of Orange's guards. They only denied, that there was a commiſſion for aſſaſſinating him. Sir John Freind and ſir William Perkins were condemned for the conſultation now given in evidence againſt ſir John Fenwick. They died not denying it. On the contrary they juſtified all they had done. It could not be ſuppoſed, that, if there had been a tittle in the evidence that was falſe, they ſhould both have been ſo far wanting to themſelves and to their friends, who were to be tried upon the ſame evidence, as not to have declared it in the moſt ſolemn mannner. Theſe things were more undeniably certain than the evidence of ten witneſſes could poſſibly be. Witneſſes might conſpire to ſwear a falſehood: but, in this caſe, the circumſtances took away the poſſibility of a doubt. And therefore the parliament, without taking any notice of Goodman's evidence, might well judge Fenwick guilty; for no man could doubt of it in his own mind. The antient Romans were very jealous of their liberty; but how exact ſoever they might be in ordinary caſes, yet when any of their citizens ſeemed to have a deſign of making himſelf king, they either created a dictator, to ſuppreſs or deſtroy him, or elſe the people proceeded againſt him in a ſummary way. By the Porcian law, no citizen could be put to death for any crime whatſoever; yet ſuch regard did the Romans pay to juſtice, even above law, that, when the Campanian legion had perfidiouſly broke in upon Rhegium, and pillaged it, they put them all to death for it. In the famous caſe of Cataline's conſpiracy, as the evidence was clear, and the danger extreme, the accomplices in it were executed, notwithſtanding the Porcian law. And this was done by the order of the ſenate, without either hearing them make their own defence, or admitting them to claim the right, which the Valerian law gave them, of an appeal to the people, yet that whole proceeding was chiefly directed by the two greateſt aſſerters of public liberty, that ever lived, Cato and Cicero. And Cæſar, who oppoſed it on pretence of its being againſt the Porcian law, was for that reaſon ſuſpected of being in the confederacy. It appeared afterwards, how little regard he had, either to law or liberty, though, upon this occaſion, he had made uſe of the one to protect thoſe, who were in a plot againſt the other.

This laſt expreſſion was much reſented by thoſe, who were againſt the bill, as carrying a ſevere reflection upon them for oppoſing it; and indeed the biſhop, though he only offered what reaſons occurred to him to juſtify his voting for the bill, fell under a great load of cenſure on this occaſion.

In concluſion, the bill paſſed by a ſmall majority of ſeven voices only, there being ſixty-eight for it, and ſixty-one againſt it [c].

The bill, ſoon after, received the royal aſſent; and, at the ſame time paſſed an act to attaint ſuch perſons as were concerned in the late conſpiracy, who had fled from juſtice, unleſs they came within a limited time, and alſo for continuing ſeveral others of the conſpirators in cuſtody. Sir John Fenwick made all poſſible application to the king for a reprieve; and as a main ground for that, and, for an article of merit, he alledged, that he had ſaved the king's life two years before. It ſeems, he pretended, that, when the jacobites, after Charnock's return from France, had reſolved to aſſaſſinate the king, before he went to Holland; and had acquainted him with their deſign; that, he aſſured them, he would diſcover it, if they did not promiſe to lay it aſide. But, as this fact could not be proved, ſo it could confer no obligation on the king, ſince he had given him no warning of his danger; and, according to his own ſtory, had truſted the conſpirators words very eaſily, when they promiſed to purſue their deſign no further; which he had no reaſon to do. So that this pretenſion was not much conſidered. But he was preſſed to make a full diſcovery; and, for ſome days, he ſeemed to be in ſome ſuſpenſe, what courſe to take. He deſired to be ſecured, that nothing, which he confeſſed ſhould turn to his own prejudice. The houſe of lords ſent an addreſs to the king, intreating that they might be at liberty to make him their promiſe; and that was readily granted. He then farther deſired, that, upon making a full confeſſion, he might be aſſured of a pardon, without being obliged to become a witneſs againſt any other perſon. To this the lords anſwered, that he had to do with men of honour; and that he muſt truſt to their diſcretion: That they would mediate for him with the king, in proportion as they ſhould find his diſcoveries ſincere and important. His behaviour to the king, hitherto, had not been ſuch, as to induce the lords to truſt to his candour; it was much more reaſonable that he ſhould truſt to them. Upon this, all hopes of any diſcoveries from him were laid aſide; and ſir John Fenwick prepared himſelf to die. He deſired the aſſiſtance of a divine; and the government offered the choice of any clergyman, that had taken the oaths; or, if that would not do, of any of the biſhops, who had diſſented about the bill of attainder; all whom he would not admit. Then three or four non-juring clergymen were offered him; but they would not come to him, pretending a fear that the oaths would be tendered to them. Dr. White, the non-juring biſhop of Chicheſter, was, at laſt, offered him. In this, and ſeveral other matters, biſhop Burnet did him ſuch ſervice, that ſir John wrote him a letter of thanks. He was beheaded on Tower-Hill, on the 28th of January; and died very compoſed, and in a much better temper than was to be expected, for his life had been very irregular. At the place of execution, he delivered a paper, in writing, to the ſheriff; wherein he did not deny the facts that had been ſworn againſt him; but complained of the injuſtice of the procedure; and left his

[c] The lords, who were for the negative (among whom were ſeveral of the king's ſervants and counſellors) entered their proteſt, which they grounded on the following reaſons: 1. Becauſe bills of attainder againſt perſons in priſon, and who are therefore liable to be tried by common law, are of dangerous conſequence to the lives of the ſubjects, and may tend to the ſubverſion of the laws of the kingdom. 2. Becauſe the evidence of grand jurymen, of what was ſworn before them againſt ſir John Fenwick, as alſo the evidence of the petty jury men, was admitted here; both which are againſt the rules of law, beſides, that they diſagreed in their teſtimony. 3. Becauſe the information of Goodman in writing was received, which by law was not admitted, and the priſoner, for want of appearing face to face, as is by law required) could not have the advantage of croſs examining him. And it did not appear by evidence that ſir John Fenwick, or any perſon employed by him, had any way perſuaded Goodman to withdraw himſelf; and it would be of very dangerous conſequence, that any perſon ſo accuſed ſhould be condemned; for by this means a witneſs, who ſhould be found inſufficient to convict a man, ſhall have more power to hurt a man by his abſence, than if he were produced 'viva voce' againſt him. 4. Becauſe, if Goodman had appeared againſt him, he was infamous in the whole courſe of his life, and could not be a good witneſs, eſpecially in caſes of blood. 5. Becauſe in this caſe there was but one evidence, viz. Porrer, and he a very doubtful one. Laſtly, becauſe ſir John Fenwick was ſo inconſiderable a man, as to endangering the peace of the government, that there was no neceſſity of proceeding againſt him in ſo extraordinary a manner.' The year following a pamphlet was publiſhed in juſtification of that bill, under the title of, 'A letter to a friend, in vindication of the proceedings againſt ſir John Fenwick, by bill of attainder, with ſome remarks on his printed paper.'

The

thanks to thoſe who had voted againſt the bill. He owned his loyalty to king James, and to the prince of Wales after him; but mentioned the deſign of aſſaſſinating king William, in terms full of horror. The paper was ſuppoſed to have been drawn by biſhop White; and the jacobites were much provoked with the laſt-mentioned paragraph [d].

During Fenwick's affair, a deſign was carried on againſt the duke of Shrewſbury, which, but for its ſingular circumſtances, hardly deſerves to be mentioned. There was one Matthew Smith, nephew to ſir William Perkins. He had been captain of an independent company at Windſor, and commanded all the time of king William's being there, when he firſt came to England. Upon the diſbanding of the independent companies, he received a commiſſion in the duke of Norfolk's regiment; but was ſoon after diſmiſſed the ſervice; which threw him into the diſaffected party. But he pretended, that, when he found, that king James's intereſts were no way to be ſupported, but by invaſions from the French, and by aſſaſſinations of the king, his duty to his country, and the horror of ſuch attempts, made him reſolve, as much as in him lay, to diſappoint ſuch deſigns. Accordingly, he applied himſelf to the duke of Shrewſbury's office, pretending, that he could make great diſcoveries; and that he knew all the motions and deſigns of the jacobites. He ſent many dark and ambiguous letters to that duke's under-ſecretary, which were, more properly, to be called amuſements, than diſcoveries [e]. For he gave only hints and ſcraps of ſtories; and, tho' he had got a promiſe not to be made a witneſs, yet he never offered any other witneſs, nor told where any of thoſe, whom he informed againſt, were lodged, or how they might be taken. He was always aſking more money, and boaſting what he could do, if he were well ſupplied; and he ſeemed to think he never had enough. It is true, before the conſpiracy broke out, he had given ſuch hints, that, when it was diſcovered, it appeared he muſt have known much more of it, than he thought fit to tell. The duke of Shrewſbury acquainted the king with his diſcoveries; but nothing could then be made, either of them or of him. When the whole plot was unravelled, it was manifeſt, from his letters, that he muſt have known more of it, than he would own; but he ſtill claimed the promiſe before made him, that he ſhould not be a witneſs. Upon the whole, therefore, he rather deſerved a ſevere puniſhment, than any of thoſe rewards which he pretended to. He was accordingly diſmiſſed by the duke of Shrewſbury, who thought, that even this ſuſpicious behaviour of his did not releaſe him from keeping the promiſes, which he had made to him. Captain Smith hereupon went to the earl of Monmouth, afterwards earl of Peterborough, and poſſeſſed him with bad impreſſions of the duke of Shrewſbury, and found him much inclined to entertain them. He told him, that he had made great diſcoveries, of which the duke would take no notice; and, becauſe the duke's ill health had obliged him to go into the country two days before the aſſaſſination was intended, he put this conſtruction upon it, that he was willing to be out of the way, when the king was to be murdered. To fix this imputation, he ſhewed the earl the copies of all his letters; all which, but the laſt more eſpecially, had the face of a great diſcovery [f]. The earl of Monmouth carried this to court; and it made ſuch an impreſſion there, that the earl of Portland ſent captain Smith money, and entertained him as a ſpy; but never could by his means, learn any one real piece of intelligence. When this happened, the king was

[d] The paper was as follows:

"Speaking nor writing was never my talent, I ſhall therefore give a very ſhort but faithful account; firſt of my religion, and next what I ſuffer moſt innocently for, to avoid the calumnies I may reaſonably expect, my enemies will caſt upon me when dead, ſince they have moſt falſely and maliciouſly aſperſed me, whilſt under my misfortunes.

"As for my religion, I was brought up in the church of England, as it is by law eſtabliſhed, aad have ever profeſſed it; though I confeſs, I have been an unworthy member of it, in not living up to the ſtrict and excellent rules thereof; for which I take ſhame to myſelf, and humbly aſk forgiveneſs of God. I come now to die in that communion, truſting as an humble and hearty penitent to be received by the mercy of God, through the merits of Jeſus Chriſt my Saviour.

"My religion taught me my loyalty, which I bleſs God is untainted; and I have ever endeavoured in the ſtation, wherein I have been placed, to the utmoſt of my power to ſupport the crown of England in the true and lineal courſe of deſcent without interruption.

"As for what I am now to die, I call God to witneſs, I went not to that meeting in Leadenhall-Street, with any ſuch intention, as to invite king James by force to invade this nation; nor was I myſelf provided with either horſe or arms, or engaged for any number of men, or gave particular conſent for any ſuch invaſion, as is moſt falſely ſworn againſt me.

"I do alſo declare in the preſence of God, that I knew nothing of king James's intending coming to Calais, nor of any invaſion intended from thence, till it was publickly known. And the only notion I had, that ſomething might be attempted, was from the Toulon fleet coming from Breſt.

"I alſo call God to witneſs, that I received the knowledge of what is contained in thoſe papers, that I gave to a great man, that came to me in the Tower, both from letters and meſſages, that came from France; and he told me, when I read them to him, that the prince of Orange had been acquainted with moſt of thoſe things before.

"I might have expected mercy from that prince, becauſe I was inſtrumental in ſaving his life; for, when, about April 1695, an attempt againſt him came to my knowledge, I did partly by diſſuaſions, and partly by delays, prevent the deſign; which I ſuppoſe was the reaſon, that the laſt villainous project was concealed from me.

"If there be any perſon, whom I have injured in word or deed, I heartily pray their pardon, and beg of God to pardon thoſe, who with great zeal have ſought my life, and brought the guilt of my innocent blood upon this nation, no treaſon being proved upon me.

"I return my moſt hearty thanks to thoſe noble and worthy perſons, who gave me their aſſiſtance by oppoſing this bill of attainder, without which it had been impoſſible I could have fallen under the ſentence of death. God bleſs them and their poſterity: though I am fully ſatisfied they pleaded their own cauſe, while they defended mine.

"I pray God to bleſs my true and lawful ſovereigns king James and the queen, and prince of Wales; and reſtore him and his poſterity to this throne again, for the peace and proſperity of this nation, which is impoſſible to proſper till the government is ſettled upon a right foot.

"And now, O God, I do with all humble devotion commend my ſoul into thy hands, the great maker and preſerver of men, and lover of ſouls; beſeeching thee, that it may be always dear and precious in thy ſight through the merits of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt. Amen."

[e] Theſe letters were publiſhed by Smith himſelf, in 1697, under the title of 'Memoirs of ſecret ſervices.' He begins with minutes of the 2d of September 1694, with the duke of Shrewſbury, informing him that king James deſigned to invade England in the ſpring of the year 1693; but that a difference happened between the jacobites here, which aroſe upon occaſion of that king's declaration of the 17th of April 1693, by which the papiſts were put out of hopes of command, in caſe that king ſhould be reſtored. That this 'Declaration' was obtained by a party called 'Compounders,' who promiſed, upon the granting that declaration, to reſtore king James in a very ſhort time. That this king was very much averſe to the ſigning it; that it was drawn here in England, and carried over by the lord Middleton, who declared, that upon king James's laying aſide the lord Melfort, and his conſenting to the declaration, the Compounders would perform their promiſe. That the French king was wrought upon by the intereſt, which the compounders made with one of his ſecretaries (who was a public enemy to the lord Melfort, and to his way of proceeding) to perſuade king James to ſign that declaration, notwithſtanding his diſinclination to it. That the compounders made ſeveral terms with that king, and ſome of them were to be made 'truſtees,' as they ſtiled themſelves, of the nation, for king James's performance of what he had promiſed in that declaration. That upon this the jacobites divided into factions, the one ſtiled 'Compounders;' the other called 'Melfordians,' who joined with the papiſts to reſtore their king without terms, with ſword in hand. That, upon the Compounders failure of promiſe as to the time of reſtoring the king, he took himſelf to be acquitted from ſtanding to that declaration drawn up by them; and now hearkened to the Melfordians; and, though Melfort was publicly laid aſide, yet he ſtill acted behind the curtain, and nothing was valued, unleſs recommended by him, while Middleton was only the ſhadow of a ſecretary. That, in ſpring 1693, great application had been made to king James to come over, who accordingly gave the Melfordian faction great hopes. That the compounding party, getting knowledge of it, laboured to prevent it, by reaſon that their meaſures were not fully concerted, and therefore ſent to the French king, to let him know, that it would be in vain to do it that ſpring, becauſe the Engliſh fleet was in ſuch readineſs, that they could fit out fifty-eight men of war in a fortnight's time; ſo that the deſign went off with a promiſe to ſtir the year after. That, when Melfort ſeemed to leave all buſineſs, and retire from the court at St. Germain's, every one complimented and waited on him to his coach, except the lord Griffin and David Lloyd, they being great compounders, and of Middleton's faction. That ſir James Montgomery was of the compounding patry, and that they helped him to make his eſcape: for, he being a timorous man, they were afraid of his confeſſing. Then Smith proceeds to make ſeveral diſcoveries, which are much the ſame with thoſe mentioned in the account of the plot. Theſe memoirs were immediately animadverted upon, by Mr. Richard Kingſton in his 'Modeſt Anſwer' to Captain Smith's 'immodeſt memoirs,' wherein he endeavours to ſhew, that theſe memoirs were not written by the Captain, but by Mr. Thomas Brown 'a ſtiff jacobite, and mercenary poet.' That they were publiſhed and diſperſed at the charge of the party, and the letters were ſo altered and interpolated, that they were not the ſame with the originals, ſent to the earl of Shrewſbury, and that the ſubſtance of the memoirs were mere fardles of improbabilities, incongruities and invented falſities.

[f] When Smith complained to the lords, intimating, that the duke of Shrewſbury intended to ſtifle his informations, the houſe ſent to the duke in the country, to know what paſſed between him and Smith, which the duke acquainted them in the following letter to the lord-keeper:

Eyeford, 15 Jan. 1696.

"My lord,

"Having received the commands of the houſe of lords, to lay before their lordſhips what letters I received from one Smith in February laſt, or, in caſe I kept none, then to acquaint the houſe with what I can remember was contained in them, I am very ſorry not to be able ſo fully to comply with their lordſhips directions, as I wiſh I could. For having heard long ſince, that this man did pretend to great merit for his diſcoveries, and, had on ſeveral occaſions, in a very unhandſome manner, complained of me, I did then endeavour to collect what letters he had ſent me, that I might judge how his intelligence appeared, when put together; for, as it came to me, I could make little of it. But I found I could retrieve ſo few, and thoſe generally of an old date, when I had more value for his intelligence than I had afterwards, that I am almoſt certain I have none of thoſe letters left, which their lordſhips deſire to ſee. I ſhall therefore apply myſelf to give them the beſt account of what he did inform me, that is moſt material at this time; which I am the better able to collect, becauſe ſeveral things he juſt going beyond the ſea; ſo captain Smith's letters were taken and ſealed up by the king's order, and left in the hands of ſir William Trumbull, who was the other ſecretary of ſtate, This matter lay quiet till Fenwick began to make diſcoveries; and, when the earl of Monmouth underſtood, that he had not named himſelf (about which he expreſſed too vehement a concern) but that he had named the duke of Shrewſbury, it was ſaid, that he entered into a negociation with the ducheſs of Norfolk, that ſhe ſhould, by ſir John Fenwick's lady, encourage him to perſiſt in his diſcoveries; and that he dictated ſome paper to the ducheſs, that ſhould be offered to him as an additional one; in which many little ſtories were related, which had been told the king, and might be believed by him; and by theſe the king might have been diſpoſed to believe the reſt of Fenwick's paper. And the whole ended in ſome diſcoveries concerning Smith, which would naturally occaſion his letters to be called for, and then they would probably have great effect. The ducheſs of Norfolk declared, that he had dictated all theſe ſchemes of his to her, who copied them, and handed them to ſir John Fenwick, and that he had left one paper with her. It was ſhort, but contained an abſtract of the whole deſign, and referred to a larger one, which he had only dictated to her. The ducheſs ſaid, that ſhe had placed a gentlewoman, who carried her meſſages to Fenwick's lady, to overhear all that paſſed; ſo that ſhe both had another witneſs to ſupport the truth of what ſhe related, and a paper left by him with her. She ſaid, that Fenwick would not be guided by him, and declared, he would not meddle with contrived diſcoveries. That thereupon the earl of Monmouth was highly provoked: He ſaid, 'that if ſir John would follow his advice, he would certainly ſave him; but, if he would not, he would get the bill to paſs. And indeed, when that matter was depending, he ſpoke two full hours in the houſe of lords, in favour of the bill, with a peculiar vehemence. Fenwick's lady, being much provoked at this, got her nephew, the earl of Carliſle, to move the lords, that her huſband might be examined concerning any advices, that had been ſent him with relation to his diſcoveries; and upon this ſir John told him what his lady had brought him, and thereupon the ducheſs of Norfolk and her confident were likewiſe interrogated, and gave the account, which has been related. In concluſion, captain Smith's letters were read, and he himſelf was examined. This held the lords ſeveral days, for the earl of Portland, by the king's orders, produced all Smith's papers. By them it appeared, that he was a very inſignificant ſpy, who was always inſiſting in his old ſtrain of aſking money, and taking no care to deſerve it.

The earl of Monmouth was, upon the accuſation and evidence above-mentioned, ſent to the Tower, and turned out of all his employments. But the court had no mind to have the matter further examined into; for the king ſpoke to biſhop Burnet, to do all he could to ſoften the earl's cenſure, which he did: the lords were much ſet againſt him, and ſeemed reſolved to go great lengths: to allay that heat, the biſhop, who did not know what new ſcheme of confuſion might have been opened by him, in his own excuſe, put the houſe in mind, that he ſet the revolution on foot, and was a great promoter of it, coming twice over to Holland, to that purpoſe; he then moved, that he might be ſent to the Tower: this was agreed to, and he lay there till the end of the ſeſſion, and was removed from all his places: But that loſs, as was believed, was ſecretly made up to him, for the court was reſolved not to loſe him entirely.

[1697] After Fenwick's buſineſs was over, the parliament, to the great ſatisfaction of the people, took care to remedy a public grievance of long ſtanding. Several places in and about the city of London, which, in the times of the Romiſh ſuperſtition, were allowed as ſanctuaries to criminals and debtors, had, ever ſince the reformation, pretended a privilege to protect the latter; and one of theſe, called White Friars, was become a notorious receptacle of broken and deſperate men, in the very heart of the metropolis, whither they reſorted in great numbers, and, to the diſhonour of the government, and great prejudice of the people, defended themſelves with force and violence againſt the law and public authority. This intolerable miſchief the parliament redreſſed by 'an act for the more effectual relief of creditors in caſes of eſcapes, and for preventing abuſes in priſons and pretended privileged places;' wherein ſuch effectual proviſion was made to reduce thoſe outlaws, that, immediately after the act was publiſhed, they abandoned their poſts to better inhabitants. An act alſo paſſed for the relief of creditors, by which they were enabled to make compoſitions with their debtors, in caſe two thirds, in number and value, did agree: But this act was repealed the next ſeſſion.

Towards the beginning of this ſeſſion, the commons having taken notice of the late miſcarriages of the fleet, ordered, that ſir George Rooke ſhould attend the houſe, to give an account, why the French Toulon ſquadron was not intercepted in going to Breſt? That admiral attended accordingly, and afterwards produced copies both of his journal, and of the orders, which he had received from the admiralty; which being examined, it was ordered, that ſir Cloudeſly Shovel ſhould lay before the houſe copies of all ſuch orders, as he had received, in order to the joining ſir George Rooke. Which being done, and much time ſpent in both houſes about this affair, it did not appear, that either of theſe admirals had failed in their duty.

On the 16th of April, the king came to the houſe of lords, to put an end to this long ſeſſion, and made the following ſpeech to both houſes.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"HAVING given my aſſent to the ſeveral bills you have preſented to me, I am now to return you my hearty thanks for what you have done this ſeſſion, which has been carried on with great prudence, temper, and affection.

"At the opening of the ſeſſion I told you, how ſenſible I was of the difficulties to be ſtruggled with, which were of ſuch a nature, that I will freely own the hopes, I had of your being able to overcome them, were founded only upon the wiſdom and zeal of ſo good a parliament.

"My expectation has been fully anſwered. You entered upon the buſineſs with ſo much chearfulneſs, proceeded ſo unanimouſly, and have at length brought things to ſuch a concluſion, that we may hope to carry on the war with ſucceſs, in caſe our enemies do not think it their intereſt to agree to an honourable peace. And ſo effectual a proviſion being made for ſupplying the deficiencies of former funds (which is the beſt foundation for re-eſtabliſhing of credit) I doubt not, but, in a ſhort time, it will have a very happy effect, to the univerſal eaſe and ſatisfaction of my people.

"The circumſtances of affairs making it neceſſary for me to be out of the kingdom for ſome time, I ſhall take care to leave the adminiſtration of the government, during my abſence, in the hands of ſuch perſons, as I can depend upon."

My

then mentioned fell out ſo true, that I was ſurpriſed how he could know them, and not more, till I underſtood he had his intelligence from one Hewet, a youth, that lived with major Holmes's brother, I think, and was about that time often employed to wait on ſir George Barclay; by which means he had opportunity to gueſs or over-hear particulars, which otherwiſe, I ſuppoſe, he might not be truſted with. I remember in winter Smith wrote very poſitively of an invaſion intended from France, which was to break out at the arrival of the Toulon fleet; and that many gentlemen of quality and officers were ſent from St. Germain's on that deſign. He named ſir Henry Browne, my lord Montague's brother, at one time; at another ſir George Barclay, Holmes, Counter, and others. Then he gave hints of ſome great deſign, which he ſhould ſoon diſcover the bottom of; and afterwards grew more particular, that it was to ſeize the king's perſon, and named Barclay, Charnock, Holmes, and others, as employed in the villainy; and that, at the ſame hour this was to be executed, there was to be a general riſing in all the counties of England. He was different in his accounts about the manner of ſeizing the king. Sometimes Mr. Lattin's lodge near Richmond was to be attacked, and the walls ſcaled by foot, whilſt he was there. Sometimes an attempt of the like nature was to be made at Kenſington houſe; and at other times the king was to be ſet upon going to, or coming from hunting. Near to the day the aſſaſſination was intended, he was very earneſt for money to buy a horſe and equipage; upon which I deſired Mr. Vernon to talk with him, if he knew of his own knowledge any perſon engaged in ſuch a deſign; for, being never able to bring any thing in confirmation of what he aſſerted, from whom he had it, or what time it was to be executed, I ſuppoſed there was no truth in the ſtory; or, if there were, I might poſſibly have ſet him to be engaged in it. He gave Mr. Vernon no ſatisfaction upon diſcourſing with him, but proceeded in his promiſes to him, that nothing could be attempted, but he would give me an account. When the whole was brought to light, and it appeared he was not enough in the ſecret to have prevented it, I intended notwithſtanding to have done ſomething for him, and at his own deſire concealed his name, to give him an opportunity, as he pretended, to apprehend Chambers. In the mean time I had an account, that in very public places he began to threaten that he would complain of me to the Parliament; whereupon I neither thought it ſafe nor decent to have any more to do with him.

"What I received, relating to an attempt on his majeſty's perſon or the invaſion, I always gave the king an account, whilſt I was able to wait on him; but, being much indiſpoſed, I had his majeſty's leave to go into the country for a few days, where I remained, till I was commanded back, upon the happy diſcovery of that horrid deſign.

"This, my lord, is all I can collect to the ſubject their lordſhips were pleaſed to command. I beg the favour it may be communicated to the houſe, and am, &c."

My lords and gentlemen,

"I Have nothing more to aſk of you, but that you carry down the ſame good diſpoſition into your ſeveral countries, which you have expreſſed in all the proceedings of this ſeſſion."

And then the lord keeper prorogued the parliament to the 13th day of May.

Beſides the acts paſſed this ſeſſion, the commons ſent a bill to the lords, limiting elections to future parliaments, that none ſhould be choſen but thoſe who had ſuch a proportion of eſtate or money; the lords rejected it: They thought it reaſonable to leave the nation to their freedom, in chuſing their repreſentatives in parliament: It ſeemed both unjuſt and cruel, if a poor man had ſo fair a reputation, as to be choſen, notwithſtanding his poverty, by thoſe who were willing to pay him wages, that he ſhould be branded with an incapacity becauſe of his ſmall eſtate. Corruption in elections was to be apprehended from the rich, rather than from the poor. Another bill was ſent up by the commons, but rejected by the lords, prohibiting the importation of all Eaſt-India ſilks, and Bengals: This was propoſed, to encourage the ſilk manufacture at home; and petitions were brought for it by great multitudes, in a very tumultuary way; but the Lords had no regard to that.

The houſe of commons taking offence at an advertiſement in the Flying-poſt, tending to deſtroy the credit and currency of the exchequer bills, that were going to be iſſued out, a bill was brought in by Mr. Pulteney, to prevent the publiſhing any news without licence. This bill, in the heat of their reſentment, was read the firſt time, but thrown out before a ſecond reading; becauſe, though they ſaw the miſchiefs of the liberty of the preſs, they knew not where to fix the reſtraint.

As the time for opening the treaty for a general peace drew near, the king appointed the earl of Pembroke, viſcount Villiers, and ſir Joſeph Williamſon, his plenipotentiaries to treat with France; and, in the earl of Pembroke's abſence, ſir Thomas Mompeſſon, ſir Charles Cotterel, junior, and Mr. James Tyrrel were to execute the office of Privy-ſeal.

The lord Galway (created an earl) the marquis of Wincheſter and viſcount Villiers were made lords Juſtices of Ireland; and Mr. Methuen, chancellor of that kingdom, in the room of ſir Charles Porter, deceaſed.

The king to return the compliment of the ſtate of Venice, appointed the earl of Manchеſter his embaſſador extraordinary to the ſtate. The earl had always appeared zealous in the cauſe of liberty, and had, at his own expence, accompanied the king as a volunteer, with a very handſome retinue into Ireland; and was in the battle of the Boyne, at the ſiege of Limerick, and, after the reduction of Ireland, was made captain of the band of yeoman of the Guards. At the ſame time, ſir James Ruſhout was ſent embaſſador to Turkey, and ſir Lambert Blackwell (knighted on that occaſion) envoy to Tuſcany.

About a month before, the earl of Ayleſbury, who (as ſaid before) was committed to the Tower, on account of the late plot, was brought by Habeas Corpus to the court of King's-Bench, and releaſed upon bail; but the lord Montgomery, committed on the ſame account, was denied that favour and remanded to Newgate.

The lord Berkley, of Stratton, who had ſignalized himſelf in ſeveral enterprizes in the channel, died of a pleuriſy and fever, cauſed by hard drinking, in company with ſeveral other nobles, who had alſo like to have ſuffered by it. Upon the lord Berkley's death, his regiment of marines was given to ſir Cloudeſly Shovel.

The earl of Dorſet reſigned the office of lord Chamberlain, which he enjoyed ever ſince the revolution. He was a generous good natured man. He was ſo oppreſſed with phlegm, that, till he was a little heated with wine, he ſcarce ever ſpoke: But he was, upon that exaltation, a very lively man. Never was ſo much ill nature in a pen, as in his, joined with ſo much good nature, as was in himſelf, even to an exceſs; for he was againſt all puniſhing, even of malefactors. He was bountiful, even to run himſelf into difficulties, and charitable to a fault, for he commonly gave all he had about him, whenever he met an object that moved him. But he was ſo lazy, that though king Charles II. ſeemed to court him to be a favourite, he would not give himſelf the trouble that belonged to that poſt. He hated the court, and deſpiſed that king, when he ſaw he was neither generous, nor tender-hearted. He was ſucceeded in his office by the earl of Sunderland, who was ſoon after ſworn of the privy-council, and was now in as great favour, as he had been in the former reigns.

About the ſame time, the lord-keeper Somers was made lord high-chancellor, and baron of Eveſham in Worceſterſhire.

The ſame day, the king appointed a regency during his abſence [g], and, two days after leaving Kenſington, he embarked, the 26th of April, at Margate for Holland, where he arrived the next day.

The great tranſaction of this year was the treaty of a general peace. The chief of the Engliſh plenipotentiaries was the earl of Pembroke. He was a man of eminent virtue, and of great learning, particularly in the mathematics: this made him a little too ſpeculative and abſtracted in his notions. He had great application, but had lived a little too much out of the world, though in a public ſtation: there was ſomewhat in his perſon and manner that created him an univerſal reſpect, for there was no man whom all ſides honoured ſo much as they did him. In this affair were joined with him the lord Villiers and ſir Joſeph Williamſon, as was before ſaid. The plenipotentiaries, named by France, were Harley, Crecy, and Calliers. The firſt difficulty that aroſe was about the place of Congreſs, the emperor propoſing either Mentz, or Francfort, and the Dutch, with moſt of their allies, inſiſting upon a place in Holland. It was expected, that either Maeſtricht, Nimeguen, or Breda, would have been choſen; but, towards the middle of January, Callieres, by his maſter's orders, moved that the plenipotentiaries of the allies, who were now at the Hague, ſhould reſide there, and thoſe of France at Delft, where they were at this time; and that the conferences ſhould be held at a palace belonging to king William, all which was agreed to. This palace was called Newburg-houſe, becauſe a duke of Newburg laid the firſt ſtone when it was building by Frederic Henry, prince of Orange. No place could be more proper for the purpoſe, being ſituated between the Hague and the Delft, cloſe by the village of Ryſwick.

The French were reſolved to have a peace at any rate; not ſo much on account of the difficulties of carrying on the war, the decay of their trade, and their heavy taxes, but chiefly from another motive. The king of Spain's illneſs, and the ſucceſſion to his dominions, to which the French king had an eye, was the principal cauſe of his deſiring a peace. He knew, that as long as the war continued, and the grand confederacy remained entire, his deſign could not be accompliſhed; and therefore he haſtened the concluſion of the treaty, that he might have his hands free to fall upon Spain, the moment his catholic majeſty died, which he might eaſily do before a new league could be formed againſt him. Accordingly, as the king of Spain's ſickneſs increaſed, the French king offered advantageous terms, giving the Allies more than could be expected, conſidering his conqueſts and force; and would have offered ſtill more, if all the Allies had been of the emperor's mind, to require a greater number of reſtitutions.

The intereſts of the emperor were entirely contrary to thoſe of the French king. He had alſo his eye upon Spain, and therefore it no leſs concerned him, that the confederacy ſhould remain, than it did the French king, that it ſhould be broken. Beſides, the emperor had the more reaſon to excite the confederates to purſue the war, as he hoped to be ſoon able to turn more forces againſt France. For he was going to conclude a league with Muſcovy, by which the Czar was obliged to make war with all his force againſt the Turks, and Tartars. He alſo hoped to have a king of Poland of his party, who might annoy the Turks in ſuch a manner, as to force him to a peace. The negotiation of the ſix circles of the Rhine, to have ſix thouſand, and, in caſe of need, twelve thouſand men on foot, was likewiſe in great forwardneſs. For theſe reaſons the emperor was entirely againſt a peace, and did all he could to retard it.

As for England and Holland, they had no other concern in the treaty, but to ſecure their Allies, to ſettle a barrier in the Netherlands, and to get king Willlam acknowledged. Things being [g] The regents were the archbiſhop of Canterbury, lord chancellor Somers, the earl of Pembroke, the duke of Devonſhire, the duke of Shrewſbury, the earl of Dorſet, the earl of Romney, the earl of Sunderland, and admiral Edward Ruſſel, for whom a patent was preparing to create him baron of Shingey, viſcount Barfleur in Normandy, and earl of Orford, which was accordingly done the 6th of May.

being in this ſtate, after ſeveral debates, the French plenipotentiary Callieres, on the 10th of February, in the name of his maſter, conſented to the following preliminaries:

I. That the treaties of Weſtphalia and Nimeguen ſhould be the baſis of this to be negotiated at Ryſwick.

II. That Straſburg ſhould be reſtored to the empire, in the ſame condition, as the French took it. (But here Borcel and Dychvelt, the Dutch plenipotentiaries, declared to the Mediator, before Callieres, that, whenever the reſtitution of Straſburg was talked of, it was alſo added, 'or an equivalent at the emperor's choice.')

III. That Luxemburg ſhould be reſtored to the Spaniards in its preſent condition. (So likewiſe it was here declared in the ſame manner, 'or an equivalent to be propoſed by Spain to the king of France.')

IV. That Mons and Charleroy ſhould be ſurrendered as they were.

V. That all places taken by the French in Catalonia, ſince the peace of Nimeguen, ſhould be reſtored in the ſame manner.

VI. That Dinant, both the city and caſtle ſhould be given up to the biſhop of Liege, as they were when taken.

VII. That all reunions, ſince the treaty of Nimeguen, ſhould be made void.

VIII. That Lorrain ſhould be reſtored according to the conditions of that treaty; but farther agreed, that in caſe the conditions made in reſpect to that country ſhould not pleaſe, that article ſhould be referred to the general treaty, and that it ſhould be the firſt point debated in the negotiation. Here it was likewiſe farther agreed, that upon concluſion of the peace, the French king ſhould acknowledge the prince of Orange as king of Great-Britain, without any manner of difficulty, reſtriction, condition, or reſerve; but as for other princes, whether they were in the confederacy or not, their pretenſions ſhould be reſerved to the general negotiation under the mediation of the king of Sweden [h].

Some of the miniſters of the Allies, after having conſulted their maſters upon theſe preliminaries, declared, that, as to the firſt article, they fully agreed to it; but, as for Straſburg, they farther inſiſted, that it ſhould be reſtored, with it's fortifications and dependencies, and that no equivalent ſhould be accepted. They allowed of the third, fourth, and fifth articles; only they inſiſted, that not only the city but the county of Luxemburg, and that of Chinay ſhould be given up; as they likewiſe did, that the city and caſtle of Dinant ſhould be yielded, together with the duchy of Bouillon, in the ſame ſtate they were. They owned themſelves alſo ſatisfied as to the ſeventh article concerning the re-unions, but not ſo with the agreement made about Lorrain, which they would have reſtored to the duke it's ſovereign, without any manner of reſtriction.

Before any farther progreſs was made in the treaty, Charles XI, king of Sweden, who had been received as mediator, happened to die [i]. His ſon, the famous Charles XII, who ſucceeded him in his throne, was but fifteen years old, and gave great hopes of being an active, warlike, and indefatigable prince, which his reign did afterwards demonſtrate to the world. This accident was like to retard the negotiations, but, the deceaſed king having appointed by his will the queen and five of the ſenators to adminiſter the government during his ſon's minority, the regents, among whom the queen had two voices, and who had full power to make treaties, and to perform all other acts of ſovereignty, as ſhould be agreed on by the major part of them, ſent immediately expreſſes to ſeveral foreign courts, to acquaint them with their intentions to purſue the mediation begun by the late king for the tranquillity of Chriſtendom; and diſpatched a new commiſſion to monſieur Lillienroot for that purpoſe. Some time before it was agreed by the plenipotentiaries at the Hague, that for the eaſier carrying on the treaty, all ceremonies ſhould be laid aſide; and the titles, which any prince took, be of no conſequence: That the ſeveral miniſters ſhould have free and ſecure correſpondence with the princes their maſters: That in order to this, blank paſſports ſhould be given to each party for the couriers diſpatched by them, as alſo for the pacquet-boats to and from England: And that the powers of the reſpective plenipotentiaries ſhould be on the ſame foot they were at Nimeguen.

In purſuance of the preliminaries, monſieur Lillienroot, the mediator, appointed the firſt conference to be held at Ryſwick, on the 9th of May; and accordingly the Allies being met together in the apartments on one ſide of the palace, the French in the apartments on the other ſide, and the mediator in the middle between both, the Allies and the French ſhewed him their powers, and gave him copies of the ſame, which he communicated to the reſpective miniſters, and left the copies with them. This, and the ſettling part of the ceremonial in order to further proceedings, took up near three hours; and then the conference was adjourned to the 11th of the ſame month; when, being met again in the ſame manner as they did at firſt, the powers of the Allies were by the mediator exchanged with the French embaſſadors. Beſides, they agreed to meet conſtantly on Wedneſdays in the morning, and Saturdays in the afternoon; and that, to prevent inconveniencies, which might ariſe from crowds of attendants, each embaſſador ſhould go thither only with one coach and ſix horſes, two pages, and two footmen. On the 15th and 18th, the mediator and plenipotentiaries met again; but all they did at thoſe two conferences was only to regulate ſeveral points of ceremony; in which, for the moſt part, they followed the rules, that were obſerved at the treaty of Nimeguen.

On the 22d of May, the Imperial plenipotentiaries delivered to the mediator their demands in the name of the emperor and empire; and ſome of the German miniſters, at the ſame time, gave in the particular pretenſions of the princes their maſters. After which the Allies drew up a large deduction in juſtification of their claims; of which however they reſolved to give the French embaſſadors no copy, till they had received the king's orders to propoſe theirs. But, the French plenipotentiaries having declared, that they had nothing to aſk or pretend to, and that they were ready to anſwer the others, the Allies changed their minds; and the French, in the mean while, had ſeveral ſeparate conferences with the Dutch about commerce and a ceſſation of arms.

[h] The other preliminaries were:

IX. That the duchy of Deux-ponts ſhould be reſtored to Sweden.
X. That Philipſburg ſhould be given up to the biſhop of Spire.
XI. That the fort of Kiel, and other fortifications made on the Rhine, ſhould be razed.
XII. That the ſame ſhould be done by fort Louis and Hunninghen.
XIII. That Traerback and Montroyal ſhould be given up; the firſt diſmantled, but upon condition never to be fortified again.
XIV. That the elector Palatine ſhould not only be reſtored to all the electorate, but alſo to the duchies of Simmeren and Lauthern, with the earldom of Manheim; as alſo other places, whereof he had been diſpoſſeſſed to the preſent time.
XV. That the ducheſs of Orleans ſhould not have recourſe to open force to maintain her pretenſions, but might bring her action according to law, in relation to the elector.
XVI. That the caſtle and county of Veldens ſhould be reſtored to their lawful owner.
XVII. That Biſweiler ſhould be given to the count of Hanaw.
XVIII. That the ſeignories of March, Mormoſy, and Dagſtein, and the county of Dagſburg, ſhould be delivered up to the count of Overſtein.
XIX. That the ſeignories of Salms and Valkenſtein ſhould be given up to the prince of Salms, or to their proprietors, ſeeing the ſame was ſtill in queſtion.
XX. That the ſeignories of Lutzenſtein and Altheim ſhould be ſurrendered to their owners.
XXI. That Tweibes ſhould be given up to the houſe of Naſſau.
XXII. That the city and county of Montbeilliard, Harcourt, Bainnont, and Chattelette ſhould be put into the poſſeſſion of the houſe of Wirtemberg.
XXIII. That Germeſheim ſhould be given up to the elector Palatine, notwithſtanding any former treaties to the contrary.
XXIV. That the principality of Orange ſhould be given up to it's ſovereign.

[i] He was a rough and boiſterous man; he loved fatigue, and was free from vice; he reduced his kingdom to a military ſtate, and was ever going round it, to ſee how his troops were ordered, and his diſcipline obſerved; He looked narrowly into the whole adminiſtration; he had quite altered the conſtitution of his kingdom; it was formerly changed from being an elective, to be an hereditary kingdom, yet, till his time, it had continued to be rather an ariſtocracy, than a monarchy; but he got the power of the ſenators to be quite taken away, ſo that it was left free to him, to make uſe of ſuch counſellors as he ſhould chuſe; the ſenators had enriched themſelves, and oppreſſed the people; they had devoured the revenues of the crown, and in two reigns, in which the ſovereign was long in a ſtate of infancy, both in queen Chriſtina's and in this king's time, the ſenators had taken care of themſelves, and had ſtripped the crown. So the king moved for a general reſumption, and this he obtained eaſily of the ſtates: Who, as they envied the wealth of the ſenators, ſo they hoped that, by making the king rich, the people would be leſs charged with taxes; this was not all, he got likewiſe an act of reviſion, by which thoſe who had grants were to account for the mean profits, and this was applied even to thoſe who had grants upon valuable conſiderations; for, when it appeared that the valuable conſideration was ſatisfied, they were to account for all they had received over and above that, and to repay this, with the intereſt of the money, at 12 per cent. for all the years they had enjoyed it. This brought a great debt on all the ſenators and other families of the kingdom, it did utterly ruin them and left them at mercy, and, when the king took from them all they had, he kept them ſtill in a dependence upon him, giving them employments in the army or militia that he ſet up.

After that, he procured of the ſtates of his kingdom an abſolute authority to govern them as he thought fit, and according to law; but even this limitation ſeemed uneaſy, and their ſlavery was finiſhed by another act, which he obtained, that he ſhould not be obliged to govern by law, but by his meer will and pleaſure: So ſucceſsful was he, in the ſpace of five years, to ruin all the families in his kingdom, and to deſtroy their laws and liberties, and that by their own conſent.

This

This laſt point the French ſeemed very eager for, and the ſame was much preſſed by the mediator, who, upon the Spaniſh miniſters delivering their grievances, declared, that he was of opinion, that nothing could more contribute to the advancement of the peace, than the agreeing on a truce by common conſent; men's minds being ſo much the leſs compoſed, and fit for a calm negotiation, by how much they were elated or depreſſed by the good or bad ſucceſſes of war. Though this motion ſeemed then to be approved by ſilence, yet other things intervened, which cauſed it to be laid aſide. About the ſame time the Brandenburg embaſſadors ſtrongly inſiſted, that all the names of the confederate princes ſhould be expreſſed, and particularly inſerted in the treaty; and ſome of the Allies took it very ill, that the pretenſions of the empire were propoſed by the emperor's embaſſadors only in his Imperial majeſty's name; to ſilence which complaints it was anſwered, that every one of the Allies was free to propoſe ſeparate articles concerning his own affairs. Whereupon ſeveral princes gave in their grievances to their mediator.

The king of France, foreſeeing that the houſe of Auſtria would inſiſt upon the treaty of the Pyrenees, reſolved to make his laſt efforts in Flanders and Catalonia, to reduce the Spaniards to his own terms, and to advance the prince of Conti to the crown of Poland, not doubting but that warlike prince, who both from inclination and gratitude would ever promote the intereſt of France, would ſoon make the emperor more tractable. The French army was very numerous and formidable this year in the Low-countries; and having, beſides, the advantage of being earlier in the field, than the confederates, both by reaſon of the remoteneſs and ſlow march of the German troops and of king William's indiſpoſition, they boaſted of attacking a no leſs conſiderable place than Namur; but, having reflected upon the difficulties of that enterprize, they were contented to open the campaign with the ſiege of Aeth, a place, which the French had yielded to Spain by the treaty of Nimeguen. There were no leſs than three marſhals of France in that army, Villeroy, Bouffiers, and Catinat; but, Catinat being the greateſt general of the three, it was to him the French king gave the direction of the ſiege, and ordered monſieur Vauban to aſſiſt him in it, whilſt Villeroy and Boufflers ſhould obſerve the confederates. Upon intelligence of the French having inveſted Aeth, king William, who by this time was recovered of his late illneſs, immediately repaired to his army in Brabant, and had an interview with the duke of Bavaria, who commanded another army at hand, to join him upon occaſion. But, beſides the great ſuperiority of the French, which would have made the attempt very difficult, king William openly declared, he would not ſacrifice one man for the relief of a place, which the French would be obliged to give up by the peace. It is true, the king might eaſily have laid ſiege to Dinant, while Catinat was beſieging Aeth; but then Bruſſels had been left expoſed to Villeroy and Boufflers, who had a deſign upon that city; but the king, by a very happy diligence, preventing them, poſſeſſed himſelf of an advantageous camp, about three hours before the French could reach it, by which they were wholly diſabled to execute their deſign. As for Aeth, it was ſo vigorouſly preſſed by the beſiegers, and ſo faintly defended by the governor, for the ſame reaſons which induced king William not to attempt it's relief, that it ſurrendered after twelve days of open trenches.

Not many days after the duke of Vendoſme, who commanded the French forces in Catalonia, inveſted Barcelona both by ſea and land, though he had ſcarce men enough to compleat his circumvallation. This gave the beſieged an opportunity to maintain a free communication with the viceroy of Catalonia, who thereupon took the field with a ſmall body of troops, and ſummoned the Miquelets to join him, in order to raiſe the ſiege. Beſides, the place was defended by a numerous garriſon of ten thouſand diſciplined men, and about five thouſand burghers, who had voluntarily taken up arms; and, to uſe all imaginable precautions for the preſervation of that city, the queen of Spain recommended it to a prince of Heſſe d'Armſtadt, who had ſignalized himſelf, not only at the battle of Aghrim in Ireland, but likewiſe on ſeveral other occaſions, and who, upon changing his religion, was now at the head of the German troops that were ſent into Spain. All theſe difficulties made the world believe, that the poſitive orders of the court of France had engaged their general in an enterprize, which would not turn to his honour. People were confirmed in this opinion by the vigorous and well-timed ſallies of the prince of Heſſe, who diſputed every inch of ground with the enemy, and ſo retarded the advancing of their works, that the duke of Vendoſme wrote to the French king, that, unleſs he was ſpeedily reinforced, he ſhould be obliged to abandon the ſiege inglorioufly. Upon this the French king ordered all the troops in Provence and Languedoc to march that way with all expedition; and, theſe ſuccours arriving in time, the French made a great attack, which laſted from twelve at night till three the next morning. They endeavoured three ſeveral times to paſs the paliſſadoes; but the beſieged repulſed them as often ſword in hand, and purſued them a good way. Had the prince of Heſſe been ſeconded by Don Franciſco de Valeſco, the viceroy, the ſiege had certainly been raiſed; but the viceroy (whether by a fate common to all the Spaniards, or from a jealouſy, that the whole honour would accrue to a ſtranger, if the place ſhould hold out) ſo entirely neglected to do his part, that he was ſurprized, and his ſmall army routed. The French, flushed with this ſucceſs, attacked the outworks, which they had been battering a long while with a great many cannon. This diſpute was obſtinate, and maintained with great courage and reſolution on both ſides; but at laſt the French, by the ſuperiority of their numbers, made themſelves maſters of the covered-way, and afterwards advanced to the attack of two baſtions, which, after having been twice taken and retaken, one of them remained in the poſſeſſion of the aſſailants. The next day, the beſieged endeavoured to recover the baſtion of San Pedro they had loſt, which occaſioned a ſharp encounter. The French were twice beaten from their poſt, but at laſt lodged themſelves again; and, about the ſame time, the enemy ſprung a mine under the baſtion of Portal Nuova with ſo good ſucceſs, that after ſeveral attacks they lodged themſelves there likewiſe. Upon theſe baſtions the duke of Vendoſme raiſed great batteries both of cannon and mortars, from which he fired ſo furiouſly upon the town, that he judged it could not hold out much longer. His conjecture proved true, for though the prince of Heſſe ſtill maintained himſelf on part of thoſe baſtions, and was reſolved to expect the laſt extremity in the caſtle; yet, the court being unwilling to ſuffer that city to be entirely ruined by the enemy, ſince, in all probability, it would ſoon be reſtored by the peace, orders were diſpatched to the prince to capitulate, which he did on very honourable conditions, after nine weeks vigorous reſiſtance; ſo that it remains undecided, whether the duke of Vendoſme gained more glory by taking, than the prince of Heſſe did by defending this place; for which ſervice he was, not long after, made viceroy of Catalonia. By this the French gained a great point. Hitherto the Spaniards, who contributed the leaſt towards carrying on the war, were the moſt backward to all overtures of peace. They had felt little of the miſeries of war, and thought themſelves out of it's reach. But now, France being maſter of ſo important a place as Barcelona, which cut off all their communication with Italy, they became as earneſt for peace, as they had before been averſe to it.

Nor was this all their danger: For monſieur de Pointis, having fitted out a ſquadron of men of war, at the charge of a company, erected by the French king's permiſſion, in order to ſeize the Spaniſh plate-fleet, in the Weſt-Indies, ſet ſail from Breſt (though at that time a ſtrong Engliſh fleet was cruizing off that place) towards the beginning of this year, and in fifty-five days arrived before St. Domingo. Here he was conſiderably reinforced, and being alſo joined by the buccaniers and freebooters in theſe parts, and finding that the galleons were already got to the Havanna, where he could not attack them, he proceeded to put his deſign upon Carthagena in execution. He received no ſmall aſſiſtance in this project from one Venner, an Engliſhman, who had ſerved the Spaniards many years, and who drew for him ſeveral plans of that town; by which Pointis judged, that there was a neceſſity of poſſeſſing himſelf, upon his firſt arrival, of a conſiderable poſt, called 'Noſtra Signora de la Papa;' otherwiſe the Spaniards would have an opportunity to carry off whatever they were deſirous to ſave. In order to this, Pointis, after concerting proper meaſures, went in a canoe to find a proper place for landing the men; but, to his ſurprize, the ſea ran ſo high, though the weather was calm, that there was no poſſibility of landing the boats; and was, himſelf, like to be drowned. Hence he learned, which was confirmed by the relation of the inhabitants, that the ſea, upon all this coaſt, in all ſeaſons, is a natural, invincible rampart; and that Carthagena is approachable only by the lake, which makes the harbour. Finding this attempt impracticable, he bent his efforts againſt the fort of Bocca Chica; of which, in a ſhort time, he made himſelf maſter, notwithanding the difficulties of approaching it, and the cowardice of the buccaniers in his ſervice. The taking of this fort was ſoon followed by the ſurrender of that of St. Lazar; after which Carthagena itſelf was inveſted, both by ſea and land. The place was attacked and defended with a great deal of vigour; but, the Spaniſh ſuccours not coming in time, and all things being now ready for an aſſault, the garriſon thought fit to agree to a capitulation, whereby they were to march out through the breach with all the uſual marks of honour, and four pieces of cannon; but, for the reſt, that all ſilver without reſerve, ſhould belong to the conqueror; and that ſuch of the inhabitants, as ſtaid behind, ſhould enjoy all they had, excepting their plate.

In purſuance of theſe articles the governor marched out of Carthagena, and Pointis entered it; but though Pointis, according to the agreement, was to have all the ſilver, how to come at it, was no ſmall difficulty. At laſt he bethought himſelf of an expedient, ordering it to be publiſhed, that he would give the tenth to the proprietors of whatſoever they honeſtly brought him and a tenth to them, who ſhould inform him of any perſons, that concealed their effects; to which he added his threats of immediate puniſhment on thoſe who diſobeyed; which had the deſired effect upon the generality of the people. Neither were the churches and religious houſes ſpared, being robbed and rifled of ſeveral maſſy images of gold and ſilver, and other rich ornaments; though, after all, the booty fell much ſhort of Pointis's expectation; for, the town having taken the alarm, before his arrival, all the women of any quality, with their jewels, the nuns, and an hundred and ten mules laden with gold, were gone a great way out of his reach; and how baſely ſoever the buccaniers had ſerved him in the expedition, they had their aſſigned proportion of the ſpoil, with which, nevertheleſs, ſome of them were not ſatisfied [k]. Though the riches had been thus ſent away, they gave it out, that they had found many millions of crowns there, which, at firſt, ſeemed incredible, and was afterwards known to be falſe; yet it was confidently aſſerted, at that time, to cover the reproach of having miſcarried in the attempt, on which they had raiſed great expectations, and to which many undertakers had been drawn in.

The French, not thinking it adviſeable or poſſible to keep this place in their hands, ruined the fort of Bocca Chica, and put out to ſea, ſtanding for Cape Tuberon; when an advice-boat from Petit Guaves informed them, that thirteen Engliſh men of war were arrived at Barbadoes, to look after them. This made Pointis alter his courſe for the ſtreights of Bahama till ſix at night, when he fell in with the Engliſh, who proved to be much ſtronger than he was informed, and who preſently took one of his fly-boats, on board of which there was a conſiderable quantity of ammunition and proviſion. While this was doing, half the Engliſh fleet, which were got within reach of the enemy, ſeemed to decline fighting, till the reſt, to the leeward, could come to the action; which gave the French an opportunity of getting before them. On the other hand, the advanced part of the Engliſh fleet having got the windward of the French, and within leſs than cannon ſhot, Pointis, who ſaw the neceſſity of fighting, gave the ſignal for the engagement. But the Engliſh admiral, Nevill, reckoning there was no ſafety for the French, but to go before the wind for the ſtreights of Bahama, ſlackened his way, propoſing to get ſo much a-head of them, as to hinder their paſſage. Upon this the French, at the cloſing of the night, tacked about, and found the ſucceſs of their working the next day, for they could reckon no more than fourteen ſhips following them in a line, and thoſe not ſo nigh by far as the day before; which made the French continue the ſame road till they got within twenty leagues of Carthagena, and the next day got clear of the Engliſh fleet.

Having made ſo narrow an eſcape, the French ſailed for Newfoundland, and watered at Conception-Bay. From hence they ſteered their courſe to that of St. John's, where lay a ſquadron of Engliſh ſhips, under commodore Norris, which was ſent with ſome land forces to recover Hudſon's-Bay. Theſe ſhips might have fallen upon the French, and would probably have maſtered them, as they were now extremely weakened by ſickneſs. But, as Norris had no certain account of their ſtrength, and being ordered upon another ſervice, he did not think proper to hazard the attacking them; ſo they eſcaped this ſecond danger, as they did afterwards a third from ſix Engliſh men of war, that attacked them in their paſſage from thence into France, where they arrived on the 19th of Auguſt. This was, as they confeſſed, more than themſelves could have expected, conſidering the diſtreſs they were reduced to. On the other hand, not only admiral Nevill died in the Weſt-Indies, but moſt of the other commanders; ſo that of all the captains, who went out, only one returned; and ſuch a mortality had raged among the ſeamen, that there were ſcarce ſailors ſufficient to bring home the ſhips; and, as this ſquadron in the bay of Mexico did very little ſervice, except robbing and deſtroying ſome of the French colonies, ſo that, ſent to Hudſon's Bay found it quite abandoned by the French; ſo that both returned home inglorious.

Theſe things occaſioned the conduct of our affairs at ſea to be much cenſured: However, our admiralty declared themſelves ſatisfied with the account, which the commanders gave of their proceedings. But that board was accuſed of much partiality. On all ſuch occaſions the unfortunate muſt expect to be blamed, and, to outward appearance, there was much room given, either to cenſure the orders, or the execution of them. The king, indeed, owned, that he did not underſtand thoſe matters; and admiral Ruſſel, now made earl of Orford, had both the admiralty and the navy board in great dependance on himſelf; ſo that he was conſidered almoſt as much, as if he had been lord high-admiral. He was too much in the power of thoſe, in whom he confided, and truſted them too far; and it was generally believed, that there was much corruption, as it was certain there was much faction, if not treachery, in the conduct of the marine. Our miſcarriages made people cry, that we muſt have a peace, for we could not manage the war to any good purpoſe; ſince, notwithſtanding our great ſuperiority at ſea, the French conducted their matters ſo much better than we, that we were loſers, even in that element, where we uſed to triumph moſt.

The ſucceſſes of the French in Flanders, Catalonia, and the Weſt-Indies, would in all probability have made them ſole maſters of the peace, and given their embaſſadors a fair occaſion to ſpeak the language of Nimeguen, had not their expectations from Poland been miſerably diſappointed, where a great change of affairs had happened this year. Their king John Sobieſki, after he had long outlived the fame he had got, by raiſing the ſiege of Vienna, died at laſt under a general contempt. He was going backwards and forwards, as his queen's negotiations in the court of France were entertained or rejected: His government was ſo feeble and diſjointed at home, that all their dyets broke up upon preliminaries, before they could, according to their forms, enter upon buſineſs: He was ſet on heaping up wealth, which ſeemed neceſſary to give his ſon an intereſt in the ſucceeding election. And indeed, upon his death, a great party appeared for the prince, notwithſtanding the general averſion to the matter; ſo that he was thought to be the only competitor, that could oppoſe the prince of Conti's advancement to the throne. But the Abbé Polignac, who managed the French king's affairs in Poland, confidently aſſured him, that the prince of Conti would certainly carry the election, if he would but come thither in perſon, and ſend him a ſufficient ſum of money to bribe ſome Palatines, who oppoſed the French intereſt. Upon this encouragement Conti ſet out for Poland; and great remittances were made to the Abbé Polignac, which he laviſhed away with much oſtentation. The Poliſh nobility had reſolved to make no haſte with the election, and plainly ſet the crown to ſale, encouraging all candidates who would bid for it. Their primate, then a cardinal, was the head of the prince of Conti's party, while the emperor did all he could to ſupport the late king's ſon. But when he ſaw, that the French party was too ſtrong for him, he was willing to join with any other candidate. The duke of Lorrain, the prince of Baden, and Don Livio Odeſchalchi, pope Innocent's nephew, were all named; but, theſe being not likely to ſucceed, a negotiation was ſecretly managed with the elector of Saxony, which ſucceeded ſo well, that he was prevailed on to change his religion, to advance his troops to the frontiers of Poland, to diſtribute eight millions of florins among the Poles, and to promiſe to confirm all their privileges, and, in particular, to undertake the ſiege of Camenieck. He conſented to all this, and, at a time when he was not at all ſuſpected of having any thoughts of the crown of Poland, took a journey in the end of the ſpring to Vienna, under the pretence of ſettling matters in relation to the campaign in Hungary, where it was given out he would command the Imperial army again this ſummer. But the event ſhewed, what his real deſign was, though it was carried on with great ſecrecy and addreſs; for all of a ſudden he left Vienna, and this was attended with various reports induſtriouſly ſpread abroad of ſome miſunderſtanding between the emperor and him, of which nobody could aſſign a cauſe. But, when peo-

[k] Pointis ſays, in his account, that they got eight millions of crowns; and the king of France allowed a tenth of the firſt million, and a thirtieth of all the reſt; ſo, of the eight millions, the ſhare of the buccaniers did not amount to above forty thouſand; whereas they expected that the whole eight millions ſhould have been divided but into four parts, and they to have had one, as being a fourth of the army. ple ſaw the elector aſſemble a body of his troops, they entertained ſeveral ſuſpicions; and the Brandenburgers ſo far took the alarm, as immediately to gather all the forces they could, to oppoſe any attempt, that might be made that way. The elector's ſudden march towards Silefia and the frontiers of Poland, quickly occaſioned other ſpeculations; and he declared himſelf a candidate a very few days before the election, being ſupported by the Imperialiſts in oppoſition to the French party. His party became quickly ſo ſtrong, that though, upon the firſt appearance at the election, while every one of the competitors was trying his ſtrength, the French party was the ſtrongeſt, and was ſo declared by the cardinal primate, yet, when the other candidates ſaw, that they could not carry the election for themſelves, they united in oppoſition to the French intereſt, and gave over all their voices to the elector of Saxony, by which his party became much the ſtrongeſt, and he was proclaimed the elected king. The cardinal gave notice to the court of France of what had been done in favour of the prince of Conti, and deſired, that he might be ſent quickly thither, well furniſhed with arms and ammunition, but chiefly with money. But the party for the elector of Saxony made more diſpatch; he lay nearer, and had both his money and troops ready; ſo he took the oaths, that were required, and got the change of his religion atteſted by the Imperial court. He made all the haſte he could with his army to Cracow, and was ſoon afterwards crowned, to the great joy of the Imperial party, but the inexpreſſible trouble of all his ſubjects in Saxony. The ſecular men there ſaw, that the ſupporting this elective crown would ruin his hereditary dominions; and thoſe who laid the concerns of the proteſtant religion to heart, were much more troubled, when they ſaw that houſe, under whoſe protection their religion grew up at firſt, now fall off to popery. It is true, the preſent family, ever ſince Maurice's time, had ſhewn very little zeal in that cauſe. The elected king had ſo ſmall a ſhare of religion in himſelf, that little was to be expected from him; nor was it much apprehended that he would become a bigot, or turn a perſecutor. But ſuch was the eagerneſs of the popiſh clergy toward the ſuppreſſing what they call hereſy, and the perpetual jealouſies, with which they would therefore poſſeſs the Poles, were like to be ſuch, in caſe he uſed no violence towards his Saxon ſubjects, as poſſibly might have great effects on him; ſo that it was no wonder, if they were ſtruck with a general conſternation upon his revolt. His electreſs, though a very young perſon, deſcended of the houſe of Brandenburg, expreſſed ſo extraordinary a meaſure of zeal and piety upon this occaſion, that it contributed much to the preſent quieting of their fears. The new king ſent a popiſh Stadtholder to Dreſden, but ſo weak a man, that there was no reaſon to apprehend much from any conduct of his. He alſo ſent them all the aſſurances, that could be given in words, that he would make no change among them.

A very unuſual accident happened at this time, which ſerved not a little to his quiet eſtabliſhment on the throne of Poland. The Muſcovites, after they had been for ſome years under the divided monarchy of two brothers, or rather, of a ſiſter who governed in their names, by the death of one of the brothers, came under one Czar. He entered into an alliance with the emperor, againſt the Turks; and Azoph, which was reckoned a ſtrong place, and commanded then the mouth of the Tanais or Donne, where it falls into the Palus Meotis, after a long ſiege was taken by his army. This opened the Euxine ſea to him, ſo that, in caſe he was furniſhed with men ſkilled in the building and ſailing of ſhips, it appeared, that this might have conſequences, that would very much diſtreſs Conſtantinople; and, in the end prove fatal to that empire. This was the ſtate of the affairs of Peter I, Czar of Muſcovy, when, being ſenſible of the defects of his education, he reſolved in order to correct them, and to qualify himſelf for the great deſigns he was projecting, to go into the world, and be better informed. He intended to make a navigable canal between the Valga and the Tanais, by which he might carry both materials and proviſions for a fleet to Azoph; and, when that communication was opened, he apprehended, that great things might be done afterwards. He therefore intended to ſee the fleets of Holland and England, and to make himſelf as much maſter of that matter as his genius could riſe to. He ſent an embaſſy to Holland to regulate ſome matters of commerce, and to ſee if they would aſſiſt him in the war, which he was deſigning againſt the Turk. When the embaſſadors were ſet out, he ſettled his affairs in ſuch hands, as he truſted to, and with a ſmall retinue of two or three ſervants ſecretly followed his embaſſadors, and quickly overtook them. He diſcovered himſelf firſt to the elector of Brandenburg, who was then in Pruſſia, looking on the diſpute, that was like to ariſe in Poland, in which, if a war ſhould follow, he might be forced to have a ſhare. The Czar intereſted himſelf greatly in the matter, not only by reaſon of the neighbourhood, but becauſe he feared, that, if the French party ſhould prevail, France being in an alliance with the Turk, a king ſent from thence would probably not only make a peace with the Turk, but turn his arms againſt himſelf, which would hinder all his deſigns for a great fleet. The French party was ſtrongeſt in Lithuania; therefore the Czar ſent orders to his general, to bring a great army to the frontier of that Duchy, to be ready to break into it, if a war ſhould begin in Poland; and it was ſaid, that the terror of this had a great effect. From Pruſſia the Czar went into Holland, where, after his embaſſadors had been admitted to an audience with the States-General at the Hague, they had one of king William at Utrecht; which being over, the King and the Czar met in a ſmall gallery, into which they entered both at the ſame time out of the adjoining rooms, and had a long conference about the poſture of affairs, wherein the Czar highly applauded the king's indefatigable endeavours, and conſtant aim to reduce France within its antient limits.

From Holland the Czar went over the next winter to England, where he ſtaid ſeveral months. Biſhop Burnet waited often on him; and was ordered, both by the king and the archbiſhop and biſhops, to attend him, and offer him ſuch informations of our religion and conſtitution, as he was willing to receive. As the biſhop had good interpreters, he had much free diſcourſe with him. He found him a man of a very hot temper, ſoon inflamed, and very brutal in his paſſion. He raiſed his natural heat by drinking much brandy, which he rectified himſelf with great application. He was ſubject to convulſive motions all over his body, with which his head ſeemed to be affected. He wanted not capacity, and had a larger ſhare of knowledge than might be expected from his education, which was but indifferent. A want of judgment, with an inſtability of temper, appeared in him too often and too evidently. He was mechanically turned, and ſeemed deſigned by nature rather to be a ſhip-carpenter than a great prince. This was his chief ſtudy and exerciſe, while he ſtaid in England. He wrought much with his own hands, and made all about him work at the models of ſhips. He told the biſhop, he deſigned a great fleet at Azoph to attack the Turkiſh empire; but he did not then ſeem capable of ſo great a deſign, though his conduct afterwards, in his wars, diſcovered a greater genius in him than appeared at this time. He was deſirous to underſtand our religion, but he did not ſeem diſpoſed to mend matters in Muſcovy. He was indeed reſolved to encourage learning, and to poliſh his people, by ſending ſome of them to travel into other countries, and to draw ſtrangers to come and live among them. How far this character ſuited him will appear, when his actions come in courſe to be mentioned.

From England he went to Vienna, where he purpoſed to have ſtaid ſome time, but was called home, ſooner than he had intended, upon a diſcovery, or a ſuſpicion, of intrigues managed by his ſiſter; but the ſtrangers, to whom he truſted moſt, were ſo true to him, that thoſe deſigns were cruſhed before he came back. But on this occaſion he let looſe his natural fury on all whom he ſuſpected. Some hundreds were hanged all round Moſcow; and it was ſaid, that he cut off many heads with his own hand; and ſo far was he from relenting or ſhewing any tenderneſs, that he ſeemed delighted with it. But, after this digreſſion, it is time to return to the election of Poland.

A fleet was ordered at Dunkirk to carry the prince of Conti to Poland; but an Engliſh ſquadron which lay before that port, kept him in for ſome time. At laſt he got out, and ſailed to Dantzick; but that city had declared for the new king, and therefore would not ſuffer him to land with all thoſe, who came with him, and only conſented to ſuffer himſelf to land with a ſmall retinue. This he thought would not become him; and therefore landed at Marienburg, where he was met by ſome of the chief of his party, who preſſed him to diſtribute the money, which he had brought from France, among them, and promiſed to return quickly to him with a great force. But he was limited by his inſtructions, and would ſee a good force, before he would part with his treaſure. The new king ſent ſome troops to diſperſe thoſe who were coming together to ſerve him; and theſe had once almoſt ſeized on the prince himſelf. But he acted after that with great caution, and would not truſt the Poles. He ſaw no appearance of any force like to be brought to him, equal to the undertaking; and fearing, leſt, if he ſhould ſtay too long, he might be frozen up in the Baltic, he came back to Dunkirk. Notwithanding this, the cardinal primate ſtood out ſtill. The court of Rome rejoiced at the pretended converſion of the new king, and owned him; but he quickly ſaw ſuch a ſcene of difficulties, that he had reaſon to repent his embarking himſelf in ſuch a dangerous undertaking. However, his election had ſome influence in diſpoſing the French now to be more earneſt for a peace; for, if they had got a king of Poland in their dependence, that would have given them a great intereſt in the northern parts, with an eaſier acceſs, both to aſſiſt the Turks and the malecontents in Hungary.

The news of this election was no ſmall mortification to the French plenipotentiaries at Ryſwick. But the treaty went on, and the French, who had daily conferences with the miniſters of the ſtates-general and others of the Allies, renewed their offer of an equivalent for Luxemburg and Straſburg, which the Imperial and Spaniſh embaſſadors ſtill rejected. About this time, the Dutch plenipotentiaries complained aloud, and with ſome ſort of indignation, of an unjuſt and falſe report, as if their maſters had underhand concluded a peace with France; and, the better to prove their ſincerity, they openly diſſuaded the miniſters of the Allies from conſenting to a truce. To this, however, the miniſters were of themſelves ſufficiently averſe, eſpecially ſince the French had rejected the pretenſions of the Imperialiſts, and Spaniards, being unwilling to anſwer them before the confederates gave their opinions concerning the propoſal, which France had made, that the plenipotentiaries of the Allies ſhould treat on the foundation laid on the 10th of February laſt, and advance no other points, beſides thoſe, that had already been mentioned. The Imperialiſts made anſwer, 'that theſe articles were but preliminary ones, and not abſolute: and that they were allowed of with this condition only, that, in caſe any point were found to be imperfect or faulty, the ſame ſhould be amended by the ſucceeding treaties; and that they were deſirous to know the anſwer of the French as to every point propoſed by the emperor and his Allies. The Spaniards were of opinion, that they ought to keep cloſe to the points, that had been once agreed on; and that to do otherwiſe would only retard the negotiation: That, ſeeing the firſt preliminary point imported, that the treaties of Weſtphalia and Nimeguen ſhould be the baſis of this negotiation, according to the expreſs conſent of the king of France, it was conſequently very evident, that thoſe preliminary poſitions could not be the foundation of all pretenſions, that the allies could have upon France. That, if the preceding treaties had no effect at all, it was to no purpoſe, that they had made choice of a place to confer in; that the mediation of the king of Sweden had been deſired; and that paſſports had been granted. Upon this the French embaſſadors diſpatched a courier to their maſter, on whoſe part the propoſitions of a truce and a free trade were again offered, as being the firſt ſtep towards a peace. But, theſe being ſtill rejected, they now replied to the anſwers made by the Imperialiſts and Spaniards, that they were ſo ſtrictly limited to their inſtructions, that they durſt not exceed or change any thing from the treaty of Nimeguen, as the baſis propoſed by the king their maſter; and that conſequently it was in vain for the allies to require any thing beyond the articles of that treaty. This reply was far from ſatisfying the allies, who gave the French to underſtand by the mediator, that, their laſt declaration being directly contrary to what had been fully regulated, and abſolutely agreed on in the preliminaries, it could have no other tendency, that to break off the treaty, or at leaſt to draw it into length. The mediator himſelf being of the ſame opinion, he laid the full pretenſions of the allies before the French plenipotentiaries, who gave him for anſwer, that the retarding the negotiation ought with more reaſon to be charged upon the allies, the laſt inſtrument, that had been preſented on the emperor's part, being conceived in ſuch articles, which they foreſaw France neither could nor ought to accept; and that the Spaniards, propoſing the Pyrenean treaty for the baſis of this, made the French inſiſt upon that of Nimeguen. To this the mediator replied, That he could not believe, that his moſt chriſtian majeſty was offended, that all the allies had joined together in the laſt anſwer, ſince that affair was common to them all: That they were of opinion, that France would have declared the ſame thing, were ſhe in the ſame condition, Spain found herſelf in, namely, that the peace of the Pyrenees ſhould be renewed in it's full force. At the ſame time the allies offered it as their opinion, that, for the avoiding of theſe difficulties and diſputes, the French ſhould anſwer each of their propoſitions apart; which was at length agreed to.

The laſt inſtruments preſented by the Imperialiſts were not pleaſing to divers of the Allies, who pretended, that they had other juſt complaints to make againſt France, in order to redreſs. The elector of Hanover's plenipotentiary inſiſting, that he ought to have a place in the aſſembly, as an electoral miniſter, occaſioned alſo ſome diſputes; which being left to the deciſion of the mediator, he gave it in favour of that plenipotentiary. Soon after the Imperialiſts and the French gave in, reſpectively, their projects of peace; but, all the articles of the French being drawn, word for word, from the treaty of Nimeguen, the ſame were rejected by the Allies, as being too oppoſite to the intereſt of the empire; and, becauſe there was often mention made of the Allies of France, it being well known, that ſhe had none in the war, unleſs the Turks were meant by it; it was inſiſted upon, that the French ſhould more fully explain themſelves, and give in a clearer plan. On the other hand, the French, in the beginning of July, required the mediator to exhort the Allies to avoid delays, and apply themſelves effectually to the terminating this tedious work. To this the mediator anſwered, That he did not ſee how the Allies retarded the moving of thoſe obſtacles that lay in the way; but that theſe delays were occaſioned by the French themſelves, in ſending thoſe points, that were undecided to Paris, in order to conſult their maſter thereon. That the ſincere intentions of the Allies were manifeſted from their having deſired, that other extraordinary days ſhould be appointed to hold their conferences, which the French, on their part, had declined; and that the Allies were not ignorant of the deſigns of the French court, who had nothing in view but the treaty of Nimeguen. As ſoon as the mediator had given an account of all this to the Allies, they reſolved to conſult together daily, in order to find out a way to ſhorten their buſineſs; and, in the firſt conference, it was concluded, that the French ſhould anſwer to every point in difference, as propoſed by the Allies; which, when the others came to know, they deſired to be informed, according to what manner the allies were willing to decide the firſt point, to the end that, having once ſeen the beginning of the treaty, they might be able to conjecture whether they had power enough to treat and conclude, without any further orders from their maſter. But the French, at the next meeting, inſiſted, that nothing could add a greater weight to this buſineſs, than to treat according to the peace of Nimeguen, and to change ſome articles therein, when there ſhould be occaſion. The mediator, at the requeſt of the allies, replied, That they were not to treat according to the treaty of Nimeguen only, but alſo according to that of Weſtphalia, ſince both together had been reciprocally propoſed and accepted of in the preliminaries; and that, conſequently, the allies required, that the French ſhould form a project, according to thoſe two treaties; to which project the allies would promiſe a ſpeedy anſwer. The French required time to deliberate upon it; which, while they were doing, the Imperial embaſſadors promiſed to thoſe of the electors, that they would ſoon communicate to them all the articles, which they ſhould put forwards, to the end that all differences between them might be adjuſted.

After ſeveral conſultations, the French declared, That they had not ſufficient power to anſwer to the different propoſals of the Imperialiſts; but that they would give in a project to the Spaniards, if they would accept of it, which the mediator acquainted the allies with; adding, that the French ſtill pretended, they had no other power to treat, than according to the treaty of Nimeguen. Whereupon the miniſters of the allies, in a particular conference, came to an unanimous reſolution, never to conſent to it, that treaty being contrary to the intereſts of almoſt all the princes and ſtates, that ſent them. In the mean time the electoral miniſters could not well digeſt the propoſal of the Imperialiſts, that, in dignities and ceſſions, there ſhould be no regard had to any other, except the embaſſadors of the higheſt characters; for they inſiſted, that they ought to be treated with upon an equal foot with the reſt. Then the French declared, that they would uſe the plenipotentiaries of the electors in the ſame manner, as the emperor's miniſters did, and honour the reſt ſo, in all public affairs, as to give no occaſion of complaints. As to the main of the treaty, the Spaniards, at laſt, conſented that the French ſhould give in their plan; to which they would return an anſwer. This they were prevailed with to do, upon an aſſurance from the mediator, that the ſame ſhould be made up of the treaties of Weſtphalia and Nimeguen, he having told the French, that the articles, which they ſhould propoſe, ought to be regulated by thoſe two treaties; by default whereof no advance could be made in the negotiation. Whilſt the French miniſters were buſy about framing their plan, the elector of Brandenburg's plenipotentiary very earneſtly preſſed them to procure a full power to treat with him, in particular, ſince his maſter had formerly declared war againſt France; and the deputies of the circles of Swabia and Franconia inſiſted likewiſe, to have ſatisfaction made them by France, for the damages, which they had ſuſtained, during the war; but all this to little purpoſe.

To quicken the ſlow advances of the treaty, the miniſters of Sweden and Denmark both declared to the French, That their maſters would be conſtrained to join their forces to thoſe of the allies, to cut off, by the ſword, all the unneceſſary difficulties, which France raiſed to protract the negotiations. The treaty, indeed, went on but ſlowly, till Harlay, the firſt of the French plenipotentiaries, came to the Hague; who, as was believed, had the ſecret. He ſhewed a fairer inclination, than had appeared in the others, to treat frankly and honourably, and to clear all difficulties that had been ſtarted before. So that the French, on the 20th of July, gave in their plan of peace, founded on the treaties of Weſtphalia and Nimeguen; the main articles of which, as to the empire, were, 'An offer to make void ſeveral re-unions, made on that ſide, by the chambers of Mentz and Beſancon, and the ſovereign council of Briſac, ſince the treaty of Nimeguen. To reſtore the city of Straſburg, or to give, as an equivalent for it, the city and caſtle of Friburg, and the towns of Briſac and Philipſburg, with the fort of Kiel, in the condition they were at preſent: To demoliſh the fortifications of Hunningen, on the other ſide of the Rhine. To reſtore Lorrain to the duke of that name, in the ſame manner as it was offered at the treaty of Nimeguen, that is, in the ſame condition it was poſſeſſed by duke Charles, in 1670, and the city of Nancy, upon certain conditions; with the demoliſhing of divers places, ſuch as Mont-Royal, Traerback, &c. As for the Spaniards, the French offered to give them the city and country of Luxemburg, and the country of Chinay, or, in lieu of them, ſome other places, hereafter to be named, for which there was a blank left in the plan. That all re-unions, ſince the treaty of Nimeguen, ſhould be made void: That the city and caſtle of Dinant ſhould be delivered to the biſhop of Liege; and that all other places, taken on both ſides, during the war, ſhould likewiſe be reſtored.' The Spaniards ſeemed, in the main, to be ſatisfied with the French conceſſions; but the Imperial miniſters made a tedious, and, as ſome thought, an unreaſonable anſwer to the plan; which the French did not much regard, their chief aim being to ſatsify the reſt, upon what terms they were willing to give them, in order to break the grand alliance, and by that means to preſerve part of their acquiſitions on the Rhine, ſince there was ſo little proſpect of having any thing elſewhere. After the delivery of the plan of peace, the king of France, finding much time ſpent to little purpoſe, by carrying on a treaty in writing, ordered his plenipotentiaries to agree to the propoſals, which the Imperialiſts had made not long before, of treating by word of mouth; and though the 10th of September was the utmoſt the French would give, to accept their offers; yet it is remarkable, that, after their diſappointment in Poland, they began to be more tractable than before.

Upon the 17th of Auguſt, an extraordinary conference was held at Riſwick, which laſted almoſt a whole day, and wherein the method agreed on of treating by word of mouth was firſt put in practice. Not many days after came the news of the taking of Barcelona by the French. This made the Spaniards very uneaſy and very preſſing to have the peace ſigned upon the conditions offered by France; and more eſpecially ſince, by the memorial given in to the mediator on the 1ſt of September, there had been an offer made to reſtore this place alſo to his catholic majeſty upon a ſlight conſideration of a few villages belonging to the chatellany of Aeth to be yielded to the French, for the conveniency of the trade of the inhabitants of Tournay. But, the more condeſcending the French ſeemed to be towards the Spaniards, the ſtiffer they became with the empire, now poſitively inſiſting upon the keeping of Straſburg, and that the emperor ſhould reſt contented with the equivalent, which, they ſaid would be more conſiderable to him, ſince he would have the entire ſovereignty of thoſe towns, that France quitted; whereas Straſburg, if reſtored, muſt have been ſet at its own liberty, as a free Imperial city. If the Imperialiſts were ſtartled at this new project, they were not leſs ſurprized at the ſhort time prefixed by France for their anſwer, which was the 20th of September; after which the French king would no longer be obliged to thoſe offers. This was ſtill the more mortifying to them, ſince they began now to be ſuperior in force to the French, and to act offenſively on the Rhine; not to mention their jealouſies, leſt ſome of the Allies ſhould ſign a ſeparate peace, and leave them out; which occaſioned ſome heats between the confederates.

On the other hand, the French plenipotentiaries were amazed at the profound ſilence of the miniſters of the Allies concerning their laſt memorial. But it ſeems the concluſion of the peace was to be owing to the ſame perſon, who had been the ſoul of the war, king William. For, while the negociations at Ryſwick were going on very ſlowly, it was ſo managed, that the earl of Portland and marſhal Boufflers, when the confederate army was encamped near Bruſſels, and the French army not far from thence, met together four times, by the order of their maſters, and conferred long together [1]. At the laſt of theſe conferences, the two negociators, after they had been ſome time in the open field, retired into an houſe in the ſuburb of Hall, where they had pen, ink, and paper, and in an hour adjuſted ſeveral points, which the plenipotentiaries at Ryſwick would not have agreed upon in a year. The chief ſubject of thoſe conferences was concerning king James. King William deſired to know, how the French king intended to diſpoſe of him, and how he could own him, and yet ſupport the other. The French king would not renounce the protecting him by any article of the treaty; but it was agreed between them, that the French king ſhould give him no aſſiſtance, nor give king William no diſturbance on his account; and that he ſhould retire from the court of France, either to Avignon or to Italy. On the other hand, his queen ſhould have fifty thouſand pounds a year, which was her jointure, ſettled after his death; and that it ſhould be now paid her, he being reckoned as dead to the nation. In this king William readily acquieſced. Theſe meetings made the treaty go on with more diſpatch, this tender point being once ſettled; and, on the 2d of Auguſt, the earl of Portland and marſhal Boufflers ſigned the paper, which they had drawn up ſome days before; upon which the king left the army the next day, and went to Dieren; whence he diſpatched the earl of Portland to the Hague, to acquaint the congreſs, "that, as for what concerned his majeſty and his kingdoms, all matters were ſo adjuſted with France, that this would occaſion no delay in the general peace; and therefore he earneſtly preſſed the other allies, and particularly the emperor, to contribute all in them lay towards concluding ſo great a work."

The interviews between the earl of Portland and marſhal Boufflers occaſioned divers ſpeculations. On the one hand the Jacobites, who, againſt all reaſon, flattered themſelves, that tho' a treaty of peace was carried on in the king's own palace, yet he would be left out of it, ſaw by theſe conferences their hopes entirely baffled; and on the other hand, a great many people, and even ſome of the king's beſt friends, began to ſuſpect, that he had entered into a private agreement with the French king, in favour either of king James or his iſſue, upon account of king William's having the peaceful enjoyment of his dominions during life, and being acknowledged as king of Great-Britain by his moſt chriſtian majeſty; which ill-grounded ſuſpicion was three years after fully removed, by king William's effectually promoting the ſettlement in the proteſtant line. Deeper politicians went farther two years after, and pretended (as will hereafter be ſeen) that, in theſe conferences between the earl of Portland and marſhal Boufflers, the firſt foundation was laid of the famous 'Treaty of Partition;' and it is not improbable, but ſomething of that kind was then propoſed and conſidered.

The day appointed by France being come, when either peace or war was to determine the fate of Chriſtendom, the Engliſh, Spaniſh, and Dutch plenipotentiaries, after a long conference with thoſe of France, having adjuſted all matters remaining in difference between any of them, reſpectively ſigned the treaty a little after midnight, and then complimented each other upon the finiſhing of that important negotiation. The imperial and electoral plenipotentiaries, who, moſt of them, were all the while preſent in the hall, were ſo far from conſenting to what was done, that, on the contrary, they required the mediator to enter a proteſtation, 'That this was the ſecond time, that a ſeparate peace had been concluded with France, (meaning that of Nimeguen for one) wherein the emperor and empire had been excluded; and that the ſtates of the empire, who had been impoſed upon through their own over-credulity, would not, for the future, be ſo eaſily perſuaded to enter into confederacies.' The Spaniſh plenipotentiaries, and particularly Don Bernardo de Quiros, by way of excuſe, replied, that he had a long time been made acquainted with his catholic majeſty's pleaſure, not to delay the ſigning of the treaty, which had been agreed upon before; and, if he had obeyed thoſe orders, the French would not have taken Barcelona. But that, having deferred the concluſion of that treaty at the perſuaſion of the Imperial miniſters, he had given the French time to make themſelves maſters of that important place; which ſucceſs emboldened their plenipotentiaries to change their language, and thereby he had himſelf run into the hazard of incurring his maſter's diſpleaſure.

All this while king James made but an indifferent figure in his melancholy retirement at St. Germain's. The French king's promiſe to him, and open declaration to all Europe, that he would never lay down arms till he had reſtored him to his throne, had raiſed this prince's hopes to a great height. But he found by ſad experience, how little the promiſes of ſovereigns are to be relied on, when their own intereſt comes in competition.

After a tedious war, dubiouſly maintained, the French king, being exhauſted both of men and money, thought it prudence to make peace, and reſtore to his neighbours all the conqueſts, which he had made upon them ſince the treaty of Nimeguen; which he was the more inclined to do, in hopes that, having diſarmed and broke the confederacy, he might recover all at the death of the king of Spain, who for many years had been in a declining ſtate of health, and who, at the concluſion of the peace of Ryſwick, was in ſo deſperate a condition, that the French court thought he could not live a month longer. On the other hand, the French king being ſenſible, that a treaty could not be ſet on foot, not only without owning king William, but alſo (as a conſequence of that acknowledgment) without abandoning king James, he did not even inſiſt, that a miniſter from him ſhould be admitted to the conferences at Ryſwick; which propoſal was unanimouſly rejected by the allies; nor would the French plenipotentiaries meddle with that prince's manifeſto. King James's expectation of the French king's protection being thus diſappointed, and he finding, that his pardons as well as his threats had no effect upon his former ſubjects, he was perſuaded to publiſh his manifeſto, containing 'A ſummary account of the reaſons, that ſhould engage the confederate catholic princes to promote his reſtoration, and a proteſtation againſt what was done at Ryſwick as null, in reſpect to the violation of his rights; with another memorial to the ſame purpoſe, addreſſed to the proteſtant confederate princes and ſtates; of which manifeſtoes no notice was taken by any of the allies [m]. As to his friends in England, they were ſo enraged to ſee him abandoned by the French king, that they could not forbear venting their bitter invectives againſt him, for which ſome of them were committed to priſon and fined, the ſame being a violation of the late treaty between the crowns of England and France [n].

[m] They were anſwered in a piece, printed at London, 1705, in quarto, under the title of, 'A memorial, drawn up by King William's ſpecial direction, intended to be given in at the treaty of Ryſwick, juſtifying the revolution, and the courſe of his government; in anſwer to two memorials, that were offered there in king James's name. In the preface we are informed, that, upon king James's preſenting his two memorials, it was thought neceſſary to prepare a memorial, in anſwer to them; which was intended to be given, in king William's name, to all the miniſters, that were then at the Hague. The memorial was, upon this, drawn up, by his majeſty's own direction, he explaining himſelf upon every particular; and the draft was examined by him, and, by his orders, carried to ſome of the worthieſt miniſters, that our nation produced in that age, and carefully reviſed and corrected by them. But when it was reſolved to tranſlate it into Latin and French, in order to the communicating it, his majeſty had advice from the Hague, that king James's memorials were ſo little conſidered there, that the offering an anſwer to them would give them ſome credit; and that, without that, they had none at all. The draft was therefore ordered to be written over again, in another ſtyle; not in his majeſty's name, but as the anſwer of a private hand to thoſe memorials; and ſo to be printed. Yet, before this could be done, another advice came, to let the matter quite alone, and to leave thoſe memorials to ſleep in that neglect, under which they were fallen. The matter reſted upon this; but, theſe papers being drawn up by ſuch an authority, and containing ſuch a full, though ſhort, vindication of the revolution, it was, afterwards, thought proper to publiſh them. The anſwer to the 'firſt Memorial of king James,' begins with obſerving: 'That the king of Great Britain does not wonder to ſee a prince, who has, for ſo long a time, ſought to take away his life, in the blackeſt methods, endeavour, now, likewiſe, to attack his honour, even in the undeceenteſt expreſſions: of which the late memorial is full. The late king, while he was in Ireland, did, himſelf, concert with one Jones, the way of murdering the king. But, ſo tender was his majeſty of the honour of a perſon ſo nearly related to him, that he gave orders to ſuppreſs that matter; though the authentical proofs of it are yet extant, in letters, and other papers, taken in the late earl of Tyrconnel's cabinet. Grandvall's confeſſion is well known; and ſir John Fenwick did lately claim merit, by his diverting another deſign to murder the king, purſuant to a commiſſion, that, though it was not come over, yet was affirmed to be ſigned by the late king. His having laid the deſign of murdering the king, a year ago, and his having ſent over perſons, and a commiſſion, to that effect, have been ſo undeniably proved, that all Europe is ſtill full of horror at it. At ſuch practices, heathens would be aſhamed. The purſuing them, year after year, deſerves ſeverer words, than the king thinks fit to uſe, even after ſuch a provocation; ſuch regard is had to the high birth, and the rank, which that prince once held in the world. The king had the leaſt reaſon to have expected ſuch practices from the late king, becauſe, though he had him ſo long in his power, he did him no hurt, nor put him under any reſtraint. He refuſed to hearken to the advices, that many gave him, of ſecuring his perſon, till a general peace ſhould be made; or, at leaſt, till Ireland ſhould be reduced. Some, who offered thoſe advices, are now in the late king's intereſt, and can, if they pleaſe, inform him of the truth of this matter. The late king himſelf, deſired to be attended by ſome of the Dutch guards, when he went to Rocheſter, and ſent to the count de Solmes, to that effect; who immediately ordered it without any directions from the king, who was not then come to London. When the king knew of it, he ſent orders to thoſe guards to wait about the late king, in what manner he himſelf ſhould command. And it was viſible to thoſe, who were about him, at that time, that he was all the while as much maſter of himſelf, as when he was ſerved by his own guards.' The whole progreſs of affairs, as they paſſed between his majeſty and king James, is laid open, and it is remarked that 'King William did not come to England on deſign to dethrone that king, but declaring a full purpoſe to leave the care and ſettlement of the nation to the parliament. And, when ſome lords were ſent to him by the late king, to aſk him, what it was, that he propoſed, his anſwer was: That he deſired, that the adminiſtration of the government might be brought into a ſtate conformable to the laws then in being; ſo that no perſons who were under legal incapacities, might continue in public offices or truſts; and that a parliament might be called, and ſit in full freedom, both armies being at an equal diſtance from it; that ſo proper remedies might be applied to all the diſtempers, into which thoſe violent councils had thrown the nation. By this, it appeared how the king had adhered to his 'declaration.' During this negotiation, and after the late king had notice given him, what the king's demands were, he, upon reaſons beſt known to himſelf, threw up all, and abandoned the government, and left his army looſe upon the nation, and the rabble upon the city of London, and withdrew himſelf: By which he did all that in him lay to caſt theſe kingdoms into moſt violent convulſions, and expoſed even his own friends to all the hardſhips, that might have been apprehended from enraged multitudes. For, if the providence of God, and the natural gentleneſs of the people of England, had not proved effectual reſtraints, this nation had become a ſcene of fire and blood; which the enemies of this kingdom perſuaded the late king to venture on, rather than to ſtay, and ſuffer a parliament to enquire into the cauſes of the miſeries the nation was fallen under, and to ſecure their religion and property. Upon this, that part of the nation, which had till then adhered to the late king, finding themſelves abandoned by him, deſired, that the king would aſſume the adminiſtration of this forſaken government; which he conſented to do, till a convention of the ſtates ſhould be brought together, to give it a full and legal ſanction. He did take a moſt particular care, that the elections ſhould be carried on with all poſſible freedom, not only without violence and threatnings, but even without recommendations, or any ſort of practice, how uſual, and how innocent ſoever. The like care ſecured their liberty, when they met: Every man argued and voted in the great deliberations, then on foot, both with freedom and ſafety. Nor did the king ſpeak to any perſon, or ſuffer any to ſpeak in his name, to perſuade, much leſs to threaten thoſe, who ſeemed ſtill to adhere to the late king's intereſt. So ſtrict was he in obſerving the promiſes he had made in his declarations. It was thought a remiſſneſs, and hazarding the public too much, to interpoſe or move ſo little in thoſe matters, as he then did. The Convention came to a full reſolution, and judged, that the late king had broke the original contract, upon which this government was at firſt founded, and, after that, had abandoned it; ſo that it was neceſſary for them, being thus forſaken by him, to ſee to their own ſecurity. And, as they judged, that the late king's right to govern them was ſunk, ſo they did not think it was neceſſary or incumbent on them to examine that, which the whole nation, in general, as well as the king, in particular, had juſt reaſon to call in queſtion, concerning the birth of the 'pretended prince of Wales. When the late king had quite diſſolved the tie of the nation to himſelf, they thought they had no further concern upon them to inquire into that matter; and therefore they thought it fit to let it remain in that juſt doubtfulneſs, under which the late king's own method of proceedings had brought it. Beſides that, a particular care had been taken by the late king, to cauſe all thoſe, who had been in the management of that matter, or were ſuſpected of having a ſhare in the artifices about it, to be carried over into France; ſo that it was not poſſible to come at thoſe perſons, by the interrogating of whom truth might have been found out. The king expreſſed no ambitious deſires of mounting the throne. The addreſſes of both houſes, and the ſtate of Europe, which ſeemed deſperate without a mighty ſupport from England, determined him in that matter. But as he can appeal to God for the ſincerity of his intentions, who alone knows them, ſo he has an infinite number of witneſſes, who ſaw and can juſtify his whole conduct in the progreſs of the revolution, if it were fit for him to appeal to them.'

In the anſwer to the 'ſecond memorial' of king James, it is obſerved in juſtification of the revolution, that 'nothing was done in the progreſs of it, but that, which he made inevitable by ſome act or other of his own. It went not upon falſe ſuggeſtions, nor barely upon the pretences of redreſſing particular grievances, or ſome doubtful oppreſſions, much leſs on the ambitious deſigns of his Majeſty, that are ſo often and ſo maliciouſly repreſented as the true cauſes of the revolution. It was the late king's open throwing off the reſtraint of law, and his ſetting about a total ſubverſion of the conſtitution, that drove the nation to extreme courſes. The oaths of allegiance can be underſtood only in the ſenſe limited by law, and ſo they cannot be conceived to bind ſubjects to a king, who would not govern them any longer, unleſs he might be allowed to do it againſt law. A revolution ſo brought about, carries in it no precedent againſt the ſecurity of government, or the peace of mankind. That, which an abſolute neceſſity inforced at one time, can be no warrant for irregular proceedings at any other time, unleſs it be where the like neceſſity ſhall require the like remedies. But, ſince the late king thinks fit to reflect on the oaths of ſubjects, he ought alſo to remember the oath, which he himſelf ſwore at his coronation to defend the church of England, and to maintain the laws; to neither of which he ſhewed any regard in his whole government, but ſet himſelf to overturn both. The many alterations, that have been made in the ſucceſſion to the crown of England, upon occaſions that were neither ſo preſſing nor ſo important as thoſe of late were, ſhould have obliged thoſe, who penned this Memorial, to be more reſerved and leſs poſitive in affirming things ſo contrary to the known hiſtory of this kingdom. Theſe revolutions were confirmed by laws, which were not afterwards upon ſucceeding changes repealed, for they continue ſtill in force; nor was the crown of England ever reckoned to be ſuch a property to thoſe, who held it, that they might uſe or diſpoſe of it at pleaſure, as the Memorial ſeems to ſuppoſe.'

Particularly

The jacobites were the more confounded at the news of it, becauſe the court of France did, to the laſt minute, aſſure king James, that they would never abandon his intereſts: And his queen ſent over aſſurances, to their party here, that England would be left out of the treaty, and put to maintain the war alone: Of which they were ſo confident, that they entered into deep wagers upon it; a practice little known among us before the war, but it was carried on, in the progreſs of it, to a very extravagant degree; ſo that they were ruined in their fortunes, as well as ſunk in their expectations, by the peace; upon which, it was ſaid, king James's queen made a bold repartee to the French king, when he told her the peace was ſigned: She ſaid, ſhe wiſhed it might be ſuch, as ſhould raiſe his glory, as much as it might ſettle his repoſe.

The moſt melancholy part of this treaty was, that no advantages were gained by it in favour of the proteſtants of France, who were refugees in England, Germany, and Holland. King William having, on all occaſions, declared himſelf their protector, they expected, that he would alſo prove their deliverer, and never conclude a peace with France, without obliging their ſovereign to reſtore them both to their eſtates, and the free exerciſe of their religion in their own country. Upon this preſumption ſeveral conſultations were held in London by the French miniſters, and the moſt conſiderable perſons among the refugees there, wherein it was debated, in what method they ſhould make their applications to the plenipotentiaries at Ryſwick, and upon what terms they ſhould agree to their reſtoration, which ſome among them looked upon as certain. The reſult of theſe aſſemblies being tranſmitted to Monſieur Jurieu, the head of the French refugees in Holland, he, with his uſual zeal for the proteſtant cauſe, addreſſed himſelf to king William, who directed the Dutch plenipotentiaries to open that matter at a diſtance to the French embaſſadors. The Dutch miniſters followed the king's orders; but the French king, to whom this overture was communicated, expreſſing an inſuperable averſeneſs to it, and urging, that, as he did not pretend to preſcribe to king William any rules about his ſubjects, ſo he expected the ſame liberty as to his own, which he looked upon as the great prerogative of a ſovereign; the matter was no farther inſiſted upon. As the caſe of the French proteſtants was no part of the cauſe of the war, ſo it did not appear, that the allies could do more for them than thus recommend them to the French king, who was ſo far engaged in a courſe of ſuperſtition and cruelty, that the condition of the French proteſtants became worſe by the peace; the court being more at leiſure to look after them, and to perſecute them, than they thought fit to do during the war.

Though the Imperialiſts were not a little concerned at the proceeding of their allies, yet they thought it adviſeable to agree to a ceſſation of arms; and expreſſes were immediately diſpatched to the reſpective armies upon the Rhine, to diſcontinue all acts of hoſtility. However, before prince Lewis of Baden had notice of it, he had made himſelf maſter of the caſtle of Eberenburg, and was preparing to lay ſiege to Kirm. But what was ſtill more mortifying to the Imperial miniſters, was, that advice had not come a few days ſooner, of the great victory obtained at Zenta over the Turks, by the emperor's forces, which would, in all probability, have made Spain and the reſt leſs eager to ſign the peace, and the French leſs ſtiff with regard to the Imperialiſts. This victory was obtained by prince Eugene of Savoy, who commanded the Imperial army in Hungary. He was a brother of the count de Soiſſons, who, apprehending that he was not like to be ſo much conſidered, as he thought he might deſerve in France, went and ſerved the emperor, and grew up in a few years, to be one of the greateſt generals of the age.

The grand ſeignior came to command his armies in perſon, and lay incamped on both ſides of the Theiſſe, having laid a bridge over the river; prince Eugene marched up to him, and attacked his camp, on the weſt ſide of the river, and, after a ſhort diſpute, he broke in, and was maſter of the camp, and forced all, who lay on that ſide, over the river: in this action many were killed and drowned: he followed them acroſs the Theiſſe, and gave them a total defeat: Moſt of their Janizaries were cut off, and the prince became maſter of all their artillery and magazines. The grand ſeignior himſelf narrowly eſcaped, with a body of horſe, to Belgrade; this was a compleat victory, and was the greateſt blow the Turks had received, in the whole war. At the ſame time, the Czar was very ſucceſsful on his ſide againſt the Tartarians. The Venetians did little on their part; and the confuſions in Poland made that republic but a feeble ally: ſo that the weight of the war lay wholly on the emperor. But though he, being now delivered from the war with France, was more at leiſure to proſecute this, yet his revenue was ſo exhauſted, that he was willing to ſuffer a treaty to be carried on, by the mediation of England and Holland; and the French being now no longer concerned to engage the Porte to carry on the war, the grand ſeignior, fearing a revolution upon his ill ſucceſs, was very glad to hearken to a treaty, which was carried on all this winter, and was finiſhed the next year at Carlowitz, from which place it takes its name.

Not many days after the concluſion of the truce between the empire and France, ſeveral embaſſadors of the allies waited upon king William at Loo, where it was conſulted what precautionary meaſures could be taken to prevent the violation of the peace lately concluded; and it was whiſpered, that an offenſive and defenſive alliance was entered into, or rather renewed, between the confederates. Now the embaſſadors of the empire happening to complain again, how much they were wronged by a precipitate treaty, they were anſwered, That they ought to impute it to themſelves, as having been often adviſed to put in their demands without delay, and not to retard the negotiation; and that they ſhould not have flattered themſelves, that more advantageous terms could have been obtained, ſince the French ſtill inſiſted upon the firſt, from which they would never recede. The Imperialiſts, ſeeing their expoſtulations had no effect, bent their thoughts upon adjuſting the remaining points in controverſy with France. The principal difference ſeemed to be about Straſburg, and, ſince they could not obtain the reſtoration of it, they inſiſted to have the equivalent for it ſomewhat enlarged; as alſo that, beſides Landau, all the places taken by France on that ſide, ſince the treaty of Nimeguen, ſhould be yielded up, and fort Louis reſigned to the duke of Lorrain. But the French plenipotentiaries anſwered that they had no power to exceed their orders, and therefore could by no means comply with theſe demands.

At length, the emperor conſidering that Briſac and Friburg (the equivalent offered by the French for Straſburg) were places belonging to his hereditary dominions, conſented to the exchange; and all other matters being concerted, and the German princes finding they could ſtruggle no longer, the treaty was ſigned by all, two days before the time limited by France was expired.

A new piece of treachery againſt the proteſtant religion broke out in the concluſion of all. The embaſſadors of the proteſtant princes being met together, at the houſe of the elector of Mentz's plenipotentiary, they named four deputies, who delivered a memorial to the mediator; wherein they demanded that at Straſburg, and other cities of Alſatia, which belonged to France, the Lutheran religion ſhould be tolerated, and enjoy all thoſe rights and immunities, as in the year 1624. To this the French demanded eight days to anſwer. But, what miſunderſtanding ſoever there might be, between the French and Imperial plenipotentiaries, as to other points, they agreed, or rather combined together, to have a clauſe inſerted, in the VIth article of the treaty between the empire and France, that the Roman catholic religion, in the places to be delivered up, ſhould remain in the ſame ſtate, in which it was at that time, without any notice taken of the proteſtants. By this means ſeveral churches were to be condemned, that otherwiſe, according to the laws of the empire, and in particular of thoſe dominions, were to be reſtored to the proteſtants. The elector palatine accepted of this condition very willingly, being bigoted to a high degree: But ſome of the princes, the king of Sweden in particular, as duke of Deux-ponts, refuſed ro ſubmit to it: And a ſtrong declaration was publiſhed by the miniſters of the proteſtant princes againſt this proceeding, as contrary to the laws of the empire, to 'the peace of religion,' in 1555; to the treaty of Weſtphalia, and to the preliminaries of the preſent treaty of Ryſwick. But it was all in vain, for this affair had been ſecretly concerted among the whole popiſh party, who are always firm to the intereſts of their religion, and zealous for them; whereas the proteſtant courts are too ready to ſacrifice the common intereſt of their religion to their own private advantage. King William was troubled at this treacherous motion; but he ſaw no inclination in any of the allies to oppoſe it with the zeal, with which it was preſſed on the other hand. The importance of the thing, ſixteen churches only being condemned by it, was not ſuch, as to deſerve, that he ſhould venture a rupture upon it. And it was thought, the elector Palatine might, on other accounts, be ſo obnoxious to the proteſtants, and need their aſſiſtance and protection ſo much, that he would be obliged afterwards to reſtore theſe churches thus wreſted from them. The king therefore contented himſelf with ordering his plenipotentiaries to proteſt againſt this, which they did in a formal act, that they paſſed.

By this peace king William concluded the great deſign of putting a ſtop to the progreſs of the French arms, which he had conſtantly purſued from his firſt appearance on the ſtage in the year 1672. There was not one of the allies, who complained, that he had been forgot by him, or wronged in the treaty; nor had the deſire of having his title univerſally acknowledged raiſed any impatience in him, or made him run into this peace with any indecent haſte. The terms of it were indeed ſtill too much to the advantage of France; but the length and charge of the war had ſo exhauſted the allies, that the king ſaw the neceſſity of accepting the beſt conditions, that could be got. It is true, France was more harraſſed by the war, yet the arbitrary frame of that government made their king the maſter of the whole wealth of his people; and the war was managed on both ſides between them and us, with this viſible difference, that every man, who dealt with the French king, was ruined by it; whereas, among us, every man grew rich by his dealings with the king; and it was not eaſy to ſee, how this could be either prevented or puniſhed. The regard, that is ſhewn to members of parliament among us, makes, that few abuſes can be inquired into or diſcovered; and the king found his reign grow ſo unacceptable to his people by the continuance of the war, that he ſaw the neceſſity of coming to a peace. The ſtates-general were under the ſame preſſure; they were heavier charged, and ſuffered more by the war than the Engliſh. The French got indeed nothing by a war, which they had moſt perfidiouſly begun. They were forced to return to the peace of Nimeguen; Pignerol and Briſac, which cardinal Richelieu had conſidered as the keys of Italy and Germany, were now parted with. And all that baſe practice of claiming ſo much, under the head of re-unions and dependencies, was abandoned. The duchy of Lorrain was alſo entirely reſtored. It was generally thought, that the French king intended to live out the reſt of his days in quiet; for his parting with Barcelona made all people conclude, that he did not intend to proſecute the Dauphin's pretenſions upon the crown of Spain after that king's death by a new war; and that he would only try how to manage it by negotiation. The military men in France generally complained of the peace as diſhonourable and baſe; and the whole nation, not entering into the views of their monarch, were ſo little pleaſed with it, that they made very ſevere reflections on meſſieurs Harlay, Crecy, and Callieres, their plenipotentiaries, whom they traduced in their lampoons, which were publicly ſung in Paris, and all over the kingdom of France, whilſt the courage, reſolution, and wiſdom of king William, to which the accompliſhment of that peace was owing, were every where celebrated.

The king, having regulated with the ſtates-general the number of forces, which they thought neceſſary to be kept on foot the next year, embarked for England, on the 13th of November, and the next morning ſafely landed at Margate, and, on the 15th, lay at Greenwich. The day following, he was received by the city of London, in a ſort of triumph, with all the magnificence that he would admit. Some progreſs was made in preparing triumphal arches, but he put a ſtop to it. He ſeemed, by a natural modeſty, to have contracted an antipathy to all vain ſhews; which was much increaſed in him by what he had heard of the groſs exceſſes of flattery, to which the French had run, beyond the examples of former reigns, in honour of their king, who having ſhewn too great a pleaſure in theſe, they had been ſo far purſued, that the wit of that nation was, for many years, chiefly employed in them; for they ſaw, that men's fortunes were more certainly advanced by a new and lively invention in that way, than by any ſervice or merit whatſoever. This, in which the French king ſeemed to be too much pleaſed, rendering him contemptible to better judges, gave king William ſuch an averſion to every thing that looked that way, that he ſcarce bore even with things that were decent and proper.

During the negotiations of peace, eſpecially towards the concluſion of them, the diſcourſe in England was general, what ſhould be done with the army, when the war was over, and almoſt as general was the opinion, that it ſhould be diſbanded. As the king was but too ſenſible how the generality ſtood affected to the keeping up an army, he ordered many of his troops to be diſbanded, and others to be ſent into Ireland, ſoon after the peace[o]. But, perceiving that the French were very ſlow in evacuating the places that were to be reſtored by the treaty, and were not beginning to reduce their forces, he put a ſtop to the diſbanding: and, though he declared what he intended to do, yet he made no haſte to execute it, till it ſhould appear how the French intended to govern themſelves. The king thought it was abſolutely neceſſary, to keep up a conſiderable land force: He knew the French would ſtill maintain great armies; and that the pretended prince of Wales would certainly be aſſiſted by them, if England ſhould fall into a feeble and defenceleſs condition: The king of Spain was alſo in ſuch an uncertain ſtate of health, ſo weak and ſo exhauſted, that it ſeemed neceſſary, that England ſhould be in a condition to bar France's invading that empire, and to maintain the rights of the houſe of Auſtria. But, though he explained himſelf thus in general to his miniſters, yet he would not deſcend to particulars, to tell how many he thought neceſſary; ſo that they had not authority to declare, what was the loweſt number the king inſiſted on.

Papers were writ on both ſides, for, and againſt a ſtanding force[p]: On the one hand, it was pretended, that a ſtanding army was incompatible with public liberty, and, accord-

Loo, Oct. 18, 1697.

The peace being now made and ratified, it muſt be conſidered, what forces to keep on foot. I much approve the project you ſent me, of keeping in Ireland twenty battalions of infantry, four regiments of dragoons, and eighteen troops of horſe, and reducing the pay of the officers. I have imparted this project to none but lord Portland, whom I am going to ſend to England, and with whom you muſt correſpond about this matter, and let me know what public orders will be neceſſary to be given for the execution of this affair. My deſign is, to diſband moſt of the regiments of foot, and dragoons, now in Ireland; and to ſend thither ſome of thoſe that are in Flanders. I alſo intend to ſend thither your regiment of horſe, and the three French regiments of foot, incorporating ſome officers, who have ſerved in Piedmont, of the four regiments which are on the Rhine, and which I am going to reform, and to take all the French proteſtant ſoldiers, and put them into the three abovementioned regiments. Be always aſſured of the continuation of my friendſhip.

I think to reduce Wolſeley's regiment to three troops, and yours to ſix, to remove all jealouſy in England.

This letter, and ſeveral others, written in French with the king's own hand (which will all be inſerted in their proper places) are now in the hands of the author, and were found among Mr. Addiſon's papers after his death.

About five weeks after, the king writ the following letter to the earl of Galway.

Kenſington, Nov. 26, 1697.

I refer you to what lord Portland will write to you about the forces, by which you will learn my intentions. I aſſure you, I am very much troubled to find things here run ſo high againſt the poor refugees. This has ſtruck me; but you know, theſe ſorts of things paſs here very eaſily. Be ever aſſured of my eſteem.

I hope you'll be able to put an end very ſoon to the parliament of Ireland.

[p] Particularly the following ones. 'An argument ſhewing, that a ſtanding army is inconſiſtent with a free government, and abſolutely deſtructive to the conſtitution of the Engliſh monarchy.' Mr. Trenchard was thought to have the chief hand in this piece, which was printed in 1697, in 4to.

'The ſecond part of an argument ſhewing, that a ſtanding army is inconſiſtent with a free government, and abſolutely deſtructive to the conſtitution of the Engliſh monarchy. With remarks on the late publiſhed liſt of king James's Iriſh forces in France.' Printed in 1697, in 4to.

'A letter balancing the neceſſity of keeping a land-force, in times of peace, with the dangers, that may follow on it.' Printed in 1697, in 4to. This piece has been generally aſcribed to the lord Sommers, but it is doubtful, whether upon ſufficient grounds. It is one of the beſt tracts, which were written on that ſide of the queſtion. The author begins with declaring, that he is far from the thought of a ſtanding army: but that the caſe at that time was, 'Whether, conſidering the circumſtances, that we and our neighbours are now in, it may not be both prudent and neceſſary for us to keep up a reaſonable force from year to year; the ſtate of affairs both at home and abroad being every year to be conſidered in parliament, that ſo any ſuch force may be either increaſed, leſſened, or quite laid aſide, as they ſhall ſee cauſe. If, 'ſays he,' we were in the ſame condition, in which we and our neighbours were an age ago, I ſhould reject the propoſition with horror. But ing to the examples of former times, the one muſt ſwallow up the other: It was propoſed, that the militia might be better modelled, and more trained; which, with a good naval force, ſome thought, would be an effectual ſecurity againſt foreign invaſions, as well as it would maintain our laws and liberties at home. On the other ſide, it was urged, that, ſince all our neighbours were armed, and the moſt formidable of them all kept up ſuch a mighty force, nothing could give us a real ſecurity, but a good body of regulated troops: Nothing could be made of the militia, chiefly of the horſe, but at a vaſt charge; and, if it was well regulated, and well commanded, it would prove a mighty army; but this of the militia was only talked of, to put by the other; for no project was ever propoſed to render it more uſeful; a force at ſea might be ſo ſhattered, while the enemy kept within their ports (as it actually happened at the revolution) that this ſtrength might come to be uſeleſs, when we ſhould need it moſt; ſo that, without a conſiderable land force, it ſeemed the nation would be too much expoſed. The word, 'ſtanding army,' had an odious ſound in Engliſh ears; ſo the popularity lay on the other ſide; and the king's miniſters ſuffered generally in the good characters, they had hitherto maintained, becauſe they ſtudied to ſtop the tide, that run ſo ſtrong the other way.

The parliament met, on the 3d of December, and the king opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"THE war, which I entered into by the advice of my people, is by the bleſſing of God, and their zealous and affectionate aſſiſtance, brought to the end we all propoſed, an honourable peace; which I was willing to conclude, not ſo much to eaſe myſelf from any trouble or hazard, as to free the kingdom from the continuing burden of an expenſive war.

"I am heartily ſorry my ſubjects will not at firſt find all that relief from the peace, which I could wiſh, and they may expect. But the funds intended for the laſt year's ſervice have fallen ſhort of anſwering the ſums, for which they were given; ſo that there are conſiderable deficiences to be provided for.

"There is a debt upon the account of the fleet and the army. The revenues of the crown have been anticipated by my conſent for public uſes, ſo that I am wholly deſtitute of means to ſupport the civil liſt; and I can never diſtruſt you will ſuffer this to turn to my diſadvantage, but will provide for me during my life in ſuch a manner, as may be for my honour, and for the honour of the government.

"Our naval force being increaſed to near double what it was at my acceſſion to the crown, the charge of maintaining it will be proportionably augmented; and it is certainly neceſſary, for the intereſt and reputation of England, to have always a great ſtrength at ſea.

"The circumſtances of affairs abroad are ſuch, that I think myſelf obliged to tell you my opinion, that England cannot be ſafe without a land-force; and I hope we ſhall not give thoſe, who mean us ill, the opportunity of effecting that under the notion of a peace, which they could not bring to paſs by a war.

"I doubt not but you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, will take theſe particulars into your conſideration in

But the caſe was altered; the whole world, more particularly our neighbours, have now got into the miſtaken notion of keeping up a mighty force; and the powerfulleſt of all theſe happens to be our next neighbour, who will very probably keep great armies; and we may appear too inviting, if we are in ſuch an open and unguarded condition, that the ſucceſs of the attempt may ſeem to be not only probable, but certain. England is an open country, full of plenty, every where able to ſubſiſt an army; our towns and cities are all open, our rivers are all fordable; no paſſes nor ſtrong places can ſtop an enemy, that ſhould land upon us; ſo that the whole nation lies open to any army, that ſhould once come into it.' To this it might be anſwered, 'Can an army be brought together, with a fleet to bring it over, and we know nothing of it? Theſe things require time, and we cannot be ſuppoſed ſo deſtitute of intelligence, as not to know of ſuch preparations. In ſuch a caſe our fleet will cover us, while our militia may be exerciſed, and marched where the danger is apprehended.' 'This, replies the author, may ſeem plauſible, and will no doubt work on ſuch, as do not conſider things with the attention, that is neceſſary. But do we not remember, that we were lately twice almoſt ſurprized; once from la Hogue, and again from Calais? We muſt not expect, that God will always work miracles for us, if we are wanting to ourſelves. If, in a time of war and jealouſy, we were ſo near the being fatally over-run, without either warning or intelligence; it is much more poſſible to ſee ſuch deſigns laid in a time of ſloth and quiet, when we are under no fears nor apprehenſions; and this may be ſo managed, that the notice we may have of it may come too late for us to be able to prevent or reſiſt it. And what will our intelligence ſignify, if we are in no condition, either to hinder the deſcent, or to withſtand the force, that may be ſent againſt us? Abſolute governments, where all depends on the will of the prince, and where men are ruined, who fail either in performing what is expected from them, or in keeping the ſecrecy, that is injoined them, can both contrive and execute things in another manner, than can be conceived by thoſe, who have the happineſs to live in free governments. Troops may have ſuch orders for marches and counter-marches, that thoſe, who are on the place, ſhall not be able to judge what is intended, till it is not poſſible to hinder it. Croſs winds may make this come yet later to thoſe, who have a ſea between them. Orders may be given to many different perſons in many different places, who ſhall know nothing of one another till they meet in a general rendezvous. It is true, we muſt ſuppoſe, that we ſhall have good fleets abroad; but one would not put ſo great a thing as the ſafety of a nation to ſuch a hazard, nor depend upon a ſingle ſecurity, when that is liable to accidents. The ſame wind, that may bring over a fleet and army to invade us, may keep our ſhips in port; ſo that it ſhall not be poſſible for them to look out; or, if they ſhould have a favourable minute to get out, it may ſo ſhatter them, that they ſhall not be able to defend either our ſeas or ports. This may well be ſuppoſed, for it really happened, when the king landed firſt in England: The late king had then a powerful fleet, which, if it could have engaged the Dutch, would have been probably too hard for them, eſpecially conſidering the tranſport fleet, that they guarded. But the eaſt-wind, that brought over the king, kept them in the river, till the Dutch had paſſed them; and, when they got out, a ſtorm ſtopped and ſhattered them ſo, that, without being able to come to any action, they were laid up. And would any man hazard the nation upon ſuch a contingency?' The author then conſiders the laſt thing in reſerve, which is our militia; and obſerves, the difference there is between troops, that have been long trained, who have learned the art, and are accuſtomed to the diſcipline of war, and the beſt bodies of raw and undiſciplined multitudes. The whole method of war is now ſuch, that diſciplined troops muſt prove a very unequal match to much greater numbers of men, who yet perhaps, upon half their practice, might prove too hard for them. I know it will be urged, that our militia may be ſo trained and modelled, as to be made more capable of ſervice than perhaps they are at preſent. This is a work of time, a project, that depends upon ſo many particulars, that may be ſubject to ſo many ſlips in the execution, that it muſt be confeſſed a nation is much expoſed, if its ſafety and preſervation muſt depend upon ſuch uncertainties. We have troops, that have paſſed through a long apprenticeſhip, and to our coſt have learned that unhappy trade, which is now become ſo univerſal, that it is thereby made neceſſary. We muſt either be preſerved by it, or periſh by it. Many gallant gentlemen have broke the courſe of their ſtudies, and the other methods of life they were in. It will not only be a hardſhip put upon them, but it will be the rendering ourſelves naked and defenceleſs, if, after all the reputation, that we have riſen to in war, we ſhould ſink into an unbecoming remiſſneſs in peace, and, upon the remote and uncertain fears of danger, that will probably never happen, expoſe ourſelves to thoſe, which we may certainly look for, as ſoon as we have put ourſelves out of a capacity of reſiſting them.' He then proceeds to the laſt and ſtrongeſt objection, which is, that 'this force will grow upon us, and continue among us, and have ſuch an influence within doors, that it will maintain itſelf in the houſe of commons; or, if that ſhould fail, it will turn them out of doors, and quickly find ways to ſubſiſt, to grow upon the ruins of liberty and property.' 'This, replied he, is a large field, and hiſtory is ſo full of inſtances this way, that it will be eaſy to open copiouſly on the ſubject. From the Prætorian cohorts down to our modern armies, enough can be gathered to give a very frightful repreſentation of a 'ſtanding army.' Who doubts it? But all the rhetoric, that this head will afford, is wrong applied in this caſe. It is not to be ſuppoſed, but that once a year a parliament muſt have this matter a-freſh under conſideration. They will ſee how the ſtate of affairs varies either at home or abroad; and whether the forces are brought under ſuch a management, that there is juſt cauſe of jealouſy. And I leave it to you to judge, whether it is poſſible in ſo ſhort a time ſo to model and influence it, as to prepare them to invade their country, and to deſtroy our conſtitution. What Cæſar, with all his genius, could not work his army to, but, after ten years conduct and ſucceſs, can give ſmall encouragement to others to attempt to bring about in one year. Perhaps you are more afraid of a ſecret influence than of open violence from them. The ſhort of this is, you are afraid the houſe will be corrupted. I confeſs it is hard to anſwer this: Jealouſy is ſtubborn and incurable; melancholy, when it grows to be a diſeaſe, raiſes many imaginary fears. They, who are haunted with that ſullen humour, neither know what they are afraid of, nor why. Poſſible accidents are ever before them; and the thinking of theſe perpetually ruins their health, ſours their humour, and makes them neglect all their preſent and certain concerns, while they are ever dreaming of what will probably never happen. We muſt conſider our preſent danger, and the likelieſt ways of ſecuring ourſelves from it, without amuſing ourſelves with what may poſſibly be brought about at ſome diſtance of time. Our repreſentatives do well to ſecure our conſtitution by the moſt effectual means they can think of; but, after all, we muſt truſt England to an houſe of commons, that is, to itſelf. Whenever the fatal time comes, that this nation grows weary of liberty, and has neither the virtue, the wiſdom, nor the force to preſerve its conſtitution, it will deliver all up, let all the laws poſſible, and all the bars imaginable, be put in the way to it. It is no more poſſible to make a government immortal, than to make a man immortal. I do not deny but ſeveral inconveniencies may be apprehended from a ſtanding force, and therefore I ſhould not go about to perſuade you to it, if the thing did not ſeem indiſpenſably neceſſary to our preſervation. I would not have us venture upon preſent and certain ruin, becauſe that, which muſt preſerve us now from it, may, at ſome time hereafter, have ill effects on our liberty. They cannot be conſiderable, as long as England is true to itſelf; and, whenſoever the nation has loſt that noble ſenſe of liberty, by which it has been ſo long preſerved, it will ſoon make fetters for itſelf, though it ſhould find none at hand ready made'.

ſuch a manner, as to provide the neceſſary ſupplies, which I do very earneſtly recommend to you.

My lords and gentlemen,

"That, which I moſt delight to think of, and am beſt pleaſed to own, is, that I have all the proofs of my people's affection, that a prince can deſire; and I take this occaſion to give them the moſt ſolid aſſurances, that, as I never had, ſo I never will, nor can have, any intereſt ſeparate from theirs.

"I eſteem it one of the greateſt advantages of the peace, that I ſhall now have leiſure to rectify ſuch corruptions or abuſes, as may have crept into any part of the adminiſtration during the war, and effectually to diſcourage profaneneſs and immorality. And I ſhall employ my thoughts in promoting trade, and advancing the happineſs and flouriſhing eſtate of the kingdom.

"I ſhall conclude with telling you, that as I have, with the hazard of every thing, reſcued your religion, laws, and liberties, when they were in the extremeſt danger; ſo I ſhall place the glory of my reign in preſerving them entire, and leaving them ſo to poſterity."

This ſpeech had various effects in the houſe of commons; but no part of it gave more offence than that, wherein the king told them, that in his opinion a ſtanding land-force was neceſſary. The commons carried the jealouſy of a ſtanding army ſo high, that they could not bear the motion, nor did they like the way the king took of offering them his opinion in that point. This ſeemed a preſcription to them, and might biaſs ſome in the counſels they were to offer the king, and be a bar to the freedom of debate: And therefore, as the managers for the court had no orders to name any number, the houſe came to a reſolution of paying off and diſbanding all the forces that had been raiſed ſince the year 1680 [q]. In vain was it urged, that the nation was ſtill unſettled, and not quite delivered from the fear of king James: That the friends of that abdicated prince were as bold and as numerous as ever, and himſelf ſtill protected by the French king, who, having as yet diſbanded none of his troops, was conſequently as formidable as before: That, if the army was entirely diſbanded, the peace, which was obtained at the expence of ſo much blood and treaſure, would be altogether precarious, and not only England, but all Europe lie once more at the mercy of that ambitious monarch an inveterate enemy to king William, the proteſtant religion, and the liberties of Chriſtendom, whom the neceſſity of his affairs, not his inclination, had reconciled. Notwithſtanding theſe and many other arguments, the vote paſſed, which brought the army to leſs than eight thouſand men. The court was ſtruck with this; and then tried, by an after-game, to raiſe the number to fifteen thouſand horſe and foot. If this had been propoſed in time, it would probably have been carried without any difficulty; but the king was ſo long upon the reſerve, that now, when he thought fit to ſpeak out his mind, he found it was too late. So that a force, not exceeding ten thouſand horſe and foot, was all that the houſe could be brought to. This gave the king the greateſt diſtaſte of any thing, that had befallen him in his whole reign. He thought it would derogate much from him, and render his alliance ſo inconſiderable, that he doubted, whether he could carry on the government, after it ſhould be reduced to ſo weak and ſo contemptible a ſtate. He ſaid, that, if he could have imagined, that, after all the ſervice he ſhould have done the nation, he ſhould have met with ſuch returns, he would never have meddled in the affairs of it; and that he was weary of governing a nation, that was ſo jealous, as to lay itſelf open to an enemy, rather than truſt him, who had acted ſo faithfully during his whole life, that he had never once deceived thoſe, who truſted him. This, and a great deal more to the ſame purpoſe, he ſaid to biſhop Burnet; but he ſaw the neceſſity of ſubmitting to that, which could not be helped.

During theſe debates, the earl of Sunderland had argued with many upon the neceſſity of keeping up a greater force. This was in ſo many hands, that he was charged as the author of the counſel, of keeping on foot a ſtanding army; he was therefore often named in the houſe of commons with many ſevere reflections, for which there had been but too much occaſion given during the two former reigns. The tories preſſed hard upon him, and the whigs were ſo jealous of him, that he, apprehending that, while the tories would attack him, the others would defend him but faintly, reſolved to prevent a public affront, and reſigned the office of lord chamberlain, not only againſt the intreaties of his friends, but even the king's earneſt deſire, that he would continue about him. Indeed, upon this occaſion, the king expreſſed ſuch a concern and value for him, that the jealouſies were increaſed by the confidence, which the court ſaw the king had in him. During the time of his credit, things had been carried on with more ſpirit and better ſucceſs than before. He had gained ſuch an aſcendant over the king, that he brought him to agree to ſome things, that few expected he would have yielded to. He managed the public affairs in both houſes with ſo much ſteadineſs and ſo good a conduct, that he had procured to himſelf a greater meaſure of eſteem, than he had in any of the former parts of his life; and the feeble and disjointed ſtate things fell into, after he withdrew, contributed not a little to eſtabliſh the character which his adminiſtration had gained him.

Purſuant to their reſolution, the commons granted a ſupply for diſbanding the army, and ordered the ſum of 250,000l. to be given as a gratuity to ſuch officers and ſoldiers, as were or ſhould be diſbanded [r]. Proviſion was alſo made for half-pay to commiſſion-officers being Engliſhmen; and a bill was ordered to be brought in, that the diſbanded ſoldiers might exerciſe their trade in any town or corporation in the kingdom.

The commons, after having reſolved the diſbanding of the army, under pretence of providing for the ſecurity of the kingdom, ordered a bill to be prepared for regulating the militia, and making them more uſeful; but, as it has been obſerved, this was no more than a pretence, for nothing was done towards ſuch a regulation, nor any act paſſed for that purpoſe.

To raiſe the ſums for diſbanding the army, and paying their arrears, and making good all deficiencies, amongſt other aids, a tax of three ſhillings in the pound was laid upon land, which was to be aſſeſſed on every county, in proportion to the rates of the firſt four ſhillings aid granted in 1691, by which means any future deficiency of this fund was prevented [s]. It was alſo reſolved by the commons, that the fourth part of the clear value of all the beneficial grants from the crown in England and Ireland, and all the forfeited eſtates which had been reſtored by the crown, ſince the reſtoration, ſhould be applied to the uſe of the public. But there were ſo many petitions againſt this, that no progreſs was made in the bill for it.

As it was true, that the revenues of the crown (as the king took notice in his ſpeech) were anticipated for public uſes, the commons did at laſt reſolve to grant what he had ſo earneſtly deſired ever ſince his advancement to the throne, namely, a revenue for life. Accordingly, a bill paſſed for a further ſubſidy of tonnage and poundage, towards raiſing the yearly ſum of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, for the ſervice of his majeſty's houſhold, during his life. This is now called 'the new ſubſidy,' and is much the ſame with the 'old ſubſidy,' of which an account has been given. It was deſigned to grant for the civil liſt no more than ſix hundred thouſand pounds; but as it had been promiſed at the treaty of Ryſwick, that, king James being now as dead to England, his queen ſhould enjoy her jointure, which was fifty thouſand pounds a year; and, as it was intended to ſettle a court about the duke of Glouceſter, who was then nine years old, to enable the king to bear theſe expences, this large proviſion was made for the civil liſt. But, by ſome great error in the mannagement, though the court never ſpent ſo little, yet payments were ill made, and, by ſome ſtrange conſumption, all was waſted. It is even ſaid, that though the king had thus obtained an encreaſe of 100,000l. to the civil liſt, on account of king James's queen's penſion, and the duke of Glouceſter's houſhold, that he never paid the queen one penny, nor allowed the duke of Glouceſter above 15,000l. a year; nay, ſo frugal was the king, that, though he kept the duke by women's hands, ſome time after the revenue was granted, he refuſed to advance one quarter of this allowance to buy plate and furniture; ſo the princeſs was forced to be at that expence herſelf.

While the commons were raiſing the ſupplies for the next year, the affair of the Eaſt-India trade, which had been depending ſo many years, was revived. The old company having offered to advance 700,000l. at four per cent. for the ſervice of the government, in caſe the trade to India might be ſettled on them, excluſive of all others, the houſe ſeemed inclined to embrace their propoſal; when another number of merchants, of whom ſir John Ward, ſir Francis Eyles, ſir Gilbert Heathcote, and Mr. Samuel Shepherd were the chief, and whoſe ſcheme was approved by Mr. Mountague, chancellor of the exchequer, propoſed to the houſe to raiſe two millions, upon the ſecurity of a good fund, to pay the intereſt at eight per cent. on condition the trade to India might be ſettled on the ſubſcribers, excluſive of all others. They alſo propoſed, that theſe ſubſcribers ſhould not be obliged to trade in a joint ſtock; but, if any members of them ſhould afterwards deſire to be incorporated, a charter ſhould be granted to them for that purpoſe. The houſe judged this new overture, not only to be more advantageous to the government, but likewiſe very likely to ſettle this controverted trade on a better foundation than it was on before. A bill was therefore brought into the houſe, for ſettling the trade to the Eaſt-Indies on thoſe, who ſhould ſubſcribe the two millions, according to the limitations beforementioned, and the following reſolutions [t]: 'Firſt, That every ſubſcriber might have the liberty of trading yearly to the amount of his reſpective ſubſcription, or might aſſign over ſuch his liberty of trading to any other perſon. Secondly, That his majeſty be impowered to incorporate ſuch of the ſubſcribers, as ſhould deſire the ſame. Thirdly, That the powers and privileges for carrying on the Eaſt-India trade ſhould be ſettled by parliament. Fourthly, That the ſubſcribers ſhould enjoy the eight pounds per cent. and liberty of trading to the Eaſt-Indies, excluſive of all others, for the term of ten years, and until the ſame ſhould be redeemed by parliament. Fifthly, That every perſon ſubſcribing five hundred pounds have a vote, and no perſon to have more votes, than one. Sixthly, That all ſhips, laden in the Eaſt-Indies, ſhould be obliged to deliver in England. Seventhly, That no perſon, who ſhould be a member of any corporation trading to the Eaſt-Indies, ſhould trade otherwiſe than in the joint ſtock of ſuch corporation, of which he was a member. Eightly, That five pounds per annum, 'ad valorem,' upon all returns from the Eaſt-Indies, be paid by the importer, to be placed to the account of the ſubſcribers, towards the charge of ſending embaſſadors, and other extraordinary expences [u]. And, ninthly, That over and above the duties now payable, a further duty of one ſhilling and ten-pence per pound weight be laid upon all wrought ſilks imported from India and Perſia, to be paid by the importer.' Againſt this bill, the old Eaſt-India company preſented a petition, to which the commons had ſo much regard, as to offer them to ſettle this trade upon them, if they would accept it on the ſame terms and limitations, on which the others were contented to take it. But the members of the old company, imagining they ſhould be too hard for the new in India, and make them weary of a loſing bargain, rejected the offer. However, the old company at laſt offered to advance the two millions; but it was now too late; for the party was formed againſt them, and their offer had no other effect, but to raiſe a clamour againſt this proceeding, as extremely rigorous, if not unjuſt. For though the king had reſerved a power to himſelf, by a clauſe in the old company's charter, to diſſolve them upon three years notice, and conſequently (it was urged) if ſuch notice was given, no injuſtice was done them, yet the clauſe (it was anſwered) reſerving that power, was to be conſidered only as a threatening, to oblige them to good conduct; and it was not uſual to diſſolve a company, by virtue of ſuch a clauſe, when no fault was objected. The commons, however, paſſed the bill in favour of the new adventurers, whoſe example, after hearing the arguments on both ſides, was followed by the lords. After which the bill received the royal aſſent [w].

nued for one year longer; and a duty laid upon all coals imported from Scotland, or other parts beyond ſea. The duties upon ſtamped vellum, parchment, and paper were doubled: The duties upon coffee, tea, chocolate, and ſpices were continued; as alſo the duty payable by hawkers and pedlars for the term of three years, to commence from the expiration of the preſent duties upon them; a further duty was laid upon ſalt; and the duties upon all luſtrings and alamodes imported were doubled; the time was enlarged for purchaſing annuities upon the ſeveral acts of parliament, for granting the ſame; and laſtly, an act paſſed for raiſing a ſum not exceeding two millions, upon a fund for payment of annuities after the rate of eight per cent per annum, redeemable by parliament.

[t] The fund for paying the intereſt of eight per cent. for theſe two millions was a duty upon ſalt, and an additional duty upon ſtamped vellum, parchment, and paper.

[u] This article refers to a part of the ſcheme propoſed to the miniſtry; which was, that his majeſty would be pleaſed to ſend an embaſſador extraordinary to the great mogul, in whoſe dominions the Eaſt-India company had their chief ſettlements and factories, to notify the eſtabliſhment of this new company, and deſire his protection and favour. The gentleman pitched upon for this employment, was ſir William Norris, member of parliament for Liverpool, who had a very noble allowance for his equipage and table; but the old company, who were in poſſeſſion of the ſettlements and factories, ſo managed matters in India, by their factors and agents, that not only the viceroys on the coaſts, but the emperor himſelf, received very ill impreſſions of the conduct and deſigns of the new company; and when ſir William Norris arrived there, it was three or four months before he could procure the neceſſary paſſes and convoys for the court at Agra, of which at laſt he had audience, but to very little purpoſe, being in no wiſe equal in benefit to the charges of the embaſſy only, and the embaſſador died in his return homewards.

[w] The old company followed the bill to the houſe of lords, where they were heard by their counſel, ſir Thomas Powis and ſir Bartholomew Shower. Thoſe readers, that are deſirous to know more of this matter, may find it in the repreſentation that was made to the lords, to the following effect.

'That this bill invaded their property, and ruined many families. That, in the charters granted them by queen Elizabeth, king James I. king Charles I. and king James II. it was ſuggeſted, that their corporation was for the honour of England, for the increaſe of navigation, and the advance of trade. That the ſaid charter contained a grant of the trade to Eaſt-India to the company, excluſive of all others. That by ſome of them they were conſtituted the lords proprietors of Bombay, and the Iſland of St. Helena. That by theſe grants they were induced to think they had a right in law to the trade, at leaſt that they ſhould have an uncontroverted title to the lands, and that on this preſumption, and relying on the public faith and credit of the great ſeal of England, they had expended above a million in fortifications, and acquired revenues of 44,000l. per annum, and many ſettlements and privileges. That, in the year 1691, the houſe of commons had made a reſolution, 'That the Eaſt-India trade ſhould be carried on in a joint ſtock, excluſive to all others.' That their company was confirmed and ſettled by three charters granted by his preſent majeſty on the 7th of October, and 17th of November 1693, and 28th of September 1694. That, upon the ſecurity of theſe charters, the company conſented to a new ſubſcription. That there was a-new ſubſcribed 744,000l. and the money brought in during the ſitting of the parliament: and that nothing was done, ſaid, or offered againſt his majeſty's charter of regulations; ſo that upon the public faith (at leaſt tacitly given) ſeven hundred and eighty-one new adventurers, of whom many were widows and orphans, did ſubſcribe a large part of their ſubſtance to ſupport this trade, during a hazardous war, for the profit and honour of England: And that the new adventurers thought they might without any hazard ſubſcribe on the ſecurity of a charter, which was ſo plainly deſigned by his majeſty to preſerve the Eaſt-India traffic, then in danger of being loſt. That, on the 10th of June, after the bill now depending before their lordſhips was brought in, the company did agree to ſubmit their preſent ſtock to a valuation of 50l. per cent. viz. 20l. per cent. for their dead ſtock, and 30l. per cent. for their quick ſtock, which they were contented to warrant at the ſaid ſums; and upon theſe terms they offered to open their books for new ſubſcriptions, in order to raiſe the two millions; That afterwards, to aſcertain the payments of the ſaid two millions, they had a general court on the 20th of June, in which they agreed to an immediate ſubſcription by private adventurers of 200,000l. to be paid at the firſt payment, ſubject to make good the ſubſequent payments; which ſubſcription was accordingly made.

Purſuant to this act, the commiſſioners, appointed by the king for taking ſubſcriptions towards the raiſing of two millions, and for ſettling a new Eaſt-India company, laid open their books at Mercers-hall, the 14th of July; and ſuch was the zeal, which people of all ranks, and even foreigners, ſhewed upon this occaſion, that, in two or three days, the whole ſum, and ſomething above it, was ſubſcribed. And, very probably, two millions more had been ſubſcribed, had not the books been ſhut before the diſtant corporations, private men in remote counties, and merchants beyond ſea, could remit their commiſſions for the ſums, which they intended to ſubſcribe. The diſpatch of ſo great a work in ſo few days, after the nation had borne ſo chargeable a war for ſo many years, ſurprized all the world. And as it greatly mortified all thoſe, who were aſſured, that the king would be diſappointed of this ſupply; ſo it gave the neighbouring nations an aſtoniſhing image, both of the opulence of England, and the ſtrength of the government.

However, this proceeding threw the old company, and all concerned in it, into the hands of the tories, which made a great breach and disjointing in the city of London. And it is certain, that this act, together with the inclinations, which thoſe of the whigs, who were in good poſts, had expreſſed, for keeping up a greater land-force, contributed to the blaſting of the reputation, which they had hitherto maintained, of being good patriots, and was made uſe of throughout England by the tories, to diſgrace both the king and them. To this, another charge of an high nature was added, that they robbed the public, and applied much of the money, that was given for the ſervice of the nation, both to the ſupporting a vaſt expence, and to the raiſing great eſtates to themſelves. This was ſenſible to the people, who were uneaſy under heavy taxes, and were too ready to believe, that, according to the practice in king Charles's time, a great deal of the money, that was given in parliament, was divided among thoſe, who gave it. Theſe clamours were raiſed and managed with great dexterity by thoſe, who intended to render the king, and all, who were beſt affected to him, ſo odious to the nation, that by this means they might carry ſuch an election of a new houſe of commons, as that by it all might be overturned. It was ſaid, that, the bank of England, and the new Eaſt-India company, being in the hands of whigs, they would have the command of all the money, and by conſequence of all the trade of England; and this raiſed the great oppoſition to the new company in both houſes of parliament. The king was very indifferent in the matter at firſt; but the greatneſs of the ſum, that was wanted, which could not probably be raiſed by any other project, prevailed on him.

Beſides the Eaſt-India trade, the commons took into conſideration that of the African company, which had long wanted a due regulation. And, upon account of the neceſſity of keeping up forts and caſtles for the defence of Engliſh factories on the coaſt of Guiney, there being no regular go-made. That it has been the conſtant practice in farms, bargains, and offers of the like nature, not to cloſe with a new propoſal, till the firſt bidder be aſked, whether he is able to advance further? And that, notwithſtanding their charters, and the right they had to the trade, they were early told their propoſal ſhould be oppoſed, though they offered the two millions in queſtion. And laſtly, That the bill allowed foreigners, as well as the king's ſubjects, to ſubſcribe to the two millions, whereby they would be let into the ſecrets and myſteries of this trade, which might produce effects very pernicious to the general intereſt of the nation.' To this the counſel for the new ſubſcribers replied, That, in the recital of their charters the old company, had omitted to give an account of the proviſos inſerted therein, viz. 'That the reſpective kings, that granted them, reſerved a power to make them void upon three years warning.' That the king by his charter could not grant the trade to the Eaſt-Indies, excluſive of all others; and that ſeveral recoveries had been made againſt them at law for proſecuting ſuch a pretended right. That, as the crown has not a power to grant ſuch a right, ſo his preſent majeſty had not in fact granted any ſuch right excluſive. That, when they mentioned the reſolution of the commons in 1691. they omitted their other reſolution, 'That it was lawful for all perſons to trade to the Eaſt-Indies, unleſs reſtrained by act of parliament.' Neither did they take notice of the two addreſſes made by the houſe of commons to the king in 1691 and 1692 to diſſolve the company. That on the 14th of November 1692, ſir Edward Seymour delivered to the commons a meſſage, importing, 'That, his majeſty had required the Eaſt-India company to anſwer directly, whether they would ſubmit to ſuch regulations, as his majeſty ſhould judge proper and moſt likely to advance the trade? And the company having agreed to it, and declared their reſolution in writing, his majeſty had commanded a committee of his privy-council to prepare regulations; which they did, and offered them to the company; but that, notwithſtanding their declaration of ſubmiſſion, they rejected almoſt all the material particulars, ſo that his majeſty finding, that, what poſſibly the houſe of commons might have expected, and indeed was neceſſary to preſerve this trade, could not be perfected by his own authority alone; and that the company could not be induced to conſent to any ſuch regulations, as might have anſwered the intentions of the houſe of commons, and that the concurrence of the parliament was requiſite to make a complete and uſeful ſettlement of this trade, he had directed all the proceedings in this matter to be laid before them, and recommended to them the preparing ſuch a bill, in order to paſs into an act of parliament, as might eſtabliſh this trade on ſuch foundations, as were moſt likely to preſerve and advance it.' It was alſo urged againſt the old company, that, their charter being become void by their non-payment of the tax impoſed upon them by parliament, they obtained a new charter, the 7th of October 1693, by indirect means, having that year paid eighty odd thouſand pounds out of the company's ſtock for ſpecial ſervice. That this charter was conteſted before the queen and council by thoſe they called 'interlopers,' upon the hearing whereof it was unanſwerably proved, that the king had not, by law, a power to grant the trade to ſome perſons excluſive of others, and that the company's affairs were then in ſuch a condition, that it would be a plain cheat to others, that ſhould come in upon their ſtock. That however, law and reaſon failing, they had recourſe to other methods, and great ſums of money were diſtributed (as it was acknowledged before a committee of both houſes of parliament) to get another charter; but that thoſe, who were concerned to adviſe his majeſty in point of law, were ſo juſt to their truſt, as to take care, that no right of trade excluſive of others was granted; and alſo that the company ſhould ſubmit to ſuch alterations, reſtrictions, and qualifications, as the king ſhould make on the 29th of September, 1693, following; and ſo, on the 17th of November 1693, a new charter of regulations was made, and another the 28th of September 1694, wherein, amongſt other things was this proviſo; 'That if it ſhould appear to the king, his heirs and ſucceſſors, that the ſaid two charters, or any other charters heretofore granted, ſhould not be profitable to the king, his heirs, and ſucceſſors, or to this realm; that then and from thenceforth, upon and after three years warning to be given to the ſaid company by the king, &c. the ſame ſhould ceaſe, be void, and determine.' That it appeared by the proceedings of the houſe of commons in 1694, how this charter was obtained; which had more in it of private promiſes than public faith: That it was not to be wondered, that the parliament took no notice of the matter, whilſt the new ſubſcribers paid in their money, when it was conſidered, that, according to ſir Baſil Firebraſs's depoſitions, 'there were ſeveral contracts, ſome to the value of 60,000l. on account of procuring a new charter, and others to the value of 40,000l. on account of procuring an act of parliament. That by ſuch means the matter might be overlooked for a while, but it was not long before the parliament took public notice of it; and, if the greater affairs of the nation had not been ſo urgent, and the ſeſſion been ſo near an end, perhaps the company might have had juſtice done them, and had been paſſed complaining of any imaginary injuſtice done them now. That therefore it was plain, that it was not for the profit and honour of the nation, and to ſupport the trade, that the new ſubſcribers came in; but that they were deluded into it by a charter obtained by indirect ways, and by the hopes of an act of parliament to confirm it, to be obtained in the ſame manner. That the trade would have been much better preſerved, and more to the honour of the nation, if no ſuch underhand practices had been carried on. That if ſome perſons, thinking themſelves to have a greater reach, than others, or being deceived by the old company's making his majeſty believe their ſtock to be worth 750,000l. and by afterwards ſharing 325,000l. of the new ſubſcribers money among themſelves, only the perſons failing them, who promiſed to get an act of parliament, or by loſſes at ſea, or by what other means ſoever it were, happened to fail in their expectation, nobody was anſwerable for it but themſelves; eſpecially ſince they had warning enough by the tranſactions before the council. It was alledged farther, that in the reigns of Edward III. and queen Elizabeth, upon complaint in parliament of patents granted for monopolies, moſt of them were immediately revoked, and the reſt left to the law. That, in king James I's time, an act of parliament paſſed to make void a charter for the ſole trade to Spain, and another againſt all monopolies. That though the patents for ſome trades with joint ſtocks (whilſt the trades, for which they were granted, were in their infancy) have been permitted for the ſettling of a trade, and till the firſt adventurers have reaped ſome reaſonable compenſation for their firſt undertaking and adventures, yet afterwards, when thoſe trades have increaſed and become great, the wiſdom of the nation has always thought fit to open a way for the kingdom to receive a general benefit thereby. That it never was eſteemed a breach of the public faith, or a derogation either from the credit of the great ſeal, or from the honour of our kings, to have their patents annulled by parliament, when the grants were thought by that grand council of the nation not to be profitable, or to be againſt the common right of the ſubject, and that no king or queen thought themſelves bound in honour or conſcience not to paſs an act of parliament to make void ſuch patents. That the king, being buſied in the many arduous affairs of the kingdom, cannot be ſuppoſed to know always what he might legally grant, and is oftentimes deceived in his grants; and for that reaſon they are often annulled by the ordinary courſe of law; and ſo might this company's patent have been; for, all perſons having a right by law to trade to the Eaſt-Indies, unleſs excluded by parliament, the king by his charter could not grant to the company any new right to the trade, beſides the privileges of an incorporated body; but that the commons juſtly bearing an high veneration to his preſent majeſty, who had run ſo great hazards and performed ſo glorious atchievements for the honour and good of the nation, had notwithſtanding taken care in this bill, that nothing ſhould interfere with his majeſty's patent. That by this patent the old company had indeed power to trade to the Eaſt-Indies, and other privileges, but without any expreſs clauſe to exclude others, or any covenant (as was in the former charters from the crown) that his majeſty would not grant licence to others, to trade thither, during the continuance of the ſaid charter; ſo that even, according to the charters themſelves, all other ſubjects of England had a right to trade to the Eaſt-Indies, and many actually traded thither without any hindrance. That, though the old company talked ſo much of their dependence on the ſecurity of their charters, yet they themſelves were convinced, that their right was not well founded, ſince they had formerly laid out ſo much money to get an act of parliament to confirm their charters, and had lately offered to lend 700,000l. to the government, to have the trade to themſelves, excluſive of all others. As to their offering afterwards to raiſe two millions, it was anſwered, That they made no ſuch offer with an intention that it ſhould take effect, but only as an amuſement to gain time, and ſo to baffle the bill; for, when they agreed to ſubmit their ſtock to a valuation of 50l. per cent, they knew very well, that others did not value it, at any thing near ſo much. And as to their ſubſcribing 200,000l. ſubject to make good the ſubſequent payments of the two millions, that it was only to obtain what they had been ſo long aiming at, viz. an act of parliament 'excluſive,' for the ſum of 200,000l. whereby the king would be defeated of a much more conſiderable loan; others delivering in ſubſcriptions for about 1,200,000l. And, laſtly, that the old company heretofore thought it an advantage to admit foreigners into their trade; and that many were actually now in the preſent company, though they were pleaſed to argue againſt it.

vernment among thoſe barbarous people, on whoſe protection they might ſafely rely, the parliament made a bill to ſettle the company, and to enable them to maintain all ſuch forts, as they now had in their poſſeſſion, or ſhould hereafter purchaſe or erect for the preſervation of their trade; and enacted at the ſame time, that any of the ſubjects of this realm, as well as the company, might, after the 24th of June, trade from England, or after the 1ſt. of Auguſt, from any of his majeſty's plantations in America, to the coaſt of Africa, between Cape Mount and the Cape of Good Hope, both the company and the free traders or interlopers, anſwering a duty of ten per cent. of the value of the goods exported thither from England, or from his majeſty's American plantations, towards the maintenance of the forts and ſettlements.

Notwithſtanding the ſevere laws, that were in force againſt ſuch as tranſport Engliſh wool to foreign parts, who are commonly called Owlers, yet many of them, encouraged by the powerful incentive of gain, continued their clandeſtine practices to the great detriment of the nation, and profit of the French, who had lately ſet up a conſiderable woollen manufacture in Picardy. The parliament therefore, the more effectually to obviate that evil, made many prudent proviſions in an act 'for explanation and better execution of former acts againſt tranſportation of wool, fuller's earth, and ſcouring clay.'

The parliament likewiſe, this ſeſſion, applied themſelves with great diligence to diſcover and puniſh ſuch offenders, who carried on a fraudulent and ſecret commerce with France, and, to the great damage of the 'royal luſtring company' of this kingdom, had, for divers years paſt, ſurreptitiouſly brought in great quantities of French alamodes and luſtrings. The firſt occaſion of this diſcovery was a paſs from the admiral of France for an Engliſh ſhip, that ſerved at once for the owling and ſmuggling trades; which paſs, at the breaking out of the late conſpiracy, was intercepted at the poſt-office, together with all the letters, which at that time were either coming from France, or ſending thither. This paſs had a long time remained uſeleſs in the hands of the ſecretary of ſtate, by reaſon it was granted on a ſuppoſititious name; but the ſame being communicated to Mr. Hilary Renew, an eminent French proteſtant merchant, who was the chief manager and promoter of the luſtring company, and who, upon ſeveral occaſions, had done ſignal ſervices to the government, he, by this help, and other concurring indications, at laſt found out the ſmugglers, and, having cauſed their books to be ſeized, petitioned the houſe of commons, in the name of the royal luſtring company, that theſe books, letters, and other papers, in which the contrivances to ruin the luſtring manufacture in this kingdom appear, might be laid before the houſe and examined. The commons received this petition, and referred the matter to the committee of trade, at the head of which was then ſir Rowland Gwyn, who, with unwearied application and induſtry, made a full diſcovery of the ſmuggling traders, to which they themſelves gave no ſmall handle, by the ill contrived and incoherent metaphors, under which, in their correſpondence with their agents in France, they endeavoured to conceal their unlawful practices; as, for inſtance, when they ſaid, 'That the cart (meaning the ſhip) would not ſet out, becauſe of the contrary winds.' Sir Rowland having made his report of the whole matter to the houſe of commons, it was reſolved on the 20th of April, 'That the manufacture of luſtrings and alamodes, ſet up by the luſtring company, had been very advantageous and beneficial to the kingdom, by employing great numbers of the poor, and preventing the exportation of our coin, for purchaſing of thoſe commodities. That there had been a very deſtructive trade carried on with France, during the war, for importing alamodes and luſtrings contrary to law, whereby the king had been defrauded of his cuſtoms, and our own manufactures greatly diſcouraged. That the ſame veſſels, which imported alamodes and luſtrings, exported great quantities of our wool. That thereby intelligence had been carried into France, during the war, and the enemies of the government had been conveyed from juſtice out of this kingdom (particularly Cardell Goodman) and had frequent opportunities of returning hither to carry on their pernicious deſigns. That by the intercepted letter, wherein the French king's paſſport was incloſed, compared with Mr. John Goudet's hand writing, and the copy of the ſaid letter entered in Mr. Goudet's copy-book of letters, and by Mr. Goudet's ſeal, wherewith the paſſport letter was ſealed, it did appear, that the ſaid paſſport was procured and paid by the ſaid Mr. Goudet and company. That the ſaid paſſport was ſent back, in order to be renewed, the time, for which it was granted, being expired. That Goudet, Longueville, and Barreau were partners, during the time this ſmuggling trade was carried on. That Mr. Stephen Seignoret, Mr. Baudouin, and Mr. Santini were alſo partners, and had imported great quantities of French alamodes and luſtrings. That Mr. Peter de Hearce dealt with ſeveral perſons in France for French ſilks, and other commodities from France, under ſeveral fictitious and counterfeit names. That John du Maiſtre, Peter Baraillau, Diana Maſon, John Auriol, Iſaac Auriol, John Pancier, John Guggier, and ſeveral others, had been concerned in the ſmuggling trade. That a bill be brought in 'For the encouragement of the luſtring company, and the more effectual preventing the fraudulent importation of luſtrings and alamodes, and the exportation of wool and fuller's earth.' That John Goudet, David Barreau, Peter Longueville, Stephen Seignoret, René Baudouin, Nicholas Santini, and Peter de Hearce (to whom were afterwards added John Pierce, John du Maitre, and John Auriol) be impeached before the lords of high crimes and miſdemeanors, and be taken into the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms attending this houſe. That the reſt of the ſmugglers be proſecuted by Mr. Attorney-general and Mr. Sollicitor general. And laſtly, that Mr. Hilary Renew, for the great ſervice done this kingdom in promoting the manufacture of alamodes and luſtrings, and diſcovering the fraudulent importation thereof, and exportation of wool, deſerved the countenance and protection of the government: And that a bill for naturalizing him and his family be permitted to paſs this houſe 'gratis.'

The impeached ſmugglers having put in their anſwer to the articles exhibited againſt them, and the committee of the houſe of commons made their replications, a great diſpute aroſe between both houſes of parliament; the lords inſiſting, that the trials ſhould be at the bar of their houſe, where the committee of the commons muſt have ſtood; and the commons, on the other hand, inſiſting upon their having a convenient place appointed for the managers of the impeachments againſt the priſoners, whereby they might be better enabled to make good their charge againſt them. This gave occaſion for a conference, which being ineffectual to accommodate the matter, the commons reſolved, that they would be preſent at the trials, as a committee of the whole houſe, in regard the affair was of great conſequence to the trade of the kingdom. Whereupon the lords acquainted the commons, that they would proceed, on the Monday following, upon the trials at Weſtminſter, where ſeats would be provided for both houſes. All this while the perſons accuſed had conceived no ſmall hopes of impunity from the diſagreement between the lords and commons, but, when they ſaw that matter adjuſted, eight of them confeſſed themſelves guilty. Whereupon the commons went up to the bar of the lords houſe, and their ſpeaker in their name having demanded judgment againſt the offenders, the lords impoſed a fine of ten thouſand pounds upon Stephen Seignoret; of three thouſand pounds on René Baudouin; of fifteen hundred pounds on John Goudet and Nicholas Santini; of one thouſand pounds on Peter de Hearce, John Pierce, and John du Maitre; and of five hundred pounds on David Barreau; and ordered, that they ſhould be impriſoned in Newgate, until they had paid their reſpective fines; and the commons addreſſed the king, that thoſe fines might be appropriated to Greenwich hoſpital, which he ordered accordingly.

Another ſort of offenders were this ſeſſion animadverted upon by the commons, but had the good fortune to eſcape with impunity. The Exchequer bills were at this time of very great uſe in the nation, by ſupplying the ſcarcity of money, during the recoining of the ſilver ſpecies. Now becauſe there was an intereſt of ſeven pounds twelve ſhillings per ann. allowed upon the ſecond iſſuing of theſe bills out of the Exchequer, after they had been paid in, on any of the king's taxes, whereas at their firſt iſſuing out of the Exchequer they bore no intereſt, this encouraged ſeveral of the king's officers, both in the Exchequer, the Cuſtoms, and the Exciſe, to contrive together to get great ſums of money by falſe indorſements on theſe Exchequer bills, before they had circulated about, and been brought into any branch of the king's revenue. The moſt conſiderable perſons, who had carried on this unwarrantable practice, were Mr. Charles Duncomb, receiver-general of the Exciſe; Mr. John Knight, treaſurer of the cuſtoms; Mr. Bartholomew Burton, who had a place in the exciſe-office; and Mr. Reginald Marriot, one of the deputy-tellers of the exchequer; which laſt, to procure his pardon, compounded to accuſe the reſt. Upon a full proof of the matter, Duncomb and Knight, who were members of the houſe of commons, were firſt expelled the houſe, and committed priſoners to the Tower; Burton ſent to Newgate, and bills ordered to be brought in to puniſh them. The bill againſt Mr. Duncomb, when a fine of near half his eſtate, which was computed at 400,000l. [x], was ſet upon him, quickly paſſed the houſe of commons, notwithſtanding the oppoſition that was made to it, particularly by ſir Thomas Trevor the attorney-general. But, being ſent up to the houſe of lords, and the houſe being equally divided, the duke of Leeds gave his caſting vote for rejecting the bill. But, Mr. Duncomb being ſet at liberty by the order of the houſe of lords, without the conſent of the commons, the latter reſented it to that degree, that they cauſed him to be remanded to the Tower of London, where he continued till the end of the ſeſſion. The bills againſt Knight and Burton had the ſame fate; and ſo all the noiſe this ſort of forgery had made, in town and country, was huſhed on a ſudden, and no more heard of it.

[1698.] The commons, this year, deſigned to apply part of all the forfeited eſtates to the uſe of the public; in order to which, they inquired into the grants made by king Charles II. and king James II. and ordered a bill to be brought in to make them void. Afterwards they examined the grants made by king William in Ireland; and, becauſe a grant was found made to Mr. Raylton, which Mr. Mountague, chancellor of the exchequer, owned to be for his benefit, a warm debate aroſe; and Mr. Mountague's enemies moved, 'That he ſhould withdraw;' which paſſing in the negative, it was reſolved by a great majority, 'That it was the opinion of this houſe, that the honourable Charles Mountague, chancellor of the exchequer, for his good ſervices to this government, did deſerve his majeſty's favour.'

The next day, the commons in a body preſented an addreſs to the king, wherein 'they with great joy and comfort remembered the teſtimonies, which his majeſty had given them of his ſincerity and zeal for the reformed religion as eſtabliſhed in this kingdom; and in particular they acknowledged the late declaration, which his majeſty had made from the throne, "That he would effectually diſcourage profaneneſs and immorality;' which, chiefly by the neglect and ill example of too many, were (like a general contagion) diffuſed and ſpread throughout the kingdom, to the great ſcandal and reproach of the proteſtant religion, and to the diſhonour and prejudice of his majeſty's government. Therefore, in concurrence with his majeſty's pious intentions, they moſt humbly deſired, that his majeſty would iſſue out his royal proclamation, commanding all judges, juſtices of the peace, and other magiſtrates, to put in ſpeedy execution the good laws, that were now in force, againſt profaneneſs and immorality, giving encouragement to all ſuch, as did their duty therein. And, ſince the examples of men in high and public ſtations have a powerful influence upon the lives of others, they moſt humbly beſought his majeſty, that all vice, profaneneſs, and itreligion might in a particular manner be diſcouraged in all thoſe, who had the honour to be employed near his royal perſon, and in all others, who were in his majeſty's ſervice by ſea or land; and that his majeſty would upon all occaſions diſtinguiſh piety and virtue by marks of his favour. They further beſought his majeſty to give effectual orders for the ſuppreſſing all pernicious books and pamphlets, which contained impious doctrines againſt the Holy Trinity, and other fundamental articles of the proteſtant faith, tending to the ſubverſion of the Chriſtian religion; and that his majeſty's proclamation might be ordered to be read at leaſt four times in the year in all churches and chapels, immediately after divine ſervice; and at the aſſizes and quarter ſeſſions of the peace, juſt before the charge is given.' The king's anſwer was, 'That he could not but be very well pleaſed with an addreſs of this nature, and he would give immediate directions in the ſeveral particulars they deſired. But that he could wiſh that ſome more effectual proviſion were made for the ſuppreſſing thoſe pernicious books and pamphlets, which their addreſs took notice of.' And on the 28th of February was publiſhed a proclamation for preventing and puniſhing immorality and profaneneſs; and the houſe of lords, to expreſs their zeal for ſo good a deſign, prepared and paſſed a bill 'for the more effectual ſuppreſſing atheiſm, blaſphemy, and profaneneſs,' to which, after ſeveral conferences, the commons gave their concurrence.

It is remarked, that the diviſions among the clergy, at that time, was one great encouragement to the profane. There were manifeſtly two different parties among them; one was firm and faithful to the preſent government, and ſerved it with zeal; theſe did not envy the diſſenters the eaſe, that the toleration gave them; they wiſhed for a favourable opportunity of making ſuch alterations, in ſome few rites and ceremonies, as might bring into the church thoſe, who were not at too great a diſtance from it. Others took the oaths indeed, and concurred in every act of compliance with the government, but they were not only cold in ſerving it, but were always blaming the adminiſtration, and aggravating misfortunes; they expreſſed a great eſteem for jacobites, and, in all elections gave their votes to thoſe, who leaned that way: At the ſame time, they ſhewed great reſentments againſt the diſſenters, and were enemies to the toleration, and ſeemed reſolved never to conſent to any alteration in their favour. The bulk of the clergy ran this way, ſo that the moderate party was far out-numbered. Profane minds had too great advantages from this, in reflecting ſeverely on a body of men, that took oaths, and performed public devotions, when the reſt of their lives was too public and too viſible a contradiction to ſuch oaths and prayers.

About the ſame time, was formed the 'Society for the reformation of manners,' which took its riſe in the following manner.

In the reign of king James II. the fear of popery was ſo ſtrong, as well as juſt, that many perſons in and about London began to meet often together, both for devotion and for their further inſtruction. Things of that kind had been formerly practiſed only among the puritans and diſſenters; but thoſe were of the church, and came to the miniſters to be aſſiſted with forms of prayer and other directions. They were chiefly conducted by Dr. Beveridge and Dr. Horneck. Some diſliked this, and were afraid it might be the original of new factions and parties; but others thought, that it was not fit nor decent to check a ſpirit of devotion, at ſuch a time. It might have given ſcandal, and it ſeemed a diſcouraging of piety, and might be a means to drive well meaning perſons over to the diſſenters. After the revolution theſe ſocieties grew more numerous, and, for a greater encouragement to devotion, they got ſuch collections to be made, as maintained many clergymen to read prayers in ſo many public places, and at ſo many different hours, that devout perſons might have that comfort at every hour of the day. There were likewiſe conſtant ſacraments every Sunday, in many churches; and there were both greater numbers and greater appearances of devotion at prayers and ſacraments, than had been obſerved in the memory of man. Theſe ſocieties reſolved to inform the magiſtrates of ſwearers, drunkards, profaners of the Lord's day, and of lewd houſes, and threw in that part of the fine, given by law to informers, into a ſtock of charity. From this they were called 'Societies for the reformation of manners,' and were encouraged by ſome magiſtrates, tho' treated roughly by others.

There was alſo about the ſame time another deſign laid, and chiefly managed by an active divine, Dr. Thomas Bray, for propagating the goſpel in foreign parts, by ſending over miſſionaries, catechiſms, liturgies, and other books for the inſtruction of the people, too ignorant and profane, in our Weſt-India colonies and plantations. He had taken great pains to promote this undertaking, and had procured the contributions of many perſons, to inable him to proceed in in the burden and growing expences of it. And, to take all opportunities of eſtabliſhing a fund for this project, upon the ſecond reading of a bill in the houſe of commons, 'for the better diſcovery of eſtates given to ſuperſtitious uſes,' the doctor preſented a petition to the houſe, praying, that ſome part of theſe eſtates might be ſet apart for the propagation of the reformed religion in Maryland, Virginia, and the Leeward Iſlands; or elſe that ſome other proviſion might be made for that purpoſe.

The earl of Macclesfield, to vindicate the honour of his family, was forced now to publiſh the ſhame of his marriage bed, and to prefer a bill in the houſe of lords, to be divorced from his wife. It ſeems his lady, about ten years before, being weary of living with the earl's father, under whoſe care her huſband had left her, during his abſence beyond ſea, retired to her mother the lady Maſon's houſe. The earl, being returned home, and reſenting the ſtep of his lady, which ſhe had made without his privity, inſtead of recalling her, ſuffered her to live in a ſtate of ſeparation; during which, it is no wonder, ſhe was tempted to break her matrimonial vows, ſince her huſband did not perform his. Accordingly, about the end of the year 1696, ſhe was delivered of a daughter. The death of this child, before the earl had heard any thing of the matter, with the belief, that this might be a ſufficient warning againſt liberties that carried ſuch viſible effects with them, reſtrained him from attempting public ſatisfaction; and beſides, at the ſolicitation

[x] He had a little before purchaſed the great manor of Helmeſly in Yorkſhire, of the truſtees for George Villiers late duke of Buckingham, at 95,000l. and paid down the money, when the want of coin was the moſt complained of.

of his wife's relations, who undertook for her conduct for the future, he conſented to allow her 500l. a year for a ſeparate maintenance. This treaty was ſcarce concluded, when, the earl being informed of his lady's being delivered of another child, he commenced a ſuit in the ſpiritual court for ſuch a divorce, as might be given by that law. But, being diſappointed in his proſecution, through the dilatorineſs of eccleſiaſtical proceedings, he applied himſelf to his peers for a remedy, which nothing but a parliament could give; all the relief, which he could expect from a ſentence in Doctors Commons, being no more than that ſtate of ſeparation, in which he and his lady had long lived. He alledged, That it is evident, that the divine law admits of ſecond marriages in ſuch caſes, and that there had been acts of parliament for them, as well as for baſtardizing ſpurious iſſue: that thoſe canons, which have prohibited ſecond marriages in like caſes, were ſo manifeſtly an effect of the popiſh doctrine of marriage being a ſacrament, and of the avarice of the court of Rome, to get money for diſpenſing with them, that, in the reformation of eccleſiaſtical laws, prepared and intended in the time of Edward VI, in purſuance of an act of parliament of Henry VIII, there was expreſs liberty given by thoſe canons to marry again, which, by virtue of that act of parliament, would have become a general law, or, at leaſt, have occaſioned one. That whatever objection might be againſt ſuch a general law from the temptation, which it might give ill people to ſeek groundleſs diſſolutions of marriages; yet, upon extraordinary caſes, ſuch as this was, ſuch relief had been granted; and, where it had been denied, either the fact had not been fully proved, or the parties had cohabited, or, after the grounds of diſſatisfaction, had been reconciled. That if in ſuch a concurrence of circumſtances, as were in his caſe, he muſt ſtill be thought to have a wife, and the children ſhe had, muſt be looked upon as his, from the common preſumption, till contrary proof, in that they were born within the four ſeas; beſides, that it could not be but too great an encouragement to women, to make an ill uſe of a ſeparate maintenance, which is provided for in moſt marriage ſettlements, it would be a moſt unreaſonable hardſhip upon him, that the ſtanding law, which is deſigned to do every man right, ſhould, by the rigour of the letter, be to him the cauſe of the greateſt wrong; and that, for his wife's fault, he ſhould be deprived of the common privilege of every freeman in the world, to have an heir of his own body, to inherit what he poſſeſſed, either of honour or eſtate; or that his only brother ſhould loſe his claim to both, and have his birthright ſacrificed to the lady Macclesfield's irregular life.

While this affair was depending in the ſpiritual court, the lady Macclesfield inſiſted upon her innocence, and her agents induſtriouſly ſpread a report, that the earl, her huſband, had been ſurprized into a private meeting with her, by a woman of intrigue. But, this ſtory being confuted by the earl's poſitive evidence to the contrary, ſhe gave up that point, and only endeavoured to make her huſband the author of her miſcarriages. She alledged, that the late earl of Macclesfield, her father in law, had turned her out of doors; that the preſent earl, notwithſtanding the obligation ſhe had laid upon him, by petitioning king James for his life,, had maliciouſly ſecluded her from bed and board. And therefore, if the lords thought fit to paſs this bill of divorce, ſhe demanded her fortune to be refunded, both becauſe a divorce diſſolves the whole frame of the marriage contract, and becauſe it were the higheſt injuſtice, that a man, who was guilty of making his wife commit adultery, ſhould be rewarded out of the ſame wife's fortune. This affair occaſioned great debates in the upper houſe; ſome peers repreſenting the danger of granting divorces; and others, amongſt whom Dr. Burnet, biſhop of Saliſbury, ſpoke the longeſt, ſhewing the neceſſity and lawfulneſs of ſuch extraordinary proceedings in ſome particular caſes. Upon the whole matter, the lords paſſed a bill 'for diſſolving the marriage between Charles earl of Macclesfield and Anne his wife, and to illegitimate her children;' but with a proviſo, that the earl ſhould refund her fortune. This bill being ſent down to the commons, the parties concerned were both heard by their counſel; but, notwithſtanding the lady Macclesfield's oppoſition, the bill was read the third time, and paſſed without any amendment, and received the royal aſſent.

On the 21ſt of May, a complaint was made to the commons of a printed book, intitled, 'The caſe of Ireland's being bound by acts of parliament in England ſtated,' written by William Molyneux, of Dublin, a gentleman of eminent parts and learning. In this book the authority of the parliament of England being denied to be binding to Ireland, a committee was appointed to inquire into the author of it, and what proceedings had been in Ireland, that might occaſion it. Upon the report of the committee, it was unanimouſly reſolved, 'That the book was of dangerous conſequence to the crown and people of England, by denying the authority of the king and parliament of England, to bind the kingdom and people of Ireland; and the ſubordination and dependence, that Ireland has and ought to have upon England, as being united and annexed to the Imperial crown of this realm; and that a bill, intitled, 'An act for the better ſecurity of his majeſty's perſon and government,' tranſmitted under the great ſeal of Ireland, whereby an act of parliament made in England was pretended to be re-enacted, and alterations therein made, and divers things enacted alſo, pretending to oblige the courts of juſtice, and the great ſeal of England, by the authority of an Iriſh parliament, had given occaſion and encouragement to the forming and publiſhing the dangerous poſitions contained in this book.' After which, the commons, in a body, preſented an addreſs to the king, wherein, having repreſented the caſe, they humbly beſought him, 'That he would give effectual orders to prevent any thing of the like nature for the future, and the pernicious conſequences of what was paſſed, by puniſhing and diſcountenancing thoſe who had been guilty thereof; that he would take all neceſſary care, that the laws, which direct and reſtrain the parliament of Ireland in their actings, be not evaded, but ſtrictly obſerved; and that he would diſcourage all things, which might in any degree leſſen the dependence of Ireland upon England.' To this the king anſwered, 'That he would take care, that what was complained of, might be prevented and redreſſed, as the commons deſired.'

This ſeſſion likewiſe, upon complaints made, that the woollen manufacture was carried on in Ireland, to the great prejudice of that ſtaple trade in England, the commons took care to ſtop the progreſs of that growing evil. They entered upon a bill for that purpoſe, but it terminated at laſt in an addreſs to the king, importing, 'That being very ſenſible, that the wealth and power of this kingdom do in a great meaſure depend on the preſerving the woollen manufacture, as much as poſſible, entire to this realm, they thought it became them, like their anceſtors, to be jealous of the eſtabliſhment and the increaſe thereof elſewhere, and to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to prevent it. That they could not without trouble obſerve, that Ireland, which is dependent on, and protected by England in the enjoyment of all they have, and which is ſo proper for the linen manufacture, the eſtabliſhment and growth of which would be ſo enriching to themſelves, and ſo profitable to England, ſhould of late apply itſelf to the woollen manufacture, to the great prejudice of the trade of this kingdom, and ſo unwillingly promote the linen trade, which would benefit both nations. That the conſequence thereof would neceſſitate his majeſty's parliament of England to interpoſe, to prevent this miſchief, unleſs his majeſty, by his authority and great wiſdom, ſhould find means to ſecure the trade of England, by making his ſubjects of Ireland to purſue the joint intereſt of both kingdoms. Wherefore they implored his majeſty's protection and favour in this matter; and that he would make it his royal care, and injoin all thoſe, whom he employed in Ireland, to uſe their utmoſt diligence to hinder the exportation of wool from Ireland (except it be imported hither) and for the diſcouraging the woollen manufacture, and the increaſing the linen manufacture in Ireland; to which the commons of England ſhould always be ready to give their utmoſt aſſiſtance.' To this addreſs his Majeſty made anſwer, 'That he ſhould do all that in him lay, to promote the trade of England, and to diſcourage the woollen and encourage the linen manufacture in Ireland.'[y]

Purſuant to this addreſs, the earl of Galway and the other

[y] About this time the king wrote the following letter to the earl of Galway.

Kenſington, July 16, 1698.

Tho' I have largely explained to the chancellor of Ireland my ſentiments about the Iriſh affairs, I am willing however to write to you, to tell you, that it was never of ſuch importance to have at preſent a good ſeſſion of parliament, not only in regard to my affairs of that kingdom, but eſpecially of this here. The chief thing that muſt be tried to be prevented, is, that the Iriſh parliament takes no notice of what has paſſed in this here, and that you make effectual laws for the linen manufacture, and diſcourage as far as poſſible the woollen. Theſe are the two moſt material points you have to accompliſh; and the third is, the neceſſary ſupply for the maintenance of the army, of which you know the importance, and to try to get as much as you can, ſince, after this ſeſſion, I ſhould be very glad not to be obliged, this good while, to have another parliament in Ireland. I have ſent orders for embarking at Oſtend the five French regiments, and inſtead of my own regiment of dragoons of Eppinger, I will ſend you two regiments of foot, which will be much the ſame as to expence. Blaithwayte will write to you about the eſtabliſhment and appointment of the pay of the forces. I muſt tell you, I am well ſatisfied with the chancellor of Ireland. At his firſt coming here to the juſtices, in their ſpeech to the parliament in Ireland, September the 27th, recommended to them a bill for encouraging the manufactures of linen and hemp: 'The ſettlement of which, ſaid they, will contribute much to people the country, and will be found more advantageous to this kingdom than the woollen manufacture, which being the ſettled, ſtated trade of England, from whence all foreign markets are ſupplied, can never be encouraged here for that purpoſe; whereas the linen and hempen manufactures will not only be encouraged, as conſiſtent with the trade of England, but will render the trade of this kingdom both uſeful and neceſſary to England. And the houſe of commons in Ireland fell in ſo far with the lords juſtices ſentiments, as to ſay, in their addreſs of thanks to them, 'We ſhall heartily endeavour to eſtabliſh the linen manufacture, and to render the ſame uſeful to England, as well as advantageous to this kingdom. And we hope to find ſuch a temperament, with reſpect to the woollen trade here, that the ſame may not be injurious to England. It was however continually inculcated by the diſaffected, how much more beneficial to that kingdom the woollen manufacture would be than the linen, and what a hardſhip it was upon the people of Ireland, to be deprived of the privilege of working up their own wool, and ſending the cloth where they pleaſed. Theſe ſuggeſtions were induſtriouſly ſpread about, upon all occaſions, by the factious, in order to inflame the minds of the people, and ſo foment diviſions among them, though it was evident, that the Engliſh could not indulge them in that trade, without the ruin of their own at the ſame time.

The city of Londonderry, ſome time before the addreſs, about the woollen affair, preſented a petition to the commons of England, 'ſetting forth their early and ſingular ſervices and ſufferings by the defence of that city againſt a long and cruel ſiege, (which eminently contributed to the deſtroying the deſigns of the enemies of theſe kingdoms;) and ſhewing, that thereby not only the greateſt part of the city and ſuburbs was demoliſhed, but alſo that their diſburſements upon this occaſion, for fortifying, providing arms and ammunition, raiſing and ſubſiſting forces, and other public loſſes, did amount to a very conſiderable ſum of money, of which they gave in an account. And, that as they had willingly expoſed themſelves, and their all, for the public intereſt and ſervice, ſo they had patiently, theſe eight years, lain under their loſſes, in hopes at the end of the war to be ſo conſidered, as they ſhould no longer remain a poor ruinous ſpectacle to all, a ſcorn to their enemies, and a diſcouragement to his majeſty's well affected ſubjects: And praying the commons to recommend their caſe to his majeſty for his royal favour, in order to their relief in the kingdom of Ireland.' Upon this the commons addreſſed the king, that he would be pleaſed to make ſome compenſation to the city of Londonderry, which, for it's eminent ſufferings and ſervices, ſo highly deſerved to have ſome ſpecial mark of his favour, for a laſting monument to poſterity. The king promiſed to take it into conſideration, but nothing was done in the affair, at leaſt at that time.

Not many days after, the king came to the houſe of peers, and, having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, cloſed the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I Cannot take leave of ſo good a parliament, without publickly acknowledging the ſenſe I have of the great things you have done for my ſafety and honour, and for the ſupport and welfare of my people. Every one of your ſeſſions hath made good this character. The happy uniting of us in an aſſociation for our mutual defence; the remedying the corruption of the coin, which had been ſo long growing upon the nation; the reſtoring of credit; the giving of ſupplies in ſuch a manner for carrying on the war, as did by God's bleſſing produce an honourable peace; and after that, the making ſuch proviſions for our common ſecurity, and towards ſatisfying the debts contracted in ſo long a war, with as little burden to the kingdom, as is poſſible, are ſuch things, as will give a laſting reputation to this parliament, and will be a ſubject of emulation to thoſe, who ſhall come after.

"Beſides all this, I think myſelf perſonally obliged to return my thanks to you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, for the regard you have had to my honour, by the eſtabliſhment of my revenue.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"There is nothing I value ſo much, as the eſteem and love of my people; and, as for their ſakes I avoided no hazards, during the war, ſo my whole ſtudy and care ſhall be to improve and continue to them the advantages and bleſſings of peace.

"And I earneſtly deſire of you all, in your ſeveral ſtations, to be vigilant in preſerving peace and good order, and in a due and regular execution of the laws, eſpecially thoſe againſt profaneneſs and irreligion."

Then the parliament was prorogued, and two days after diſſolved, having now ſate it's period of three years, in which (as the king ſaid in his ſpeech) great things had been done; the whole money of England was recoined; the king ſecured in his government; an honourable peace was made; public credit was reſtored; and the payment of public debts was put on ſure funds.

The chief conduct of affairs lay now in a few hands. Among theſe the lord Sommers was moſt eminent in the houſe of lords; for, as he was one of the ableſt and moſt incorrupt judges, that ever preſided in Chancery, ſo his great capacity for all affairs made the king conſider him beyond all his miniſters; and he well deſerved the confidence, that the king expreſſed for him on all occaſions. In the houſe of commons, Mr. Mountague, the chancellor of the exchequer, had gained ſuch a viſible aſcendant over all, who were zealous for the king's ſervice, that he gave law to the reſt, which he did always with great ſpirit, but ſometimes with too aſſuming an air. The fleet was in the earl of Orford's management, who was both treaſurer of the navy, and at the head of the admiralty. He had brought in many into the ſervice, who were very zealous for the government; but a ſpirit of impiety and diſſoluteneſs ran through too many of them, ſo that thoſe, who intended to caſt a load upon the government, had too great advantages given by ſome of thoſe. The adminiſtration at home was, otherwiſe, without exception, and no grievances were complained of. Sir William Trumbull had been removed, on the 5th of December 1697, from the poſt of ſecretary of ſtate, which was conferred on Mr. James Vernon, who had formerly been ſecretary to the duke of Monmouth, and ſince the revolution chief clerk to the duke of Shrewſbury, under whom he had for ſeveral years managed all the affairs of the duke's office (which the duke could not attend, becauſe of his ill ſtate of health) and was afterwards advanced to the place of ſecretary to the lords juſtices, during the king's abſence, which employment he had diſcharged to the king's ſatisfaction.

The king, on the 21ſt of the ſame month, having received letters from the king of France and the Dauphin, acquainting him with the duke of Burgundy's marriage, appointed the duke of St. Alban's, one of the lords of his bed-chamber, to return the compliment, who, in a few days, ſet out for France.

The earl of Clancarty, who had married one of the earl of Sunderland's daughters, and who, during the war, had made his eſcape from the Tower of London, and fled into France, preſumed, about this time, to return into England, both under the benefit of the peace, and chiefly under the protection, which he expected from his father-in-law. On the laſt day of December, he arrived at London, and went directly to his lady; but he was not a little ſurprized, when, the next morning, upon information given to the government by his brother-in-law, the lord Spencer, a meſſenger was ſent with a warrant to carry him priſoner to Newgate, as being attainted for high-treaſon. However, the earl of Sunderland interceding for him, the king contented himſelf with baniſhing the lord Clancarty his dominions.

On the 5th of January, through the careleſſneſs of a laundreſs, a fire broke out at Whitehall, by which all the body of the palace, with the new gallery, council-chamber, and ſeveral adjoining apartments, were entirely burnt down; that famous piece of architecture, the banqueting-houſe, for which the king was ſo particularly concerned, that he ſent meſſenger upon meſſenger from Kenſington for it's preſervation, hardly eſcaping the violence of the flames.

Five days after the earl of Portland ſet out on his embaſſy to France, and in eleven days reached the capital city of that kingdom, having in his way thither been received with ex-parliament, he committed a great overſight, which has got him many enemies, and all the miniſtry here are much incenſed againſt him, as well as the whig-party; but, in Ireland, it is juſt the contrary, it is the tories: So he'll find it hard to behave in ſuch a manner, as not to be involved in difficulties. If bad ſucceſs attends you in the parliament, it is certain that the blame will here be laid on him. I thought it neceſſary to inform you of this circumſtance, that you may take your meaſures accordingly. Be always aſſured of my eſteem.

W. R.

I ſhall ſet out in two days for Holland. I ſend you back the prince of Conti's letter, and approve much of your anſwer to him. I had not an opportunity to let you know it before, traordinary civility and reſpect. Four days after his arrival at Paris, he was magnificently entertained at ſupper by the duke de Grammont, with the marſhals de Villeroy and Boufflers, the dukes of Valentinois, Clerembault, and Roquelaure, count Tallard, whom the French king had named to the embaſſy of England, and ſeveral other perſons of the principal quality in France. And the next day he was admitted to a private audience of the king, as alſo of the Dauphin, the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berry, monſieur, madame, and the ducheſs of Burgundy, by all whom he was ſeverally received with great marks of diſtinction, and afterwards entertained at dinner by the marquis de Torcy, ſecretary of ſtate for foreign affairs. The duke of St. Albans having had at the ſame time audience of leave, returned to London. It is remarkable, that the duke having brought from France extraordinary rich ſuits of clothes, both for himſelf and his ducheſs, in which they appeared on the princeſs of Denmark's birth-day, the houſe of lords being apprehenſive, that their example would be followed by the reſt of the ladies and courtiers, to the advancement of the French, and the detriment of the Engliſh manufactures, they addreſſed the king to diſcourage the wearing French ſtuffs, and the ſumptuouſneſs of apparel.

During

On the 27th of February, the earl of Portland made his public entry with ſuch extraordinary ſplendor, as had never been ſeen at the court of France ſince the duke of Buckingham's embaſſy, when he came to demand in marriage for king Charles I. Mary Henrietta of France. He was accompanied by the lords Cavendiſh, Haſtings, Paſton, Raby, and Woodſtock, his ſon, Mr. Fielding, colonel Stanhope, Mr. Charles Boyle, Mr. Prior, ſecretary to the embaſſy, and ſeveral other Engliſh gentlemen; and, attended by a gentleman of the horſe, twelve pages, fifty-ſix footmen, twelve led horſes, four coaches with eight horſes, and two chariots with ſix, was received by the duke of Boufflers, and conducted to the hotel reſerved in Paris for the entertainment of foreign embaſſadors, and through multitudes of ſpectators, who were aſtoniſhed at the grandeur and opulence of the Engliſh. Two days after, he was admitted to his firſt public audience, which, for a diſtinguiſhing mark of honour, he had in the king's bed-chamber, and even within the rails round the bed, where the king ſtood, with the dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berry, his grandſons, and the count de Thouloufe, his natural ſon, the duke d'Aumont, and the marſhal de Noailles. The lord Portland having made his ſpeech in French, and delivered his credentials, the king anſwered him in very obliging terms, both in relation to his maſter and himſelf; and then he preſented to the king the Engliſh noblemen and gentlemen of his retinue; which being over, he had audience of the Dauphin and the reſt of the royal family. And not only in imitation, but by expreſs directions, of the French king, all that court ſhewed the Engliſh embaſſador moſt ſingular marks of honour and reſpect.

Some time after his public audience he went to Verſailles, and ſtaid there four days, being lodged in the hotel de Bouillon. The firſt day he was treated by the marſhal de Boufflers, who, in the afternoon, went with his excellency into the gardens, and ſhewed him the water-works. The next day he was invited to dine with monſieur de Livry, maſter of the king's houſhold; and after dinner had a long converſation with the king in the gardens, the fountains playing all the while. Here it is by ſome thought, that the project for a partition of the Spaniſh monarchy was opened by the French king [z].

King James paſſed his time very indifferently all that while at St. Germain's; for, beſides the honours which were done to the embaſſador of the prince, who poſſeſſed his abdicated throne, and which could not but be a ſenſible mortification to him, he was informed, that the lord Portland inſiſted upon the removing of him to a greater diſtance from the French king's preſence; promiſing, in his maſter's name, to give him and his queen an honourable penſion, which would eaſe that king of the great charge he was at in maintaining him and his family, ever ſince they had taken ſanctuary in his dominions. After the concluſion of the late treaty of peace, wherein his concerns were wholly overlooked, king James ſeemed to be abſolutely abandoned; and therefore concluding, that the earl of Portland's demand would be complied with, he was reſolved to retire to Avignon, and began already to inform himſelf if he could live conveniently there; but he was agreeably ſurprized, when he heard, that the French king would never give ear to the embaſſador's propoſal.

In this interval the earl of Mancheſter being arrived at Paris, in his return to England from his embaſſy to Venice, he and the earl of Portland went to St. Cloud, on the 5th of May, to viſit the duke of Orleans, and in the evening to Verſailles to wait on the king, and were received at both places with great reſpect. Four days after they both had the honour to dine with the Dauphin at Meudon; and the next day the earl of Portland had his public audience of leave of the royal family, king William having named the earl of Jerſey to ſucceed him as embaſſador extraordinary to France. There being a review of the troops of the houſhold in the plain of Archers, where the king, the Dauphin, the young princes of France, and divers perſons of quality were preſent, the embaſſador went thither alſo; but would perhaps have refrained going, if he had known, that king James and the titular prince of Wales had likewiſe been there. The prince, by his father's directions, endeavoured to join converſation with the lord Woodſtock, but the earl of Portland, his father, perceiving it, ordered his ſon to avoid him, as he did himſelf all thoſe who belonged to the court of St. Germain's; though it was reported, that king James had cauſed it to be inſinuated to him, that he never pretended to make his lordſhip anſwerable for the ill uſage, which he received from the perſon, whom he repreſented. At this review king James himſelf did all he could to engage the lord Cavendiſh, and the other Engliſh noblemen, to accoſt him: but they all imitated the earl of Portland, who on the 4th of June went to Verſailles, and had a private audience of the king in his cloſet, where he took his laſt leave; as he did afterwards of the Dauphin, and of the duke and ducheſs of Orleans at St. Cloud. The king ſent the earl the uſual preſent of his picture ſet with diamonds, but with this difference, that the ſtones were worth three times as much as thoſe of other gifts of that kind. Beſides this, he preſented him with all the prints engraved at the Louvre, conſiſting of twelve large folios. In return of which the earl made him a preſent of nine very fine Engliſh horſes, and ſoon after, on the 8th of June, he left Paris, and went to Chantilli, an houſe belonging to the prince of Condé, where he was entertained in a ſplendid manner till the 11th, when he took leave of that prince, and, proceeding on his journey in his return to England, arrived at Kenſington on the 19th.

Thus ended this famous embaſſy, which coſt king William fourſcore thouſand pounds to little purpoſe, it being remarked, that no embaſſador was ever more honoured or leſs ſucceſsful than the earl of Portland, who could obtain nothing, either as to the removal of king James, or in favour of the proteſtants of France, againſt whom the perſecution, which in many places had been interrupted, during the war, began now to rage afreſh with redoubled violence. As for the earl himſelf, he was ſo far from gaining any thing by his embaſſy, that on the contrary he found at his return, that Mr. Keppel was become a great favourite. Keppel was the ſon of Pallant lord of Keppel in Guelderland, by a daughter of Opdan, one of the chief lords of the States of Holland. He was raiſed from being a page of honour into the higheſt degree of favour that any perſon had ever attained about the king. He was now made earl of Albemarle, and ſoon after knight of the garter, and by a quick and unaccountable progreſs he ſeemed to have engroſſed the royal favour ſo entirely, that he diſpoſed of every thing in the king's power. He was a chearful young man, who had the art to pleaſe, but was ſo much given up to his pleaſures, that he could ſcarce ſubmit to the attendance and drudgery, that were neceſſary to maintain his poſt. He never had yet diſtinguiſhed himſelf in any thing, though the king did it in every thing. He was not cold nor dry, as the earl of Portland was thought to be, who ſeemed to have the art of creating many enemies to himſelf, and not one friend. But the earl of Albemarle had all the arts of a court, was civil to all, and procured many favours. The earl of Portland obſerved the progreſs of this favour with great uneaſineſs. They grew to be not only incompatible, as all rivals for favour muſt needs be, but to hate and oppoſe one another in every thing, by which the king's affairs ſuffered much. The one had more of the confidence, and the other much more of the favour. The king had heaped many grants on the earl of Portland, who, upon his return from his embaſſy, could not bear the viſible ſuperiority in favour, that the other was grown up to; ſo he took occaſion, from a ſmall preference, that was given him, in prejudice of his own poſt, as groom of the ſtole, to withdraw from court, and laid down all his employments. The king uſed all poſſible means to divert him from this reſolution, but without prevailing on him. He conſented to ſerve the king ſtill in his affairs, but he would not return to any poſt in the houſhold; and not long after was employed in the negotiation, ſet on foot for the ſucceſſion to the crown of Spain.

[z] During his ſtay at Verſailles, there happened a paſſage between Mr. Prior, the ſecretary of the embaſſy, and one of the French king's officers, which deſerves to be related. As the officer was conducting Mr. Prior about the apartments, among other curioſities, he ſhewed him thoſe fine pieces of Le Brun, which repreſent the French king's victories; and aſked him, Whether king William's actions were alſo to be ſeen in his palace? 'No, ſir, replied Mr. Prior, the monuments of my maſter's actions are to be ſeen every where but in his own houſe.'

On the 19th of March 1697-8, count Tallard, the French embaſſador, arrived at London, and ſoon after accompanied the king to Newmarket, where he was not a little ſurpriſed to ſee the vaſt concourſe of nobility and gentry, and the great ſums of money loſt or won, at the races.

France reaped but ſmall benefit from the peace as to her commerce, which continued almoſt as dead as in time of war. It is true, ſome Engliſh and Dutch came to Bourdeaux and Roan, in order to take in wine and paper, and brought other commodities to be ſold there. But the tariff not being regulated between all the parties, and the treaty of Ryſwick mentioning only, that, in relation to Holland, it ſhould be put upon the ſame foot, as it was agreed in 1664, which was not yet done; and in reſpect to England, that commiſſioners appointed by both kings ſhould meet at London, three months after the ratification, to determine all differences; this, together with the loſs of at leaſt 20 per cent. by the money, which the French king, to ſupply his preſent neceſſities, had raiſed to an extravagant rate, obliged moſt of thoſe ſhips to return home, without either ſelling or buying any thing. Upon this, the States-General ſent deputies to the king of France to demand the regulation of the tariff, purſuant to the late treaty. But, the trade of Holland being far leſs advantageous to France than that of England, by reaſon the Dutch uſe to import more of their own commodities into that kingdom than they export of the growth of it from thence, and that, on the contrary, the Engliſh were accuſtomed, before the war, to ſend great ſums of money yearly into France, not only for wines, paper, ſtuffs, linen, hats, and ſilks, but alſo for abundance of things of leſs importance, the purchaſe of which could not be made with what they imported thither of the growth and manufacture of England; ſo the court of France at firſt reſolved to keep up the tariff as high as poſſible with the Hollanders, while they deſigned to lower it with the Engliſh. But monſieur Philippeaux d' Herbaut being ſent over hither as commiſſary-general from the French king, for regulating the commerce between the two nations, he found inſuperable difficulties in his commiſſion, not only becauſe of the high duties laid by the parliament on all French goods, and which were already appropriated to ſeveral uſes, but alſo becauſe the Engliſh had by this time learned to be without the commodities of the product of France, ſupplying themſelves, for the moſt part, with wine from Italy, Spain, and Portugal; with linen from Holland and Sileſia; and with paper, ſtuffs, hats, and ſilks, by the manufactures of theſe goods ſet up in England by the French refugees.

About this time the king ſettled the houſhold of the duke of Glouceſter, who was entering the tenth year of his age, and gave manifeſt proofs of an excellent genius. The earl of Marlborough, who was reſtored to favour, was made his governor[a], and at the ſame time ſworn of his majeſty's privy council. The biſhop of Saliſbury was appointed his highneſs's preceptor, having under him Mr. Willis, chaplain to the king, and afterwards biſhop of Durham, and Dr. Prat to aſſiſt him in this function. Biſhop Burnet did all he could to excuſe himſelf, having hitherto had no ſhare in the princeſs's favour or confidence. He was alſo become uneaſy at ſome things in the king's conduct, and, though he conſidered him, as the glorious inſtrument of many great things to the nation, he could not help thinking, he might have carried matters further than he did; and that he was giving his enemies handles to weaken his government. Theſe conſiderations diſpoſed him rather to retire from the court, than to engage deeper in ſuch a conſtant attendance, for ſo many years, as this employment might laſt. But the king would truſt that care with him, and the princeſs gave him ſuch encouragement, that he reſolved not only to ſubmit to this, but to give himſelf wholly up to it. He took to his own province the inſtructing the young prince in the principles of religion, and the rules of virtue, and the giving him a view of hiſtory, geography, politics, and government. At the ſame time, he reſolved to look very exactly to all the maſters, that were appointed to teach him other things.

Scotland was now in a ſort of ferment, occaſioned by the oppoſition their African and Weſt-India company met with in the proſecution of their ſcheme, for ſettling a trade to Africa, and a colony in America. The company had endeavoured by their agents to get ſubſcriptions in England, Holland, and Hamburgh, and had met with encouragement from private perſons in all thoſe places. The Engliſh and Dutch India and African companies took the alarm, and a ſtop was put to the ſubſcription, the Scotch agents were taking. The king was even prevailed with to permit his miniſter at Hamburgh to preſent a memorial to the ſenate againſt it. Upon this the Scots India company laid open their grievances before the parliament (which was now aſſembled at Edinburgh, the earl of Marchmont being the king's commiſſioner) repreſenting, 'That whereas the wiſdom of the king and parliament had thought fit, by two ſeveral ſolemn acts and letters patents under the great ſeal of that kingdom, to eſtabliſh their company with ſuch power, privileges, and immunities, as were needful to encourage any ſuch new undertaking in that nation, and particularly to raiſe a joint ſtock in ſuch manner, as they ſhould think fit; and, for that end to infranchiſe ſuch foreigners, as would become partners with them, and to enter into treaties of commerce with any in amity with his majeſty for that effect; that thoſe of their number, who were then intruſted with the management of that affair, did think it moſt natural to make the firſt offer of ſharing their ſaid privilege with their countrymen, and other neighbours in England, as living under the ſame monarchy; and that they not only readily embraced the offer, but in nine days ſubſcribed 300,000l. ſterling, as the one half of the capital ſtock then propoſed, and actually paid in the firſt fourth part thereof, part in ſpecie, part in bank notes, payable upon demand. That both houſes of parliament of England taking umbrage at thoſe proceedings, had not only jointly addreſſed his majeſty for fruſtrating the ends of the ſaid acts, but the houſe of commons had alſo appointed a committee to examine what methods were taken for obtaining the ſaid acts of parliament for eſtabliſhing their company; who were the ſubſcribers thereunto, and who were the promoters and adviſers thereof; with power to ſend for perſons, papers, and records: And that purſuant thereto the ſaid committee had given orders to ſummon not only the Engliſh ſubſcribers, but even ſome perſons reſiding then in Scotland, as by the ſaid addreſs, votes of the houſe of commons, and copy of the ſaid ſummons did appear. By all which, together with ſome other meaſures then taken, their friends in England were, to their great loſs, diſappointment, and retardment, forced to relinquiſh the enterprize. That, notwithſtanding that diſcouragement, not only moſt of the nobility, gentry, and merchants, and the whole body of the royal boroughs, had, upon the inducement and public faith of the ſaid acts of parliament and letters patents, contributed as adventurers in raiſing a far more conſiderable joint ſtock, than any was ever before raiſed in the kingdom for any public undertaking or project of trade whatſoever; which made it of ſo much the more univerſal a concern to the nation. But they had alſo all the promiſing hopes of foreign aid, that their hearts could wiſh, eſpecially at Hamburgh, where the merchants of that city entered into contract with their deputies, to join at leaſt 200,000l. ſterling with them; till, to their great ſurprize and loſs, the Engliſh miniſters there had, under pretence of a ſpecial warrant from his majeſty, put a ſtop thereto, by giving in a memorial to the ſenate of that city, not only diſowning the authority of the acts of parliament and letters patents, but alſo threatening both ſenate and inhabitants with the king's utmoſt diſpleaſure, if they ſhould countenance or join with them in any treaty of trade or commerce; which memorial they prayed might, for the better information of his grace and the eſtates, be read in parliament. That, after the memorial was by the ſenate tranſmitted to the 'commerci' or body of merchants of that city, they, to aſſert their own freedom, had adviſed and prevailed upon their (the Scots) deputies and agents, who were there for ſome days to open books in the merchants hall, where for ſome days they ſigned conſiderable ſums, purſuant to their contract, though under condition to be void, if they ſhould not procure ſome declaration from the king, that might render them ſecure from threatenings and other inſinuations contained in the memorial. That as the reaſonable (nay, and unqueſtionable) proſpect, which they had of a powerful aſſiſtance from Hamburgh, and ſeveral other places (if not obſtructed) had induced them to prepare a far greater equipage at firſt, than otherwiſe they would have done; ſo the rendering theſe meaſures abortive had not only weakened their ſtock, leſſened their credit, retarded their firſt expedition, and diſheartened many of their partners at home, but even ſlackened their reſolution and power from profecuting, at that time, ſeveral other branches of foreign and domeſtic trades and improvements, which they had in view, if they had not met with ſuch obſtructions and diſcouragements from time to time. That, though their company was more immediately and ſenſibly touched in many reſpects by ſuch proceedings than any other, yet they humbly conceived alſo, that 'the honour and independency of the nation,' as well as the credit and authority of the parliament, was ſtruck at through their ſides. That they could not as countrymen, and in duty to that collective power, which gave their company firſt a being, but inform his grace, his majeſty's high commiſſioner, and the eſtates of parliament, of the premiſes, to the end that the great-council of the nation (then aſſembled) might do therein, as they in their profound wiſdom and diſcretion ſhould think fit. That, as to what concerned their company in particular, they ſhould humbly beg leave to ſuggeſt farther, that, the ſhips being then at ſea on their intended voyage, the former treatment, which their company met with in England and elſewhere, might give them juſt grounds to ſuſpect, that, if either through multiplicity of public affairs, or otherwiſe howſoever, his grace and the eſtates of parliament ſhould neglect the taking preſent notice of ſuch umbrage, the enemies of their company would be thereby encouraged either directly or indirectly to purſue their former deſigns of ruining (if poſſible) all their meaſures. Therefore they deſired his grace and the eſtates of parliament, to take the premiſes into their ſerious conſideration, to vindicate their company's reputation abroad, by ſupporting the credit of the acts of parliament and letters patents, by which the ſame was eſtabliſhed, and wherein the honour of the nation was ſo much concerned: To take effectual meaſures for repairing the great loſs and damages, which they had already ſuſtained through the unwarrantable treatment above-mentioned, as well as for preventing the like for the time to come, and withal to continue to them the privileges and exemptions mentioned in the acts of parliament and letters patents, for ſome longer time, in conſideration of the time already elapſed without improvement, by reaſon of theſe obſtructions.'

The parliament, having maturely weighed this petition, thought fit, by way of addreſs, humbly to repreſent to his majeſty, on the 5th of Auguſt, 'That having conſidered a repreſentation made to them by the council-general of the company trading to Africa and the Indies, which mentioned ſeveral obſtructions, that they met with in the proſecution of their trade, particularly by a memorial preſented to the ſenate of Hamburgh, by his majeſty's reſident in that city, tending to leſſen the credit of the rights and privileges granted to the company, by an act of the then preſent parliament: They therefore laid before his majeſty the whole nation's concern in that matter; and they did moſt earneſtly intreat, and moſt aſſuredly expect, that his majeſty, in his royal wiſdom, would take ſuch meaſures, as might effectually vindicate the undoubted rights and privileges of the company, and ſupport the credit and intereſt thereof: And as they were in duty bound to return his majeſty moſt hearty thanks for the gracious aſſurance his majeſty had been pleaſed to give them, of all due encouragement for promoting the trade of that kingdom; ſo they were thereby encouraged humbly to recommend to the more eſpecial marks of his royal favour the concerns of the company, as that branch of their trade, in which they and the nation, which they repreſented, had a more peculiar intereſt.'

The company having thus engaged the parliament to eſpouſe their intereſt, they ſeconded their addreſs by a petition to the king, dated the 10th of Auguſt, and importing, 'That whereas the parliament had, by their addreſs, been pleaſed to recommend the concerns of the company to his majeſty, for ſupporting the credit and intereſt thereof, which had already ſuffered in a great meaſure, by reaſon of the ſeveral obſtructions, which they had met with in the proſecution of their trade, particularly by a memorial given in to the ſenate of Hamburgh, by his majeſty's miniſter there; theſe encouraged them, with all humility, to lay before his majeſty, that, as the memorial was given in to the ſenate of Hamburgh in a moſt ſolemn and public manner, ſo they humbly conceived, that the effects thereof could not be taken away, but by ſome intimation made to the ſenate, that they might enter into commerce with them as freely and ſecurely in all reſpects, as they might have done, before the giving in of the memorial. That, in conſideration of the damages ſuſtained by the company, his majeſty would be pleaſed, for their encouragement, as a gracious mark of his royal favour, to beſtow upon them the two ſmalleſt of the frigates then lying uſeleſs in Brunt-Iſland Harbour: And that in regard of the time loſt, by reaſon of theſe obſtructions, his majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to continue the privileges granted by act of parliament to the company of being cuſtom-free for ſuch longer time, as his majeſty ſhould think fit."

This affair occaſioning great heats and diſcontents in the parliament, the commiſſioner put a ſtop to their proceedings, towards the beginning of September, and adjourned them to the 5th of November.

During this interval, there being two letters ſent from Mr. Stevenſon, the company's agent at Hamburgh, to the court of directors of the company, concerning the Hamburgh memorial, this occaſioned another letter from the directors of the company to the lord Seafield, who was appointed ſecretary of ſtate, wherein they declared, "That they had, by order of the council-general of their company, the copies of two letters received from their company's agent at Hamburgh to his lordſhip; upon the reading whereof the day before, at a meeting of the council-general, they were not a little ſurprized at the contents, conſidering the many repeated aſſurances they had formerly by letters and word of mouth, and even in parliament, that the king had given orders to his miniſter at Hamburgh, with relation to the memorial given in to the ſenate of that city againſt their company: But, after ſome reaſoning thereupon, and conſidering how far his lordſhip's frank undertaking, when in Scotland, as well as the ſtation he was in, did engage his beſt endeavours to procure the company juſtice, and vindicate the company's rights in that matter, they had ordered them, the (court of directors) to tranſmit the ſaid copies to his lordſhip, and expected his lordſhip's anſwer to that and their late petition to his majeſty, before they remonſtrated any further with relation thereunto." Upon this the ſecretary acquainted the court of directors, by a letter ſent to ſir John Schaw, their preſident, 'That he would take the firſt convenient opportunity he could have, to repreſent the matter to the king; but could not yet expect to have it, his majeſty being very much employed in the affairs of the Engliſh parliament.'

The king having appointed the lords juſtices to govern in his abſence, of whom the earl of Marlborough was one, he ſet out the 20th of July for Holland, where he landed the next day. Before his departure from England, news came from Spain, that their king was dying. This alarm had been often given before, but it came much quicker now. The French, upon this, ſent a fleet to lie before Cadiz, which came thither at the time that the galleons were expected home from the Weſt-Indies; and it was apprehended, that, if that king died, they would have ſeized on all that treaſure. A fleet was ſent from England thither to ſecure them; but it came too late to have done any ſervice, if it had needed. This was much cenſured; but the admiralty excuſed themſelves, by ſaying, that the parliament was ſo late in fixing the funds for the fleet, that it was not poſſible to be ready ſooner than they were. The king of Spain recovered for that time, but it was ſo far from an entire recovery, that a relapſe was ſtill apprehended. When the king therefore went to Holland, he left ſealed orders behind him, of which ſome of his miniſters declared, they knew not the contents till they were opened. By theſe the king ordered ſixteen thouſand men to be kept up. For excuſing this, it was ſaid, that, though the parliament had, in their votes, mentioned only ten thouſand land-men, to whom they had afterwards added three thouſand marines, and had raiſed only the money neceſſary for that number, yet no determined number was mentioned in the act itſelf. And therefore, ſince the apprehenſion of the king of Spain's death made it adviſeable to have a greater force ready for ſuch an accident, the king reſolved to keep up a force ſomewhat beyond that which the houſe of commons had conſented to. The leaving theſe orders ſealed made the whole blame to be caſt ſingly on the king, as it ſkreened the miniſters from a ſhare in this counſel: And miniſters have been more than once known to put the advices, that they themſelves gave, in ſuch a manner on their maſter, that, in executing them, the kings have taken more care to ſhelter their miniſters, than to preſerve themſelves.

The king, upon his arrival at Holland, having aſſiſted at the aſſembly of the ſtates-general, and given audience to ſeveral public miniſters, particularly to the envoy of Lorrain, who notified to him the marriage of the duke his maſter, with mademoiſelle, daughter of the duke of Orleans, he went to Loo, attended by the earls of Eſſex, Portland, and Selkirk, and ſeveral other perſons of quality. He had not been long there, before he was waited upon by count Tallard, who had orders not to ſuffer him to cool upon the propoſal made by the

the French king to the earl of Portland, concerning the ſucceſſion of the crown of Spain; which overture king William had communicated to the lord chancellor Sommers before he left England. The French embaſſador having preſſed him for an anſwer, the earl of Portland, by the king's order, wrote a letter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon, wherein it was mentioned, that, count Tallard having declared, that an accommodation might be found in relation to the Spaniſh ſucceſſion, the king had founded France upon the conditions; which were in ſubſtance, that the electoral prince of Bavaria ſhould have the kingdom of Spain, the Indies, and the Low Countries, and all that depended upon the Spaniſh dominions, except Naples and Sicily, Sardinia, the province of Guipuſcoa on this ſide of the Pyrenees, Fontarabia, and St. Sebaſtian, Final, and the places in Tuſcany, of which Spain ſtood poſſeſſed; in conſideration of which, France was abſolutely to renounce the right which it pretended to the ſucceſſion of Spain. And as for Milan, it was to be given to the archduke Charles, the emperor's ſecond ſon.

At the ſame time the king himſelf ſent the following letter to the lord chancellor Sommers:

"I Imparted to you, before I left England, that in France there was expreſſed to my lord Portland ſome inclination to come to an agreement with us, concerning the ſucceſſion to the king of Spain; ſince which count Tallard has mentioned it to me, and has made ſuch propoſitions, the particulars of which my lord Portland will write to Vernon, to whom I have given orders not to communicate them to any other beſides yourſelf, and to leave to your judgment to whom elſe you would think proper to impart them; to the end that I might know your opinion upon ſo important an affair, and which requires the greateſt ſecrecy. If it be fit this negociation ſhould be carried on, there is no time to be loſt, and you will ſend me the full powers under the great ſeal, with the names in blank to treat with count Tallard; I believe this may be done ſecretly, that none but you and Vernon, and thoſe to whom you ſhall have communicated it, may have knowledge of it, ſo that the clerks, who are to hold the warrant and the full powers, may not know what it is. According to all intelligence, the king of Spain cannot outlive the month of October, and the leaſt accident may carry him off every day. I received yeſterday your letter of the 9th; ſince my lord Wharton cannot at this time leave England, I muſt think of ſome other to ſend embaſſador to Spain; if you can think of any one proper, let me know it, and be always aſſured of my friendſhip."

W. R.

Mr. ſecretary Vernon having ſent the earl of Portland's letter to the lord Sommers, who was then at Tunbridge for the benefit of the waters, the chancellor immediately returned the letter to Mr. Vernon, and deſired him to communicate the contents of it to the earl of Orford, Mr. Mountague, and the duke of Shrewſbury; which he thought 'the beſt way of executing the king's commands; at the ſame time letting them know, how ſtrictly his majeſty required, that it ſhould remain an abſolute ſecret;' which caution made Mr. Vernon impart it to the Duke of Shrewſbury only, as he afterwards acquainted my lord Sommers.

Some time after Mr. Montague and Mr. Secretary Vernon going down to Tunbridge, the lord chancellor and they debated this important affair; and his lordſhip wrote a letter to the king, dated the 28th of Auguſt, acquainting him with the reſult of their conſultation.[b] But, before this letter reached the king, the firſt treaty of partition was ſigned. The perſons commiſſioned by king William, were the earl of Portland and ſir Joſeph Williamſon, who was afterwards winked at when this affair came under the conſideration of the parliament, while the lord Sommers, for his faithful advice, was impeached. By this treaty it was agreed:

I. That the peace of Ryſwick ſhould be confirmed.

II. That in conſideration of the ill ſtate of the king of Spain's health, and for preſerving the public peace, in caſe the ſaid prince ſhould die without iſſue, the kingdom of Naples and Sicily, with the places then depending upon the Spaniſh monarchy, ſituated on the coaſt of Tuſcany, or the adjacent iſlands, comprehended under the name of Santo Stephano, Porto Hercole, Orbitello, Telamone, Portolongo, Piombino, the marquiſate of Final, the province of Guipuſcoa, particularly the towns of Fontarabia and St. Sebaſtian, and eſpecially the Port Paſſage; and likewiſe all places on the French ſide of the Pyrenees, or the other mountains of Navarre, Alava, or Biſcay, on the other ſide of the province of Guipuſcoa, with all the ſhips and gallies, and other appurtenances belonging to the gallies, ſhould be given to the Dauphin, in conſideration of his right.

III. That the crown of Spain, and the other kingdoms and places both within and without Europe, ſhould deſcend to the electoral prince of Bavaria, of whom his father, the elector, was to be a guardian and adminiſtrator till he came of age.

IV. That the duchy of Milan ſhould be reſtored and allotted to archduke Charles, the emperor's ſecond ſon.

This treaty was to be communicated to the emperor and the elector of Bavaria by king William and the States-general; and, if they did not agree to it, then the proportion of the party not agreeing ſhould remain in ſequeſtration, till

[b] The lord Sommers's letter was as follows:

S I R,

"Having your majeſty's permiſſion to try if the waters would contribute to the re-eſtabliſhment of my health, I was juſt got to this place when I had the honour of your commands; I thought the beſt way of executing them would be to communicate to my lord Orford, Mr. Montague, and the duke of Shrewſbury (who, before I left London, had agreed upon a meeting about that time) the ſubject of my lord Portland's letter, at the ſame time letting them know how ſtrictly your majeſty required, that it ſhould remain an abſolute ſecret.

"Since that time Mr. Montague and Mr. Secretary are come down hither, and upon the whole diſcourſe three things have principally occurred, to be humbly ſuggeſted to your majeſty.

"Firſt, That the entertaining a propoſal of this nature ſeems to be attended with very many ill conſequences, if the French did not act a ſincere part; but we were ſoon at eaſe, as to any apprehenſion of this ſort, being fully aſſured your majeſty would not act but with the utmoſt nicety, in an affair wherein the glory and ſafety of Europe were ſo highly concerned.

"The ſecond thing conſidered was the very ill proſpect of what was like to happen upon the death of the king of Spain, in caſe nothing was done previouſly towards the providing againſt that accident, which ſeemed probably to be very near: The king of France having ſo great a force in ſuch a readineſs, that he was in a condition to take poſſeſſion of Spain, before any other prince could be able to make a ſtand. Your majeſty is the beſt judge whether this be the caſe, who are ſo perfectly informed of the circumſtances of parts abroad.

"But, ſo far as relates to England, it would be want of duty not to give your majeſty this clear account, that there is a deadneſs and want of ſpirit in the nation, univerſally ſo, as not at all to be diſpoſed to the thought of entering into a new war, and that they ſeem to be tired out with taxes to a degree, beyond what was diſcerned, till it appeared upon the occaſion of the late election; this is the truth of the fact, upon which your majeſty will determine what reſolutions are proper to be taken.

"That which remained was the conſideration what would be the condition of Europe, if the propoſal took place: Of this we thought ourſelves little capable of judging, but it ſeemed, that, if Sicily was in the French hands, they will be entirely maſters of the Levant trade; that, if they were poſſeſſed of Final, and thoſe other ſea-ports on that ſide, whereby Milan would be entirely ſhut out from relief by ſea, or any other commerce, that duchy would be of little ſignification in the hands of any prince; and that, if the king of France had poſſeſſion of that part of Guipuſcoa, which is mentioned in the propoſal, beſides the ports he would have in the Ocean, it does ſeem he would have as eaſy a way of invading Spain on that ſide, as he now has on the ſide of Catalonia.

"But it is not to be hoped, that France will quit its pretences to ſo great a ſucceſſion, without conſiderable advantage; and that we are all aſſured, your majeſty will reduce the terms as low as can be done, and make them, as far as is poſſible in the preſent circumſtances of things, ſuch as may be ſome foundation for the future quiet of Chriſtendom; which all your ſubjects cannot but be convinced is your true aim. If it could be brought to paſs that England might be ſome way a gainer by this tranſaction, whether it was by the elector of Bavaria, (who is the gainer by your majeſty's interpoſition in this treaty) his coming to an agreement to let us into ſome trade to the Spaniſh plantations, or in any other manner, it would wonderfully endear your majeſty to your Engliſh ſubjects.

"It does not appear, in caſe this negociation ſhould proceed, what is to be done on your part, in order to make it take place: Whether any more be required than the Engliſh and Dutch ſhould ſit ſtill, and France itſelf to ſee it executed. If that be ſo, what ſecurity ought to be expected, that if, by our being neuters, the French be ſucceſsful, they will confine themſelves to the terms of the treaty, and not attempt to make further advantages of their ſucceſs,

"I humbly beg your majeſty's pardon that theſe thoughts are ſo ill put together: Theſe waters are known to diſcompoſe and diſturb the head, ſo as almoſt totally to diſable one from writing: I ſhould be extremely troubled, if my abſence from London has delayed the diſpatch of the commiſſion one day. You will be pleaſed to obſerve, that two perſons (as the commiſſion is drawn) muſt be named by either of them. I ſuppoſe your majeſty will not think it proper to name commiſſioners that are not Engliſh, or naturalized, in an affair of this nature.

I pray God give your majeſty honour and ſucceſs in all your undertakings.

I am, with the utmoſt duty and reſpect,

S I R,

Your majeſty's moſt dutiful and moſt obedient ſubject and ſervant.

P. S. The commiſſion is wrote by Mr. Secretary, and I have had it ſealed in ſuch a manner, that no creature has the leaſt knowledge of the thing, beſides the perſons named."

things could be brought to an accommodation: And in caſe the electoral prince of Bavaria ſhould come to inherit his ſhare, and yet die before his father without iſſue, the elector was to ſucceed him in thoſe dominions, and his heir after him. The duchy of Milan likewiſe, upon the archduke's refuſal to accept it, was to be ſequeſtered to, and governed by the prince of Vaudemont, and after him by his ſon, prince Charles of Vaudemont.

Soon after the concluſion of this treaty, the king took a review of the Dutch troops near Arnheim, and then went to Zell, to viſit the duke of that name. Here he was received with extraordinary reſpect as he had been at all places, through which he paſt in his way thither, and waited upon by ſeveral neighbouring princes and princeſſes, particularly the electreſs of Hanover, with the electoral prince and princeſs his ſiſter. Mr. Stepney, envoy extraordinary to the elector of Brandenburg, attended the king likewiſe with letters from that prince; and, at his return to Loo, the duke of Bavaria came to pay his acknowledgments to him for the care he had taken of his intereſt in the late treaty of partition.

Whilſt the French king was negotiating the treaty of partition, the marquis d'Harcourt, his embaſſador in Spain, was playing another ſort of game at Madrid. The queen of Spain, who was nearly related to the king of the Romans, and conſequently entirely in the intereſt of the houſe of Auſtria, foreſeeing the deſigns of the French king, had early concerted meaſures with d'Harrach, the Imperial miniſter, to diſappoint them. She had not only got her creatures into the council, but likewiſe procured the vice-royalty of Catalonia to be beſtowed on the prince of Heſſe d'Armſtadt, and the government of Milan on prince Vaudemont, who had both upon many occaſions ſignalized their zeal for the German intereſt. It was propoſed to make prince Eugene viceroy of Navarre, but the oppoſition that met with in the Spaniſh councils, not only prevented it, but gave too plain indications of the influence of France in the council of Spain. The duke of Medina Celi was now viceroy of Naples, and it was thought adviſeable to continue him there, by reaſon of his being one of the moſt conſiderable grandees of Spain, and moſt beloved of the people, and who conſequently might obſtruct the deſigns of the German party, if he came home diſguſted. This was the ſituation of the Spaniſh affairs, when the French embaſſador arrived at Madrid. His inſtructions were, if he ſaw no poſſibility to get the ſucceſſion of that kingdom ſettled upon one of the Dauphin's ſons, he ſhould endeavour at leaſt to hinder it from devolving on any of the emperor's children, on whom it was ſettled by the will of Philip IV, the king of Spain's father. To add weight to the embaſſador's inſtances, and awe the Spaniards into a compliance, he cauſed ſixty thouſand of his beſt troops to file off towards the frontiers of Catalonia and Navarre, and ſent a conſiderable number of his ſhips of war and gallies into ſeveral ports of Spain. The marquis d'Harcourt followed his inſtructions with great application. He told thoſe, whom he found inclinable to act in concert with him in ſo important an affair, that Philip IV. had exerted his power too far, in diſpoſing of his crown againſt the laws of nature and the conſtitution of the realm. That the ſucceſſion lawfully belonged to his daughter's children, and not to his relations four degrees removed. That the Dauphin, ſon to Maria Thereſa, the preſent king of Spain's ſiſter, had three: And, if the Spaniards would fix their eyes upon the ſecond of them, the duke of Anjou, to be their king, he being ſtill as pliable as wax, they might eaſily mould him to the cuſtoms and manners of their country: That, if they were averſe to this overture, the electoral prince of Bavaria being grandſon of a daughter of Spain, the king of France would rather approve of him to ſucceed in the Spaniſh monarchy, than any of the emperor's children; unleſs, as the Poles had done, to cut off the pretenſions of foreign princes, they would chuſe a ſovereign among themſelves; in which the king of France would protect them, ſince he never intended to unite Spain to his own kingdom, but only to keep it from falling into the hands of the houſe of Auſtria, which was already grown too powerful by the late conqueſts in Hungary. The queen of Spain having a watchful eye upon the French embaſſador, who made it his buſineſs to thwart her deſigns in favour of the emperor, ſoon diſcovered his practices; and therefore, under pretence that the air of Madrid was prejudicial to the king's health, ſhe carried him to Toledo, without allowing any foreign embaſſador to follow him hither. Harcourt quickly penetrated into the deſign of the queen's journey, and judged very rightly, that, being there ſole miſtreſs of the king, ſhe might eaſily prevail with him to ratify king Philip the IV's will. He was confirmed in this apprehenſion by count Harrach's being no more to be ſeen at Madrid; and, ſuppoſing he was gone to Toledo, he went immediately thither himſelf, under pretence of a memorial, which he pretended to have received from his maſter, with poſitive orders not to communicate it to any beſides his catholic majeſty. The queen was extremely ſurprized at the unexpected arrival of the French embaſſador, and cauſed the king to acquaint him, that he had left the cardinal of Corduba (one of the queen's creatures) at Madrid, to take care of foreign affairs, during his abſence, to whom he might have communicated his memorial, and that he only came thither to recover his health, and not to trouble himſelf with buſineſs. This pretended memorial was, it ſeems, to offer to the king of Spain the French king's aſſiſtance to raiſe the ſiege of Ceuta, which the queen was too wiſe to let the king accept, ſince by that means the French would have got, what ſhe was endeavouring to prevent, a footing and intereſt in Spain. Harcourt, after this unſucceſsful journey, bethought himſelf of another ſtratagem, and, being returned to Madrid, ſo powerfully worked upon the ambition of cardinal Portocarrero, that he engaged him in the intereſt of France.

While theſe things paſt in Spain, the French were not leſs buſy to ſtrengthen themſelves, by an alliance with the crown of Sweden, which at length was concluded at Stockholm on the ninth of July. It was declared in the ſecond article, that 'the aim and intention of this treaty was to preſerve and ſecure the common peace by ſuch means, as ſhould be judged moſt proper and convenient.'

In this manner did the French king amuſe the foreign courts with his pretended endeavours to preſerve the tranquility of Europe, when he was meditating how to break it, upon the firſt news of the king of Spain's death, which was hourly expected at the court of France. For, to ſay nothing of the motions of his land and naval forces, already mentioned, he cauſed a great camp to be formed at Compiegne, the pretence of which was to inſtruct the duke of Burgundy in the art of war; but which gave no ſmall umbrage to the neighbouring princes and ſtates, who looked upon it as deſigned to make a ſudden irruption into the Spaniſh Netherlands. However, the unexpected recovery of the king of Spain's health, as it diſappointed the hopes of the French king, ſo it diſpelled the fears of the reſt, at leaſt for this year.

King William's journey to Zell gave the court of France as much uneaſineſs as the camp at Compiegne gave the allies, though it is certain, the king's chief view was to cement the union of the princes of Germany by a match between the king of the Romans and the princeſs of Hanover, which was now agreed on, and ſoon after compleated; and by removing the apprehenſions, which ſome members of the empire were under, of the growing power of the emperor; which the king did effectually, in concert with the ſtates-general, by putting a ſtop to the Hungarian war, which had continued for above fifteen years. The armies on both ſides were indeed conſiderable in number and ſtrength this ſummer; but yet there ſeemed no great diſpoſition in either for action, but rather an inclination in the contending parties to ſet up a treaty under the mediation of the lord Paget, the Engliſh, and Mr. Colliers the Dutch embaſſador; who towards the middle of Auguſt arrived in the Turkiſh camp near Belgrade, and by their good offices the place of conference was agreed upon to be between Peterwaradin and Salankemen; the emperor's and the confederate miniſters being to reſide at Carlowitz, the Sultan's at Salankemen, and the mediators between the two places. It was on the ſeventh of November when the mediators delivered to the Turkiſh plenipotentiaries the preliminary articles, which were in ſubſtance, that each party ſhould retain what he poſſeſſed. And the five following days were ſpent in preparing matters, upon which they were to enter into conference. And now there aroſe a great diſpute about precedency. The Turks inſiſted upon the firſt place, which was claimed by the emperor's embaſſadors, next to whom the Poliſh plenipotentiary demanded to ſit; which was refuſed by the Ruſſian and all the reſt, except the Venetian, who inſiſted upon the ſeat next to the Engliſh. This diſpute had like to have had very ill conſequences, if Maurocordato, one of the Turkiſh plenipotentiaries, had not found out the following expedient. He propoſed the erecting of a round building, with as many doors as there were embaſſadors, each door looking towards the country from whence they ſeverally came, and that tents ſhould be placed round the building, from whence on the firſt day of conference, the embaſſadors ſhould come forth with an equal pace, and enter the room, all at the ſame time, and, ſaluting one another, take the ſeat next to them. The mediators ſecretaries, and thoſe of the Imperial embaſſy, were placed behind; and the Turkiſh ſecretary ſate down before the floor. The conference was opened with the pronouncing of theſe words, 'God grant an happy peace,' and laſted from half an hour after ten till three in the afternoon, when the mediators and plenipotentiaries went out in the ſame order, as they entered. The conferences were renewed in the ſame manner the three ſucceſſive days with good ſucceſs. But ſome debates ariſing about the giving up of Teckely and the Holy Sepulchre, the diſmantling of Caminieck, and the ſurrendering of another place upon the Black Sea; beſides the quitting of Azoph to the Muſcovites; and chiefly about the regulation of the limits between the two empires and the Venetian and Turkiſh territories; the plenipotentiaries ſent expreſſes to their reſpective maſters, which waſted a great deal of time. However at length the Imperialiſts and Poles concluded their part of the treaty, on the 26th of January 1698-9, and perhaps would have done it ſooner, but in ſome ſort of compliance with the Venetians, who did not ſign theirs till the middle of the next month. As for the articles between the Czar of Muſcovy and the Sultan, they contained only a truce for two years, and ſo were ſoon agreed upon and ſigned, on the 25th of December 1698. By this peace the emperor preſerved his late acquiſitions, and greatly enlarged his territories. The Poles had the important place of Caminieck reſtored to them with other advantages. The Muſcovites were gainers by the keeping of Azoph. And the Venetians had all the Morea, and ſeveral fortreſſes in Dalmatia, yielded up to them. So that it was computed, that the Turks loſt the beſt half of their dominions in Europe. Thus the long war between the emperor and the Turks, which had brought both ſides by turns very near the laſt extremities, was at laſt concluded by the direction and mediation of the king of England.

By this time the new king of Poland having brought the cardinal primate, who had all along adhered to the prince of Conti, to acknowledge his title, and compoſed the troubles of Lithuania, a univerſal peace ſeemed now to be ſettled throughout Chriſtendom.

There was now a parliament choſen, and the elections fell generally on men, who were in the intereſts of the government. Many of them had indeed ſome popular notions, which they had imbibed under a bad government, and thought they ought to keep them under a good one. So that thoſe who wiſhed well to the public, apprehended great difficulties in managing them. The king himſelf did not ſeem to lay this to heart ſo much as was fitting. He ſtaid long beyond ſea; and croſs winds hindered his return to England ſo ſoon as he had intended; upon which the parliament was prorogued for ſome weeks after the members were come up. Even this ſoured their ſpirits, and had too great a ſhare in the ill humour, that appeared among them.

The king arrived in England, the 3d of December; and, the parliament being met three days after, and the commons having choſen ſir Thomas Littleton for their ſpeaker, the ſeſſion was opened by the king with the following ſpeech:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I Have no doubt but you are met together with hearts fully diſpoſed to do what is neceſſary for the ſafety, honour, and happineſs of the kingdom; and that is all I aſk of you.

"In order to this, two things principally ſeem to require your conſideration.

"The one is, what ſtrength ought to be maintained at ſea, and what force kept up at land for this year. All that I ſhall obſerve to you on this head, is, that the flouriſhing of trade, the ſupporting of credit, and the quiet of the people's minds at home, will depend upon the opinion they have of their ſecurity. And, to preſerve to England the weight and influence it has, at preſent, on the councils and affairs abroad, it will be requiſite, Europe ſhould ſee, you will not be wanting to yourſelves.

"The ſecond thing I ſhall mention to you, as of great conſequence, is the making ſome farther progreſs towards a diſcharging the debts which the nation has contracted, by reaſon of the long and expenſive war. In this the public intereſt, as well as juſtice, is concerned; and I think an Engliſh parliament can never make ſuch a miſtake, as not to hold ſacred all parliamentary engagements.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I do earneſtly recommend theſe things to you, that you may provide ſuch ſupplies, as you ſhall judge neceſſary for theſe ſeveral occaſions.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I think it would be happy, if ſome effectual expedient could be found for employing the poor, which might tend to the great increaſe of our manufactures, as well as remove a heavy burden from the people.

"I hope alſo you will employ your thoughts about ſome good bills for the advancement of trade, and for the future diſcouragement of vice and profaneneſs,

"The things I have mentioned to you being of common concern, I cannot but hope for unanimity and diſpatch."

It appears by this ſpeech, how neceſſary the king thought it to keep up a good naval and land force. For though he had taken meaſures to ſecure the Spaniſh ſucceſſion, and preſerve the tranquillity of Europe; yet he was apprehenſive, that, if England was entirely diſarmed, it would be too great a temptation to the ambition of France, to break through all treaties and engagements, in order to invade the monarchy of Spain, but the commons were ſo far from being of the king's mind, that they highly reſented his keeping up an army beyond the votes of the laſt parliament, without duly conſidering the occaſion for his ſo doing; and this reſentment was increaſed by the king's own management in the affair. The miniſters repreſented to him, that they would carry the keeping up a land force of ten or twelve thouſand, but that they could not carry it further. He ſaid, ſo ſmall a number was as good as none at all; therefore he would not authoriſe them to propoſe it. On the other hand, they thought they ſhould loſe their credit with their beſt friends, if they ventured to ſpeak of a greater number. So that, when the houſe of commons took up the debate, the miniſtry were ſilent, and propoſed no number; upon which thoſe, who were in the contrary intereſt, named ſeven thouſand men; and accordingly it was reſolved, "That all the land forces of England, in Engliſh pay, exceeding ſeven thouſand men (and thoſe conſiſting of his majeſty's natural born ſubjects) be forthwith paid and diſbanded; and that all the forces in Ireland, exceeding twelve thouſand men (and thoſe natural born ſubjects, to be maintained by that kingdom) be likewiſe forthwith diſbanded." They ordered a bill to be brought in upon theſe reſolutions, which was eagerly purſued, and ſoon brought to perfection. This gave the king great uneaſineſs; for, by theſe reſolutions, not only the army was to be reduced to an inconſiderable number, but that number was to conſiſt of natural born ſubjects, by which means the Dutch guards (of whom the king was entirely fond) were to be ſent away, as well as the regiments of the French refugees were to be caſhiered. The king ſeemed not only to lay this much to heart, but even to ſink under it. He tried all that was poſſible to ſtruggle againſt it, when it was too late; it not being ſo eaſy to recover things in an after game, as it was to have prevented this miſunderſtanding, which was like to ariſe between him and his parliament. It was ſurmiſed, that he was reſolved not to paſs the bill, but that he would abandon the government, rather than hold it with a force, that was too ſmall to preſerve and protect it. Yet this was conſidered only as a threatening, ſo that little regard was had to it. However it appears from an original letter of the lord chancellor Sommers to the duke of Shrewſbury, that the king had actually formed ſuch a deſign; from which no remonſtrances, which that lord could then uſe, could prevail on him to deſiſt. For his majeſty was reſolved to go to the parliament, on the 4th of January, and to make the following ſpeech:

"I Came to this kingdom, at the deſire of this nation, to ſave it from ruin, and to preſerve your religion, your laws, and liberties; and for that end I have been obliged to maintain a long and burdenſome war for this kingdom; which, by the grace of God, and the bravery of this nation, is at preſent ended in a good peace; under which you may live happily and in quiet, provided you will contribute to your own ſecurity, in the manner I had recommended to you at the opening of the ſeſſions. But ſeeing, to the contrary, that you have ſo little regard to my advice, and that you take no manner of care of your own ſecurity, and that you expoſe yourſelves to evident ruin, by diveſting diveſting yourſelves of the only means for your defence, it would not be juſt nor reaſonable, that I ſhould be witneſs of your ruin, not being able to do any thing of myſelf, it not being in my power to defend and protect you, which was the only view I had in coming into this country. Therefore, I am obliged to recommend to you to chuſe and name to me ſuch perſons, as you ſhall judge moſt proper, to whom I may leave the adminiſtration of the government in my abſence; aſſuring you, that, though I am at preſent forced to withdraw myſelf out of the kingdom, I ſhall always preſerve the ſame inclination to its advantages and proſperity. And when I can judge, that my preſence will be neceſſary for your defence, I ſhall be ready to return, and hazard myſelf for your ſecurity, as I have formerly done; beſeeching the great God to bleſs your deliberations, and to inſpire you with all that is neceſſary for the good and welfare of the kingdom."

[1698-9] By what means the king was diverted from executing this reſolution, does not appear; but the bill for reducing the army paſſed with ſome oppoſition in the houſe of commons; and in the houſe of lords a feeble attempt was made againſt it, but this was rather a reproach than a ſervice to the government, it being faintly made, and ill defended. When the bill was ready, the king came, on the 1ſt of February, to the houſe of lords, and, inſtead of the foregoing ſpeech, made that which follows; wherein, he ſhews his reaſons for paſſing the diſbanding-bill, and at the ſame time expoſtulates a little upon the hardſhip of it [c].

My lords and gentlemen,

"I AM come to paſs 'the bill for diſbanding the army,' as ſoon as I underſtood it was ready for me.

"Though in our preſent circumſtances there appears great hazard in breaking ſuch a number of the troops; and though I might think myſelf unkindly uſed, that thoſe guards who came over with me to your aſſiſtance, and have conſtantly attended me in all the actions, wherein I have been engaged, ſhould be removed from me; yet it is my fixed opinion that nothing can be ſo fatal to us, as that any diſtruſt or jealouſy ſhould ariſe between me and my people, which I muſt own would have been very unexpected, after what I have undertaken, ventured, and acted for the reſtoring and ſecuring of their liberties.

"I have thus plainly told you the only reaſon, which has induced me to paſs this bill; and now I think myſelf obliged, in diſcharge of the truſt repoſed in me, and for my own juſtification, that no ill conſequences may lie at my door, to tell you as plainly my judgment that the nation is left too much expoſed.

"It is therefore incumbent upon you to take this matter into your ſerious conſideration, and effectually to provide ſuch a ſtrength, as is neceſſary for the ſafety of the kingdom, and the preſervation of the peace, which God has given us."

Though the commons could not be diverted from their purpoſe, by the king's reaſons for paſſing the bill, nor by his repreſentation of the dangerous conſequences of it, they preſented however an addreſs of thanks, ſetting forth, "How ſenſible they were of the difficulties he had undertaken, and the labours he had ſuſtained, and the hazards he had run, in reſcuing them from popery and arbitrary power, reſtoring their liberties, and giving peace and quiet to all Chriſtendom: They returned him their moſt hearty thanks for his moſt gracious ſpeech, in which he had expreſſed ſo great a regard for the good will and affection of his people, and had given ſo undeniable proof of his readineſs to comply with the deſires of his parliament. And, as his majeſty had ſhewn a moſt tender and fatherly concern for the ſecurity and ſafety of his people, ſo they aſſured him, that he ſhould never have reaſon to think the commons were undutiful or unkind to him, but that they would upon all occaſions ſtand by and aſſiſt him in the preſervation of his ſacred perſon, and ſupport of his government, againſt all his enemies whatſoever." His majeſty, in anſwer to this, told them, "That he took their addreſs very kindly: That he was fully ſatisfied of their duty and affection, and had no doubt but they would always act in the manner they had expreſſed upon this occaſion."

The lords alſo preſented an addreſs of thanks for the diſbanding act, and for the gracious expreſſions in his ſpeech, "That it was his majeſty's fixed opinion, that nothing could be ſo fatal to them, as that any diſtruſt or jealouſy ſhould ariſe between his majeſty and his people: As likewiſe for his care and concern for the ſafety of the kingdom, upon all occaſions; aſſuring his majeſty, that at all times, for the ſafety of the kingdom, and the preſervation of the peace, which God has given them, they would aſſiſt and defend his majeſty againſt all his enemies both at home and abroad."

The king thanked the lords for their addreſs: and finding that both houſes concurred in the ſame opinion as to the diſbanding of the army, he gave effectual orders for reducing it to the number of ſeven thouſand men, to be maintained in England, under the name of guards and garriſons. But, by reaſon that cavalry is more ſerviceable upon any ſudden exigency, than infantry, the king took care, that, of theſe ſeven thouſand, four thouſand were horſe and dragoons, and three thouſand were foot. The bodies were alſo reduced to ſo ſmall a number of ſoldiers, that it was ſaid, we had now an army of officers; but this model was much approved by proper judges as the beſt, into which ſo ſmall a number could have been brought.

This great reform gave the king much concern; but what touched him very ſenſibly was the neceſſity of ſending away his Dutch guards, a regiment, which had faithfully attended his perſon from his earlieſt years, followed his fortune every where, and to which, beſides inumerable other ſignal ſervices, he owed his victory at the famous battle of the Boyne. With theſe the king had the utmoſt regret to part; and therefore, as he hoped the paſſing the diſbanding-act had ſoftened their minds, he made an attempt for keeping theſe guards by ſending the lord Ranelagh with the following meſſage to the commons, all of his own hand-writing:

"William R.

"His majeſty is pleaſed to let the houſe know, that the neceſſary preparations are made for tranſporting the guards, who came with him into England; and that he intends to ſend them away immediately, unleſs, out of conſideration to him, the houſe be diſpoſed to find a way for continuing them longer in his ſervice, which his majeſty would take very kindly."

Upon reading this meſſage, the queſtion was put, That a day be appointed to conſider of it; but it was carried in the negative, and reſolved, that an addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, repreſenting the reaſons, why the houſe could not comply with his meſſage. The addreſs was accordingly delivered, wherein they repreſented, "That the paſſing the late act for diſbanding the army gave great ſatisfaction to the ſubjects; and his majeſty's readineſs to comply with the punctual execution of it would prevent all occaſions of diſtruſt and jealouſy between him and his people. That it was an unſpeakable grief to them, that his majeſty ſhould be adviſed to propoſe any thing in his meſſage, to which they could not conſent with due regard to that conſtitution, which his majeſty came over to reſtore, and had ſo often expoſed his royal perſon to preſerve; and did in his gracious declaration promiſe, that all thoſe foreign forces, which came over with him, ſhould be ſent back. That in duty therefore to his majeſty, and to diſcharge the truſt repoſed in them, they craved leave to lay before his majeſty, that nothing conduceth more to the happineſs and welfare of this kingdom, than an entire confidence between his majeſty and his people, which could no way be ſo firmly eſtabliſhed, as by intruſting his ſacred perſon with his own ſubjects, who had ſo eminently ſignalized themſelves on all occaſions, during the late long and expenſive war."

The king's anſwer to this addreſs was as follows, "Gentlemen, I came hither to reſtore the antient conſtitution of this government. I have had all poſſible regard to it ſince my coming; and I am reſolved, through the courſe of my reign, to endeavour to preſerve it entire in all the parts of it. I have a full confidence in the affections of my people, and I am well aſſured they have the ſame in me; and I will never give them juſt cauſe to alter this opinion.

"As to my ſubjects who ſerved during the war, I am an eye witneſs of their bravery, and of their zeal for my perſon and government; and I have not been wanting to expreſs my ſenſe of this to my parliaments, as well as upon other occaſions. I have all the reaſon to truſt and rely upon them, that a prince can have; and I am ſatisfied there is not one man among them capable of entertaining a thought that what was propoſed in my meſſage proceeded from any diſtruſt of them.

[c] The title of the bill was, An Act for granting an aid of 800,000l. for the effectual diſbanding of the army.

The

" It ſhall be my ſtudy, to the utmoſt of my power, to perform the part of a juſt and a good king; and, as I will ever be ſtrictly and nicely careful of obſerving my promiſes to my ſubjects, ſo I will not doubt of their tender regards to me."

But this anſwer could not move the commons from their reſolutions; ſo that the Dutch guards were ſoon after ſhipped off for Holland [d].

In carrying theſe points, many hard things were ſaid againſt the court, and againſt the king himſelf. It was ſuggeſted, that he loved not the nation; that he was on the reſerve with all Engliſhmen, and ſhewed no confidence in them; but that, as ſoon as the ſeſſion of parliament was over, he went immediately to Holland. And it was ſaid, this was not to look after the affairs of the ſtates, which had been more excuſable; but that he went thither to enjoy a lazy privacy at Loo, where, with a few favourites, he hunted and paſſed away the ſummer in a way, that did not much raiſe his character. It is certain, the uſage, which his majeſty had met with of late, put his ſpirits too much on the fret; and he neither took care to diſguiſe that, nor to overcome the ill humour, which the manner of his deportment, rather than any juſt occaſion given by him, had raiſed in many againſt him.

At the ſame time that the army was thus reduced, there was a large proviſion made for the ſea, greater than was thought neceſſary in a time of peace. Fifteen thouſand ſeamen, with a fleet proportioned to that number, was thought a neceſſary ſecurity, ſince we were made ſo weak by land. For the maintenance of this fleet, and for diſbanding the army, and other neceſſary occaſions, a ſupply was granted of 1,484,015l. to be raiſed by a tax of three ſhillings in the pound upon all lands, penſions, offices, and perſonal eſtates.

One of the conſequences of diſbanding the army was a more viſible concourſe of the jacobites and papiſts about the town and court, in ſo bold and inſolent a manner, that the commons took notice of it; and, upon that occaſion, preſented the following addreſs to the king on the 21ſt of February:

" WE your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons in parliament aſſembled, having obſerved the great concourſe to this city of papiſts and other diſaffected perſons, who have not owned your majeſty to be lawful and rightful king of theſe realms, and the boldneſs they aſſume from your majeſty's unexampled clemency, not only to keep horſes and arms contrary to law, but alſo to frequent all public places of reſort near your two houſes of parliament, and even to approach your royal palaces, whereby they may have opportunities to perpetrate any wicked attempt againſt your royal perſon, on the ſafety and preſervation whereof our religion and liberties, and the peace and welfare, not only of theſe kingdoms, but of all Europe, do in a very great meaſure depend.

" And having alſo conſidered the many plots and conſpiracies againſt your majeſty's perſon and government, but eſpecially the late horrid intended aſſaſſination, contrived and carried on, not only by papiſts (whoſe religion and intereſt might lead them to it) but even by ſuch, who at their death (to the great ſcandal of our religion) profeſſed and owned themſelves to be members of the church of England, which chiefly (under God) owes its preſervation and defence to your majeſty, and whoſe doctrines are directly oppoſite to all ſuch inhuman and treaſonable practices.

" And having alſo certain information, that great numbers of popiſh prieſts, and jeſuits, within this city and parts adjacent, intrude themſelves into the preſence of ſick and dying perſons, with deſign to prevail upon them, in their weakneſs, to be reconciled to the church of Rome; and daily endeavour to prevert and ſeduce from their allegiance your majeſty's good ſubjects, in poiſoning them with their wicked and damnable doctrines and principles; and that they have imported great quantities of popiſh books, and keep ſchools to breed up and inſtruct children in the Romiſh ſuperſtition and idolatry.

" We therefore hold ourſelves obliged, for quieting the minds of your good ſubjects, and in duty to your majeſty, humbly to beſeech your majeſty, that you will be graciouſly pleaſed (in order to ſuppreſs ſuch practices of the reſtleſs and notorious enemies of your government) to iſſue out your royal proclamation for removing all papiſts and others, who diſown your majeſty's government, from the city of London and parts adjacent, according to the laws; and that the laws may be put in execution againſt them in ſuch a manner, that their wicked deſigns may be effectually diſappointed."

To this addreſs his majeſty made anſwer, 'That he would take care, that the laws ſhould be put in execution according to their deſire,' and in order to this he cauſed a proclamation to be publiſhed on the 2d of March.

Theſe complaints of the growth of popery were not without reaſon; for, upon the peace of Ryſwick, a great ſwarm of prieſts came over to England, not only thoſe, whom the revolution had frighted away, but many more new men, who appeared in many places with great inſolence; and it was ſaid, that they boaſted of the favour and protection, of which they were aſſured. Some enemies of the government began to give it out, that the favouring that religion was a ſecret article of the peace; and ſo abſurd is malice and calumny, that the jacobites began to ſay, that the king was either of that religion, or at leaſt a favourer of it: Complaints of the avowed practices and inſolence of the prieſts were brought from ſeveral places, and thoſe were maliciouſly aggravated by ſome who caſt the blame of all on the king. Theſe complaints, being continued the next ſeſſion, produced a remarkable act againſt the papiſts, of which an account will be given in its place.

The old Eaſt-India company preſented a petition to the commons, praying, 'That their caſe might be taken into conſideration; and that the houſe would make ſome proviſion, that their corporation might ſubſiſt for the reſidue of the term of twenty-one years, granted by his majeſty's charter: That the payment of the five pounds per cent. by the late act for ſettling the trade to the Eaſt-Indies might be ſettled and adjuſted in ſuch a manner, as it might not remain a burden upon the petitioners: And that ſuch further conſiderations might be had for the petitioners relief, and for the preſervation of the Eaſt-India trade to England, as ſhould be thought meet.' The commons, having taken this petition into conſideration, on the 27th of February, ordered a bill to be brought in thereupon; which bill was rejected, on the 9th of March, before it came to a ſecond reading.

Some in the houſe of commons, it is ſaid, began to carry things to a great height, and to aſſert that they were not bound to maintain the votes, and to keep up the credit of the former parliament; and they tried to ſhake the act, made in favour of the new Eaſt-India company: This was ſo contrary to the fundamental maxims of our conſtitution, that it gave cauſe of jealouſy, ſince this could be intended for nothing, but to ruin the government: Money raiſed by parliament, upon bargains and conditions that were performed, by thoſe who advanced it, gave them ſuch a purchaſe of thoſe acts, and this was ſo ſacred, that to overturn it muſt deſtroy all credit for the future, and no government could be maintained that did not preſerve this religiouſly.

The commons took likewiſe into conſideration the ſtate of [d] The king writ the following letter to the earl of Galway, a little before this.

Kenſington, Jan. 27. 1698.

I received ſome days ago a letter from you without date, by which I ſee you are uneaſy at the proceedings of the parliament here againſt the foreigners. I think you have too much cauſe to be ſo; though, as yet, nothing has paſſed about you, and I have good reaſon to hope you will be left undiſturbed. At leaſt, you may be aſſured, I ſhall do my utmoſt, that nothing be done to your prejudice; ſatisfied, as I am, with your conduct, and uſeful, as you are, for my ſervice. So you may be ſure, that I will not recall you, unleſs I am forced to it, which I hope will not be the caſe. It is not to be conceived, how people here are ſet againſt the foreigners. You will eaſily judge on whom this reflects. I deſign very ſhortly to ſend into Ireland five regiments of foot, and two of horſe, and ſoon after three more of foot, eight in all. I will ſend you, in a few days, orders to diſband Woolſey's regiment of horſe, and nine regiments of foot, intending to keep only thoſe of Hanmer and Hamilton. I deſign alſo, when the parliament riſes, to ſend you your regiment of horſe, and the three French regiments, and perhaps Miramont's dragoons; but that muſt be very ſecret, though I much fear my deſign is already ſuſpected here. I am in doubt whether I ſhall ſend likewiſe into Ireland Eppinger's regiment. All this together would amount to eighteen battalions of foot, three regiments of horſe, and five of dragoons, reckoning Eppinger's for two; and this would be in a manner agreeable to your project, and, according to my calculation, the expence no greater; but, if it ſhould be, ſomething muſt be retrenched, of which I ſhould be glad to know your ſentiments. You will eaſily perceive how neceſſary it is, that all this be kept ſecret. I thought it requiſite to give you early notice of my intention, that you might take your meaſures accordingly; mine muſt be regulated according as things go in the parliament, of which there is no being ſure, till the ſeſſion is over. There is a ſpirit of ignorance and malice prevails here beyond conception. Be always aſſured of my friendſhip.

WILLIAM R.

The

the navy; and, after an examination of the preſent and paſt management of the maritime affairs, they drew up and preſented to the king an addreſs, concerning certain miſmanagements, which were of no great importance [e].

It was evident, that this addreſs was chiefly levelled againſt the earl of Orford, who was both treaſurer of the navy, and one of the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty, and who had got too much by his late expedition in the Mediterranean, and done the government too ſignal ſervices, not to lie open to the inquiry of ſome well-meaning, and to the envy of many diſaffected perſons. The earl therefore, foreſeeing the ſtorm gathering againſt him, thought it prudence to reſign all his places and retire. However it ought to be remembered in juſtice to him, that what he got in the Streights, was only by the preſents he received from the ſtates, whom he protected; for it was confeſſed by his very enemies, that a fleet was never better taken care of, nor more timely provided, than that, which he, with ſo much reputation, commanded. And beſides it is moſt certain, that he charged the king in his books with much leſs a day for every man, than the uſual allowance of the navy [f].

[1699] This ſeſſion ended on the 4th of May, when the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"AT the opening this parliament I told you my opinion was, that you were come together with hearts fully diſpoſed to what was neceſſary for the ſafety, honour, and happineſs of this kingdom; and, having nothing elſe to recommend to you, I had reaſon to hope for unanimity and diſpatch.

"You have now ſat ſo many months, that the ſeaſon of the year, as well as your particular affairs, make it reaſonable you ſhould have a receſs. I take it for granted you have finiſhed all the bills, which for the preſent you think requiſite to be paſſed into laws; and I have given my aſſent to all you have preſented to me.

"If any thing ſhall be found wanting for our ſafety, the ſupport of public credit, by making good the faith of the kingdom, as it ſtands engaged by parliamentary ſecurities, and for diſcharge of the debts occaſioned by the war, or towards the advancing of trade, the ſuppreſſing of vice, and the employing of the poor, which were all the things I propoſed to your conſideration, when we met firſt, I cannot doubt but effectual care will be taken of them next winter, and I wiſh no inconvenience may happen in the mean time."

Then the lord chancellor prorogued the parliament to the firſt of June.

During this ſeſſion, there was great talk of the lewdneſs of the ſtage, and not without reaſon, for both players and plays were ſo profane, that they were become a ſcandal to the nation. There had lately been publiſhed a book, intitled 'A ſhort view of the ſtage,' by Jeremy Collier, the ſame that had abſolved ſir William Perkins, at Tyburn. In this work, he made a collection of the moſt lewd and profane paſſages in ſome modern plays, as ſir John Vanbrugh's, Mr. Congreve's, and others, whoſe authors could more eaſily defend the writing of comedies, which Collier declaimed againſt, than vindicate what they had written in the paſſages he quoted. His book had a great run, and was cried up by the religious part of the town. And indeed, it was hardly poſſible for immorality and profaneneſs to be effectually reſtrained, while they were acted over with ſo much indecent liberty upon the ſtage. The ordinary plays, inſtead of anſwering the good old deſign of expoſing vice, and recommending the charms of virtue, were debauched with the wrong images of things, and with a language bordering upon impious and obſcene. This licentious vein had grown into a faſhion under the rejoicings of king Charles II. and was now continued to pleaſe the vitiated palate of the gay and looſe people, that frequented the play-houſes for want of religion and buſineſs. The king, who rarely or never went to thoſe places of diverſion, was honeſtly informed of the ſcandal given to them; and therefore to put ſome check upon their liberty and lewdneſs, he commanded the following order to be ſent to both play-houſes.

His majeſty being informed, that, notwithſtanding an order made in June 1697, by the earl of Sunderland, then lord chamberlain of the houſehold, to prevent the profaneneſs and immorality of the ſtage, ſeveral plays had lately been acted, containing expreſſions contrary to religion and good manners. And whereas the maſter of the revels had repreſented, that, in contempt of the ſaid order, the actors did neglect to leave out ſuch profane and indecent expreſſions, as he had thought proper to be omitted: Therefore it was his majeſty's pleaſure, that that they ſhould not hereafter preſume to act any thing in any play, contrary to religion and good manners, as they ſhould anſwer at their utmoſt peril. At the ſame time the maſter of the revels was commanded not to licenſe any plays containing irreligious or immoral expreſſions, and to give notice to the lord chamberlain, if the players preſumed to act any thing, which he had ſtruck out.

Towards the end of March, the earl of Warwick and lord Mohun being ſeverally indicted for the murder of captain Richard Coote, were tried by the houſe of peers, in a court prepared for that purpoſe, in Weſtminſter-Hall; the lord chancellor of England being conſtituted lord high-ſteward upon this occaſion, and the court being opened with the uſual ceremonies, the trial of the earl of Warwick came on firſt, and laſted till late in the evening; when the peers adjourned to their own houſe, and, after ſeveral debates, the lords temporal, only, returned to the court in Weſtminſter-Hall; where they delivered their judgments, 'ſeriatim,' upon their honours; and unanimouſly acquitted the earl of the murder, but found him guilty of manſlaughter. The next day came on, in like manner, the trial of the lord Mohun; who was acquitted of the murder by the unanimous ſuffrages of the peers then preſent [g].

On the 14th of May, the earl of Jerſey, lately returned from his embaſſy to France [h], was appointed ſecretary of ſtate, in the room of the duke of Shrewſbury. The duke, by a fall from his horſe, was rendered incapable to undergo the fatigue of the ſecretary's place; but he accepted of that of lord chamberlain of his majeſty's houſhold; and, accordingly, in October following, the key and white ſtaff were delivered to him by the king. He afterwards went to France and Italy for change of air, and married an Italian lady Adelaida Palleotica, of Bologna. The earl of Mancheſter was appointed embaſſador extraordinary to France; and the earl of Pembroke being declared lord preſident of the council, the privy ſeal was given to the lord viſcount Lonſdale. On the laſt day of May, the king appointed the lord chancellor, the lord preſident of the council, the lord privy ſeal, the lord ſteward of the houſhold, the earl of Bridgewater, firſt commiſſioner of the admiralty, the earl of Marlborough, the earl of Jerſey, and Mr. Montague, to be lords juſtices of England, during his abſence. The day after, the king went from Kenſington to Margate; where he embarked for Holland, and on the 3d of June, landed at Orange Polder; from whence he went to the Hague.

[e] The articles were,

"That the Streights ſquadron, not ſailing till September laſt, was prejudicial to England, and a great miſmanagement.

"That the order made by the commiſſioners of the admiralty, the 12th of September 1695, giving Henry Prieſtman eſq. an allowance of ten ſhillings a day from the date of his commiſſion, as commander in chief before Sallee in the year 1684, till the Bonadventure was paid off, over and above his pay as captain of the ſaid ſhip, was very unreaſonable, and a miſapplication of the public money.

"That the victualling any of his majeſty's ſhips by others than by the victuallers appointed for that ſervice, or their agents, was contrary to the courſe of the navy, and might be of ill conſequence.

"That many new and unneceſſary charges had, in an extraordinary manner, been introduced into the navy, which was a great miſmanagement.

"That the deductions of poundage taken by the pay-maſters of the navy for ſlop-clothes, dead-men's clothes, tobacco, cheſt at Chatham, chaplain and ſurgeon, were without warrant, and ought to be accounted for.

"That it was inconſiſtent with the ſervice of the navy for the ſame perſon to be one of the commiſſioners for executing the office of lord high admiral and treaſurer of the navy at the ſame time.

"And that the paſſing any account of monies impreſſed for the contingent uſes of the navy, without regular vouchers, or ſuch other proof as the nature of the ſervice would admit, either, with or without a ſign manual, was contrary to the rules and methods of the navy, and of dangerous conſequence.

"All which they begged leave to lay before his majeſty, deſiring, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to take effectual care, that the miſmanagements herein complained of might be prevented for the future."

[f] He was ſo popular, that in the former parliament, when he was a commoner, he was knight of the ſhire for Middleſex, knight of the ſhire for Cambridge county, and burgeſs for Portmouth, an honour, without example, in the rolls of parliament.

[g] The caſe was thus: The lords Warwick and Mohun, and the captains French and Coote, with Mr. Dockwra and Mr. James, being at a tavern, a quarrel aroſe; and they all went in chairs to Leiceſter-Fields, between one and two o'clock in the morning; and a duel was fought in the dark, three againſt three; in which Coote was killed by French, as was ſaid. The main evidence againſt the lord Warwick was, that his ſword was bloody, and French's was not.

[h] The earl of Jerſey obtained leave for the ducheſs de la Force, a proteſtant, to quit France; where, upon the death of her huſband, ſhe was thrown into a nunnery at Evreux, in Normandy, and had endured fourteen years perſecution, with great conſtancy. She came over with the counteſs of Jerſey, and lived here to a very great age.

The commons of England having voted, That twelve thouſand men ſhould be maintained in Ireland, the parliament of that kingdom applied themſelves to find the neceſſary funds to anſwer the charge; and, on the 26th of January, an act paſſed for raiſing 120,000l. on all lands, tenements, and hereditaments in Ireland. This being done, the parliament was prorogued; and, ſeven months after, a new commiſſion, conſtituting the duke of Bolton, the earl of Berkeley, and the earl of Galway, lords Juſtices of Ireland, was opened, and read in council, and theſe two earls having been ſworn in the uſual manner, were complimented by the council, and ſeveral other perſons of quality [i].

All this while the Scots company were under no ſmall uneaſineſs: But, notwithſtanding the ſeveral repulſes, which they had met with in England, their court of directors, towards the beginning of the year, beſides the letters formerly mentioned ſent another to the lord Seafield, ſecretary of ſtate, to put him in mind of his promiſe, touching their petition, and the parliament's addreſs to the king. To which he wrote an anſwer on the 7th of February: "That he had preſented their petition to the king, and was commanded to let them know, That, there being accounts, that the ſhips belonging to the company, were arrived on the coaſts of America, and the particular deſign not being communicated to his majeſty, he therefore delayed to give an anſwer, till he received certain information of their ſettlement." The company having this intimation from the king, their council-general wrote a letter to him, importing; "That they had arrived ſafe at their intended port, within a league of the Golden Iſland, on the coaſt of Darien; and, after having treated aboard the ſhips with the natives, who were always owned to be proprietors of that part of the coaſt, their men had, at the requeſt, and with the conſent of the natives, landed on the 4th of November 1698, and taken poſſeſſion of an uninhabited place, never before poſſeſſed by any European whatever; and that, in purſuance of the treaty, the chief men and leaders of the natives had joined with, and taken commiſſion from the council. That they thought it their duty, at their firſt meeting, to give his majeſty an account thereof; and likewiſe, that by letters from the council, bearing date at New Edinburgh in Caledonia (the name given to their new ſettlement) the 28th of December, they were poſitively informed, that the French had a deſign upon all that coaſt, or at leaſt to make a ſettlement ſomewhere thereabouts. And they humbly conceived, that the firm ſettlement of their colony in thoſe parts might be a means of preventing, or at leaſt leſſening the evil conſequences, that might ariſe to his majeſty's kingdoms and dominions every where, by the ſettlement of any powerful foreign neighbour upon any part of that coaſt. And that, as they were always bound thankfully to acknowledge his goodneſs for granting them thoſe privileges and his letters patents, by which their company was eſtabliſhed; ſo they did in all humility confidently expect his royal favour and protection, as having, in all the ſteps of their conduct, through the whole courſe of that affair, ſtrictly obſerved the conditions required by the act of parliament and letters patents: And they referred that, together with the contents of their laſt petition, to his royal conſideration, to give ſuch directions therein, as to his wiſdom ſhould ſeem meet and expedient."

The news of the Scots ſettlement at Darien alarmed moſt of the nations of Europe, who had plantations in the neighbourhood. And it was no wonder, that the Spaniards in particular complained loudly of it. It lay ſo near Porto Bello and Panama on the one ſide, and Carthagena on the other, that they could not think they were ſafe, when ſuch a neighbour came ſo near the center of their empire in America. The French king alſo complained of this, as an invaſion of the Spaniſh dominions, and offered the court of Madrid a fleet to diſlodge the Scots.

The marquis of Canales, the Spaniſh embaſſador in England, likewiſe preſented the following memorial to the king: "The king, my maſter, being informed from ſeveral places, and laſtly, from the governor of the Havanna, of the inſult and attempt of ſome Scots ſhips, provided with men, and other things requiſite, who are endeavouring to ſettle themſelves in his dominions in America, and particularly in the province of Darien, his majeſty has received theſe advices with great diſcontent, as a mark of diſregard, and a breach of the alliance between the two crowns (which his majeſty has hitherto, and always will religiouſly obſerve, and from which ſo many advantages have accrued to his majeſty and his ſubjects) from which alliance his majeſty did not expect theſe ſudden inſults of his majeſty's ſubjects, and that in a time of peace, without any occaſion or pretence, in the very heart of his dominions. All that the king deſires is, that it be repreſented to his majeſty how very ſenſible he is of theſe hoſtilities and unjuſt proceedings, againſt which he will take proper meaſures." [k]

It was further urged by the Spaniards, that they were once poſſeſſed of Darien; and, though they found it too unhealthy to ſettle there, yet the right to it belonged ſtill to them; and conſequently, that the ſeizing of it was a breach of treaty, and a violent poſſeſſion of their country. In anſwer to this, the Scots aſſerted, that the nations of Darien were never conquered by the Spaniards, and were by conſequence a free people. They alledged, that they had purchaſed of thoſe natives leave to poſſeſs themſelves of that place; and that the Spaniards had abandoned the country, becauſe they could not reduce the natives; ſo that the pretenſion of the firſt diſcovery was made void; and then, the natives being left to themſelves, it was lawful for the Scots to treat with them.

It was given out, that there was much gold in the country; and the Scots were ſo full of hopes from this project, that a fund was raiſed for carrying it on, greater than, as was thought, that kingdom could ſtretch to. Four hundred thouſand pounds ſterling was ſubſcribed, and a fourth part was paid down; and afterwards ſeventy thouſand pounds more were brought in; and a national fury ſeemed to have tranſported the whole kingdom upon this project.

The jacobites went into the management with a particular heat. They ſaw the king would be much preſſed from Spain. The Engliſh nation apprehending, that this would be ſet up as a breach of treaties, and that upon a rupture their effects in Spain might be ſeized, grew alſo very uneaſy at it. Upon which it was thought, that the king would in time be forced to diſown the invaſion, and to declare againſt it; and in that caſe the jacobites hoped to have inflamed the kingdom with this, that the king denied them his protection, while they were only acting according to law; and this, they would have ſaid, was contrary to the coronation oath, and ſo they would have thought they were freed from their allegiance to him. The jacobites having this project, did all that was poſſible to raiſe the hopes of the nation to the higheſt degree. The Engliſh plantations grew alſo very jealous of the new colony; and feared, that the double proſpect of finding gold, and of robbing the Spaniards, would draw many planters from them into this new ſettlement; and that the buccaniers might run into them: For by the Scots act, this place was to be made a free port; and, if it was not ruined, before it was well formed, they reckoned it would become a ſeat of piracy, and another Algiers in thoſe parts. Upon theſe grounds the Engliſh nation inclined to declare againſt this, and the king ſeemed convinced, that it was an infraction of his treaties with Spain. Orders therefore were

[i] A letter at this time from the king to the earl of Galway, ſhews how much he was chagrined at the late proceedings.

Kenſington, Jan. 1, 1699.

I have not writ to you all this winter, by reaſon of my vexation at what paſſed in the parliament, and becauſe of the uncertainty I was under to know what to ſend you. It is not poſſible to be more ſenſibly touched than I am, at my not being able to do more for the poor refugee officers, who have ſerved me with ſo much zeal and fidelity. I am afraid the good God will puniſh the ingratitude of this nation. I could hardly get the eſtabliſhment of Ireland paſſed, as it will be ſent you: There are retrenchments, which I was forced to make, though I like them not; and, doubtleſs ſome of them muſt be changed. The duke of Bolton ſeems pleaſed with you, but not with the chancellor. I have this day diſpatched a new commiſſion for the lords juſtices of Ireland, by joining with the duke of Bolton, and you, the earl of Berkeley; who is an eaſy man, and will be agreeable to you. I am perfectly ſatisfied with your conduct; and hope now you will be left undiſturbed, ſince, in the laſt parliament nothing was ſaid of you, though you were much threatened. I fear, the commiſſion given here by the commons, for the inſpection of the forfeitures, will give you a great deal of trouble, and me no leſs, the next winter. Aſſuredly, on all ſides, my patience is put to the trial. I am going to breathe a little beyond ſea, in order to come back as ſoon as poſſible. I think it for my ſervice to change the commiſſion of the treaſury in Ireland, where, I doubt, the revenue is not well managed; of which it is neceſſary that you let me know your ſentiments immediately. The eſtabliſhment of the next year muſt abſolutely be reduced, that my ordinary revenue may ſerve to pay it; and a parliament in Ireland muſt not be thought of ſo ſoon. Of this you ought inſtantly to conſider; and take your meaſures for the future. Be always aſſured of my friendſhip.

ſent, but very ſecretly, to the Engliſh plantations, particularly to Jamaica, and the Leeward Iſlands, to forbid all commerce with the Scots at Darien. Accordingly, proclamations were publiſhed at Jamaica, Barbadoes, New York, and New England, in his majeſty's name, ſtrictly commanding all his ſubjects, that they ſhould not preſume, on any pretence whatſoever, to hold any correſpondence with the Scots at Darien, nor give them any aſſiſtance of arms, or ammunition, or proviſions, or any other neceſſaries whatſoever.

Whilſt in Scotland all men were full of hopes that their new colony ſhould bring them home mountains of gold, theſe proclamations came to their knowledge, and were complained of as acts of hoſtilities and violations of the common rights of humanity. It is true, the proclamations had a great effect on the colony, though otherwiſe it was too weak and ill ſupplied, as well as too much divided within itſelf, to have ſubſiſted long. Thoſe, who had firſt poſſeſſed themſelves of it, were forced to abandon it. Soon after they had gone from it, a ſecond recruit of men and proviſions were ſent thither from Scotland. But one of their ſhips unhappily took fire, in which they had the greateſt ſtock of proviſions; and ſo theſe likewiſe went off. And, though the third reinforcement, that ſoon followed this, was both ſtronger and better furniſhed, yet they fell into ſuch factions among themſelves, that they were too weak to reſiſt the Spaniards, who, feeble as they were, yet ſaw the neceſſity of attacking them; and they, finding themſelves unable to reſiſt the force, which was brought againſt them, capitulated; and with that the whole deſign fell to the ground, partly for want of ſtock and ſkill in thoſe, who managed it, and partly by the baſeneſs and treachery of thoſe, whom they employed.

The conduct of the king's miniſters in Scotland was much cenſured in the whole progreſs of this affair, for they had connived at it, if not encouraged it, in hopes that the deſign would fall of itſelf; but now it was not ſo eaſy to cure the univerſal diſcontent, which the miſcarriage of this deſign to the impoveriſhing of the whole kingdom, had raiſed, and which now began to ſpread like a contagion among all ſorts of people.

King William, having received the compliments of the foreign miniſters, and other perſons of quality, on his ſafe arrival in Holland, aſſiſted at the aſſembly of the States-General, and at that of the ſtates of Holland, and given inſtructions to Mr. Hill, whom he had appointed his envoy extraordinary to Savoy, to make his compliment of congratulation to that court upon the birth of the prince of Piedmont (which had been notified to him in England by count Maſſey) he ſet out for Loo, at which palace, and that of Dieren, he ſpent moſt part of the ſummer in his uſual diverſions of hunting and ſhooting.

About the latter end of Auguſt, the ſtates of Holland, out of their regard for the king's preſervation, publiſhed a placart, requiring, that all ſuch perſons, as had been declared rebels in England, ſhould immediately depart their dominions. And a few days after the king reviewed the Dutch forces incamped near Arnheim, and then returned to Loo, to entertain his boſom friend the old duke of Zell, who was come thither to make him a viſit with a numerous retinue.

The duke of Zell ſtaid about two months with the king at Loo, and, during the king's reſidence there, the earl of Portland, the French embaſſador count Tallard, and the grand penſionary of Holland, had frequent conferences about the affair of the Spaniſh ſucceſſion. There being alſo good reaſon to be apprehenſive of a rupture between the two northern crowns, his majeſty ſent inſtructions to monſieur Opdam, the Dutch embaſſador in Sweden, to uſe his utmoſt endeavours to prevent it, which were however ineffectual. About the middle of October, the king came to the aſſembly of the ſtates, and having ſettled the ſtate of the Dutch army and fleet for the enſuing year, he embarked for England, October 16, landed at Margate the next day, lay that night at Canterbury, and on the 18th arrived at Kenſington.

This year died the marquis of Wincheſter, whom the king had created duke of Bolton; he was a man of a ſtrange mixture; he had the ſpleen to a very high degree, and affected an extravagant behaviour; for many weeks he would take a conceit not to ſpeak one word; and at other times he would not open his mouth, till ſuch an hour of the day, when he thought the air was pure; he changed the day into night, and often hunted by torch-light, and took all ſorts of liberties to himſelf, many of which were very diſagreeable to thoſe about him. In the end of king Charles's time, and during king James's reign, he affected an appearance of folly, which afterwards he compared to Junius Brutus's behaviour under the Tarquins. With all this, he was a very knowing, and a very crafty politic man; and was an artful flatterer when that was neceſſary to compaſs his end, in which generally he was ſucceſsful. He was a man of a profuſe expence, and of a moſt ravenous avarice to ſupport that; and, though he was much hated, yet he carried matters before him with ſuch authority and ſucceſs, that, he was, in all reſpects, the great riddle of the age.

This ſummer ſir Joſiah Child died; he was a man of great notions as to merchandize, which was his education, and in which he ſucceeded beyond any man of his time; he applied himſelf chiefly to the Eaſt-India trade, which by his management was raiſed ſo high, that it drew much envy and jealouſy both upon himſelf and upon the company. He had a compaſs of knowledge and apprehenſion unuſual to men of his profeſſion. He was vain and covetous, and thought too cunning, though he ſeemed to be always ſincere.

A few days after the king's return, Mr. Mountague, having a view to the auditor's place, reſigned his ſeat at the treaſury-board, and was ſucceeded as chancellor of the exchequer by Mr. John Smith, and by Mr. Hill, now returned from Savoy, as one of the lords of the treaſury.

Many expected to ſee a new parliament; for the king's ſpeech at the end of the former ſeſſion look'd like a complaint, and an appeal to the nation againſt them; he ſeemed inclined to it, but his miniſters would not venture on it; the diſſolving a parliament in anger has always caſt ſuch a load on thoſe, who were thought to have adviſed it, that few have been able to bear it; beſides, the diſbanding the army had rendered the members, who promoted it, very popular to the nation; ſo they would have ſent up the ſame men, and it was thought that there was little occaſion for heat in another ſeſſion. And therefore, the parliament being met the 16th of November, the king addreſſed himſelf to both houſes in the following manner:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I Hope you will not think I have called you out of your countries too ſoon, if you conſider, that our common ſecurity requires a farther proviſion ſhould be made for the ſafety of the kingdom by ſea and land, before we are at the end of what was granted for that purpoſe the laſt ſeſſion. And, when you enter upon this buſineſs, I believe you will think it neceſſary to take care of the repairs of the ſhips and of the fortifications, without which our fleet cannot be ſafe, when it is in harbour.

"I cannot omit to put you in mind of another matter, in which ſo great a number of my ſubjects is concerned, and wherein the honour of the kingdom, and the faith of parliaments, is ſo far engaged, that our future ſecurity ſeems to depend upon it; I mean, 'the making good the deficiencies of the funds,' and the diſcharging the debts contracted by reaſon of the war.

"And till we may be ſo happy to ſee the public debts paid, I ſhall hope no ſeſſion will end without ſomething done towards leſſening them. While I am ſpeaking to you on this head, I think myſelf obliged to mention, with a very particular concern, a debt, which is owing to the prince of Denmark, the ſtate whereof I have ordered to be laid before you.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"Theſe are things of ſuch importance, that I muſt earneſtly recommend them to your conſideration, and deſire you to provide the neceſſary ſupplies.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"There is nothing I ſhould more rejoice in, than that I were not under the neceſſity of ſo often aſking aids of my people. But as the reaſon of it is evident, becauſe the funds, formerly applied to defray the public expence, are now anticipated for payment of the debts of the kingdom; ſo it is my ſatisfaction, that you all ſee, that nothing of what is demanded, is for any perſonal uſe of mine. And I do faithfully aſſure you, that no part of what is given ſhall be diverted from any purpoſe, for which it is deſigned.

"I believe the nation is already ſenſible of the good effects of peace, by the manifeſt increaſe of trade, which I ſhall make it my buſineſs to encourage by all means in my power. Probably, it might receive an advantage, if ſome good bill were prepared for the more effectual preventing and puniſhing unlawful and clandeſtine trading, which does not only tend to defraud the public, but prejudices the fair merchant, and diſcourages our own manufactures.

The

" The encreaſe of the poor is become a burden to the kingdom; and their looſe and idle life does, in ſome meaſure, contribute to that depravation of manners, which is complained of, I fear, with too much reaſon. Whether the ground of this evil be from defects of laws already made, or in the execution of them, deſerves your conſideration. As it is an indiſpenſable duty, that the poor, who are not able to help themſelves, ſhould be maintained; ſo I cannot but think it extremely deſirable, that ſuch, as are able and willing ſhould not want employment; and ſuch, as are obſtinate and unwilling, ſhould be compelled to labour.

" My lords and gentlemen,

" I have a full aſſurance of the good affections of my people; which I ſhall endeavour to preſerve, by a conſtant care of their juſt rights and liberties; by maintaining the eſtabliſhed religion; by ſeeing the courſe of juſtice kept ſteady and equal; by countenancing virtue, and diſcouraging vice; and by declining no difficulties nor dangers, where their welfare and proſperity may be concerned. Theſe are my reſolutions; and I am perſuaded that you are come together with purpoſes, on your part, ſuitable to theſe of mine. Since, then, our aims are only for the general good, let us act with confidence in one another; which will not fail, by God's bleſſing, to make me a happy king, and you a happy, flouriſhing people."

This excellent ſpeech was ſo far from removing (as it was hoped) the ill impreſſions, which the diſſatisfaction the king had expreſſed upon the proceedings of the commons, when he parted with them laſt, had left in their minds, that it ſerved rather to encreaſe them. The commons, notwithſtanding their diſbanding the forces, would not ſuffer the leaſt intimation of their want of confidence in the king; and grew angry at their being thought to have given any occaſion to ſuch a ſuſpicion: Inſtead, therefore, of an addreſs of thanks, they preſented a ſort of remonſtrance, ſetting forth; " That, being highly ſenſible, that there was nothing more neceſſary for the peace and proſperity of the kingdom, for the quieting people's minds, and diſappointing his enemies deſigns, than a mutual and entire confidence between him and his parliament; they did eſteem it their greateſt misfortune, that, after having ſo amply provided for his and the government's ſecurity, both by ſea and land, any jealouſy or miſtruſt had been raiſed of their duty and affection to him and his people: And begged leave to repreſent to him, That it would greatly conduce to the continuing and eſtabliſhing an entire confidence between him and them, that he would ſhew marks of his high diſpleaſure towards all, that ſhould preſume to miſrepreſent their proceedings to him; and they, on their part, being duly ſenſible of his conſtant concern to maintain their civil and religious rights, in defence whereof he had ſo often expoſed his perſon, would do all they could to prevent and diſcourage all falſe rumours and reports, reflecting on his majeſty's government, whereby to create any miſunderſtanding between him and his ſubjects." To this the king returned the following anſwer:

" Gentlemen, my parliaments have done ſo great things for me; and I have, upon all proper occaſions, expreſſed ſo great a ſenſe of their kindneſs; and my opinion has been ſo often declared, that the happineſs of any Engliſh king depends upon an entire correſpondence between him and his parliament, that it may not ſeem ſtrange for me to aſſure you, that no perſon has ever yet dared to go about to miſrepreſent to me the proceedings of either houſe. Had I found any ſuch, they would immediately have felt the higheſt marks of my diſpleaſure. It is a juſtice I owe, not only to my parliament, but to every one of my ſubjects, to judge of them by their actions: And this rule I will ſteadily purſue. If any ſhall attempt, hereafter, to put me upon other methods, by calumnies, or miſrepreſentations, they will not only fail of ſucceſs, but ſhall be looked upon and treated by me, as my worſt enemies.

" Gentlemen, I am pleaſed to ſee by your addreſs, that you have the ſame thoughts of the great advantages, which will enſue to the kingdom from our mutual confidence, as I expreſſed to both houſes at the opening of this ſeſſion. I take very kindly the aſſurance you give me, of uſing your utmoſt care and endeavours to prevent and diſcourage all falſe rumours and reports reflecting upon me and my government; and I faithfully promiſe you, that no actions of mine ſhall give you a juſt ground for any miſunderſtanding between me and my people."

As thoſe, who oppoſed the king, were reſolved to force a change of miniſtry upon him, they ſought all occaſions for this, and imagined they had found a good pretence, in the following affair.

In the beginning of the year 1695, the earl of Bellamont was made governor of New York; and the king at that time did him the honour to ſay, that 'he thought him a man of reſolution and integrity, and, with thoſe qualities, the more likely than any other he could think of to put a ſtop to the growth of piracy;' with which that province and the reſt of the American colonies were remarkably infeſted, for which reaſon he intended to put the government of New England alſo into his hands. Upon this all perſons, who had concerns in New York, made their application to him; and among others colonel Robert Levingſton, a man of a conſiderable eſtate and fair reputation, who had ſeveral employments in the province of New York; on which account, as well as that of other matters, which he had then depending before the council and the treaſury, he had frequent acceſs to him. Bellamont taking occaſion to mention to him the ſcandal, which lay upon New York, in reſpect to the encouragement, which pirates found there, Levingſton confeſſed, there was too much ground for the complaint; and that, if ſome ſpeedy and effectual courſe was not taken to ſuppreſs theſe enormities, ſo many perſons would be drawn into the guilt, that it would become very difficult to maſter them. He then propoſed to him to employ captain William Kidd lately come from New-York in a ſloop of his own, who had told him he knew moſt of the principal pirates, and their places of rendezvous, and would undertake to ſecure moſt of them, in caſe he might be employed in one of the king's ſhips, a good ſailor, of about thirty guns and one hundred and fifty men, ſince, though the pirates were many in number, yet they had at that time no ſhips of conſiderable force. Levingſton repreſented Kidd as a bold honeſt man, and one he believed fitter than any other to be employed on that occaſion. The earl of Bellamont acquainted the king with this propoſal, which was thought neceſſary to be immediately conſidered, becauſe ſeveral informations upon oath were then come to the ſecretary of ſtate of ſeveral veſſels gone and going from Bermudas, New York, Rhode Iſland, &c. under the command of Thomas Too, William Maze, John Ireland, Thomas Wake, and others, all of them pirates, who had made ſeveral piratical voyages, and returned with great wealth. The king conſulted the admiralty on this occaſion; but the war employing all the king's ſhips, which were in a condition for ſervice, and the great want of ſeamen, notwithanding the preſs, and all other means uſed, together with the remoteneſs of the voyage, and the uncertainty of meeting with the pirates, or taking them, though they might be found out, occaſioned, after ſome deliberation, the laying aſide of this project. Levingſton however would not give it over, but propoſed to the earl of Bellamont, that, if perſons of conſideration might be induced to join in the expence of buying and fitting out a proper ſhip, he had ſuch an opinion of Kidd's capacity and good meaning, and ſo great a deſire that ſome ſtop might be put to thoſe piracies, that he would himſelf be one of the undertakers, and that he and Kidd would be a fifth part of the charge; Kidd, as he alledged, being a ſettled inhabitant at New York, where he had a competent eſtate, and had married a wife with a good fortune, by whom he had a child: That he lived regularly, and his good behaviour might be depended upon with aſſurance, becauſe, if he did otherwiſe than as his duty would oblige him, he had no place to go to, for he had acted ſuch things againſt the French ſince the war, that he durſt never truſt himſelf to them. But, as the ſtrongeſt argument, that could be made uſe of for truſting Kidd, the colonel offered to be bound for the faithful execution of his commiſſion. All this the earl made known to the king, who highly approved of the deſign; and, to encourage it, was pleaſed to conſent, that the perſons, who engaged, ſhould have a grant of what Kidd ſhould take from the pirates as far as it might belong to them, except a tenth, which was reſerved to ſhew, that the king was a partner in the undertaking. Upon this encouragement the earl of Bellamont propoſed it to the lord chancellor Sommers, the duke of Shrewſbury, the earl of Romney, and the earl of Orford, ſir Edmund Harriſon, and others, who agreed to his propoſal of 6000l. expence, of which Levingſton and Kidd were to be a fifth part. The whole management of the affair was left to the earl of Bellamont. The commiſſion granted to Kidd had nothing in it, contrary to law, or different from the conſtant form of commiſſions of that kind, of which there had been a great number. There was a power to fight with and ſeize pirates, in order to bring them to a legal trial; but not a word of treating with them, or pardoning them; yet this was given out by the old Eaſt-India company, and that Kidd as a notorious pirate, where he had received a commiſſion om the admiralty as a privateer, before he was employed y theſe noble adventurers, of whom he never ſaw the duke f Shrewſbury or the lord Sommers. He was introduced to e earl of Orford by the earl of Bellamont, and to the earl of omney by colonel Hewetſon, which was all he knew of em. He had no inſtructions public or private from any of e adventurers, except ſailing orders from the earl of Bellaont, by which he was directed to purſue the letter of his ommiſſion.

Purſuant to the orders, which Kidd had received from he earl of Bellamont and ſir Edmund Harriſon, he ſailed n the Adventure Galley from Plymouth, in April 1696, to New York, and in his way took a French prize. From hence he went to Madeira, thence to Bonaviſta, and St. Jago, rom whence he proceeded to Madagaſcar, and from thence e cruiſed at the entrance of the Red Sea; but, effecting othing, he ſailed to Calicut, and took a ſhip of a hundred nd fifty tons; the maſter of which, and three or four of his rew, were Dutchmen, the reſt Moors; and this ſhip he carried to Madagaſcar [l]. From thence he ſailed again, and bout five weeks after he took the Quedagh Merchant of four hundred tons; the maſter of which was one Wight an Engliſhman. She had on board two Dutch mates and a French gunner; the crew were all Moors; in all about ninety perſons. This ſhip he carried to St. Mary's near Madagaſcar, nd there he ſhared the goods with his crew, forty ſhares to his own uſe. Here ninety of his crew, who were a hundred nd fifty-one in all, left him, and went on board the Mocha frigate, an Eaſt-India company ſhip, which had turned pirate, nd then lay there. Kidd and the reſt of his men burnt the Adventure Galley at St. Mary's, and they all went on board the Quedagh Merchant, and ſailed for the Weſt Indies. Being denied ſuccour at Anguila and St. Thomas's, he ſailed to Mona, lying between Porto Rico and Hiſpaniola, and there, by the means of one Bolton got ſome proviſions from Curacoa. He bought a ſloop of Bolton, in which he loaded part of his goods, and left the Quedagh Merchant, with the reſt of the goods, in truſt with Bolton, and ſeventeen or eighteen men in her. In this ſloop he touched at ſeveral places, and diſpoſed of a great part of his goods, and at laſt came to Boſton in New England, where the earl of Bellamont ſeized him, and what goods he had left; for he had pretended, that the Quedagh Merchant, being manned with Moors, was a lawful prize, though there was no proof, that the commander and his crew had committed any piracies on the Engliſh or any European, or indeed Indian nation. The earl of Bellamont, by letters of the 8th of July, 1699, ſent notice of Kidd's being taken to the ſecretary of ſtate, and to the council of trade; tranſmitted the informations againſt him, together with his examinations, and a particular account of all his own proceedings in relation to Kidd and other pirates; and preſſed, that immediate care might be taken in England, to ſend for them in order to their trial, taking notice, that in New England there was no law to puniſh piracy with death; and that in thoſe parts the people were ſo favourable to pirates, by reaſon of the wealth they brought and diſperſed among them, that little juſtice could be expected. He likewiſe deſired orders with reſpect to the goods, which he had ſecured. Upon this advice the lords juſtices directed the admiralty immediately to diſpatch away one of the king's ſhips to fetch Kidd and the other pirates in ſafe cuſtody, together with their effects. The admiralty appointed the Rocheſter man of war for that ſervice, which had her orders accordingly, and ſailed for Boſton with other ſhips under her convoy; but, the Rocheſter being diſabled by a ſtorm from continuing the voyage, and forced back, it was preſently reported, that it was all colluſion between the miniſters and adventurers, who had no mind that Kidd ſhould be brought to England, for fear of his making diſcoveries, that the duke of Shrewſbury, the lord chancellor Sommers, &c. were turned pirates; ſince to be partner with pirates is the ſame thing as being pirates themſelves. So heavy a load was caſt on the miniſtry, chiefly on him who was at the head of the juſtice of the nation; it was ſaid, he ought not to have engaged in ſuch a project; and it was maliciouſly inſinuated, that the privateer would not have turned pirate, in confidence of the protection of thoſe who employed him, if he had not ſecret orders from them for what he did. Such black conſtructions are men, who are engaged in parties, apt to make of the actions of thoſe, whom they intend to diſgrace, even againſt their own conſciences: So that an undertaking, that was not only innocent but meritorious, was traduced as a deſign for robbery and piracy. This was urged in the houſe of commons as highly criminal, for which all, who were concerned in it, ought to be turned out of their employments; and a motion was made, the 6th of December, that the letters patents granted to the earl of Bellamont and others, of pirates goods, were diſhonourable to the king, againſt the law of nations, contrary to the laws and ſtatutes of the land, invaſive of property, and deſtructive of trade and commerce; but it was rejected by a great majority.

The next attempt was to remove the biſhop of Saliſbury from being preceptor to the duke of Glouceſter. Some objected his being a Scotchman; and others remembered his paſtoral letter, which had been ordered to be burnt. So an addreſs to the king for that purpoſe, was moved, the 13th of December; but this motion was likewiſe loſt by the ſame majority, that had carried the former vote [m].

Mean while, the ſupply for the ſmall army and fleet was ſettled, and a fund was given for it. Thoſe who had reduced the army, thought it needleſs to have ſo great a force at ſea; ſo on the 21ſt of December, it was reſolved, that ſeven thouſand men ſhould be the complement for ſea-ſervice the next year. This was moved by the tories, and the whigs readily gave way to this reduction, becauſe the fleet was now in another management; the earl of Orford, with his friends, being laid aſide, and a ſet of tories brought into their places [n].

The great buſineſs of this ſeſſion was the affair of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland. Among the complaints againſt the court, one was, that the king had given grants of theſe eſtates. It has been remembered, that a bill being ſent up by the commons, attainting the Iriſh that had been in arms, and applying their eſtates to the paying the public debts, leaving only a power to the king, to diſpoſe of the third part of them, was like to lie long before the lords; many petitions being offered againſt it; upon which the king, to bring the ſeſſion to a ſpeedy concluſion, had promiſed that this matter ſhould be kept entire, till their next meeting: But, the next ſeſſion

[l] The pirates had made a ſort of ſettlement on the iſland of Madagaſcar, under Henry Avery, who, thinking himſelf not well uſed in the Engliſh ſea ſervice, had turned pirate. This man had not only taken and robbed a large ſhip belonging to the Mogul, on board of which was an Indian princeſs and a great treaſure, but he committed ſeveral other piracies. The Eaſt-India company, fearing reprisals from the Mogul, repreſented the neceſſity of deſtroying thoſe pirates, who were thus harboured in Madagaſcar. Avery and his companions falling out, and being almoſt left alone, he got a paſſage to England, and as ſome ſay to Ireland. He had intruſted the remains of the plunder which he brought with him, with a perſon who cheated him of ſo much of it, that he died of want. The lords juſtices of England, hearing of his arrival in 1696, iſſued out a proclamation for apprehending this famous pirate. His father was a Devonſhire man, and lived near Biddeford, where he had a ſmall eſtate. His mother and ſiſter were both there, when the proclamation was read for his apprehenſion, and it was ſaid, he had preſented his ſiſter with the pearl necklace, he had taken from the Indian princeſs, which ſhe afterwards ſold.

[m] About this time biſhop Burnet publiſhed a noted work, of which he gives the following account: I publiſhed, this year, an expoſition of the thirty-nine articles of religion: It ſeemed a work much wanted, and it was juſtly to be wondered at, that none of our divines had attempted any ſuch performance, in a way ſuitable to the dignity of the ſubject: For ſome ſlight analyſes of them are not worth either mentioning or reading. It was a work that required ſtudy and labour, and laid a man open to many malicious attacks; this made ſome of my friends adviſe me againſt publiſhing it; in compliance with them, I kept it five years by me, after I had finiſhed it: But I was now prevailed on by the archbiſhop and many of my own order, beſides a great many others, to delay the publiſhing it no longer. It ſeemed a proper addition to the hiſtory of the reformation, to explain and prove the doctrine, which was then eſtabliſhed. I was moved firſt, by the late queen, and preſſed by the late archbiſhop to write; I can appeal to the ſearcher of all hearts, that I wrote it with great ſincerity and a good intention, and with all the application and care, I was capable of; I did then expect, what I have ſince met with, that malicious men would employ both their induſtry and ill-nature, to find matter for cenſure and cavils; but, though there have been ſome books writ on purpoſe againſt it, and many in ſermons and other treatiſes have occaſionally reflected, with great ſeverity, upon ſeveral paſſages in it, yet this had been done, with ſo little juſtice or reaſon, that I am not yet convinced, that there is one ſingle period or expreſſion, that is juſtly remarked on, or that can give me any occaſion, either to retract, or ſo much as to explain any one part of that whole work; which I was very ready to have done, if I had ſeen cauſe for it. There was another reaſon, that ſeemed to determine me to the publiſhing it at this time, namely, the growth of popery.

[n] The commons laid a duty on Iriſh hops, on Eaſt-India goods, and continued the duties on French goods and wines, towards raiſing the ſupply; and ordered a clauſe in one of the money bills, for the importing cuſtom-free a certain quantity of paper for printing Dr. Alix's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. They reſolved, that a ſupply be granted to his majeſty towards the payment of his proportion of the debt owing to the prince of Denmark, and the monies to be raiſed to be laid out in this kingdom, and ſettled upon the prince and princeſs, and their iſſue, according to their marriage-agreement. That an addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, that he would uſe his endeavours to procure other princes and ſtates to pay their proportions of the ſaid debt. They agreed upon a ſupply for the coinage, for circulating exchequer-bills one year longer, for making good the deficiencies of the three ſhillings in the pound in the eighth year of his majeſty's reign, and of the duty on ſtamped paper and parchment, granted in the ſame ſeſſion of parliament; of the malt-tickets and quarterly poll granted in the next year, for paying off the tranſport debt, and for payment of the debt due to the navy, and ſick and wounded ſeamen.

going over, without any proceeding in it, the king granted away all theſe confiſcations: it being an undoubted branch of the royal prerogative, that all confiſcations accrued to the crown, and might be granted away at the pleaſure of the king: it was pretended, that thoſe eſtates came to a million and a half in value. Great objections were made to the merits of ſome, who had the largeſt ſhare in thoſe grants; attempts have been made, in the parliament of Ireland, to obtain a confirmation of them, but that which Ginckle, who was created earl of Athlone, had, was only confirmed; now it was become a popular ſubject of declamation, to arraign both the grants, and thoſe who had them: Motions had been often made, for a general reſumption of all the grants, made in this reign; but, in anſwer to this, it was ſaid, that, ſince no ſuch motion was made, for a reſumption of the grants made in king Charles the ſecond's reign, notwithſtanding the extravagant profuſion of them, and the ill grounds upon which they were made, it ſhewed both a diſreſpect and black ingratitude, if, while no other grants were reſumed, this king's only ſhould be called in queſtion. The court party ſaid often, let the retroſpect go back to the year 1660, and they would conſent to it, and that which might be got by it would be worth the while. It was anſwered this could not be done after ſo long a time, that ſo many ſales, mortgages, and ſettlements had been made, purſuant to thoſe grants; ſo all theſe attempts came to nothing. But, in the laſt ſeſſion, a more effectual method was taken. A commiſſion was given, by act of parliament, to ſeven perſons named by the houſe of commons, to inquire into the value of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland ſo granted away, and into the conſiderations upon which thoſe grants were made. Accordingly, theſe commiſſioners, namely the earl of Drogheda, Francis Anneſley, John Trenchard, James Hamilton, Henry Langford, ſir Richard Leving, and ſir Francis Brewſter, went over to Ireland, and affected great zeal in the execution of theit truſt. They proceeded like inquiſitors, and did readily believe every thing that was offered them, which tended to inflame the account; as they ſuppreſſed all that was laid before them, which contradicted their deſign of repreſenting the value of the grants very high, and of ſhewing how undeſerving thoſe were who had obtained them. They repreſented the confiſcated eſtates to be ſuch, that, out of the ſale of them, above a million and a half might be raiſed. The commiſſioners diſagreed in ſome points. So the report was delivered on the 15th of December to the houſe of commons, by four only of the ſeven commiſſioners; the other three, namely, the earl of Drogheda, ſir Richard Leving, and ſir Francis Brewſter, had refuſed to ſign it, becauſe they thought it falſe and ill-grounded in ſeveral particulars, of which they ſent over an account to both houſes; but no regard was had to their memorial, nor was any inquiry made into their objections to the report. Theſe three were looked on as men gained by the court; and the reſt were magnified as men that could not be wrought on, nor frightened from their duty. The ſpecious propoſal of raiſing ſo large a ſum as a million and a half, towards diſcharging the public debts, ſo took with the houſe, that no complaint againſt the proceedings of the commiſſioners could be hearkened to, and all the methods uſed to diſgrace the report, had the quite contrary effect; and the hatred into which the favourites were fallen, among whom, and their creatures, the grants were chiefly diſtributed, made the motion go the quicker. When therefore the report was peruſed by the commons, they reſolved, that a bill ſhould be brought in for applying all the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, and grants thereof, ſince the 13th of February 1688, to the uſe of the puhlic [o]. All oppoſition to this was looked upon as a courting of the men in favour; nor was any regard paid to a motion for reſerving a third part, to be diſpoſed of by the king, which had been in the bill that was ſent up eight years before to the lords. When this was moved, it was anſwered, that the grantees had enjoyed thoſe eſtates ſo many years, that the mean profits did ariſe to more than a third of their value. As the party for this bill apprehended that many petitions would be offered to the houſe, which the court would probably encourage, on deſign, at leaſt, to retard their proceedings, they, to prevent this, that the bill might not be clogged with too many clauſes, paſſed a vote of a very extraordinary nature, That they would not receive any petition from any perſon whatſoever, concerning the grants, adding at the ſame time, that they would conſider the great ſervices performed by the commiſſioners appointed to inquire into the forfeited eſtates [p].

[o] The report conſiſts of ninety articles, the chief of which are theſe:

	Acres.
The number of acres in the ſeveral counties, belonging to the forfeited perſons, are - -	1,060,792
Theſe being worth 211,623l. a year, at ſix years purchaſe for a life, and at thirteen years, for the inheritance, come to the full value of - - -	l. 2,685,130
Out of theſe lands, the eſtates, reſtored to the old proprietors, by the articles of Limerick and Galway, are valued at 724,923l. and thoſe reſtored by royal favour, at 260,863l. after theſe and ſeveral other allowances, the groſs value of all the eſtates forfeited ſince the 13th of February 1688, and not reſtored, amounts to - -	1,699,343

The number of grants and cuſtodiams, ſince the battle of the Boyne, under the great ſeal of England, are 76, ſome of the principal of which are mentioned, namely,

	Acres,
To the lord Romney, three grants of - -	49517
To the earl of Albermarle, two grants of - -	108,633
To William Bentinck (lord Woodſtock) - -	135,820
To the earl of Athlone (occaſioned by the parliament of Ireland)	26,480
To the earl of Galway - - - -	36,148
To the earl of Rochford, two grants of - -	30,512
To the lord Coningſby, - - - -	5,966
To colonel Guſtavus Hamilton, for his ſervices in wading through the Shannon and ſtorming Athlone, at the head of the Engliſh grenadiers, - - -	5,582
To ſir Thomas Pendergraſs, for diſcovering the aſſaſſination-plot, - - - -	7,082

It is alſo obſerved, that ſeveral of the grantees had raiſed great ſums of money, by the ſale of their lands amounting, in all, to 68,155l. particularly, the earl of Athlone (his grant being confirmed by act of parliament) had ſold to the amount of 17,684l. the lord Romney, 30,147l. and the earl of Albermarle, 13,000l.

In theſe and moſt other articles, the commiſſioners all agreed; but a difference aroſe amongſt them on account of king James's private eſtate, granted to him when duke of York. This eſtate three of the commiſſioners, and particularly Leving, would not allow to be forfeited, and conſequently ought not to be reported. Whilſt they were debating this matter, Mr. Arthur Moore, member of the houſe of commons, ſent them a letter of his own private motion, wherein he directed them, 'to make a ſeparate article of the lady Orkney's grants, becauſe that might reflect upon ſome body,' meaning the king. Mr. Montague chancellor of the Exchequer, having learned the contents of Moore's letter, and being zealous to vindicate the king's honour, which he thought was ſtruck at in that letter, complained of it to the houſe. Being preſſed to tell his author, he at firſt excuſed himſelf, alledging, that he was under a private obligation not to reveal what had paſſed in private converſation; but the houſe inſiſting upon it, he named Mr. Methuen, lord chancellor of Ireland, who was alſo a member of the houſe; but he denied poſitively that he had ever mentioned any ſuch thing. The houſe therefore reſolved on the 15th of January, "That the ſaid report was falſe and ſcandalous;" and a motion being made, 'That the four commiſſioners for Iriſh forfeitures, who ſigned the report preſented to the houſe, had acquitted themſelves in the execution of that commiſſion with underſtanding and integrity,' a warm debate aroſe thereupon, which was adjourned to the next day, when the commons reſolved, 'That the four commiſſioners had acquitted themſelves in the execution of their commiſſion with underſtanding, courage, and integrity: that ſir Richard Leving had been the author of the groundleſs and ſcandalous aſperſions caſt upon the four commiſſioners. And that ſir Richard Leving be committed priſoner to the Tower of London for his offence. However, after all, this eſtate was placed at the end of the report, in a different manner from the reſt. We ſhall conclude (ſay the four commiſſioners who ſigned the report) by laying before your honours another grant of a conſiderable value, which we are apprehenſive does not fall within the letter of our inquiry; but ſince the benefit of ſome forfeited leaſes or holdings are therein granted, we chooſe rather to lay the whole grant before you, than be thought deficient in executing any part of our duty, or what might be expected from us.

A grant under the great ſeal of England, dated the 30th of May, 1695, paſſed to Mrs. Elizabeth Villers, now counteſs of Orkney, of all the private eſtates of the late king James (except ſome ſmall part in grant to the lord Athlone) containing 95,649 acres, worth yearly 25,995l. 18s. value 337,943l. There is payable out of this eſtate 2000l. a year, to the lady Suſannah Bellaſis for her life, and 1000l. a year to Mrs. Godfrey for her life, and almoſt all the old leaſes determine in May 1701, and then the eſtate will anſwer the values above mentioned.

This report was ſigned by Anneſly, Trenchard, Hamilton, and Longford. The other three refuſed to ſign it, upon account of this and ſeven other articles of the ninety. They gave their reaſons for it, in a letter to the lord chancellor, November 1699, and in another to the ſpeaker; but the houſe would not hear it read, becauſe the other four commiſſioners, whoſe conduct was complained of in the letter, had not ſet their hands to it.

The report was likewiſe animadverted upon, in a tract intitled, Jus Regium, or the king's right to grant forfeitures, &c. This author brings down the value of the forfeitures, to 780,000l. out of which he deducts all the debts and incumbrances, with three years profits of the lands for the expences of the truſt, and allows, that they will yield 500,000l. in Ireland. He gives an inſtance of the commiſſioners over-valuing the lands in the private eſtate of king James, being a grant to him, when duke of York, of all the eſtates of the Regicides. Inſtead of 95,649 acres, he reduces them to 78,915, and the yearly value of them from May 1701, when all the old leaſes are determined, to 8,489l. inſtead of 25,965l. ſubject to the annuities abovementioned, beſides 10,000l. in arrear to the lady Bellaſis: there had been 9,887l. received for fines, out of this eſtate, by Mr. Broderick and Mr. Pooley, which are loſt to the tenants by the reſumption: the author, in the ſame manner, examines all the then grants, and ſhews, that the commiſſioners were deceived both in the number of acres, and value of the eſtates. St. Tracts II. 709—773.

[p] Accordingly, on the 7th of March, the commons reſolved, that the ſum of 1000l. be paid to the earl of Drogheda, Francis Anneſly, John Trenchard, James Hamilton, Henry Langford, and to James Hooper ſecretary to the commiſſioners; and the ſum of five hundred only to ſir Richard Leving and ſir Francis Brewſter, in conſideration of their expences; which ſums were ordered to be paid out of the Iriſh forfeitures.

After this on the 18th of January, it was farther reſolved by the commons, that the adviſing, procuring, and paſſing theſe grants had occaſioned great debts upon the nation, and heavy taxes upon the people, and highly reflected on the king's honour; and that the officers and inſtruments, concerned in the ſame, had highly failed in the performance of their truſt and duty. Then it was voted, that this reſolution ſhould be preſented to the king, in the form of an addreſs, which was accordingly done on the 21ſt of February, to which the king, five days after, returned this anſwer.

Gentlemen,

"I was not only led by inclination, but thought myſelf obliged in juſtice, to reward thoſe who had ſerved well, and particularly in the reduction of Ireland, out of the eſtates forfeited to me, by the rebellion there.

"The long war by which we were engaged, did occaſion great taxes, and has left the nation much in debt; and the taking juſt and effectual ways for leſſening that debt, and ſupporting public credit, is what in my opinion, will beſt contribute to the honour, intereſt, and ſafety of this kingdom."

[1700] The commons were ſo provoked with this anſwer, that they reſolved, that whoſoever had adviſed it, had uſed his utmoſt endeavours to create a miſunderſtanding and jealouſy between the king and his people. They then proceeded on the bill of reſumption, which being finiſhed, they paſſed, the 2d of April. In juſtification of their proceedings, they ordered the report of the commiſſioners for the Iriſh forfeitures to be publiſhed; "and that the reſolution of the 18th of January laſt; the reſolution of the 4th of April 1690, relating to the forfeited eſtates; his majeſty's ſpeech to both houſes, the 5th of January 1690-1; the addreſs of the houſe to the king, the 15th of February laſt; his majeſty's anſwer thereunto, the 26th of the ſame February; and the reſolution of the houſe thereupon; and laſtly, the addreſs of the houſe of commons of the 4th of March 1692-3, and his majeſty's anſwer thereunto, be alſo re-printed with the report;" and they reſolved, "That the procuring or paſſing exorbitant grants by any member now of the privy-council, or by any other, that had been a privy-councillor, in this or any former reign, to his uſe or benefit, was a high crime and miſdemeanor."

In the bill of reſumption little regard was ſhewn to the purchaſes made under thoſe grants, and to the great improvements made by the purchaſers or tenants, which were ſaid to have doubled the value of thoſe eſtates. However, that ſome juſtice might be done both to purchaſers and creditors, thirteen truſtees were named, in whom all the forfeited eſtates were veſted, and they had a very great and uncontrolable authority lodged with them, of hearing and determining all juſt claims, relating to thoſe eſtates, and of ſelling them to the beſt purchaſers; and the money, to be raiſed by this ſale, was appropriated to pay the arrears of the army [q]. Among all the caſes, that of the earl of Athlone's was the moſt ſingular. The houſe of commons had been ſo ſenſible of his good ſervice in reducing Ireland, that they had made an addreſs to the king, to give him a recompence ſuitable to his ſervices. And the parliament of Ireland was ſo ſenſible of their obligations to him, that they confirmed this grant of between two and three thouſand pounds a year. He had ſold it to thoſe, who thought they had purchaſed under an unqueſtionable title; yet all that was now ſet aſide, no regard being had to it; ſo that this eſtate was thrown into the heap. Some exceptions were made in the bill in favour of ſome grants, and proviſion was made for rewarding others, whom the king, as they thought, had not enough conſidered. Great oppoſition was made to this by ſome, who thought, that all favours and grants ought to be given by the king, and not originally by an houſe of parliament; and this was managed with great heat, even by ſome of thoſe, who concurred in carrying the bill. In concluſion, it was, by a new term, as well as a new invention, conſolidated with the money-bill, that was to go for the pay of the fleet and army; and, under the title of a bill, for granting an aid to his majeſty, by the ſale of the forfeited and other eſtates and intereſts in Ireland, and by a land-tax in England, for the ſeveral purpoſes therein mentioned, was carried up to the houſe of lords, which by conſequence they muſt either paſs or reject. The method that the court took in the houſe of lords to oppoſe it, was to offer ſome alterations, which were indeed very juſt and reaſonable: but ſince the commons would not ſuffer the lords to alter money-bills, this was in effect to loſe it. The court, upon ſome previous votes, found they had a majority among the lords; ſo, for ſome days, it ſeemed to be deſigned to loſe the bill, and to venture on a prorogation or a diſſolution, rather than paſs it. The bill being ſent down with ſome alterations to the commons, they not only diſapproved them, but began to fly out into high votes both againſt the miniſters and favourites, and ordered a liſt of the privy council to be laid before them. There were ſeveral conferences between the two houſes, in which the lords ſtrongly inſiſted on their amendments. The commons were ſo exaſperated at this, that they ordered the lobby of their houſe to be cleared of all ſtrangers; the back-doors of the ſpeaker's chamber to be locked up; and that the ſergeant ſhould ſtand at the door of the houſe, and ſuffer no members to go forth; and then proceeded to take into conſideration the report of the Iriſh forfeitures, and the liſt of the lords of the privy council; and a queſtion was moved, "That an addreſs be made to his majeſty to remove John lord Sommers, lord chancellor of England, from his preſence, and councils for ever," but it was carried in the negative by a greater majority, than had appeared at the beginning of the ſeſſion.

The lord Sommers, during theſe debates, was ill; and the worſt conſtruction poſſible was put upon that; for it was ſaid, that he adviſed all the oppoſition, which was made to the bill in the houſe of lords, but that, to keep himſelf out of it, he feigned that he was ill; though his great attendance in the court of chancery, the houſe of lords, and at the council table, had ſo impaired his health, that every year, about that time, he uſed to be brought very low, and diſabled from buſineſs. The king ſeemed reſolved to venture on all the ill conſequences, that might follow the loſing this bill, though they would probably have been very fatal. As far as could be judged, either another ſeſſion of that parliament, or a new one, would have baniſhed the favourites, and begun the bill anew, with the addition of obliging the grantees to refund all the mean profits. Many in the houſe of lords, who in all other things were very firm to the king, were for paſſing this bill, notwithſtanding his earneſtneſs againſt it, ſince they apprehended the ill conſequences that were likely to follow, if it were loſt. Biſhop Burnet was one of theſe; and the king was much diſpleaſed with him for it. The biſhop ſaid, that he would venture his majeſty's diſpleaſure, rather than pleaſe him in that, which he feared would be the ruin of his government; not apprehending at that time, what injuſtice lay under many of the clauſes in the bill, which appeared afterwards ſo evidently, that the very ſame perſons who drove on the bill, were convinced of them, and redreſſed ſome of them in acts that paſſed in ſubſequent ſeſſions [r].

The king became ſullen upon all this, and upon the many incidents, that are apt to fall in upon debates of this nature. He either did not apprehend in what ſuch things might end, or he was not much concerned at it. His reſentment, which was much provoked, broke out into ſome inſtances, which gave ſuch handles to his enemies, as they wiſhed for; and they improved thoſe advantages, which his ill conduct gave them, with much ſpite and induſtry, ſo as to alienate the nation from him. It was once in agitation among the party, to make an addreſs to him againſt going beyond ſea; but even that was diverted with a malicious deſign. Hitherto the body of the nation retained a great meaſure of affection to him. This was beginning to diminiſh by his going ſo conſtantly beyond ſea, as ſoon as the ſeſſion of parliament

[q] On the 26th of March, the commons, having conſidered of the number, qualifications, and manner of chuſing the truſtees for the bill of Iriſh forfeitures, reſolved, 'That the number of truſtees be thirteen: that no perſon be a truſtee, who had any office of profit, or was accountable to his majeſty, or was a member of this houſe: and that the truſtees be choſen by ballotting.' Two days after, the ſeveral members having given in liſts of thirteen perſons names, which were put into claſſes, the majority fell upon Francis Anneſly, James Hamilton, John Baggs, John Trenchard, James Iſham, Henry Langford, James Hooper, ſir Cyril Wyche, John Cary, ſir Henry Sheres, Thomas Harriſon, ſir John Warden, William Fellowes, and Thomas Rawlins. The two laſt having equal voices, one of them muſt have been left out; but the houſe being informed, that ſir John Warden was a baron of the Exchequer in the county palatine of Cheſter during his life, at a yearly ſalary from the crown, it was reſolved, that ſir John Warden was not capable of being a truſtee in the bill, and ſo the other two ſtood.

[r] The biſhop ſays, if he had rightly underſtood that matter in time, he would never have given his vote for ſo unjuſt a bill. He only conſidered it as an hardſhip put on the king, many of his grants being thus made void, ſome of which had not been made on good and reaſonable conſiderations, ſo that they could hardly be excuſed, much leſs juſtified. He thought the thing was a ſort of force, to which it ſeemed reaſonable to give way at that time, ſince the king's friends were not furniſhed with an equal ſtrength to withſtand it. But, when he ſaw afterwards, what the conſequences of this act proved to be, he firmly reſolved never to conſent again to any tack to a money-bill, as long as he lived.

The

was ended, though the war was now over. Upon this it grew to be publickly ſaid, that he loved no Engliſhman's face nor his company. His enemies therefore reckoned that it was fit for their ends to let that prejudice increaſe in the minds of the people, till they might find a proper occaſion to ingraft ſome bad deſigns upon it.

The ſame day that the motion was made againſt the lord chancellor Sommers, the commons reſolved, 'That an addreſs be made to his majeſty, that no perſon, who was not a native of his dominions, except his royal highneſs prince George of Denmark, be admitted to his majeſty's councils in England or Ireland.' But, before this addreſs could be preſented, the king came the next day to the houſe of peers, and, after paſſing the bill about the forfeited eſtates, with ſeveral others, commanded the earl of Bridgwater, who was ſpeaker of the houſe in the abſence of the lord Sommers, to prorogue the parliament to the 23d of May. Thus ended a ſeſſion, by the proceedings of which men of all ſides were put into a very ill humour [s].

Among the acts of this ſeſſion a very remarkable one paſſed againſt the papiſts. A complaint being made by the clergy of Lancaſhire, of the growth of popery, and a petition offered for more effectual methods to put a ſtop to it, a bill was propoſed, that obliged all perſons educated in that religion, or ſuſpected to be of it, who ſhould ſucceed to any eſtate before they were of the age of eighteen, to take the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, and the teſt, as ſoon as they came to that age; and, till they did it, the eſtate was to devolve to the next of kin, that was a proteſtant; but was to return back to them, upon their taking the oaths. All popiſh prieſts were alſo baniſhed by the bill, and were adjudged to perpetual impriſonment, if they ſhould again return into England; and the reward of an hundred pounds was offered to every one, who ſhould diſcover a popiſh prieſt, ſo as to convict him.

Thoſe, who brought this into the houſe of commons, hoped, that the court would have oppoſed it; but the court promoted the bill; ſo, when the party ſaw their miſtake, they ſeemed willing to let the bill fall: and when that could not be done, they clogged it with many ſevere and ſome unreaſonable clauſes, hoping that the lords would not paſs the act; and it was ſaid, that, if the lords ſhould make the leaſt alteration in it, they, in the houſe of commons, who had it ſet on, were reſolved to let it lie on their table, when it ſhould be ſent back to them. Many lords, who ſecretly favoured papiſts, on the jacobite account, did, for this very reaſon, move for ſeveral alterations; ſome of theſe importing a greater ſeverity; but the zeal againſt popery was ſuch in that houſe, that the bill paſſed without any amendment, and it had the royal aſſent. Biſhop Burnet, notwithſtanding his principles for toleration, and againſt perſecution for conſcience-ſake, was for this bill. He had always thought, that, if a government found any ſect in religion incompatible with its quiet and ſafety, it might, and ſometimes ought to ſend away all that ſect, with as little hardſhip as poſſible. This act hurt no man that was in the preſent poſſeſſion of an eſtate; it only incapacitated his next heir, to ſucceed to that eſtate, if he continued a papiſt; ſo the danger of this, in caſe the act ſhould be well looked to, would put thoſe of that religion, who are men of conſcience, on the ſelling their eſtates; and, in the courſe of a few years, might deliver us from having any papiſts left among us. But this act wanted ſeveral neceſſary clauſes, to inforce the due execution of it; the word, 'next of kin,' was very indefinite, and the 'next of kin' was not obliged to claim the benefit of this act, nor did the right deſcend to the remoter heirs, if the more immediate ones ſhould not take the benefit of it; the teſt, relating to matters of doctrine and worſhip, did not ſeem a proper ground for ſo great a ſeverity; ſo this act was not followed nor executed in any ſort; but here is a ſcheme laid, though not fully digeſted, which on ſome great provocation, given by thoſe of that religion, may diſpoſe a parliament to ſuch clauſes in a new act, as may make this effectual.

The duke of Norfolk, taking advantage of the precedent made the laſt year, in the caſe of the earl of Macclesfield, lodged a bill in the houſe of peers, 'to diſſolve his grace's marriage with the lady Mary Mordaunt, and to enable him to marry again,' which in a few days paſt both houſes, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the ducheſs of Norfolk [t].

The ſeſſion being ended (as was obſerved) ſo much to the diſſatisfaction of all parties, the leaders of the tories ſeemed reſolved to puſh a change of miniſtry. They began with inſinuating to the favourites the neceſſity of the king's removing the lord Sommers, who, as he was conſidered as the head of the whigs, ſo his wiſe counſels, and his modeſt way of laying them before the king, had gained him a great ſhare of his eſteem and confidence; and it was reckoned, that the chief ſtrength of the party lay in his credit with the king, and in the prudent methods he took to govern the party, and to moderate that heat and thoſe jealouſies, with which the king had been ſo long diſguſted, in the firſt years of his reign. Every method had been tried for his removal. He had, in the firſt place, been particularly charged in the houſe of commons, for turning many gentlemen out of the commiſſion of [s] The king writ the following letter to the earl of Galway, ſoon after the prorogation of the parliament.

Hampton-Court, May 11, 1700.

It is a good while ſince I writ to you laſt. The reaſon is, that being always uncertain of the iſſue of the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, I was unwilling to anſwer any of your letters. You may judge, what vexation all their extraordinary proceedings gave me, and I aſſure you, your being deprived of what I gave you with ſo much pleaſure, was not the leaſt of my griefs. I hope, however, that I ſhall be in a condition to acknowledge the good ſervices you have done me, and you may depend upon it, I ſhall earneſtly ſeek occaſions ſo to do. It ought to be ſome ſatisfaction to you, in the juſt reſentment of what concerns you, that nobody could blame your conduct; on the contrary, all appeared ſatisfied with it, and the vote, which paſſed in anger the laſt day, concerns you but indirectly. And I can aſſure you, that you was in no way the occaſion of it. There have been ſo many intrigues, in this laſt ſeſſion, that, without having been on the ſpot and well informed of every thing, it cannot be conceived. It will be impoſſible for me to continue the commiſſion of the lords juſtices in Ireland, as it is at preſent; ſo I have reſolved to ſend thither the duke of Shrewſbury as viceroy, and that you command the army under him. Do not think that this will be a degradation, nobody here will take it to be ſo, and I know that every one wiſhes it, and believes it abſolutely neceſſary for my ſervice. I am fully perſuaded, as I hope, that you will not refuſe to accept of this command, nor relinquiſh my ſervice. I aſſure you, I never had more occaſion, than at preſent, of perſons of your capacity and fidelity. I hope I ſhall find opportunities to give you marks of my eſteem and friendſhip, and I would not engage you in this, were I not aſſured that no hurt can happen to you from it: But I know it will meet with a general approbation, and doubt not your friends will ſay the ſame, and I am glad to tell you, you have a great many and among all parties.

WILLIAM R.

The duke of Shrewſbury refuſing to go to Ireland, there was no change made in the government, till the king's return from Holland.

[t] The duke had applied to the houſe of lords, in the year 1694, for a divorce, which occaſioned great and long debates; and on which biſhop Burnet thus remarks: In the latter ages of popery, when marriage was reckoned among the ſacraments, an opinion grew to be received, that adultery did not break the bond, and that it could only intitle to a ſeparation, but not ſuch a diſſolution of the marriage, as gave the party, that was injured, a right to marry again. This became the rule of the ſpiritual courts; though there was no definition made about it, before the council of Trent. At the time of the reformation, a ſuit of this nature was proſecuted by the marquis of Northampton: The marriage was diſſolved, and he married a ſecond time; but he found it neceſſary to move for an act of parliament, to confirm this ſubſequent marriage: In the reformation of the eccleſiaſtical laws, that was prepared by Cranmer and others, in king Edward's time, a rule was laid down, allowing of a ſecond marriage, upon a divorce for adultery. This matter had lain aſleep above an hundred years, till the preſent duke of Rutland, then lord Roos, moved for the like liberty. At that time a ſceptical and libertine ſpirit prevailed, ſo that ſome began to treat marriage, only as a civil contract, in which the parliament was at full liberty to make what laws they pleaſed: and moſt of king Charles's courtiers applauded this, hoping that the king might be divorced from the queen. The greater part of the biſhops apprehending the conſequence the lord Roos's act might have, oppoſed every ſtep that was made in it; though many of them were perſuaded, that, in the caſe of adultery, when it was fully proved, a ſecond marriage might be allowed. In the duke of Norfolk's caſe, as the lady was a papiſt, and a buſy jacobite, ſo a great party appeared for her. All that favoured the jacobites, and thoſe who were thought engaged in lewd practices, eſpouſed her concern with a zeal that did themſelves little honour. Their number was ſuch, that no progreſs could be made in the bill, though the proofs were but too full, and too plain. But the main queſtion was, whether, ſuppoſing the matter fully proved, the duke of Norfolk ſhould be allowed a ſecond marriage? The biſhops were deſired to deliver their opinions, with their reaſons: All thoſe who had been made during the preſent reign, were of opinion, that a ſecond marriage in that caſe was lawful, and conformable, both to the words of the goſpel, and to the doctrine of the primitive church: and that the contrary opinion was ſtarted in the late and dark ages; But all the biſhops, that had been made by the two former kings, were of another opinion, though ſome of them could not well tell why they were ſo. Here was a colour for men who looked at things ſuperficially, to obſerve that there was a difference of opinion between the laſt made biſhops, and thoſe of an elder ſtanding. From which they inferred, that we were departing from the received doctrine of our church; and upon that topic, the earl of Rocheſter charged us very vehemently. The bill was let fall at this time. An act paſſed this ſeſſions for continuing the old Eaſt-India company a corporation. The company, finding that their friends prevailed in the houſe of commons, took the opportunity of getting a bill brought in their favour; which, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of the new company, and the endeavours of the court, paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent.

Another incident happened this ſeſſion. The Rev. Mr. Stephens, preaching before the houſe of commons, on the 30th of January, inſtead of aggravating, ſeemed to vindicate the putting king Charles to death, and endeavoured to perſuade his auditors, that the obſervation of that day ſhould be aboliſhed. This produced, inſtead of thanks, an order, that, for the future, no perſon ſhould preach before the houſe, that was not a dean or doctor of divinity.

the peace [u]. This was much aggravated, and raiſed a very high complaint againſt him; but there was no juſt cauſe for it: When the deſign of the aſſaſſination and invaſion, in the years 1695 and 1696, was diſcovered, a voluntary aſſociation was entered into, by both houſes of parliament, and that was ſet round the nation: In ſuch a time of danger, it was thought, that thoſe, who did not enter voluntarily into it, were ſo ill affected, or at leaſt ſo little zealous for the king, that it was not fit they ſhould continue juſtices of the peace: So an order paſſed in council, that thoſe, who had ſo refuſed, ſhould be turned out of the commiſſion: He had obeyed this order, upon the repreſentations made to him, by the lords lieutenants and the 'cuſtodes rotulorum' of the ſeveral counties, who were not equally diſcreet: Yet he laid thoſe repreſentations before the council, and had a ſpecial order for every perſon that was ſo turned out. All this was now magnified, and it was charged on him, that he had adviſed and procured theſe orders; yet this could not be made ſo much as a colour to proceed againſt him, a clamour and murmuring was all that could be raiſed from it. This method not having produced any great effects, another had been tried. It had been endeavoured to raiſe a diſſatisfaction againſt him by appeals from many of his judgments, yet very few of them received alteration, and his character was raiſed inſtead of being hurt by theſe attacks [w]. After theſe and other methods of ſhaking lord Sommers's credit had failed, the tories now ſtudied

[u] With a view to him, it was that a bill was ſet on in the houſe of commons, 'qualifying juſtices of the peace;' and a committee appointed 'to inſpect the commiſſions of the peace and commiſſions for deputy-lieutenants, as they now ſtand, and as they were for ſeven years laſt paſt.' This committee having made their report to the houſe, that not only many perſons diſſenting from the church of England, but men of ſmall fortunes, and who conſequently had an entire dependence on the court, were put into thoſe places, the commons on the 26th of March reſolved, 'That an addreſs be made to his majeſty, that it would much conduce to the ſervice of his majeſty and the good of this kingdom, that gentlemen of quality and good eſtates be reſtored and put into the commiſſions of the peace and lieutenancy; and that men of ſmall eſtates be neither continued nor put into the commiſſions." Which addreſs being preſented the king by the whole houſe, he told them, "That he was of opinion, that men of the beſt quality and eſtates were moſt proper to be intruſted in the commiſſions of the peace and lieutenancy; and that directions ſhould be given accordingly,'

[w] Among theſe appeals, one caſe in particular, commonly called the bankers caſe, which had given occaſion to clamour, becauſe of the extenſive conſequences following the determination in regard to the property of large numbers, was brought before the houſe of lords, the final reſort both in law and equity. It is well known in what manner king Charles had mortgaged the whole revenue of the crown to the bankers for an immenſe debt, and paid intereſt at the rate of 8 per cent, while thoſe who intruſted the bankers received only 7 per cent. In the year 1672, the Exchequer payments were ſtopped, and multitudes ruined. About five years after, he granted his letters patent to all perſons concerned for the annual penſion of 6 per cent, out of the hereditary exciſe, given by parliament inſtead of the wards and liveries 12 Ch. II. and upon the principal ſums due to them, on delivering up their ſecurities, and accepting proportionable aſſignments in ſatisfaction of their debts. The payments were made regularly by virtue of thoſe letters patent down to Lady-day 1683, and then no more iſſued for the remainder of king Charles's reign, the whole reign of king James, and for three quarters of a year from after the revolution, when a ſuit was inſtituted in the court of Exchequer, praying the aid of it to enforce the payment of the arrears and growing ſums, at the receipt, agreeable to the terms of the letters patent. The two principal queſtions ſtated in the arguments were,

1. Whether the grants made by king Charles II, of the annual ſums of the hereditary exciſe to the goldſmiths, their heirs and aſſigns, were effectual in law, and did charge this revenue, in time of his ſucceſſors.

Whether the remedy, purſued by the parties in the cauſe, was warranted by the law or courſe of the Exchequer? The chief baron and two others were of opinion with the bankers in both theſe points. Baron Lechmere differed in both.

Upon this judgment, a writ of error came before the lord keeper in the Exchequer chamber, who called the judges to his aſſiſtance. It was ſolemnly argued by each of them. And they all agreed as to the firſt, that the letters patent were binding in law: That the king has power to alien or charge thoſe revenues, of which he is ſeized in fee, without an act of parliament: That the cuſtom of exciſe was purchaſed by him, for a valuable conſideration, that is, accepted in lieu of the profits ariſing from the wards and liveries. As to the objection, that this power of alienating may be a prejudice to the people, the law entertains no ſuch diſhonourable thoughts of the king, as to ſuppoſe, he will act wrong in the things ſubmitted to his power. That the objection is repugnant to the conſtitution of the government. Suppoſe the realm ſhould be in preſent danger of invaſion, if the king could not raiſe money by alienating his revenue, the nation muſt periſh; and therefore, kings of England have formerly borrowed ſeveral ſums of money, by mortgaging their lands. That it has been the conſtant uſage of our princes to reward deſerving miniſters out of the crown revenues, which proceeds on the great maxim, that rewards is one of the main pillars of government. As to the diſtinction taken between the alienating the antient demeſne lands derived to the king, either by deſcent or purchaſe, and this revenue of exciſe ſettled by parliament, and therefore unalienable, it was ſaid, the law reſtrained not the king from aliening any ſpecies of his revenue: That the land in antient demeſne ſeemed moſt appropriate to the king's uſe of all his revenues, becauſe they had ſeveral privileges relating to the king; as not to be impleaded out of the manor, to be free of toll for all things concerning their ſuſtenance and huſbandry, not to be impannelled on any inqueſt; and yet even theſe were alienable: That what reaſon can be aſſigned, why ſome eſtates ſhould be aliened, and ſome not? Why may not the king as well alien theſe eſtates, as they might formerly the flowers of his crown, a county palatine with royal rights? An eſtate, ſettled on a ſubject by act of parliament, is ſubject to his alienation, why not in the caſe of the king? It appears in fact, that all the monaſtery lands given by act of parliament, and that by general words, as in this law which ſettled the hereditary exciſe, were aliened by the king. So the cuſtoms have always been granted and charged in like manner, without controverſy. As to the objection that the exciſe was given inſtead of unalienable inheritances, as wards, liveries, and purveyances, it was ſaid, that it did not appear how the nature of one kind of inheritance could affect another. But even theſe were in effect alienable, becauſe they might have been releaſed, as were ſometimes ſervices 'in capite.' That 'Forteſcue, de Laudibus Legum Angliæ,' expreſsly diſcourſing of the reſtraints laid upon the crown, would not have omitted to mention the unalienable nature of the revenue, if this point had not been clearly admitted. Eſpecially as there were ſo many grants made in Henry VIth's time, and ſo many acts of reſumption, which are a demonſtration that thoſe grants could not be revoked but by act of parliament.

To the ſecond point, all the judges, except Treby, chief juſtice, and Lechmere, were of opinion, that the remedy was legal, and they relied entirely upon two precedents in Plowden's commentaries, ſir Thomas Wroth's caſe, and ſir H. Neville's caſe, in the Exchequer; upon which thoſe proceedings had been formed. The one was the demand of an annuity, granted to ſir Thomas Wroth by Henry VIII, out of the treaſury, in the hands of the treaſurer of the court of augmentations, under the ſeal of that court: The other, of a rent charge iſſuing out of the lands, ſubject to the ſurvey of the ſame court, and payable there. Judgment had been given for the parties in like manner, as in the preſent caſe.

My lord chief juſtice Treby applied himſelf to ſhew, that theſe two caſes were founded upon particular reaſons, and not upon the common law, or courſe of the Exchequer. By the ſtatute 27 Henry VIII. c. 27. all lands purchaſed, or to be purchaſed by Henry VIII, were put under the juriſdiction of that court; that the lands, in ſir H. Neville's caſe came within this ſtatute; and by an act paſſed 1 Mary, and the queen's letters patent ſubſequent, this court and all its powers were united to that of the Exchequer. That it proceeded in a ſummary way, and partly in nature of a court of equity.

Baron Lechmere ſaid in the Exchequer, that lord Hale had formerly declared, theſe precedents were not to be urged as precedents of the juriſdiction of the Exchequer, in things properly and originally of its own cognizance.

Lord chief juſtice Holt endeavoured to anſwer this reaſoning, firſt, by ſhewing, from a determination in Dyer, 4 Elizabeth, that the court of augmentations was never united to the Exchequer, and that queen Mary, ſubſequent to the act in the firſt of her reign, having by her letters patent of one day diſſolved that court, and, by her letters patent of the next, united the ſame to the Exchequer; the ſecond letters patent came too late, and were void. Conſequently, there was no acceſſion of power to the Exchequer, and the revenues of the court of augmentations fell naturally under its government; and, therefore, ſir Thomas Wroth, and ſir H. Neville, came to the court of Exchequer, as to an original court of revenue. Secondly, that, admitting it to be true, the court of augmentations was united, yet it did not appear, that the court of augmentations had any eſpecial powers, to give relief to grantees of annuities and rents; that the act, by which it was erected, made it a court of record and a court of revenue, to ſuch and ſuch lands: Whence it ſeemed to follow, that in the court of augmentations, as of wards and ſurveyors, ſuch relief was given by a right incident to it, as a court of revenue; and in imitation of what the Exchequer, the old court of revenue, could do before, by common law.

Lord Sommers delivered his opinion in the month of June 1696, and confined his reaſonings entirely to the ſecond queſtion. He ſet himſelf very elaborately to ſhew that the remedy purſued by the parties was illegal, and might be attended with the utmoſt danger to the diſpoſal of the public revenue, and treaſure of the crown, of which the law has always had a ſuperlative care, as that on which the ſafety of the king and kingdom muſt in all ages depend. To the firſt argument of lord Holt, he anſwered, that the ſtatute 1 Mary, c. 10. did impower the queen to diſſolve the court of augmentations, and to unite the court ſo diſſolved, to that of the Exchequer by letters patent, both parts of which power ſhe literally purſued. That on a ſubject of philoſophy, or ſpeaking of the natural exiſtence of things, it would be abſurd to ſay, what it annihilated one day, ſhall have yet ſuch an exiſtence as to be united to any thing the day following. But ſpeaking on a legal ſubject, where fictions and relations and concluſions have place, nothing could be of more eaſy or obvious conception. He ſaid, every thing ought to be expounded favourably in ſupport of the queen's intention, in following the expreſs directions of an act of parliament: and that the ſtatute 1 Elizabeth, c. 4. did, fully and in terms, declare the validity of this union. To the ſecond he anſwered, both from undoubted maxims of law, and accurate deductions of precedents; he ſhewed, that anciently the barons of the exchequer did at no time before the union of the courts of augmentations, and firſt fruits, both erected by Henry the VIIIth, give relief to grantees of rents or annuities in this manner, immediately upon application to them. That the party uſed previouſly to apply to the king by petition of right, and the treaſurer and barons were authoriſed by the great or privy ſeal, or by ſpecial indorſement upon the petition, giving them power to examine into the demand; but even their determination had no other effect than that of a certificate, nor could enforce the payment. The warrant for the payment, to be made at the receipt of the exchequer, muſt be obtained from the king, under the great or privy ſeal. Therefore this juriſdiction could not be originally incident, in notion of law, to a court of revenue as ſuch. That the court of exchequer, indeed, after the transfer of the powers of the augmentations and firſt fruits, did exerciſe them to the ſeveral purpoſes, and in reſpect of the lands, before under the ſurvey of thoſe courts. From whence the inference was plain, not that thoſe courts in exerciſing theſe powers purſued the courſe of the exchequer, but the exchequer, in taking a new courſe after the union, did act according to their manner, and ſupply their place. That, had it not been ſo, the erection of thoſe courts had been vain at firſt, becauſe the exchequer could have done the buſineſs as well. He then ſhewed, in what manner Henry the VIIIth, affecting power, and having great deſigns, endeavoured to get ſome parts of the revenue more immediately under his private and perſonal direction, than the old regular conſtitution of the exchequer would allow. To that end, he procured acts of parliament in different years of his reign, erecting the court of general ſurveyors, the court of firſt fruits and tenths, and the court of augmentations. The firſt and laſt of theſe, in the 38th year of his reign, were incorporated; and, in the firſt of queen Mary, were annexed to the exchequer. He proved that ſuch a juriſdiction, as that now contended for, was unknown to every author who to get it infuſed into the king, that all the hard things, that had been of late put on him by the parliament, were occaſioned by that hatred that was borne to his miniſters; and that, if his majeſty would change hands, and employ others, matters might be ſoftened and mended in another parliament. With this the earl of Jerſey endeavoured to poſſeſs the earl of Albemarle; and the uneaſineſs the king was in, diſpoſed him to think, that, if he ſhould bring in a ſet of tories into his buſineſs, they would ſerve him with the ſame zeal, and with better ſucceſs, than the whigs had done; and he hoped to throw all upon the miniſters, that were now to be diſmiſſed.

The firſt time that the lord Sommers recovered ſo much health, as to come to court, the king told him, That it ſeemed neceſſary for his ſervice, that he ſhould part with the ſeals; and he wiſhed, that he would make the delivering them up his own act. Upon this, the lord Sommers took the liberty to ſpeak freely to the king, in words to this effect; That he very well knew what his enemies aimed at, by their abuſing and perſecuting him as they had of late done: The ſeal was his greateſt crime; and, if he quitted that, he ſhould be forgiven; but, knowing what ill uſe would be made of it, if it were put into their hands, he was reſolved, with his majeſty's permiſſion, to keep it in defiance of their malice, and to ſtand all the trials they ſhould put upon him, with the ſupport of his innocence, and the hopes of being ſerviceable to his majeſty: He feared them not; and did not doubt, but, if his majeſty would be as firm to his friends as they would be to him, they ſhould be able to carry whatever points he had in view for the public welfare, in a new parliament. The king ſhook his head a little, as a ſign of his diffidence, and only ſaid, 'It muſt be ſo[x].' However, the lord Sommers perſiſted in refuſing to deliver up the ſeals as his own act. All his friends had preſſed him not to offer them, ſince that ſeemed to ſhew fear or guilt. He begged therefore the king's pardon, if in this he followed their advice; but he told his majeſty, whenever he ſhould ſend a warrant under his hand, commanding him to deliver them up, he would immediately obey it. The order was accordingly brought by lord Jerſey on the 17th of April 1700, and upon it the ſeals were ſent to the king. Thus the lord Sommers was diſcharged from this great office, which he had held ſeven years with a high reputation for capacity, integrity, and diligence. His being thus removed was much cenſured by all, but thoſe who procured it. Our princes uſed not to diſmiſs miniſters, who ſerved them well, unleſs they were preſſed to it by a houſe of commons, that refuſed to give money, till they were laid aſide. But here a miniſter, who was always vindicated by a great majority in the houſe of commons, when he was charged there, and who had ſerved both with fidelity and ſucceſs, and was indeed cenſured for nothing ſo much as for his being compliant with the king's humour and notions, or at leaſt for being too ſoft or too feeble in repreſenting his errors to him, was removed without a ſhadow of complaint againſt him. This was done with ſo much haſte, that thoſe, who had prevailed with the king to do it, had not yet concerted, who ſhould ſucceed him. They thought, that all the great men of the law were aſpiring to that high poſt, ſo that any one, to whom it ſhould be offered, would certainly accept it; but they ſoon found they were miſtaken; for, what by reaſon of the inſtability of the court, what by reaſon of the juſt apprehenſions men might have of ſucceeding ſo great a man, both the lord chief juſtice Holt[y], and the attorney-general Trevor, to whom the ſeals were offered, excuſed themſelves. It was term time, ſo that a vacancy in that poſt put things in ſome confuſion. A temporary commiſſion was granted to the three chief judges, to ſit in the court of Chancery; and, on the 21ſt of May, the ſeals were at laſt given, with the title of lord-keeper, to ſir Nathan Wright, one of the king's ſerjeants at law, in whom there was nothing equal to the poſt, much leſs to him, who had lately filled it. The king's inclinations ſeemed now turned to the tories, and to a new parliament. It was for ſome time in the dark, who had the confidence, and gave directions to affairs; and thoſe, who looked on, were often diſpoſed to think, that there was no direction at all, but that every thing was left to take its courſe, and that all was given up to hazard.

Beſides the affairs of England, the remonſtrances of the Scots India company extremely perplexed the king. Upon news of their ill ſucceſs at Darien, for want of aſſiſtance from the Engliſh plantations, a petition for a preſent ſeſſion of parliament was immediately ſent about the kingdom, and was ſigned by many thouſands. This was ſent up by ſome of the chief of their nobility, whom the king received very coldly: Yet a ſeſſion of parliament was granted them, to which the duke of Queenſbury was ſent down commiſſioner. Great pains were taken, by all ſorts of practices, to be ſure of a majority; great offers were made them in order to lay the diſcontents, which ran then very high; a law for a 'habeas corpus,' with a great freedom for trade, and every thing, that they could demand, was offered, to perſuade them to deſiſt, from purſuing the deſign upon Darien. The court had tried to get the parliament of England to interpoſe in that matter, and to declare themſelves againſt that undertaking. The houſe of lords was prevailed on to make an addreſs to the king, repreſenting the ill effects that they apprehended from that ſettlement: But this did not ſignify much, for, as it was carried in that houſe by a ſmall majority of ſeven or eight, ſo it was laid aſide by the commons. Some were not ill pleaſed to ſee the king's affairs run into an embroilment, and others did apprehend, that there was a deſign to involve the two kingdoms in a national quarrel, that, by ſuch an artifice, a greater army might be raiſed; ſo they let the matter fall. Nor would they give entertainment to a bill which the lords paſſed, and ſent up to them about the union of the two nations, under the title of a bill, 'for authorizing certain commiſſioners of the realm of England to treat with the commiſſioners of Scotland, for the weal of both kingdoms.' To this bill the commons refuſed to give their concurrence. The managers in that houſe, who oppoſed the court, reſolved to do nothing that ſhould provoke Scot-had written on the court of Exchequer, unwarranted by the oath of the barons, by any authorities in the law books, by any records or ſtatutes. That it ſuppoſed a direct abſurdity in the conſtitution of the court, becauſe it inveſted them with a power of commanding their ſuperior officers: That to ſay they can command the treaſurer by their judgment, when that very judgment is under the review and correction of the treaſurer, who is co-ordinate in the exchequer chamber with the lord chancellor, is a manifeſt inconſiſtency. He ſaid, it contradicted ſacred and received principles of law, 1. That no part of the king's treaſure can be iſſued, but by warrant under the great or privy ſeal; for which reaſon the law has placed ſuch a guard upon them, as to make the counterfeiting of them high-treaſon. 2. That, when once money is paid into the receipt of the Exchequer, no court has power to intermeddle with it. In the laſt place, he relied much on the inconvenience, no inconſiderable argument in law. That the barons of the exchequer cannot, as ſuch, be connuſant of the neceſſities of the ſtate; and though they were, and knew them to be ever ſo preſſing, they can only act according to one rule: and, if the king's treaſure muſt be iſſued by warrant under their ſeal, on the demand and application of the ſubject, a penſion granted upon no conſideration, or a very ill one, might perhaps be paid out of the money which ought to be employed, and poſſibly was provided by parliament, for ſetting out a fleet, reſiſting an invaſion, or ſuppreſſing a rebellion. That to deny the king the power of ordering the payments out of his own coffers, was to deny him that which is in every ſubject's power. It is to take from him the judgment of public neceſſities, or at leaſt the means of relieving them.

This argument of lord Sommers was printed in the year 1733, and is much admired for the inimitable elegance of the ſtile and method, and for its comprehenſion and learning. It may be added, that it is not only eſteemed one of the fineſt performances in the law, but has ſatisfied very able lawyers of the legality of his judgment; ſo that the publication of it did as much juſtice to his integrity, as honour to his parts. It is ſaid, that, in the making of it, the ſearch of records and precedents coſt him 700l. After this debate and conſideration of the matter, he reverſed the judgment of the court of exchequer on his own opinion, ſupported by that of chief juſtice Treby, who was one of the greateſt men of his time, and baron Lechmere, who had been an able practiſer in the exchequer above ſixty-years, againſt the opinion of all the reſt.

On the 6th of December 1699, there was an appeal from the determination to the houſe of lords, and, after hearing council and the ſentiments of the judges, a day was ſet apart for debating it. Lord Sommers, with his uſual modeſty and candour, opened his reaſons to the houſe, and ſome lords, in an unprecedented manner called upon Holt, chief juſtice, to anſwer him, though a peer of their own body, and chancellor. But Sommers, not daunted by that peculiar circumſtance, replied upon Holt with great ſpirit and energy. The judgment however was reverſed on the 23d of January, and a proteſt entered. No liberate or warrant for payment iſſued upon this reverſal; but in the ſame ſeſſion an act paſſed to apply the revenue of exciſe, as a ſecurity for 820,000l. and a weekly payment of 3,700l. to the civil liſt, on account of the neceſſity of affairs, ſubject, at the ſame time, to the charge of an annual payment of three per cent. on the whole principal due to the bankers, from and after the 26th of December 1705, which principal was made redeemable on payment of a moiety. This caſe, in reſpect of the unhappy perſons who had intruſted the bankers with their money, deſerved all that compaſſion, with which it was popular to treat it in thoſe times; but the bankers had made an unjuſt and extorſive profit from the crown, and the iniquitous extravagance of king Charles's court had been the ſource of the calamity. 5 Mod. Rep. p. 29. Lord Sommers's argument in the banker's caſe, p. 19.

[x] A gentleman, who had this from the lord Sommers's own mouth, told it to Mr. Oldmixon.

[y] Mr. Prior, in a letter to the earl of Mancheſter, dated at Hampton-Court, May 2. 1700, and printed among Mr. Cole's memoirs, page 126, ſays thus: My lord chief juſtice Holt, having been here to-day, and with the king in private, has given people occaſion to ſay, that he has refuſed the ſeals. If it be ſo or not, I cannot ſay, but as yet the ſeals are not diſpoſed of.

However,

land, or take off from the king any part of the blame and diſcontent, which ſoured that nation [z]. On the contrary, it was given out, in order to raiſe the national diſguſt ſtill higher, that the oppoſition, which the king gave to the Scots colony, flowed neither from a regard to the intereſts of England, nor to the treaties with Spain, but from a care of the Dutch, who from Curacoa carried on a coaſting trade among the Spaniſh plantations with great advantage; which, it was ſaid, the Scots colony, if once well ſettled, would draw wholly from them. Theſe things were ſent about Scotland with great induſtry. The management was chiefly in the hands of jacobites. Neither the king nor his miniſters were treated with the decencies, that are ſometimes obſerved, even after ſubjects have run to arms. The keeneſt of their rage was pointed at the king himſelf. Next him the earl of Portland, who had ſtill the direction of their affairs, had a large ſhare in it. In the ſeſſion of the Scotch parliament, in order to make the affair of Darien a national concern, it was voted, 'That the colony of Caledonia in Darien was a legal and rightful ſettlement, and that the parliament would maintain and ſupport the ſame.' Upon that, the ſeſſion was for ſome time diſcontinued. When the news of the total abandoning of Darien was brought over, it cannot be well expreſſed, into how bad a temper this caſt that body of that people. They had now loſt almoſt two hundred thouſand pounds ſterling upon this project, beſides all the imaginary treaſure, which they had promiſed themſelves from it. The nation was therefore raiſed into a ſort of fury upon it; and, in the firſt heat, an addreſs was ſent about the kingdom for hands, repreſenting to the king the neceſſity of a preſent ſitting of the parliament, which was drawn in ſo high a ſtrain, as if they reſolved to purſue the effects of it, by an armed force. It was ſigned by a great majority of the members of parliament, and the ferment in men's ſpirits was ſo raiſed, that few thought it could have been curbed, without breaking forth into great extremities [a].

This addreſs being preſented to the king by the lord Roſs, who, with ſome others, was deputed by the parliament for that purpoſe, his majeſty told them, 'That he could give no anſwer at that time to their petition, but they ſhould know his intentions in Scotland.'

The addreſſers, finding that the parliament was further adjourned by proclamation, and not knowing how ſoon it might be allowed to ſit, framed the draught of a ſecond national addreſs, to be ſigned by the ſeveral ſhires and boroughs throughout the kingdom: But, while the ſame was carried on, his majeſty writ a letter, directed to the duke of Queenſbury, and the privy-council, which letter was publiſhed in the manner of a proclamation, and wherein the king declared, "That, if it had been poſſible for him to have agreed to the reſolve offered to aſſert the right of the African company's colony in America, though that method ſeemed to him unneceſſary, yet his majeſty had from the beginning readily done it, at the earneſt deſires of his miniſters, and for his people's ſatisfaction, all other conſiderations ſet apart; but, ſince that things were much changed, his majeſty being truly ſorry for the nation's loſs, and moſt willing to grant what might be needful for the relief and eaſe of the kingdom, he aſſured them, that he would be ſo ready to concur with his parliament, in every thing that could be reaſonably expected of him, for aiding and ſupporting their intereſts, and repairing their loſſes, that his good ſubjects ſhould have juſt grounds to be ſenſible of his hearty inclinations to advance the wealth and proſperity of that his majeſty's ancient kingdom. That his majeſty was confident, that that declaration would be ſatisfying to all good men, who would certainly be careful both of their own preſervation, and of the honour and intereſt of the government, and not ſuffer themſelves to be miſled, nor give any advantage to enemies and ill deſigning perſons, ready to catch hold of any opportunity, as their practices did too manifeſtly witneſs. Concluding, That his majeſty's neceſſary abſence had occaſioned the late adjournment, but, as ſoon as God ſhould bring him back, he was fully reſolved his parliament ſhould meet."

While the parliament was ſitting, there was a ſecond treaty of partition concluded between England, France and Holland. The former treaty, made in favour of the electoral prince of Bavaria, was entirely defeated by his death. That young prince ſeemed marked out for great things, and had all the promiſing beginnings that could be expected in a child of ſeven years old, when he fell ſick, and was carried off the third or fourth day of his illneſs; ſo uncertain are all the proſpects, and all the hopes that this world can give. Now the Dauphin and the emperor were to diſpute, or to divide this ſucceſſion between them; ſo a new treaty was ſet on foot: It was generally given out, and too eaſily believed, that the king of France was grown weary of war, and was reſolved to paſs the reſt of his days in peace and quiet; but that he could not conſent to the exaltation of the houſe of Auſtria; yet, if that houſe was ſet aſide, he would yield up the Dauphin's pretenſions; and ſo the duke of Savoy was much talked of, but it was with the proſpect of having his hereditary dominions yielded up to the crown of France: But this great matter came to another digeſtion a few months after.

The king and the ſtates general ſaw the danger, to which they would be expoſed, if they ſhould engage in a new war, while the nation was yet under the vaſt debts that the former had brought upon it. The king's miniſters in the houſe of commons aſſured him, that it would be a very difficult thing to bring them to enter into a new war for maintaining the rights of the houſe of Auſtria. During the debates concerning the army, when ſome mentioned the danger of that monarchy falling into the hands of a prince of the houſe of Bourbon, it was ſet up for a maxim, that it would be of no conſequence to the affairs of Europe, who was king of Spain, whether a Frenchman or a German; and that, as ſoon as the ſucceſſor ſhould come within Spain, he would become a true Spaniard, and be governed by the maxims and intereſts of that crown; ſo that there was no proſpect of being able to infuſe into the nation an apprehenſion of the conſequence of that ſucceſſion. The emperor had a very good claim; but, as he had little ſtrength to ſupport it by land, ſo he had none at all by ſea; and his treaſure was quite exhauſted by his long war with the Turks. The French drew a great force towards the frontiers of Spain, and they were reſolved to march into it upon that king's death. There was no ſtrength to oppoſe them, yet they ſeemed willing to compound the matter. But they ſaid, the conſideration muſt be very valuable, that could make them deſiſt from ſo great a pretenſion; and both the king and ſtates thought it was a good bargain, if, by yielding up ſome of the leſs important branches of that monarchy, they could ſave thoſe in which they were moſt concerned, which were Spain itſelf, the Weſt-Indies, and the Netherlands. The French ſeemed willing to accept of the dominions in and about Italy, with a part of the kingdom of Navarre; and to yield up the reſt to the emperor's ſecond ſon, the archduke Charles. The emperor entered into the treaty, for he ſaw he could not hope to carry the whole ſucceſſion entire; but he preſſed to have the duchy of Milan added to his hereditary dominions in Germany. The expedient that the king propoſed, was, that the duke of Lorrain ſhould have the duchy of Milan, and that France ſhould accept of Lorrain inſtead of it. He was the emperor's nephew, and would be entirely in his intereſts. The emperor did not agree to this, but yet he preſſed the king not to give over the treaty, but to try if he could make a better bargain for him; and above all things recommended ſecrecy; for he well knew how much the Spaniards would be offended, if any treaty ſhould be owned, that might bring on a diſmembering of their monarchy. For, though they were taking no care to preſerve it in whole or in part, yet they could not bear the having any branch torn from it. The king reckoned, that the emperor, with the other princes of Italy, might have ſo much intereſt in Rome, as to ſtop the pope's giving the inveſtiture of the kingdom of Naples; and, which way ſoever that matter might end, it would oblige the pope to ſhew great partiality, either to the houſe of Auſtria, or the houſe of Bourbon, which might occaſion a breach among them, with other conſequences, that might be very happy to the whole proteſtant intereſt. Any war that might follow in Italy, [z] However, ſome time before a complaint was made to the houſe of commons of a printed book, intitled, 'An inquiry into the cauſes of the miſcarriage of the Scots colony at Darien,' and the houſe, having examined the ſaid book, reſolved, 'That it, highly reflecting on the honour of his majeſty, and both houſes of parliament, and tending to create jealouſies and animoſities between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, was a falſe, ſcandalous, and traiterous libel;' ordered it to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, and addreſſed his majeſty to iſſue out his royal proclamation, for the diſcovering and apprehending the author, printer, and publiſher of the ſaid libel: Which proclamation was publiſhed accordingly.

[a] In this addreſs they complained, 'of their having been interrupted by a ſudden adjournment, while they were debating a motion concerning their colony at Darien, which they conceived was not agreeable to the 40th act of the 11th parliament of king James VI, wherein it is enacted, "That nothing ſhould be done or commanded, which might directly or indirectly prejudice the liberty of free voting, and reaſoning of the eſtates of parliament." That by a ſubſequent adjournment of twenty days, the parliament was not permitted to come to any reſolution in the preſſing concerns of the nation, which they could not think conſiſtent with that article of their claim of right, whereby it was declared, "That for the redreſs of all grievances, ſtrengthening and preſerving of the laws, parliaments ought to be frequently called and allowed to ſit, and the freedom of ſpeech and debate ſecured to the members." Wherefore they earneſtly entreated his majeſty, that he would be pleaſed to allow his parliament to meet on the day to which it was then adjourned; and to ſit as long as might be neceſſary for redreſſing the grievances of the nation.'

The

would be at a great diſtance from us, and in a country that we had no reaſon to regard much: Beſides, that the fleets of England and Holland muſt come, in concluſion, to be the arbiters of the matter.

Theſe were the king's ſecret motives for entering into the treaty; moſt of which he communicated to biſhop Burnet. Accordingly the treaty was ſigned at London and the Hague; the Engliſh plenipotentiaries being the earl of Portland and Jerſey. By this treaty that of Ryſwick was ſolemnly confirmed; and, in caſe his catholic majeſty ſhould die without children, the Dauphin was to have, for himſelf and his heirs, the kingdom of Naples and Sicily, and alſo the iſlands on the Italian coaſt belonging to Spain, namely, St. Stephano, Porto Hercole, Orbitello, Telamone, Porto Longone, and Piombino, the city and marquiſate of Final, and the province of Guipuſcoa. The Dauphin was likewiſe to have the duchies of Lorrain and Bar; and the duchy of Milan was to be given to the duke of Lorrain and his heirs, in lieu of Lorrain and Bar; but the county of Bilche was to remain in ſovereignty to the prince of Vaudemont. The archduke Charles was to have, for himſelf and his heirs, the kingdom of Spain, and all that belonged to it, in and out of Europe. The emperor was to have three months time given him to come into this treaty: And, in caſe the archduke ſhould die without children, the ſucceſſion was to go to ſome other child of the emperor, to whom he ſhould be pleaſed to give it, except him, who ſhould be emperor or king of the Romans: And this part of the monarchy of Spain was alſo never to go to the prince who ſhould be either king of France, or Dauphin [b]. What reception this treaty met with from the princes and ſtates, to whom it was offered, will hereafter be ſhewn; and alſo what a moſt perfidious uſe of it was made by the French, to alienate the Spaniards from their allies, and obtain a will in favour of the duke of Anjou; though both the French king and Dauphin had bound themſelves not to accept any will, teſtament, or donation, contrary to the treaty: The original of which, ſigned by the Dauphin, biſhop Burnet has in his hands. No mention was made of this treaty, during the ſeſſion of parliament; for, though the king was generally believed, yet, as it was not publickly owned, no notice could be taken of bare reports: And nothing was to be done, in purſuance of this treaty, during the king of Spain's life.

The king, that he might give ſome content to the nation, ſtayed at Hampton-Court till July, before he went abroad. On the 14th of May, he beſtowed the garter on the earl of Albemarle; which, 'tis pretended, gave great offence. The ſame honour was alſo conferred on the earl of Pembroke, lord preſident of the council. Towards the latter end of June, the earl of Jerſey was made chamberlain of the houſhold; which had been ſome time vacant, by the duke of Shrewſbury's reſignation. The earl of Romney was made groom of the ſtole, and the earl of Carliſle one of the lords of the bedchamber. Soon after this, the king, having nominated the lords juſtices to govern in his abſence [c], ſet out for Holland.

About three weeks after his arrival there, he received the ſurpriſing and melancholy news of the death of the duke of Glouceſter, which was in a great meaſure occaſioned by the ſolemnity of his birth day, on the 24th of July. After the ceremony was over, the duke found himſelf fatigued and indiſpoſed, and the next day he was very ſick, and complained of his throat. The third day he was hot and feveriſh. Next morning, after bleeding, he thought himſelf better; but in the evening, his fever appearing more violent, a bliſter was applied to him, and other proper remedies adminiſtered. The ſame day a raſh appeared on his ſkin, which increaſing the next day, more bliſters were laid on. In the afternoon the fever growing ſtronger, his highneſs fell into a delirium, which continued till his death. He paſſed the night, as he did the preceding, in ſhort broken ſleeps and incoherent talk. On the 29th, the bliſters having taken effect, and the pulſe mending, the phyſicians, who attended him, thought it probable, that he might recover; but about eleven at night, he was on a ſudden ſeized with a difficult breathing, and could ſwallow nothing, ſo that he expired before midnight, being ten years and five days old. He was the only remaining child of ſeventeen, whom the princeſs of Denmark had borne, ſome to the full time, and the reſt before it. She attended him, during his ſickneſs, with great tenderneſs, but with a grave compoſedneſs, that amazed all who ſaw it; and ſhe bore his death with a reſignation and piety, that were indeed very ſingular. Biſhop Burnet had been truſted with his education now two years, and the duke had made an amazing progreſs. He had read over part of the ſcriptures with him, and had explained things that fell in his way, very copiouſly, and was often ſurprized with his queſtions, and the reflections that he made. He came to underſtand things relating to religion beyond imagination. The biſhop went through geography ſo often with him, that he knew all the maps very particularly. He explained to him the forms of government in every country, with the intereſt and trade of that country, and what was both good and bad in it; and acquainted him with all the great revolutions, that had been in the world, and gave him a large account of the Greek and Roman hiſtories, and of Plutarch's lives. The laſt thing the biſhop explained to him was the Gothic conſtitution, and the beneficiary and feudal laws. He talked to his highneſs of theſe things at different times near three hours a day. This was both eaſy and delightful to him. The king ordered five of his chief miniſters to come once a quarter, and examine the progreſs he made; and they ſeemed amazed both at his knowledge, and the good underſtanding that appeared in him; for he had a wonderful memory, and a very good judgment. His death gave a great alarm to the whole nation. The jacobites grew inſolent upon it, and ſaid, that now the chief difficulty

[b] The ſecret article of this treaty, inſerted by Mr. Cole, in his "Memoirs of the Affairs of State," p. 113. was as follows:

"His Britannic majeſty, his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, and the lords the States General, having a deſire to prevent a war which might be occaſioned by the death of the king of Spain without children, have agreed on a treaty about the ſucceſſion; which was ſigned at London the 21ſt of February, O. S. and at the Hague the 25th of March, 1700. N. S. And, as it is ſaid in the fourth article of the ſaid treaty, That the duchies of Lorrain and Bar ſhall be yielded to the Dauphin, in exchange for the duchy of Milan, which ſhould be given to the duke of Lorrain; and, as the two kings and the States General think that nothing is more proper for the ends propoſed, they will make uſe of all their intereſts, either jointly or ſeparately, to engage the ſaid duke of Lorrain to conſent to it.

"But, as it is neceſſary to determine who ſhall be the prince, to whom the duchy of Milan ſhall be committed, and what ſhall be given to the Dauphin for reparation, in the room of the duchies of Lorrain and Bar, if againſt all likelihood, the duke of Lorrain would not give his conſent to this exchange, notwithſtanding the good offices and continual applications repeated, during the life of the king of Spain, or to the time hereunder agreed to, after his death; the ſaid two kings and the States General, abovenamed, have agreed, that, in that caſe, his Britannic majeſty and the States General ſhall chuſe one of theſe alternatives, at the end of the ſaid term, after the death of his catholic majeſty, that is, to conſign the duchy of Milan into the hands of the elector of Bavaria, to enjoy it for him, his children, males or females, his heirs, ſucceſſors and deſcendants, males or females, born, or to be born, for ever, in entire property and full poſſeſſion: ordering, in exchange, Navarre to the Dauphin, to enjoy it, he and his children, males and females; his heirs, ſucceſſors, or deſcendants, born, and to be born, in entire property, and full poſſeſſion; or, inſtead of Navarre, the city and duchy of Luxemburg, and the county of Chiny. Or elſe to give the duchy of Milan to the duke of Savoy, to enjoy it, for his children, males and females, his heirs, ſucceſſors, and deſcendants, males and females, born, and to be born, in entire property and poſſeſſion; ordering in exchange, for the ſhare of the Dauphin, the city of Nice, the valley of Barcelonetta, and the duchy of Savoy, to enjoy it in perpetuity, and full poſſeſſion, he, his children, heirs, ſucceſſors, and deſcendants, males, or females, born, and to be born.

"Moreover, the two kings, and the States General have agreed by this ſecret article, that, though it is not ſaid in the ſeventh article of the ſaid treaty, ſigned at London the 21ſt of February, and at the Hague the 25th of March 1700, that a prince ſhall be agreed on, to whom the ſaid portion of the moſt ſerene archduke ſhall be given, in caſe the emperor and the king of the Romans will not ſubſcribe to the ſaid treaty after the term of three months ſhall be expired, to be counted from the day on which it ſhall be notified to him: Nevertheleſs, the emperor ſhall be allowed to ſubſcribe, during two months, to be reckoned from the day on which the death of his catholic majeſty ſhall be made known to him by his Britannic majeſty, his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, and the lords the States General. But, in caſe his Imperial majeſty refuſes to enter into it in the time above-named, the two kings and the States General ſhall agree, at the end of the time above appointed, on a prince, to whom the ſaid portion ſhall be given, and the remainder of what is in the ſaid ſeventh article, from which what is abovesaid does not derogate, ſhall be punctually executed.

"It is further agreed, that, if the moſt ſerene archduke ſhould go into Spain, or enter into the duchy of Milan, though it is ſaid in the eighth article of the ſaid treaty, to which this ſecret article refers, that he cannot go thither before the death of his catholic majeſty, but by the common conſent of the two kings and the States General; his Britannic majeſty and the States General engage themſelves to uſe all their poſſible endeavours and might, and even to come to acts of hoſtility, if it be neceſſary: In ſhort, to take all convenient meaſures, in concert with his moſt Chriſtian majeſty to oblige his catholic majeſty and the Spaniards, to ſend him back out of Spain, or out of the duchy of Milan, without any delay.

"This article ſhall have the ſame force as if it had been, word for word, inſerted in the treaty, to which it refers, and ſhall be enregiſtered by the parliament of Paris, immediately after the death of his catholic majeſty without children."

The

was removed out of the way of the prince of Wales's ſucceſſion.

Soon after this, the houſe of Brunſwick returned the viſit, which the king had made them laſt year, and the eyes of all the proteſtants in the nation turned towards the electreſs dowager of Hanover, who was daughter of the queen of Bohemia, and the next proteſtant heir, all papiſts being already excluded from the ſucceſſion. Thus of the four lives, that the nation had in view, as their chief ſecurity, the queen and the duke of Glouceſter were carried off on the ſudden; and of the two, that remained, the king and the princeſs of Denmark, as there was no iſſue, and little hopes of any by either of them, ſo the king, who at laſt was a man of a feeble conſtitution, was now falling under an ill habit of body; his legs being much ſwelled, which ſome thought was the beginning of a dropſy, while others thought it was only a ſcorbutic diſtemper.

The ſtate of things at that time gave a melancholy proſpect. The nation was falling under a general diſcontent, and a diſlike of the king's government. And the king, on his part, ſeemed to grow weary of them, and their affairs; and, partly by the fret from the oppoſition he had of late met with, partly from his ill health, he was falling, as it were, into a lethargy of mind. The adminiſtration of the government was now almoſt wholly engroſſed by the houſe of commons, who muſt ſit once a year, and as long as they thought fit, while the king had only the civil liſt for life. The act for triennial parliaments kept up a ſtanding faction in every county and town of England; while luxury, vanity, and ambition increaſed daily; and animoſities were come to ſuch a height, as to afford diſmal apprehenſions. Few ſeemed to have a right notion of the love of their country, and of a zeal for the good of the public. The houſe of commons, how much ſoever its power was advanced, yet was much ſunk in its credit; very little of gravity, order, or common decency appeared among them. The balance lay chiefly in the houſe of lords, who had no natural ſtrength to reſiſt the commons.

A league had been formed in the north to cruſh the young king of Sweden, and invade his dominions on all ſides at once. The elector of Brandenburgh was to fall into Pomerania, and the king of Denmark to attack Holſtein, whilſt the king of Poland invaded Livonia, which was antiently a fief of the crown of Poland. The miniſter of Sweden, before the king went abroad, preſſed him to make good his engagements with that crown. For, purſuant to the league, the Poles were now beſieging Riga. The firſt attempt of carrying the place by ſurprize miſcarried. Thoſe of Riga were either over-awed by the Swediſh garriſon that commanded there, or they apprehended, that the change of maſters would not change their condition, unleſs it were for the worſe; for which reaſon they made a greater ſtand than was expected, and, in a ſiege of above eight months, very little progreſs was made. The firmneſs of that place made the reſt of Livonia continue fixed to the Swedes. The Saxons made great waſte in the country, and ruined the trade of Riga. The king of Sweden, being obliged to employ his main force elſewhere, was not able to ſend them any conſiderable aſſiſtance. The elector of Brandenburgh lay quiet without making any attempt; as likewiſe did the princes of Heſſe and Wolfembuttle. The two ſcenes of action were in Holſtein, and before Copenhagen. The king of Denmark found the taking the forts that had been raiſed by the Duke of Holſtein, an eaſy work; they were ſoon carried and demoliſhed [d]. He beſieged Toninghen next, which held him longer. Upon the Swedes demand of the auxiliary fleets, that were ſtipulated both by the king and the ſtates, orders were given for equipping them in England, and likewiſe in Holland. The king was not willing to communicate this deſign to the two houſes, and try if the houſe of commons would take upon themſelves the expence of the fleet. They were in ſo bad a humour, that the king apprehended, that ſome of them might endeavour to put an affront upon him, and oppoſe the ſending a fleet into the Sound; though others adviſed the venturing on this, ſince no nation can ſubſiſt without alliances ſacredly obſerved. And this was an antient one, lately renewed by the king; ſo that an oppoſition, in ſuch a point muſt have turned to the prejudice of thoſe, who ſhould move it. Soon after the end of the ſeſſion, a fleet of thirty ſhips Engliſh and Dutch was ſent to the Baltic, commanded by ſir George Rooke, which arrived in the Sound on the 20th of July. The Danes had a good fleet at ſea, much ſuperior to the Swedes, and almoſt equal to the fleet ſent from hence. But, as it was their whole ſtrength, they would not run the hazard of loſing it. They kept at ſea for ſome time, having got between the Swedes and the fleet of their allies, and ſtudied to hinder their conjunction. When they ſaw that could not be done, they retired, and ſecured themſelves within the port of Copenhagen, which is a very ſtrong one. The Swedes, with their allies, came before that town, and bombarded it for ſome days, but with little damage to the place, and none to the fleet. The duke of Lunenburgh, together with the forces, that the Swedes had at Bremen, paſſed the Elbe, and marched to the aſſiſtance of the duke of Holſtein. This obliged the Danes to raiſe the ſiege of Toninghen, and the two armies lay in view of one another for ſome weeks, without coming to any action. Another deſign of the Danes alſo miſcarried. A body of Saxons broke into the territories of the duke of Brunſwick, in hopes to force their army to come back to the defence of their own country: But the duke of Zell had left things in ſo good order, that the Saxons were beat back, and all the booty, that they had taken, was recovered.

In the mean time king William offered his mediation, and a treaty was ſet on foot; and, as he did not approve of ſir George Rooke's bombardment of Copenhagen, ſoon after he had received the news of it, he directed Mr. Blaithwayte to write to that admiral from Loo, not to commit any further hoſtilities againſt the town or ſhipping. The king of Denmark propoſed, that the king of Poland might be included in the treaty, but the Swedes refuſed it; and, as the king was not guarantee of the treaties between Sweden and Poland, ſo he was not obliged to take care of the king of Poland. The treaty proceeding but ſlowly, this made the king of Sweden apprehend, that he ſhould loſe the ſeaſon, and be forced to abandon Riga, which began to be ſtraitned; and therefore to quicken the treaty, he reſolved on a deſcent in the iſle of Zealand. This was executed without any oppoſition, the king of Sweden conducting it in perſon, and being the firſt who landed. He ſhewed ſuch ſpirit and courage in his whole conduct, as raiſed his character very high. It ſtruck a terror through all Denmark; for now the Swedes reſolved to beſiege Copenhagen. This brought the treaty to a concluſion between Denmark, Sweden, and Holſtein, about the middle of Auguſt. The old treaties were renewed, and a liberty of fortifying was reſerved for Holſtein under ſome limitations; and the king of Denmark paid the duke of Holſtein two hundred and ſixty thouſand rix-dollars for the charge of the war. The peace being thus made, the Swedes retired back to Schonen, and the fleets of England and Holland returned home. The king's conduct in this whole matter was highly applauded: He effectually protected the Swedes, and yet obliged them to accept of reaſonable terms of peace. The king of Denmark ſuffered moſt in honour and intereſt. It was a great happineſs, that this war was ſo ſoon at an end; for, if it had continued, all the North muſt have engaged in it; and, as the chief ſtrength of the proteſtant religion lay there, ſo that intereſt muſt have ſuffered much, which ſide ſoever had come by the worſt in the progreſs of the war; and it was already ſo weak, that it needed not a new diminution.

Some days after the ſigning of the treaty, lieutenant general Bannier, who commanded in the town of Toninghen, while it was beſieged by the Danes, waited on the king at Loo, being ſent by the duke of Holſtein, in acknowledgment of his protection. And, about ſix weeks after, the king of Poland's reſident at the Hague, preſented a memorial to the States-general, full of aſſurances of friendſhip from the king his maſter, and acquainting them, that what induced him to put off the bombarding of Riga, when every thing was in readineſs for executing that deſign, was chiefly the conſideration of the loſs which divers merchants, ſubjects to the king of England, and the States General, would have ſuffered thereby. The king wrote to the Czar of Muſcovy, upon the occaſion of the differences between him and the crown of Sweden, to preſs him to an accommodation, and to offer his mediation for that purpoſe.

The treaty for dividing the Spaniſh monarchy (which began now to be publiſhed) had given riſe to a very important ſeries of negotiations; which were carried on with great ſecreſy and addreſs, during the courſe of this ſummer [e]. It is needleſs to remind the reader of the motives, that induced

This the young king of Denmark complained of, as contrary to the 'Condominium,' which he and the duke have in that duchy; ſo entered into the league againſt Holland and Sweden.

the contracting parties to ſign this treaty; or of the nature of its contents, as both have been already related: But when, purſuant to one of the articles, it came to be offered, jointly, by the miniſters of England, France, and Holland, to the reſt of the powers of Europe, the reception it met with was none of the moſt favourable. The greateſt part returned general and dilatory anſwers. The Italian ſtates were unwilling to ſee the French in poſſeſſion of Naples, and the ſtates Del Preſidi. Thoſe of Germany were, from motives of fear, or intereſt, unwilling to diſoblige the Houſe of Auſtria. Brandenburg expected the title of king from the authority and good offices of the Imperial court. Saxony and the Northern crowns were taken up with their own quarrels; which the peace of Travendal had by no means accommodated. Some thought the duke of Savoy under engagements at Vienna; but it ſeems moſt probable that he reſolved to defer making terms for himſelf, till the treaty took place; and was not without hopes, that, upon the emperor's refuſal, he ſhould be nominated of Portland began, ſoon after this, to treat about a new partition treaty, in favour of the archduke Charles; and the king ſent the earl of Jerſey into France, with inſtructions to negotiate this ſecond treaty: But, that earl, being ſoon recalled, the earl of Mancheſter was appointed to ſucceed him: From whoſe papers, publiſhed by Chriſtian Cole, Eſq. the following extracts are taken; which will give us light into the ſecret hiſtory of the ſecond partition treaty.

Alexander Stanhope, Eſq. the Engliſh envoy extraordinary at Madrid, to the earl of Mancheſter.

Madrid, Aug. 27. 1699.

A paper, ſent me this evening, from Don Antonio de Ubilla ſecretary of the 'Diſpacho Univerſal,' a copy of which was incloſed, gives me an unexpected opportunity of beginning my correſpondence with an office that concerns, or, by the contents, is ſuppoſed to concern your excellency's negotiations in that court.

Copy of the paper above-mentioned.

Don Antonio de Ubilla kiſſes the hands of don Alexander Stanhope, envoy extraordinary of his Britannic majeſty, and lets him know, that the king his maſter, having been frequently informed by his miniſters in the north, of the ſtrong informations and evident proofs, which they have, by different advices and accidents, that the Engliſh, Hollanders, and French, in conſequence of what was laſt year concluded and ſtipulated at Loo, are now again forming new treaties for the ſucceſſion of this crown, and for dividing it: Which notices have been corroborated by other ways; ſo that they are public over all Europe: It would be againſt his dignity to diſſemble, and take no notice of them. The king, his maſter, thinks it inexcuſable, not to oppoſe what might produce ſuch irreparable inconveniencies, if it came to be put in execution; and has ordered his miniſters, in the courts of France, England, and Holland, to make known to thoſe princes and governments the juſt ſentiments his majeſty has of thoſe advices, unheard of before, in in the life of any king, and more improper in that of his majeſty; which conſiſting, at preſent (by the divine mercy, and for our happineſs,) in only thirty-eight years of age, we may naturally promiſe ourſelves, and eſpecially from his moſt high providence, that he may give his majeſty the important ſucceſſion, which we hope for from him, by the affectionate prayers and vows of his vaſſals: It cauſing a juſt wonder and grief, that they doubt before-hand, of ſo great a poſſibility, by reaſon of any opinions, taken up from the ſlight complaints, and the affliction of his kingdoms and ſubjects, and the impreſſions, that ſeem to diſturb the general tranquility, which we now enjoy: When, on the other hand, it is not to be believed, from the righteous and pious mind of his majeſty, that he lives ſo unmindful of his obligation, and values ſo little the love and ſecurity of his vaſſals, if God (by his ſecret and ſovereign judgments) would chaſtiſe us, by taking away his life (which, we hope, he will not ſuffer) without granting him the benefit of a ſucceſſion, his affairs will not be left, without a due reflection on what is moſt juſt, and moſt important for the public tranquility; and ſo, that nobody ſhall be able to find fault with his juſtice, or his foreſight. For which reaſons his majeſty has ordered his aforeſaid miniſters to make inſtances, and uſe their diligence to cut off thoſe negotiations; weighing the ill effects which they now produce; and, what their continuance may produce. And, that the complaint of his majeſty, and the orders he gives to his miniſters abroad, to notify to the princes, at whoſe courts they reſide, be, at the ſame time, made public, he has lately ordered, that it be made known to the miniſters here. For this reaſon does don Antonio de Ubilla communicate it to don Alexander Stanhope, by order of his maſter, that he may alſo give notice to his Britannic majeſty, aſſiſting, with his prudent repreſentations, this juſt and honeſt purpoſe; that ſo the univerſal quiet may be maintained: and that he may quit the ſcandal of this negotiation, which, it is feared, will be an unhappy motive of kindling a voracious flame of a new war: Which, being once lighted, will be difficult to be extinguiſhed, either by the greateſt force, or the moſt dextrous and moſt powerful mediation: And he remains obedient to don Alexander Stanhope, with all affection.

The earl of Mancheſter, to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, Sept. 30, 1699.

The Spaniſh embaſſador is endeavouring to get a private audience of the king. The firſt matter, he is to repreſent, is in relation to ſome tranſactions at Loo. The declararion of his king makes alſo great diſcourſe here. The ſtate of affairs at St. Germains continues much the ſame it was. They are ſtill pleaſing themſelves with hopes the nation will recall him, at laſt; though the greateſt proſpect they ſeem to have, is the death of the king of Spain; which might, again, renew the war.

The earl of Mancheſter, to Mr. Yard.

Paris, Octob. 7, 1699.

They write from Loo, that the Spaniſh embaſſador has delivered to all the lords juſtices a memorial relating to the ſucceſſion of the crown of Spain, which his majeſty reſents very much.

Mr. Yard, to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, Octob. 28, 1699.

I believe the king's directions will be ſignified to the Spaniſh embaſſador, to-morrow, to leave the kingdom. Indeed, the paper, he gave about, was very inſolent, and appealing to the parliament; ſo that the king could do no leſs. Mr. Stanhope is recalled at the ſame time.

Remonſtrance preſented in French, by the marquis de Canales, embaſſador from the king of Spain, to the lords juſtices.

In the firſt place, The king, his maſter, having been certainly informed, that his majeſty, king William, the Hollanders, and other powers (in purſuance of what they treated and ſtipulated, laſt year, at Loo) are now actually framing new treaties about the ſucceſſion of the crown of Spain; and (what is more deteſtable) contriving its diviſion and repartition: His majeſty orders his extraordinary embaſſador, reſiding in this kingdom, to make known to the lords juſtices of England the reſentment, which theſe unheard-of proceedings create in his majeſty, eſpecially during the life of a monarch, who is of ſo fit an age to expect (for many years) an heir, ſo much deſired by all nations, that, without a deteſtable avarice, no one would ſuffer himſelf to be carried away with the ambition of uſurping the dominions of others.

That, if this were not contrary to the law of nature, no nation or government would be ſafe againſt the machinations of the ſtrongeſt and moſt malicious; whereas, reaſon, and not force, ſets bounds to nations.

That, if it were lawful for foreigners to concern themſelves about the ſucceſſion of kings and ſovereigns, there would be no ſtatutes or municipal laws to be obſerved; nor would any laws be free from the outrages of others, more eſpecially thoſe of the crown of England.

That, if watches were ſet upon the indiſpoſitions of ſovereigns, no health would be conſtant, no life ſecure, while both depend on the hand of the Almighty, who is the arbiter of life, death, and empires.

That the impreſſions, which one kingdom makes upon another, to tempt the allegiance of the ſubjects, and excite their minds to inſurrections, are an offence, and breach of the good faith, which ought to be obſerved among Chriſtians, and more particularly among allies and friends.

That it ought not to be preſumed, of any prince or nation, and ſtill leſs of the king of the Spaniſh nation, that they are ſo negligent, as not to take proper meaſures, upon future and unexpected accidents (if this ſhould happen) to ſecure the public peace, and the repoſe of Europe, which has been the aim of the king and nation for ſo many ages, as it is now and always will be.

That, if there is not a ſpeedy end put to theſe proceedings and projects, there will doubtleſs break out a direful and univerſal war over all Europe, difficult to be ſtopped when it is deſired, and ſo much the more prejudicial to the Engliſh, as they have but juſt felt the effects of innovations, and of the late war. This matter is ſo worthy of conſideration, that it is not doubted but it will be thought ſo by the parliament, the nobility, and the whole Engliſh nation, which has never been wanting in prudence and foreſight.

The ſame nation muſt conſider their own particular intereſts, and their commerce and treaties with the Spaniſh king and nation; the alteration, diviſion, and partition of which would neceſſarily be very detrimental to them; and all this may be prevented by deſiſting from the project in hand, and by not promoting innovations, deſtructive at all times to empires and kingdoms.

That the embaſſador extraordinary of Spain will manifeſt to the parliament, in the next ſeſſions, the juſt reſentment which he now expreſſes, in the ſame manner as his maſter has cauſed it to be ſhewn to all the public miniſters of the kings, princes, and ſtates, that reſide at the court of Madrid.

The tranſlation of the paper ſent to the Spaniſh embaſſador, and which was written in French by Mr. ſecretary Vernon, and dated, the 30th of September 1699.

His majeſty having ſeen the paper, which the ſecretary of the embaſſy of Spain has lately delivered, by order of your excellency, to the lords juſtices of the kingdom; his majeſty thinks the contents ſo inſolent and ſeditious, that, in reſentment of ſo extraordinary a proceeding, and which can by no means be juſtified by the law of nations, he orders, that you go out of his dominions preciſely in eighteen days, to be counted from this notification; and that you keep in your houſe till your departure. I am alſo ordered to let you know, that theſe are the orders of his majeſty, that no writing be any more received from you or any of your domeſtics.

Mr. Stanhope to the earl of Mancheſter.

Madrid, Nov. 5, 1699.

By the incloſed copy of the complaint I have made here againſt the marquis de Canales's proceedings, your excellency will judge I have ſeen his inſolent and ſeditious paper. They readily received mine, which I much doubted they would not; and it was ſent within an hour hither from the eſcurial to the council of ſtate. This was the day before yeſterday in the morning, and they have been in cloſe conſults ever ſince. I have advices from ſeveral hands, and ſome from perſons of the firſt rank, that the reſolution will probably be moderate; and that they will diſown their embaſſador, ſo far at leaſt as to the brutality of his expreſſions, and it may be as to the ſubſtance, now they find the world generally cry out againſt the folly as well as inſolence of it; though I am ſatisfied he had orders to do the thing, but not in that manner. This makes me willing to give them time to bethink themſelves before they run headlong into miſchiefs, againſt which they are ſo ill provided, and it is a latitude my order allows me. Beſides that if I can prevent a breach, and procure his majeſty humble ſatisfaction, I ſhall believe I do both him and my country good ſervice.

The two princes more immediately concerned in its operation, viz. the emperor and king of Spain, loudly declared againſt it from the beginning. The Engliſh tranſlation of Mr. Stanhope's paper to Don Antonio de Ubilla, delivered at the Eſcurial, the 3d of November 1699, N. S.

Don Alexander Stanhope, envoy extraordinary of the king of Great Britain, kiſſes the hands of Don Antonio de Ubilla, and ſays, that he has orders from the king his maſter, immediately to paſs to the royal knowledge of his catholic majeſty the juſt motive of complaint given him by a paper, which the ſecretary of the marquis de Canales, by order of his maſter, delivered to the lords juſtices of England in London, of which the adjoined is a true copy, and from whoſe contents, beſides the rude and provoking language, it is manifeſt the deſign of it was to ſtir up ſedition in his kingdoms, by appealing to the parliament and people of England againſt his majeſty; which is to own them ſuperiors to his royal perſon, than which nothing can be more abſurd and contrary to the conſtitution of the government of the kingdom of England; and is what the ſaid marquis de Canales, embaſſador from his catholic majeſty, neither ought nor could be ignorant of, after ſo many years reſidence in it. Notwithſtanding which the paper is full of contumelious terms to his majeſty's perſon, making uſe of ſeveral artifices, of inſinuations and threats, purpoſely to breed a miſunderſtanding and diſſention betwixt his majeſty and his ſubjects; an attempt, which no ſovereign prince can ſuffer in his dominions: And therefore the king of Great Britain, his maſter, found himſelf neceſſitated to ſtop, as ſoon as poſſible, a miſchief, which by the induſtry of the marquis went on ſpreading itſelf daily, by ordering he ſhould be required to go out of his kingdoms, and finally, the ſaid paper, being both in words and ſubſtance, affrontive to the majeſty and ſacredneſs of kings, the king of Great Britain, his maſter, doth not believe it poſſible, that the marquis writ or publiſhed it by the orders of his catholic majeſty, but on the contrary perſuades himſelf, that this his reſentment will be much to his royal ſatisfaction, as made for the common cauſe of all kings; and that don Alexander Stanhope will hope, that don Antonio de Ubilla paſs all this to the royal knowledge of his catholic majeſty, whom God preſerve, remaining don Antonio's moſt humble and affectionate ſervant.

Madrid, the 2d of November 1699, N. S.

Mr. Stanhope to the earl of Mancheſter.

Nov. 12, 1699, N. S.

The next day after my laſt, which was November 5, I had certain notice from ſeveral hands, the king had taken his reſolution of ordering me to be gone; whereupon at midnight I diſpatched to the Eſcurial my agent, with the paper, of which the incloſed is a copy. The ſecretary of the Deſpacho Univerſal, don Antonio de Ubilla, would not receive, but was willing to hear the contents by word of mouth, and that was as much as I deſired. Two days after, the conductor, or maſter of the ceremonies, came to order me in the king his maſter's name to be gone out of the Spaniſh dominions within eighteen days, and not to ſtir out of my houſe till I ſhould begin my journey. Your excellency has the anſwer I gave my conducter in the ſame ſheet with the former. I have every day ſince ſollicited my paſſports, being ready to be gone whenever they give them me; and am told the reaſon of the delay is to know by next poſt, whether any paſſports, and in what form they were given to the marquis de Canales in London, that they may exactly imitate the ſame with me.

The tranſlation of Mr. Stanhope's paper to Don Antonio de Ubilla, expreſſing the king his maſter's orders to return home, and deſiring his catholic majeſty's paſſports.

Don Alexander Stanhope, envoy extraordinary from the king of Great Britain, kiſſes the hands of don Antonio de Ubilla, and ſays, that having already repreſented to his catholic majeſty, whom God preſerve, the motives, that neceſſitated the king, his maſter, to ſend the declaration, he lately did, to the marquis de Canales; and don Alexander Stanhope having no other orders but to return to his majeſty's royal preſence, as ſoon as poſſible, he communicates this to don Antonio de Ubilla, that he may pleaſe to put it into the knowledge of his catholic majeſty, whom he beſeeches at the ſame time, with all humble ſubmiſſion, to order ſuch paſſports to be given him, as will be neceſſary for ſuch a voyage; and don Alexander Stanhope remains don Antonio de Ubilla's moſt humble and affectionate ſervant.

Madrid, November 6, 1699.

Mr. Stanhope's anſwer to the conductor of embaſſadors, when he came with a meſſage from the king to order him to leave the Spaniſh dominions in eighteen days, and not ſtir out of his houſe, till he ſhould begin his journey.

You will pleaſe to tell his catholic majeſty from me, that I will punctually comply in all that you have intimated to me by his royal order, becauſe in ſo doing I ſhall obey the orders of the king my maſter, as his catholic majeſty cannot but have been informed by don Antonio de Ubilla, to whom I communicated it two days ago by my ſecretary at the Eſcurial, deſiring at the ſame time paſſports neceſſary for my voyage; that I am glad to ſee their two majeſties minds ſo unanimous, and deſire they may continue the ſame in all other matters.

The ſubſtance of the earl of Mancheſter's audience of the French king at Verſailles, on Sunday, Nov. 15. 1699.

SIR,

The king my maſter having found, that monſieur de Tallard was, by his inſtructions, obliged to quit Holland before he ſigned the treaty, which was projected with your majeſty, relating to the ſucceſſion of Spain; his majeſty has ordered me to deſire this private audience, to aſſure you, ſir, that the king continues in the ſame ſentiments he was always of in regard to that treaty. Your majeſty knows very well the good offices employed by the king my maſter, to make the Imperialiſts enter into it. He has alſo done all he could to make the ſtates like it. His majeſty continues to act as he did. As to what concerns the king's ſigning it, he cauſed the earl of Jerſey to come into Holland expreſsly for this end; and I doubt not, but the count of Tallard will have told your majeſty, how often the king my maſter has offered himſelf to ſign it, to ſhew, that he was ready to do all that depended on him. Your majeſty will give me leave to be a little long, in telling how this affair has paſſed, that ſo your majeſty may have it perfectly cleared up, that there is no alterarion in the intention of the king my maſter. The buſineſs was propoſed to the ſtates of the province of Holland, as to thoſe, who were the moſt intereſted in it; for it was not apprehended, that any obſtacles ſhould be met with elſewhere, if the conſent of that province was had. That was alſo the beſt way to make the ſecret of this affair leſs apt to be divulged.

Sir, If it has been repreſented to you, that the king my maſter might have made uſe of the credit he has with the ſtates, to cauſe this treaty to be concluded; I will own, that the king has a great deal of credit in that country. But this credit does always conform itſelf to the manners and cuſtoms of the country; and, though the ſtates had found no objection, the buſineſs could not have been ended without the conſent of every city, which could not be had in leſs time than a month or three weeks, as the penſionary and the earl of Portland have given count Tallard to underſtand. But, whilſt his orders did not give him leave to wait for the concluſion of the affair, the king my maſter hopes, that your majeſty will renew your orders to monſieur de Tallard, or will ſend orders to monſieur de Bonrepos, to endeavour to remove all obſtacles, that ſo the project of the treaty may have its effect.

The French king's anſwer.

I own I was a little ſurprized, that the affair was not finiſhed at the expiration of the time, and before the king your maſter did ſet out for England. I am ſatisfied with the aſſurances, which you now give me from him, that he continues ſtill in the ſame intention; and I hope he will ſtill continue to contribute all he can with the ſtates. As for me, I am ſtill of the ſame mind, and I act withthe ſame ſincerity. I will ſoon ſend monſieur de Tallard with the neceſſary inſtructions.

When I ſaid, 'That the reaſon the ſtates of Holland were not ſooner acquainted with it, was, that it could not be propoſed to them, till it was known, whether the Imperialiſts would come in or no;' the king ſaid, 'They have had time enough given them, and even too much.' As to count Tallard's having orders to come away, the king took no notice of it, nor that he had been informed of every ſtep. Upon my ſaying, 'Monſieur Tallard has been informed of all that has been done in this affair, and has even ſeen all the letters, which Mr. Hop wrote to the penſionary; and, it being firſt propoſed to the province of Holland, it ſeemed that he was ſatisfied in theſe points,' I took occaſion to ſee, if monſieur de Bonrepos had any orders, ſaying, 'That the king my maſter is deſirous that your majeſty ſhould be informed by monſieur Tallard, or monſieur de Bonrepos, of all that paſſes; and even the ſtates will always have a great regard for all that comes from your majeſty.' The king anſwered, 'In this affair I confided only in monſieur de Tallard; and I know very well, that the king your maſter has more credit than I in Holland on this occaſion.' When I ſaid, 'That the king had recommended it to the care of the penſionary, and that we hoped, that the difficulties were ſuch as might be ſurmounted.' The king anſwered, 'That he hoped ſo too; and that he imagined, that ſomebody would come from the ſtates into England; and that the treaty would be ſigned there.' The king ſaid alſo, 'As you know, I have it under the hand of the king your maſter, as he has it under mine.' Then I ſaid, 'I have alſo, ſir, particular orders to tell your majeſty from the king, that as he has acted on this occaſion with an open heart, and with all poſſible ſincerity; ſo he will continue to act on all other occaſions that may be able to contribute to the ſtrengthening the friendſhip and good correſpondence with your majeſty.' The king anſwered, 'You may aſſure the king, your maſter, that I will do the ſame.'

Mr. Prior ſet out, on the ſaid 15th of November 1699, with this account of the audience, for London.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, Nov. 21, 1699.

The ſame day Mr. Prior left this place, I went to Verſailles, and had my audiences, where paſſed what is uſual on ſuch occaſions. The king expreſſed himſelf in very obliging terms, mentioning the great deſire he had to continue the good correſpondence, that is now ſo well eſtabliſhed; and that he did again repeat to me what he had formerly aſſured me of, &c. I made monſieur de Torcy a viſit, where I took occaſion to diſcourſe of what had paſſed in my private audience. I knew he expected it, and was alſo willing to find out his ſenſe of the matter. He ſaid, That the king had acquainted him with it: That I had fully explained the whole proceeding to his majeſty: That monſieur de Tallard was to ſet out on Monday next. He did ſtill ſeem to inſiſt on the great credit our king had with the ſtates, and, laughing, ſaid, he wondered I ſhou d leſſen it. I told him, I did own the ſtates had always ſhewn a great regard to every thing, that was propoſed by his majeſty: That the aſſurances, I had given the king, were, that he had recommended it, and would continue to do it; ſo that nothing would be wanting on his part: That, though there were great hopes of a good concluſion, yet, till it was agreed to by the ſtates, it was more than could be ſaid, that they would certainly do it. On the whole, I find the court impatient till it is done, by ſaying, No time was to be loſt: That the king of Spain's of them." In this anſwer, the imperial court perſiſted with little variation, except that their refuſals became ſtronger and ſharper, the more they were preſſed; and ſometimes they pretended, what they could not believe, that Charles II. was in a fair way of recovery, and might have poſterity of his own. This was the language of their public memorials; but the courts of Harrach and Kaunitz, the principal miniſters of Leopold, talked in a higher and more confidential ſtile to the French embaſſador, the marquis de Villars. They expreſſed, in their private conferences, the ſtrongeſt reſentment at the conduct of the maritime powers, not unmixed with terms of diſreſpect towards king William, and inſinuations, that domeſtic factions had rendered his government weak and contemptible. They aſſured him, that their maſter would put every thing to hazard, rather than accept a treaty, which muſt reduce him to an abſolute dependence on England and Holland, for the preſervation of Spain and the Indies in his family, and, at the ſame time, robbed him of the Milaneſe.

Spain's life was very uncertain: That, by the laſt account they had, he was ill again. I waited on monſieur de Tallard this morning, and his diſcourſe was much the ſame. He gave me to underſtand, that, though monſieur de Bonrepos would ſeem to be concerned in this affair, he was not: That he hoped to find all things ready at his return into England, which would be on Saturday next: That he had all the duty imaginable for the king: That his intentions were and always would be, to endeavour to continue a good underſtanding between our maſters. To which I replied, as was proper on ſuch an occaſion, 'I hope monſieur de Tallard will be ſo juſt, as to give it the ſame turn in England, he does here.'

The earl of Mancheſter to the lord chancellor Sommers.

Paris, Decemb. 8, 1699.

As to the affair, that paſſed in Holland this ſummer, I cannot ſee why the ſtates ſhould make any difficulty, ſince the year before they did agree to a propoſal of that nature; and the ſame reaſon does ſtill continue, unleſs they were deſirous to ſee firſt the ſucceſs of their tariff there, which was yeſterday ſettled and exchanged.

The houſe of Auſtria will never agree to any thing till it is too late. Beſides, they think our intereſt is ſo much concerned, that we ſhall at all times procure them ſome conditions; and, on the other ſide, the fear they have of diſobliging Spain makes them ſo very cautious, as not to come into any propoſal whatever. I muſt confeſs, I am impatient to ſee the concluſion of this matter. For, in caſe it has not the effect we always propoſed, I ſhall be ſorry it has gone ſo far: And I know this court will be much diſſatisfied with us, and may be with ſome reaſon. All I have acted in it has ſucceeded as was deſired.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, December 23, 1699.

I was this day with monſieur de Torcy.—He took notice, that the affair of Spain was ſtill depending, and not agreed to, which might be a great prejudice to this king, ſince they had now a good opportunity of turning matters to their advantage, the queen of Spain being diſſatisfied with the court of Vienna. He did not mention the occaſion, but I fancy it is ſomething in relation to the counteſs of Berlips. All I ſaid was, that I was aſſured, that the king my maſter would contribute all he could to bring that matter to a good concluſion. He anſwered, that the king was fully ſatisfied of it.

Count Zinzendorf had an audience of the king this day, having juſt received a courier with the news, that the queen of the Romans was brought to bed of a daughter. The king told him, as he ſays, in a very obliging manner, that he had given orders to monſieur de Villars to take his audience of the archduke in the manner the emperor ſhould think fit. So that at preſent this court ſeems deſirous to oblige the emperor as much as they can.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, Decem. 31, 1699.

I never ſee monſieur de Torcy, but he ſpeaks to me of the great affair. On Tueſday laſt I was there: I found him appearing a little more concerned: He ſaid, that matters were ſtill under ſuch uncertainties, that they could not tell what to depend on: That he did not find, that this affair was any way advanced: That the king of Spain had been indiſpoſed again ſince his return to Madrid, and might die of a ſudden, which probably would produce a new war in Europe, in caſe thoſe meaſures, that were propoſed, were not firſt agreed to. I could give him no other anſwer, than that I believed he was ſatisfied nothing would be wanting on the king my maſter's part; and that I believed monſieur de Tallard was acquainted with what paſſed. He ſaid he believed not; for that he had aſked an audience of the king, but could not have it, by reaſon the king was to go to Hampton-Court; and that at that time there arrived three poſts from Holland. I told him, that I did not doubt but monſieur de Tallard had told him how eaſy of acceſs the king was: that I had ſeen him ſpeak to the king about buſineſs, even without ſo much as aſking an audience, or acquainting the ſecretary of ſtate with it. I ſaid, as for myſelf, that I thought, if monſieur de Tallard had not left Holland ſo ſoon, it might have facilitated this affair. To which monſieur de Torcy anſwered, that they had nothing to do with the ſtates, having only treated with the king of England: That monſieur de Bonrepos was come to Paris, ſo that they had no embaſſador there, ſeeming to inſiſt very much on this point, that it was not in the leaſt their buſineſs: That ſeveral months were paſſed ſince the time they had reaſon to believe this matter would have been finiſhed, &c. I cannot tell but he expected ſome light from me, or it may be monſieur de Tallard is uneaſy, and has made them ſo. I found by monſieur de Tallard, the night before he went from hence, that he thought by Chriſtmas this matter would certainly be ended. He ſaid, in caſe it had a good concluſion, he ſhould be very glad to ſtay in England; if not, he hoped he ſhould be recalled, and ſome other ſhould be ſent. It may be, that this court was of the ſame opinion; and that, finding the contrary, it makes them doubtful of what the ſucceſs will be. Monſieur de Torcy nevertheleſs did not ſeem to make any doubt; he only ſaid, that in caſes of this nature time was not to be loſt.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, Jan. 6. 1700.

I am in hopes the grand affair goes on well, ſince monſieur de Torcy diſcourſing yeſterday with me, as he generally does, told me, that the penſionary of Holland had told monſieur de Bonrepos that the province of Zealand had given their conſent; and, there being ſince ſome time paſt, as is hoped we ſhall ſoon know the ſucceſs; which will make this court eaſy. Monſieur de Torcy pretends they have propoſals of treaties from all parts, but that the king does much more deſire and ſeek that with the king of England than any other. Monſieur de Torcy has received by an expreſs a letter from monſieur de Tallard of the 30th of December N. S. which is two days freſher than ours. He ſeemed much better ſatisfied than the time before.

The earl of Jerſey to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, Jan. 11-12, 1700.

The great affair is come to a good concluſion; the province of Holland, having conſented to it, except ſome little reſerve, which will be of no conſequence. Your excellency will be pleaſed, as you may occaſionally diſcourſe with monſieur de Torcy, to let him know this; which may prevent any thing, that Tallard may repreſent otherwiſe, on this ſubject.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, Jan. 27, 1700.

I was, yeſterday, with monſieur de Torcy; who had received an expreſs from monſieur de Tallard, with news, That the affair was concluded: that the only difference that remained, at preſent, was, That the ſtates would have their part ſigned in Holland; and monſieur de Torcy did not well know how this could be done, the French king having no miniſter there. I found monſieur de Torcy very well pleaſed; and, in caſe that matter is not otherwiſe agreed on, I could perceive, that would be no obſtruction; but the French king would ſend a perſon into Holland.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, March 31, 1700.

The treaty is come from Holland, though the counterpart be not yet, becauſe, as monſieur de Torcy ſaid, they could not tell, but the courier might have been ſtopped in Flanders; ſo they would not ſend them together. It does begin to take air, and count Zinzendorf has ſome notice of it, having diſcourſed to me of the ſeveral heads. I have been far from giving him any light into that matter; only ſo far, as I have often ſaid before, when I found him alarmed at the illneſs of the king of Spain: that I thought it would be happy for Europe, if there could be a compromiſe; but that that would very much depend on the emperor. He ſaid, I might be aſſured the emperor would agree to any thing, that was reaſonable. I avoided, always, going any further, without orders; though I cannot ſee, but he will be ſoon informed of this whole matter, whenever it is again propoſed at Vienna.

——— I do believe, this court will do what they can, in order to a peace in all parts. The reaſon why I think ſo, is, becauſe monſieur de Torcy ſays, It would be neceſſary, that moſt of the princes in Europe conſented to what is agreed on in England; which cannot be ſo well done, if they are in war one with another.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, May 8, 1700.

I deſired monſieur de Torcy would let me know, when he would mention the late treaty to the emperor's miniſter; and what meaſures they intended to take, that I might act conformable to them: He ſaid, he ſhould take no notice of it to him, till next Tueſday ſevennight: That they would ſend orders to monſieur de Villars (with a copy of the treaty) to communicate it to the emperor; and to ſend back the courier at the expiration of eight days, in caſe he had no anſwer, and to declare, that this king ſhall look upon it as a refuſal: That, leſt the emperor might engage the pope, the French embaſſador at Rome is to communicate it alſo, and to deſire it may be kept a ſecret: That they think proper to act in the ſame manner with the republic of Venice, and they will impart it to their embaſſador here about the ſame time they mention it to the emperor's miniſter. As for Spain, they thought it not yet proper. He ſaid, they ſhould now ſee the ſucceſs of this great affair, and the king would have the honour of it, and the caſe was extremely changed in two years: That the king had now all the obligations and intereſt to wiſh for the life and welfare of our king, aſſuring me of the great concern he was under ſometime this winter, when they heard from monſieur de Tallard, that he was a little indiſpoſed. This, I take it, is not unlikely, it being plainly their intereſt; elſe I ſhould not eaſily be perſuaded of their good intentions. I wiſh it was ſo elſewhere.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, May 19, 1700.

Yeſterday monſieur de Torcy acquainted the emperor's miniſter of the whole affair. He ſeemed mightily ſurprized, and complained much of the proceedings of our king, taking notice of the many engagements that have been made between his maſter and him. To which monſieur de Torcy anſwered, That he thought he had no reaſon to complain, after what had paſſed on that ſubject

They threw out frequent overtures, that his imperial majeſty was willing to take up with the Dauphin's ſhare of the partition, or to concert a new one with Lewis XIV, which ſhould coincide better with their reſpective intereſts. But whether theſe offers were deſpiſed at Verſailles, or the ſincerity of them ſuſpected, the marquis de Villars received no other inſtructions in anſwer to them, than that the king did not think it right to admit any alteration, without the conſent of his allies. The emperor's obſtinacy in rejecting the treaty, amazed all thoſe, who were acquainted with his circumſtances. His troops, if compleat, did not amount to ſeventy thouſand men; but, for want of recruits, they were far ſhort of that number. He was indebted between twenty and thirty millions of florins; and his chamber of finances had ſcarce credit enough to ſupply him with neceſſaries. It was generally believed, that he placed his chief reliance on the chapter of accidents, or on what the ſuperſtition of his family, or adulation of it's partizans, have ſtiled the miracle at Vienna, and that the emperor had been informed of every thing, that was now agreed to: that this matter was not of a new nature, for that there had been a ſecret treaty between the emperor and France concerning the ſucceſſion of Spain in 1668. When I ſaw monſieur de Torcy, he told me all that had paſſed, and I was glad to hear of this ſecret treaty, that being a good argument to monſieur de Zinzendorf, as you will find afterwards. He ſoon took notice of it to me, and began much in the ſame manner as with monſieur de Torcy. I told him, I wondered to ſee him ſo much ſurprized, ſince for ſome time he always aſſured me, there was ſuch a matter in agitation, and that it was concluded: that, if he would conſider a little, he would be convinced, that the king had not only conſidered the intereſt of Europe, but in particular that of the emperor: that what might be very doubtful, and even not likely to be obtained by a war, might now be ſecured by a peace if they pleaſed. He ſaid, What faith can be expected, if the Pyrenean treaty, and the renunciation, that France made, was not valid? To this I anſwered, That I believed that the emperor did not take it to be a full deciſion in relation to Spain; elſe he would not have made a ſecret treaty with France in 1668, wherein he yielded much more, as I was informed. I then proceeded to ſhew him the ſituation of affairs. I repreſented the power of France, the intereſt they have in Italy, as alſo in Spain; and beſides what he had often told me, that it was feared, that the Spaniards would declare themſelves for a prince of France; that I was of opinion, that he himſelf would think at laſt, that this was the only way to prevent it, and that they had it now in their power. Upon the whole matter he ſeemed partly convinced, and he begins now to think, that the king could obtain no better conditions, and that the only difficulty, that will remain, is what relates to Milan. I left him to judge, whether he thought the princes of Italy would be contented, that either France or the emperor was maſter there. After this diſcourſe he went again to monſieur de Torcy, and deſired a copy of the treaty, which he ſaid he would ſend him, and then made him ſome propoſals as from himſelf, that he might be the better able to inform his maſter; which he afterwards acquainted me with, and which I ſend your lordſhip in his own words, as well as I can remember them. He is now ſo apprehenſive leſt Spain ſhould declare for France, as you will ſee by the queſtions he aſked monſieur de Torcy, that he will do what he can for the treaty; and it is thought he is very well with the emperor. He ſends this day an expreſs to Vienna, and, I think, one to count Harrach in Spain, as does alſo the Spaniſh embaſſador, whom monſieur de Torcy has acquainted with the treaty, and given him a copy of it. He only ſaid, that it was a matter above his underſtanding, but he would not fail to inform his maſter of it. The Venetian embaſſador is alſo acquainted with it; and monſieur Calliere goes this week to the duke of Lorrain to notify it to him. So your lordſhip will judge it will not be long a ſecret.

Count Zinzendorf aſked monſieur de Torcy of his own accord, after the agreement betwixt England, France, and Holland had been ſhewn him:

'1. Whether France will conſent to the arch-duke's going into Spain, during the life of his catholic majeſty?'

Monſieur de Torcy's anſwer:

'France does conſent to it, on condition that the emperor does accept the conditions.'

'2. Whether, in caſe the Spaniards would make choice of a French prince within the given term of three months, it be agreed not to give ear to the propoſals of Spain?

'Yes, it is agreed.'

'3. That the ceſſion of the kingdom of Naples ought, in my opinion, to be underſtood as only to the deſcendants of queen Mary Tereſa; and that it is by no means to be incorporated with the crown nor the houſe of France?

'That this will be made eaſy, and that there will be no difficulties about it.'

'4. Whether there was any room to hope, that France would change or accommodate ſome thing in the treaty?'

'That the king was in ſo good a diſpoſition, that he would come into any thing; and that this treaty was not of that nature, that nothing could be changed in it, ſo it be done by the common conſent of England, France, and Holland.'

The earl of Jerſey to the earl of Mancheſter.

Hampton-court, May 13, 1700, O. S.

I have your letter of the 19th, and laid it before the king. His majeſty approves of what has been ſaid to count Zinzendorf, concerning the treaty, only as to the ſecond query:

'Whether, in caſe the Spaniards would make choice of a French prince within the given term of three months, it be agreed not to give ear to (attendre) the propoſals of Spain?

A. 'Yes it is agreed.'

'The ſenſe of theſe words is it not this? That, though the Spaniards ſhould, within the three months, propoſe to make choice of any prince of the houſe of Bourbon, yet the French ſhall not in that caſe hearken to ſuch a propoſition, but ſhall adhere to what is literally preſcribed in the treaty. Your lordſhip will ſee, in diſcourſing with monſieur Zinzendorf, if he does not underſtand it thus; and take care, that it be ſo explained to monſieur de Torcy, as to leave no room for any difficulty.'

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, May 26, 1700.

I have acquainted your lordſhip already, that the only diſcourſe we have here is concerning the treaty with England, and I have made ſome enquiry, which way it could come to be ſo ſoon public; and it happened thus: The king ſent for monſieur on Thurſday laſt, and informed him of it, and even of the particulars, ſaying it was no longer a ſecret, for he had informed moſt of the princes of Europe of it. This was ſufficient to make it known, and it was certainly deſigned ſo. It does occaſion different opinions, tho' I find, that the more they conſider, the more they approve of it. The Italian miniſters were the moſt alarmed by what the French are to have in Italy, with the ſeveral ports, which makes them maſters there whenever they pleaſe. But the chief point is, that all theſe places are annexed to the crown of France. They ſay, if they were to go to a younger ſon, that might make all that matter eaſy. We are to ſee here monſieur de Torcy to-morrow, the court being ſtill at Marly, and then I ſhall be better able to give you an account how affairs ſtand. I hear the Spaniſh embaſſador does act very prudently, and has ſoftened the matter as much as poſſible to the court of Spain.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, May 29, 1700.

I never fail, when the Miniſters here ſpeak of the king, to aſſure them of the particular eſteem he has for his moſt chriſtian majeſty, &c. and I had yeſterday a good opportunity of repeating it at a conference I had with monſieur de Torcy about the treaty, &c. I am of opinion, that the emperor's miniſter here will preſs that matter at the court of Vienna, he being more convinced than ever, that it is for his maſter's intereſt to agree to it; and monſieur de Torcy did own to me, that he found him much altered ſince the laſt time he ſaw him: and he told me of the propoſitions he had made him, and which I have already acquainted you with. The courier, which was ſent to monſieur de Villars, is expected back every day, and will give us ſome light as to which way this will turn. The duke of Lorrain has acceded, but it is at preſent a ſecret, as monſieur de Torcy ſays, becauſe he is willing to keep meaſures with the emperor, as you will be told by monſieur de Tallard, if he has not told you already.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, June 2, 1700.

I had the honour of your's of May the 13th, and am ſenſible the ſecond propoſition of monſieur de Zinzendorf might have been plainer by the word 'ecouter' inſtead of 'attendre;' but I was willing to keep his own words, not having then diſcourſed with monſieur de Torcy: though I now find his anſwer went further, and on that query he ſaid, 'provided the emperor within the term of three months ſigned and ratified; elſe they ſhould not think themſelves obliged.' This he added, in order to leave him in more doubt, which he thought was proper at preſent; though he ſaid it was not very likely the Spaniards would now be more their friends; and beſides, this king would keep ſtrictly to what is preſcribed by the treaty. I afterwards talked to monſieur Zinzendorf, who underſtands it in your lordſhip's ſenſe, and I did explain to him further what monſieur de Torcy had told me concerning that matter. At firſt he did not entirely agree to it, though there was little difference, ſo that there can be no ill conſequence from it; and this matter is ſo ſettled, that I hope the king will approve of it.

Monſieur de Torcy made ſome excuſe to me, and ſaid the time would not permit them to conſult firſt with the king in relation to the duke of Lorrain, and told me, they had ſent a project to be ſigned by him, and it was not convenient to let this matter cool: That ſome conditions were ſent, but ſuch as would cauſe no diſputes: As, 1. That the duke is not to quit Lorrain till he is in poſſeſſion of Milan. 2. That Milan ſhould go to his heirs and family, as Lorrain now does. 3. That the Dauphin ſhould renounce all his claim. 4. That they would not agree with the emperor till the inveſtiture from him was ſettled, if neceſſary, in relation to Milan. Monſieur de Tallard has a copy of this project; and, when it is ſigned, which will be very ſoon, it will be neceſſary, that the king and the States general ſhould ſign an act to confirm the ſame. Monſieur de Villars has communicated the treaty to the emperor, who declared in general terms, that he was very much inclined to the peace of Europe. By the couriers, which he was to ſend eight days after, he will explain that matter further. Monſieur de Torcy ſays, they have an anſwer from the French embaſſador at Rome, and the pope ſeems to approve of the treaty. After this he ſaid, it would be very convenient, England and France ſhould always act in concert in the affairs of Europe: and let fall ſome words, as if he underſtood there was a treaty on foot between England, the emperor, Denmark, and Poland: That the Daniſh miniſters had made ſeveral offers in England, &c. I told him, I thought there was nothing of that nature, and it was not very likely, becauſe we ſent our fleet to aſſiſt Sweden, which was in a manner declaring againſt Denmark and Poland: That I ſuppoſed their miniſter here had made propoſals to this court, at leaſt it was ſaid ſo. But, ſince the aſſurances he had given me, that no alliance or treaty ſhould be made with them, till matters were compoſed, without communicating it to the king my maſter, I was entirely ſatisfied, and I hoped he would be ſo likewiſe, reports of this nature being generally ſpread to create miſunderſtandings.

of the houſe of Auſtria. But the true ſpring of his refuſal was, that, in June this year, the king of Spain made a diſpoſition in favour of his ſecond ſon, which they knew at Vienna, and yet took no meaſures to render it effectual, by marching troops into Italy, or ſending the young archduke with a ſufficient force into Spain; both which ſchemes had been in agitation.

The affairs of Spain were all this ſummer in a terrible ferment. The king had frequent returns of his illneſs; and it was expected, that every relapſe would carry him off. The adminiſtration was in a moſt infeebled and disjointed ſtate; the nobility ſplit into factions; the people mutinous and diſcontented. On the firſt knowledge of the treaty, they appeared highly incenſed, that three foreign powers ſhould undertake to transfer their allegiance, and parcel out their dominions. They conſidered a partition as the greateſt diminution of the ſplendor and ſtrength of the Spaniſh monarch. The grandees, in particular, could not endure to be deprived of ſo many lucrative governments; and it was the univerſal cry, that France alone could maintain their ſucceſſion entire, and recover them out of the calamity, to which they were reduced. It is the common opinion, that the ſeeds of this great revolution were laid by the capacity and addreſs of the marquis d'Harcourt, during his embaſſy at Madrid in

The ſecret treaty of 1668, was ſigned by the father of count Averſperg, who is now with you. The emperor then conſented, that France ſhould have Naples and Sicily, all Flanders and the Philippine iſlands. Count Zinzendorf ſays he was baniſhed for that reaſon.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, June 9, 1700.

The courier, which monſieur de Villars was to ſend back from Vienna eight days after his arrival, is come back. Monſieur de Villars writes, that he had diſcourſed with count Caunitz; that he was preſſed to ſtay ſome days before he ſent back the courier; that, when they found he could not do it, they let him know, that the emperor would, in ten days time, give him a poſitive anſwer; and that he would not take any meaſures with Spain; and they believed it would be ſuch an anſwer, as he would think worth ſending by another expreſs. So they think here, this matter is in a good way. He told me further, that the duke of Lorrain deſired an explanation concerning the ſovereignty of Bich, which, by the treaty, is to go to the prince of Vaudemont; that the duke had reaſons to think he had no right to it at preſent, and therefore whatever he ſigned would not prejudice his title, till the treaty took place. This we have allowed him, and they underſtand that the prince of Vaudemont is to have the ſovereignty, when the exchange is made. Monſieur de Torcy took notice to me again, that the French king would act in nothing without conſulting the king, and he ſuppoſed he was fully ſatisfied of it, and that he approved of what had been done. I thought it proper to aſſure him of it, &c. It is certain, the credit and reputation of the king was never ſo great here, as it is now. Though I can never be perſuaded they love him, yet I am confident they eſteem him, and deſire his friendſhip. I muſt tell your lordſhip, all agree, that the duke of Savoy is rightly ſerved. His miniſter here is very uneaſy.

Mr. James Creſſet to the earl of Mancheſter.

Hamburg, June 14, 1700.

The late league concerning the Spaniſh ſucceſſion makes a great noiſe in the world. If the emperor be pleaſed, it is no great matter what others ſay or do.

Mr. Paul Methuen to Mr. Abraham Stanyan.

Liſbon, June 15, 1700.

We are likely to have a more buſy ſcene of affairs than has been uſual; for, the laſt day of May, there arrived a courier in eleven days from Verſailles to the French embaſſador; which is an extraordinary diligence. The day after his arrival, the embaſſador deſired a ſecret audience of the king, which being granted, he remained an hour in private with him, nobody being in the room but the king and himſelf; during which he ſhewed him the treaty in French, that was ſigned by the earls of Portland and Jerſey, count de Tallard, count de Briord, and eight Dutch plenipotentiaries, for the dividing the Spaniſh monarchy between the archduke and the Dauphin, if the king of Spain ſhould die without any children. After he had ſhewed the treaty, and explained the contents of it, he made a ſpeech to invite him into it, ſetting out his maſter's great kindneſs ſhewed to the king of Portugal on this occaſion, in giving him ſo ſudden notice of what concerned ſo nearly the intereſt of this kingdom. The embaſſador received no anſwer from the king at his audience; ſo he diſpatched back the courier to give his maſter an account, that he had obeyed his orders; and four days after he ſent one of his ſervants poſt with the anſwer he received from the duke of Cadaval, his commiſſary, which was, that, this being a buſineſs of great conſequence, it required ſome time to conſider of it; and that in the mean time the king returned his moſt Chriſtian majeſty thanks for this particular demonſtration of his kindneſs, and aſſured him, that nobody could deſire more earneſtly than he, whatſoever was for the good and peace of Chriſtendom. By this anſwer it ſeems probable, that the king of Portugal will not take any reſolution of being comprehended in the treaty, until he ſees what the emperor does; and that, in order to it, he will wait for count Wallenſtein, who has been ſome time at Madrid, and is expected here in a few days, the king's barges being already gone to wait for him on the other ſide of the river.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, June 16, 1700.

I find the French deſign very ſoon to communicate the treaty in all parts, ſa monſieur de Torcy ſays, ſince England ſays there is no occaſion of deferring it, eſpecially in thoſe parts of Germany, where the king has no miniſters; but, where he has, it is neceſſary they ſhould all act at the ſame time. The French intend and think it convenient to do it to the prince of Heſſe-Darmſtadt and the duke of Saxe-Gotha, who were forgot. As for the elector of Hanover and Bavaria, they leave that to us, the elector of Hanover not being yet owned as ſuch by this court. The French miniſter at Mantua is to have orders to communicate it there and at Parma, &c. And they have given their order for Turin. The duke of Lorrain has not yet ſigned, though he pretends he will. He has called a council of twelve perſons, ſince which he has deſired many explanations from this court to what concerns his own country, that ſo they may have the ſame privileges when under France. Some are allowed, but he deſires alſo not to be a guarantee of the treaty, which deſire is of ſuch a nature, that it cannot be agreed to. We ſhall ſoon find, whether all this is not to gain time, and to ſee what the emperor will do.

Mr. Robert Sutton to the earl of Mancheſter.

Vienna, June 19, 1700.

Underſtanding, that it would not be unacceptable to your excellency to know what meaſures the emperor takes in relation to the treaty newly concluded with France, I could not but rejoice at an occaſion of doing your lordſhip any pleaſure, and take the liberty to acquaint you, that the emperor has not hitherto taken any reſolutions touching the treaty. All that has been declared is, that the emperor, for reaſons very well known, thought himſelf obliged to communicate with Spain, which is the party moſt concerned in his opinion, and that afterwards he would return an anſwer; which perhaps we may be forced to wait for till towards the end of the term allowed him. In the mean time your excellency will eaſily judge the agreements to be very unwelcome to this court. Some of the miniſters do not hide their high diſlike of it. But nevertheleſs, though they do not explain themſelves, I believe it is paſt a doubt, that the emperor will at length enter into it. The neceſſity of it is very clear, and will be often repeated to them.

Mr. Stanhope to the earl of Mancheſter.

Hague, June 24, 1700.

Here is a perfect good underſtanding between the French embaſſador, the count de Briort, and me. I diſpatched two days ago by his courier copies of the late treaty about the Spaniſh ſucceſſion to our miniſters at Hamburg, Copenhagen, Sweden, and Berlin, to be communicated to thoſe princes, with inſtructions to endeavour to perſuade them to approve and enter into the guarantee for executing it. I am told your excellency has done the ſame to Mr. Methuen in Portugal.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, June 26, 1700.

The court being at Marly, monſieur de Torcy came on Thurſday laſt to Paris, and in the conference I had with him, he told me, that the duke of Lorrain had himſelf ſigned the treaty with monſieur de Calliere, and at the ſame time had wrote to the French king, that, notwithſtanding he did not inſiſt on the ſeveral explanations, and the propoſals he had made, yet he hoped they would be granted him. The chief point, and which he deſires moſt, is, that he may not be looked upon as a guarantee, ſince he had neither troops nor money to maintain it, in caſe of a war. Beſides, to act againſt the emperor, he thought, was what in gratitude he ought not to do. It was not proper to allow him this, as I take it, for very good reaſons, ſince it would have been an example to others to make the ſame difficulty, and eſpecially to thoſe, who have not the ſame advantage by this treaty. Yet it is explained to him, that it is not expected he ſhall give any other aſſiſtance than a free paſſage through his country, in the ſame manner as he is already obliged to do by the treaty of Ryſwick. He alſo conſents to ſend ſome full power to ſign it at the Hague, as I underſtand the king deſires. Moſt of the other things he deſires, and of which I think I formerly acquainted you, relate to his own country, when it ſhall be ſubject to France, and moſt of this is granted him. It was well he did not ſtay for an anſwer from Vienna; for, as I perceive, there is but little inclination there to agree to the treaty, as it is now; for, I take it, you will ſee them play another ſort of game. Monſieur de Zinzendorf's courier is returned, and he told me, that his orders were to aſſure me, that his maſter was as much inclined as any body to preſerve the peace of Europe: but, as the treaty was communicated in Spain, he could not come to any reſolution, till he had heard from thence. I did perceive there was ſomething more, and eſpecially ſince I ſaw him ſo impatient to ſee monſieur de Torcy, which he did preſs very much; and he ſaw him on Tueſday at a houſe near Marly, where he told him, he had orders from the emperor to offer the Dauphin, inſtead of what he was to have in Italy, the Weſt-Indies. Monſieur de Torcy ſaid (as he tells me, and I cannot but think this court will act ſincerely) that the propoſition was of ſuch a nature, that he did not think it proper to acquaint the king with it, neither could he imagine that England and Holland could agree to it. To which monſieur Zinzendorf anſwered, That France was able to maintain it by their fleets and troops, if they would accept of it. When he found this would not do, then he propoſed, as from himſelf, that France ſhould have Sardinia and Luxemburg, in lieu of Lorrain, and the emperor Milan. This was as extraordinary as the other. At laſt he ſaid, it was impoſſible for the emperor to agree to the ninth article, viz. That the kingdom of Spain ſhall never deſcend to any one, who ſhall be at the ſame time emperor or king of France, &c. After ſome further arguments, that paſſed, monſieur de Torcy aſked, Whether the emperor would ſign the treaty, in caſe this article was ſuppreſſed? He could not ſay any thing poſitively to that. I cannot tell but France would be eaſy enough in this alteration; but I take it to be againſt the intereſt of Europe to have it ſo. When monſieur de Torcy acquainted me with this, I told him, that what he had propoſed, was, in my opinion, of great conſequence, and was very unlikely to be agreed to by whoever 1698; and that he found means to gain over the cardinal Portocarrero, the marquis de Monterey, and de los Balbazes, beſides ſeveral others of the principal nobility, lawyers, and men of note in Spain. However this may be, it is certain, the miſmanagements of the preſent reign, and the rapacious and violent carriage of the queen Mariana, aunt to the arch-duke Charles, had entirely alienated the hearts of the whole nation from the Germans; and that they were diſpoſed to receive with open arms a grandſon of Lewis XIV, provided they were aſſured of never becoming a province to France. Nor did the reflection, that a prince of the Auſtrian line muſt owe his chief ſupport to heretics, carry a ſmall weight along with it in the minds of a ſuperſtitious people. Portocarrero for the repoſe of the king's conſcience, which ſometimes ſuggeſted to him the unnatural part he was about to act, in depriving his own family of their juſt rights, adviſed him to conſult the pope on this momentous point of regulating the ſucceſſion. Innocent XII, who was firmly attached to France, after taking the opinion of a college of cardinals, determined againſt the validity of queen Maria Tereſa's renunciation, as being founded on compulſion, and contrary to the fundamental laws of the Spaniſh monarchy; and exhorted his catholic majeſty to make his will in favour of one of the French king's grandſons, by which he would effectually con-

whoever might approve the treaty. Spain might then poſſibly be joined to the Empire, &c. He did own it would have difficulties, and ſaid, the French king would not hearken to any propoſal but by common conſent. I muſt take notice to your lordſhip, that monſieur de Villars was only acquainted with the firſt propoſition, viz. that of the Indies, and even that was not communicated to Mr. Hop. I have not taken any notice of all this matter to monſieur de Zinzendorf, nor do I intend it; though monſieur de Torcy ſaid, I might as to the firſt propoſal, he having declared he made it by order. Monſieur de Torcy then told me, that the treaty had been communicated to the king of Portugal, who talked of it, as if he never could conſent to it; and accordingly the French miniſter there ſent away on the 4th inſtant the courier. When the king perceived this, he ſoon changed his mind, and ſo another was diſpatched, by whom he agrees entirely to the treaty on the following conditions.

1. If the emperor does not conſent within the time limited, that then he may be one in the naming of another prince.

2. That he may have two places yielded to him, that formerly belonged to Portugal; One was Alcantara, but I do not remember the other.

3. That, if he be attacked by reaſon of the treaty, thoſe, who are concerned in it, ſhall be obliged to aſſiſt him.

Monſieur de Torcy did ſeem to think it was worth granting him theſe terms, ſince it was the only way to engage him heartily in it; and, as for the firſt article, there would be ſtill three againſt one. The ſame courier brought letters from Madrid with this account, that the council, that had been aſſembled upon the notification of the treaty, where the king was not preſent, had agreed, that the beſt advice they could give the king, was, that he ſhould declare a prince of France for his ſucceſſor; the count d' Aguilar being the only one that did not conſent to it: that the queen had preſſed the king to diſapprove this reſolution, which he would not do; and that as yet he had not declared himſelf. The count de Harrach had diſcourſed with ſeveral of them, and eſpecially with the cardinal Portocarrero, and others, whom he thought in the emperor's intereſt; and they all anſwered, that it was the only advice they could give their king.

This matter is not yet public here, Monſieur de Torcy thinks it proper, that our envoy in Switzerland ſhould have orders to ſpeak privately to ſeveral of the chief of them, and ſay, it is expected they do give leave to any troops to paſs their country in caſe of a war, this king intending to give the ſame inſtructions to monſieur de Puyſieux, and order him to ſay, that they were to obſerve the ſame method our king had done, and not to mention this matter in public.

The earl of Mancheſter to Sir Lambert Blackwell, envoy at Florence.

Paris, July 3, 1700.

I have received the incloſed from my lord Jerſey, and have taken this way of ſending it you by a courier, who brings orders of the ſame nature to the French envoy. I ſuppoſe you will find you are to act jointly, and to take your meaſures together. It is in relation to the late treaty with France concerning the ſucceſſion of Spain. I cannot tell how acceptable it will be to the great duke.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, July 7, 1700.

I ſuppoſe the pacquet was gone before your's of the 20th of June came to Whitehall, becauſe it came by itſelf, and I did not receive it, till I was returned from Verſailles, ſo that I could not diſcourſe with monſieur de Torcy concerning thoſe matters. He told me however, as to what you write in relation to the ninth article, that he had mentioned it to monſieur de Zinzendorf, who had promiſed to ſend immediately a courier to Vienna, for he had no poſitive orders to ſay, that this was the only point the emperor inſiſted on. M. de Zinzendorf alſo took notice of it to me, and ſays he will do what lies in his power. I muſt tell your lordſhip, that he does what he can to be well here, and endeavours to procure merit to himſelf both with the emperor and this court.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, July 8, 1700.

Monſieur de Torcy has aſked me, if the king approved of the manner, in which they have communicated the treaty. I ſaid I had no reaſon to think otherwiſe. This may be occaſioned by what monſieur de Zinzendorf may have ſaid to him, for he has as good as told me, that in England it was not liked, that the treaty ſhould be made ſo public. Monſieur de Zinzendorf is of opinion, that the king of Spain will never declare for a prince of France, but rather for the arch-duke. This we ſhall now ſoon ſee. The Spaniſh embaſſador has as yet received no orders, and carries himſelf in the ſame manner as he did before the treaty.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Sutton at Vienna.

I am obliged to you for your letting me know what thoughts they have where you are concerning the treaty, and I find you write much the ſame with what they have here from thence. I cannot but think the emperor will judge ſo well of his own intereſt as to accept it at laſt, eſpecially, when he ſees Spain is inclined to ſettle the whole ſucceſſion on a prince of France, which I ſuppoſe you have heard of. All the council, except count d'Aguilar, were of opinion, that the beſt advice they could give the king, at this juncture of affairs, was for him to declare the duke of Anjou his ſucceſſor. I cannot tell but this may make ſome alterations at your court, and bring them to a ſpeedy reſolution. I am told, that count Caunitz is ill, and that this makes the affairs not ſo well as otherwiſe they would.

Mr. Sutton to the earl of Mancheſter.

Vienna, July 10, 1700.

As to the treaty of regulation of the Spaniſh ſucceſſion, I have only to acquaint your lordſhip, that this court will not return any poſitive anſwer yet. They have received newly a courier from Spain, but will not diſcover what diſpatches he has brought, and conceal their intentions as much as they can till the return of their own courier from Madrid, alledging, they can ground nothing upon the advices they have hitherto received thence. However, it may be preſumed, that they will accept the treaty, though it be very diſpleaſing to them. They take no viſible meaſures to prevent the execution of it; from whence one may reaſonably conclude, they ſee the neceſſity of admitting it; and one cannot wonder at their managing the affections of the Spaniards.

P. S. I thought not to conceal from your excellency, that it appears pretty plainly, that this court would abſolutely reject the treaty, if they had any hopes of bettering themſelves: But, eſteeming the buſineſs irrecoverably concluded on our ſide, and not knowing how to remedy it, they are likely to turn their thoughts more upon the ways of preſerving what is allotted them, than upon catching at the ſhadow, and leaving the ſubſtance, eſpecially if the Spaniards will comply therewith.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, July 17, 1700.

The laſt time I ſaw monſieur de Torcy, he told me (which he ſaid was forgot) that it would be proper that I ſhould have orders to take notice of the treaty concerning the ſucceſſion of Spain, to thoſe Italian miniſters, that come from courts, where our king has none, and to deſire their maſters to enter into the treaty, as France has already done, as a means to ſecure the peace of Europe. I ſaid I had no orders, but that I would write about it. As to Modena, I thought it was not proper for me to take notice of, which he agreed in; ſo that there are Savoy, Venice, Mantua, and Genoa. I intend to ſpeak again to monſieur de Torcy, and have a further explanation.

I ſend you a letter from monſieur d'Hervaert, who has communicated the treaty: Monſieur de Torcy tells me, that it is thought, that the Swiſs Cantons will hardly enter into the Guaranty, but they may conſent to have troops raiſed in their country, in caſe of a war. On that occaſion, he ſaid alſo, that he had ſent to the French embaſſador in Portugal a copy of the treaty to be ſigned by that king, in the manner it was agreed to in England. He tells me, that the duke of Savoy anſwered with great profeſſions, but in general terms, when the treaty was communicated to him. That the French embaſſador there had now orders to let him know, that, the king his maſter had reaſon to hope he might have had a more poſitive anſwer from him, eſpecially ſince there was a diſcourſe, as if he had made a treaty with the emperor: Which, as he did not believe, ſo it was neceſſary ſuch diſcourſes ſhould be diſcouraged, and that the world ſhould ſee the contrary. That, as for monſieur de la Tour's going to England, the French king was glad, that he took all the ways to cultivate the friendſhip of the king of England. This will certainly put him on ſome difficulties how to explain himſelf.

Mr. John Robinſon to Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Malmo, July 7-18, 1700.

I have ſeen a letter from the king of Spain to the king of Sweden, giving him an account of the treaty made about the ſucceſſion to his dominions; but only adding, that it is a matter of great importance, and that he (the king of Spain) is deliberating upon it. They intend, I think, to anſwer, that the king of Sweden will do ſo too.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, July 23, 1700.

Monſieur de la Tour is here; and, as ſoon as he has waited on this king, he intends for Holland. I have ſeen him; and, by his diſcourſe, I find he does not think to go into England, when the king returns; though the Savoy embaſſador, here, told me, That he was to reſide there; and ſo he told this court. It will depend much on the ſucceſs of what he goes about; and, I muſt tell you, that it occaſions many conjectures here, eſpecially, ſince it is known, that the duke of Savoy has, of late, ſent many expreſſes to Vienna, which this court does not like: And, I have reaſon to think, it will preſs him to declare, what his intentions are; it being his misfortune to be ſo well known, tribute to the propagation of the faith, and the repoſe of Chriſtendom. As ſoon as this infallible deciſion was procured, the cardinal of Toledo redoubled his efforts, to perſuade his maſter to act in conformity to it; who accordingly ſigned his teſtamentary diſpoſition, in the beginning of October, N. S.

With regard to the conduct of the French king, whilſt this tranſaction was depending, it is too extraordinary not to be a little inſiſted on. Some have thought, and not without ſufficient grounds of probability, that in the propoſal and concluſion of this partition, his ſincerity ought to be unqueſtioned; and that he really conſidered it at that time as more for the immediate intereſt of his crown, to annex to it for ever thoſe dominions, which were to be given him as an equivalent for the Dauphin's pretenſions, than to put his grandſon in poſſeſſion of the whole monarchy. But the emperor's unexpected refuſal of his concurrence, the abhorrence, which the Spaniards ſhewed for being diſmembered, and, above all, a perſuaſion, that England would not renew the war, induced him to break through his engagements, by accepting the will. We muſt however confeſs, that it has been the more prevailing opinion, that his moſt Chriſtian majeſty meant only to deceive and amuſe from the beginning, and made uſe of what was his own propoſition, as an argument to perſuade known, that it will be hard for him to play the ſame game over again. His embaſſador, here, is much dejected; and, at the laſt conference I had with monſieur de Torcy, he was ſeen to come from him in great diſorder. It was eaſy to imagine, that this was occaſioned by what I have mentioned to you.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, July 24, 1700.

As to the affairs of the North, I cannot ſee, but this court is as deſirous as we to accommodate them, at leaſt, in outward appearance, they are ſo: Beſides, I take it to be their intereſt, ſince the king of Denmark is willing to enter into the treaty concerning the ſucceſſion of Spain.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, July 28, 1700.

Monſieur de la Tour leaves this place in a few days; and you are not like to ſee him in England; neither does he propoſe to ſtay above three weeks in Holland. His buſineſs there is to lay before the king the great debts, that are due from the king of Spain to the duke of Savoy. He had an audience from this king; and aſſured him, That his maſter has no engagements with the emperor; nor does he in the leaſt diſpute the right of the Dauphin. I find this court is ſatisfied, now, with his going; and will be glad to help him; though, if he acts otherwiſe, they will ſoon find him out.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, July 30, 1700.

The letters from Spain of the 17th bring nothing very conſiderable; only, that the great men there are ſtill inclined for a prince of France, that ſo their monarchy may not be divided. The king of Spain has his health better than ever, as they pretend.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Sutton.

Paris, July 30, 1700.

I had the favour of your's, of the 16th; and, I find, that, where you are, matters are ſtill uncertain. The emperor muſt now ſoon come to ſome reſolution. His courier, that went to Spain, paſſed, lately, here, in his return to Vienna; and, it is thought, that, in caſe the king of Spain is not inclined to declare the archduke his ſucceſſor, the emperor will ſign the treaty. I am of opinion, that the reſolutions of Spain, whatever they be, will not ſignify much, they being not in a condition to ſupport them: And it is certain, that the great men, there, are almoſt all for a prince of France, for the whole ſucceſſion; and they would not have the monarchy divided; and think, if the French would accept it, they are able to maintain it better than the emperor. I wiſh your court [of Vienna] may ſee ſo well their intereſt, as not to loſe this opportunity, by putting it out of the power of the king, our maſter, to help them; which muſt certainly be the conſequence, if they do not accede.

Sir Lambert Blackwell to the earl of Mancheſter.

Florence, July 30, 1700.

I wrote to your excellency, the 23d, adviſing what paſſed at my audience with the great duke; and, at midnight (after the poſt was diſpatched) I received from cavalier Montemagni, ſecretary of ſtate, a few lines; bringing me his highneſs's anſwer. Copies of both I incloſe, by which your excellency will find the great duke expreſſes himſelf very much obliged to his majeſty; but ſeeks to gain time, by his general anſwer, without mentioning, whether he will, or not, inter into the guaranty of the treaty: My opinion being, that his highneſs is willing firſt to know, what the emperor and Venetians reſolve; and accordingly will take his meaſures. I do likewiſe ſend your excellency a copy of his highneſs's anſwer to the French envoy; being much to the ſame purpoſe, which the envoy diſpatched to his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, by a courier extraordinary; and till the return (which, he tells me, may be in fifteen days) will move no farther. I muſt alſo wait his majeſty's commands; though I intended to let the ſecretary of ſtate know, that my hopes were, his highneſs would have been more particular.

Mr. James Creſſet to the earl of Mancheſter.

Hamburg, July 30, 1700.

Your excellency plainly ſees the tricking of the Daniſh court, in ſhuffling the king our maſter into a mediation, to elude the force of his guaranty. Count Chamilly juggles to ſerve the court, where he reſides; which ſubſiſts only upon poor ſhifts and lyes. If our Spaniſh treaty cannot find better and ſurer ſupports than at Copenhagen, I ſhall be ſorry for it. Your excellency may pleaſe to acquaint the French miniſtry (if you think fit) That, notwithſtanding all the confidence the Daniſh court has in their embaſſador, the count Chamilly, it has made a myſtery to him of a letter lately ſent from the king of Spain to the king of Denmark, upon the ſubject of our late treaty: And this matter came out by accident, at ſupper, at my houſe, two nights ago; where I had only count Chamilly and the Spaniſh miniſter.

Monſieur d'Hervaert to the earl of Mancheſter.

Berne, Aug. 1, 1700.

You have ſeen, by my laſt letter to my lord Jerſey, which I took the liberty to ſend you unſealed, what I had done, purſuant to the orders of the king, about the treaty of ſucceſſion of Spain, which you had the goodneſs to ſend me. I communicated it, in conjunction with M. de Puyſieux, to the cantons aſſembled by their deputies; he and I having invited them to enter into it, and to ſubſcribe the guaranty. Their anſwer was ſuch as we foreſaw; that is, the deputies promiſed, that each would make a report to its ſovereign. It is eaſy to judge, that they will endeavour to gain as much time as they can. As the diet is finiſhed, we can have no poſitive anſwer from the Cantons; but, at another, which muſt be called on purpoſe: And we intend to puſh for it, when we ſhall think it a fit time. If we cannot perſuade them to engage themſelves, in form, in the guaranty for the execution of the treaty, we flatter ourſelves, that we ſhall, at leaſt, obtain, that they will not permit that the troops, which the emperor might ſend to oppoſe it, ſhall paſs. At this we work with all our might: that is, M. de Puyſieux and I; as alſo M. de Valkenier; who is arrived in Switzerland within theſe eight days, to aſſiſt us, by order of the States General, his maſters.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Aug. 11, 1700.

An expreſs arrived yeſterday from Madrid, in his way to Vienna. He brings no further account of the queen of Spain's being with child; yet count Harrach had complimented her upon the report; which, ſome think, he might as well have let alone. Her anſwer to him was, That God would do what he pleaſed. I find, that, in Spain, they are reſolved to court the king, our maſter. Schonenberg has been admitted to an audience of the king; and what paſſed, in relation to Canales, in England, will be forgot, and another will be named. Don Quiros is certainly ordered to return to the Hague. All this matter has been brought about by the queen: and it is ſaid, that our king has wrote to her; which has produced this good effect. In ſhort, the Spaniſh embaſſador here takes all occaſions to oblige me; which I return in the ſame manner. They find it their intereſt to be well with England.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, Aug. 13, 1700.

The emperor's envoy has received a courier from Spain; whom he diſpatched the ſame day, for Vienna. He aſſures me, That monſieur Schonenberg has had an audience of the king of Spain: That don Quiros has orders to go to the Hague; and that they will take no further notice of the affair of monſieur de Canales, but intend ſoon to name an embaſſador to the king. The only meaſure, they ſeem to have taken, is to put themſelves in a poſture of defence.

Mr. Methuen to the earl of Mancheſter.

Liſbon, Aug. 15, 1700.

This goes by a courier, which the French embaſſador ſends, to give his maſter an account, that he has concluded a treaty of guaranty with this court; by which the king of Portugal is obliged to maintain the late treaty of repartition, and the execution of it.

Aug. 18, 1700.

I have been forced to break open my letters, to acquaint your lordſhip, that the French embaſſador told me, poſitively, he had ſigned the treaty, the 15th; yet he did not, having obſerved, juſt as he was going to ſign, that the Portugueſe had, in one of the articles, inſerted a clauſe, by which they might afterwards pretend, that they were not obliged to make war on the emperor, or Spain, until they began it. This occaſioned a diſpute between the embaſſador and the Portugueſe commiſſioners; but all was, at laſt, accommodated to the ſatisfaction of the embaſſador, and the treaty ſigned this evening.

Mr. ſecretary Vernon to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, Aug. 5, 1700, N. S.

I received, yeſterday, your excellency's letter, of the 11th inſtant. That the Spaniards are ſo obliging, of late, does not proceed from his majeſty's having writ to them; but, I rather think, they are endeavouring to create jealouſies and ſuſpicions between us and France; and that they have a mind to have a miniſter here, next winter, to blow the coals in parliament, if he can, and to perſuade people to find fault with the treaty about the ſucceſſion

Charles II, to leave the duke of Anjou his ſole heir. Let this be as it will, the treaty was no ſooner ratified, than his miniſters at foreign courts co-operated with thoſe of England and the States-general, in puſhing the acceptance of it; and when king William, having received ſome intelligence of Harcourt's negotiation, expoſtulated with him upon it by letter, the French king not only denied his knowing any thing of the matter, but declared under his own hand, in a letter to the king, that, though a will ſhould be made in favour of his family, he would take no advantage of it, but adhere to the partition. Nay further, when count Zinzendorf, the imperial miniſter at Paris, demanded in a memorial, What part France would act, in caſe Spain ſhould voluntarily place a grandſon of the French king on the throne? Monſieur de Torcy returned anſwer in writing, that it would by no means be liſtened to: And to the very laſt moment the court of Verſailles expreſſed, in all their ſteps, a fixed reſolution of adhering to the treaty.

When the ſecret of the partition was divulged in England, it was preſently writ and talked into an unpopular meaſure, though viſibly the only one, that could be taken to prevent a new war, in which the nation then ſeemed unwilling or unable to engage. The different cenſures it underwent were, that ſo important an affair ought not to have been concluded without the advice of parliament: That it was contrary to the firſt ſeparate article of the alliance: That, unleſs concerted with the king of Spain, it was unjuſt in the contrivance, and hazardous in the execution: That the terms, to their dominions: But, I ſuppoſe, we ſhall be very well contented, that the peace of Europe may be preſerved upon theſe terms.

The report of the queen of Spain's being with-child, I conceive, is the more cheriſhed, that it may give the emperor a pretence for returning no anſwer, whether he will come into the late treaty, or not. The three months, propoſed for his declaring himſelf, are, now, near expired; and we hear nothing more from Vienna, but that a certain courier, they expect from Madrid, is not yet arrived. In the mean time, we hear, the French ſquadrons, under the command of Neſmont and Pointi, are like to join. One would be glad to know what they are deſigned for. It is ſaid, they will winter at Cadiz, if they do not make themſelves maſters of Gibraltar.

Mr. Sutton, to the earl of Mancheſter.

Newſtadt, Aug. 17, 1700.

I am ſorry to acquaint your excellency, that the reſolution we have ſo long expected from the emperor, in relation to the treaty for regulating the ſucceſſion of Spain, is not ſuch as was deſired. Count Harrach has, to-day, acquainted the M. de Villars, and monſieur Hop, ſeparately, That he was commanded by the emperor, to impart to them, for their maſters information, that his Imperial majeſty, conſidering the king of Spain to be in good health, and of ſuch an age, that he might very well, with the bleſſing of God, hope for iſſue of his own, did not think it becoming, eſpecially him, that was his uncle, to make a diviſion of his ſucceſſion. He added to the M. Villars, That the emperor hoped this anſwer would not interrupt the good intelligence between himſelf and his moſt Chriſtian majeſty; and that he would not proceed to the nomination of a third, which would but embroil matters the more: That, when the ſucceſſion happened to fall, the emperor thought it juſtly belonged to him; and, after the extinction of the male line of the houſe of Auſtria, to the duke of Savoy, according to Philip the IVth's will. He told monſieur Hop alſo, That the emperor deſired to continue in a good underſtanding with the king and the States-General. I cannot ſee count Harrach to-night; but ſhall, doubtleſs, receive the ſame anſwer from him to-morrow. If there be any thing different in it, I will acquaint your lordſhip with it, by the firſt opportunity. Your excellency is much abler than I am, to judge of the conſequences of the emperor's reſolution. He certainly reckons upon the friendſhip of the Spaniſh court; but, althongh he be ſure of it, I cannot ſee how it will anſwer the expectation he may have of it; or, what other means he has, to hinder the performance of the agreement already made.

The earl of Mancheſter, to Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, Aug. 20, 1699.

In the conferences I had with monſieur de Torcy, he told me what had paſſed at the audience, which the Spaniſh embaſſador had ſome days ago. The ſubſtance of it was to diſſuade the king from proceeding any further in the treaty concerning the ſucceſſion. He ſaid, that the king his maſter was like to live a long time; that his health was better than ever it was; that he had named no perſon to ſucceed him, nor would he. The king anſwered, that nobody wiſhed more for his maſter's health than himſelf: That all men are mortal: That he had no other deſign in what he had done but the peace of Europe. The Spaniſh embaſſador diſcourſed afterwards with monſieur de Torcy, who took notice to him, that the reſolutions, that were taken in Spain about ſuppreſſing all penſions, were in order to maintain a conſiderable number of forces, which might create jealouſies, eſpecially if they were foreign troops. To which he anſwered, that they had been long enough the jeſt of Europe, by having their affairs in ſo ill a condition; that every man was maſter in his own country, &c. I find by monſieur de Torcy, that the French are apprehenſive, that the emperor's troops are to go to Milan and Naples; and he ſaid it had been already propoſed to the republic of Venice to paſs twenty thouſand men through their territories; and, if ſo, he thought it would be neceſſary, that the French troops, that are near Catalonia, ſhould have orders to march to the frontiers of Spain; not that he believed there would be any occaſion of proceeding further, but that this would be ſufficient to hinder the Germans from going into Italy. This he deſired the king ſhould know. I am ſatisfied, that there is ſomething of this nature in hand by what monſieur Zinzendorf lets fall ſometimes in his diſcourſes. Monſieur de Torcy ſaid, that they intended to preſs for the emperor's anſwer concerning the treaty, and that it would be convenient we ſhould do it alſo.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, Aug. 27, 1700.

Monſieur de Torcy acquainted me yeſterday with the anſwer the emperor has given to monſieur de Villars. He refuſes to enter into a treaty concerning the ſucceſſion of Spain, as long as the king of Spain lives; and hopes they will not proceed to the naming of another prince, which may have ill conſequences, and oblige him to take meaſures to defend his right. He ſaid, had he ſeen me in the morning, he ſhould have complained very much of the coolneſs and indifference they ſhewed in Holland in this affair. That though monſieur de Tallard did aſſure them, the emperor had concerted with Spain that his troops were to march into Italy; yet it was not thought fit to take any meaſures to prevent it; but that, by the letter he juſt then received from monſieur Tallard, he ſees and tells me, that the king our maſter does agree, that both in Spain and Vienna their miniſters ſhall have orders to declare againſt it. This court does intend to preſs the duke of Savoy to enter into a treaty with France, if he is not already engaged with the emperor. It cannot be his intereſt to have the German troops ſo near him; and, in caſe he refuſes France, it will be demonſtration; that he is acting otherwiſe than he has aſſured them.

Mr. Robinſon to the earl of Mancheſter.

Helſingburg, Aug. 25. 1700, O. S.

The acceſſion of this crown [of Sweden] to the treaty about the Spaniſh ſucceſſion goes very ſlowly forward, and theſe miniſters ſeem to think the circumſtances of their affairs ought to excuſe them at preſent from taking part in it, ſince the emperor has ſo many ways to incommode them, eſpecially while the war, the king of Poland has begun againſt them, continues. They ſeem much perſuaded, that their friends will not preſs them to expoſe themſelves, but rather firſt help them to a ſtate of ſafety, and then they ſhall be in a condition to make returns.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, Sept. 17, 1730.

Yeſterday I ſaw monſieur de Torcy. I do find by him, that they are well ſatisfied with the proceedings in Holland in relation to the great affair, and I do like the propoſal to engage thoſe, that will not enter into the guaranty to be neuter. I did hear from other parts, that the French miniſters were uneaſy, and of opinion, that we did not act fairly: but I aſſure you, that they have no ſuch thoughts here at preſent.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Sept. 18, 1700.

I can now aſſure you, that this court is entirely ſatisfied with the proceedings in Holland, in relation to the treaty, and there are no grounds for what is ſaid in other parts. I do not doubt but that there are too many, that would have it otherwiſe; but I am of opinion, that it is not in their power to effect it.

Monſieur Schonenberg to the earl of Mancheſter.

Madrid, September 23, 1700.

I do not doubt but your excellency is informed of the anſwer of this court to the laſt memorial of the French envoy extraordinary, to make it change its reſolution of receiving any Imperial or other foreign troops into its domains in Italy; as I have alſo repreſented on the ſame ſubject, by expreſs order as well of the king our maſter, as the lords the States General, they have, almoſt word for word, anſwered to it in the ſame manner; that is to ſay, in ſhort, that they pretend here to be at liberty, and under pretence of recruiting the foreign troops, who ſerve in the Spaniſh pay, to introduce them, when they ſhall judge it to be proper. The ſaid court plunges itſelf more and more into ſtrange diſorders, in regard to the ſucceſſion. The king and queen are abſolutely for the Imperial court; and on the other hand the council of ſtate runs blindly and head-foremoſt in favour of the duke of Anjou, flattering themſelves, that his moſt catholic majeſty will embrace this affair. In the mean while every thing grows worſe and worſe; many deliberations and conſultations, but no good reſolutions. The king keeps his bed ſince yeſterday, by reaſon of a new flux, &c.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Sept. 25, 1700.

Here is a courier arrived from Madrid to the French court. He alſo brought letters from Mr. Schonenburgh, which I have ſent forward. The French miniſter there having given a memorial, as was agreed in Holland, to the court of Spain, in order to diſſuade his catholic majeſty from receiving the emperor's troops, or any foreigners in Italy, or in his other dominions; the anſwer was, that at preſent the king did not ſee any occaſion of recruiting his foreigners, that were in his ſervice; but, when he did, he ſhould follow the example of the king his maſter, and other princes.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Methuen.

Paris, Octob. 3, 1700.

All things are very quiet here, and will continue ſo, unleſs the meaſures, which Spain may take with the emperor, occaſion the contrary; which, I take it, is not their intereſt; and I hope, that the declaration, that has been made at Madrid and at Vienna, will prevent it. I hear your neighbours are very angry with what the king of Portugal has done. I wiſh others were as well convinced, that it is the only means to preſerve the peace of Europe, and I am ſatisfied they will at laſt.

which France had obtained, were prejudicial to the intereſts of this country, and deſtructive of the balance of power, as the poſſeſſion of Naples and the Tuſcan ports muſt ſubject Italy to their yoke, and render our Levant and Mediterranean trade precarious, and to be carried on at their diſcretion; whilſt the ceſſion of Guipuſcoa afforded them another inlet into the heart of Spain upon any rupture.

The almoſt extinguiſhed hopes of the jacobites began to revive on this occaſion, and upon the ſad event of the duke of Glouceſter's death. As they knew, whatever tended to create a general diſlike to the king's meaſures muſt be of ſervice to their cauſe, they were the forwardeſt to inflame the minds of the people, and had a book ſent to the preſs againſt the treaty, in which all thoſe, who were ſuppoſed to have had an hand in it, were ſeverely treated. Mr. Graham, lord Preſton's brother (as the earl of Mancheſter wrote over from Paris) was diſpatched to St. Germain's by ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, and others of the tory party, with a propoſal to get the ſucceſſion ſettled on the pretended prince of Wales, and to aſſure king James, that a vote would be propoſed in the houſe of commons, not to ſupport the crown in the execution of the treaty.

Such was the perplexed and melancholy ſituation of affairs, when the king left Loo to embark for England, where he arrived the 18th of October, not a little chagrined at the difficulties, in which he found himſelf involved, and which had a viſible effect both on his health and temper.

Before his return, he made good his declaration to the Scots, in allowing their parliament to meet on the 28th of October, and ſent them a letter from Loo, containing in ſubſtance, 'That, having adjourned their parliament on account of his going beyond ſea, he then promiſed what he was now ready to make good to them, at this meeting. That he had conſidered their addreſs in 1698, in behalf of the African company, and would comply with their deſires, in relation to that national concern; and moreover do all elſe, that could be required for maintaining and advancing the peace and welfare of their kingdom. He likewiſe promiſed to give his royal aſſent to all acts for better eſtabliſhing the preſbyterian government, preventing the growth of popery, ſuppreſſing vice and immorality, encouraging piety and virtue, preſerving and ſecuring perſonal liberty, regulating and advancing trade, and eſpecially for retrieving the loſſes, and promoting the intereſts of the African and Indian companies. He alſo promiſed to encourage manufactures, and aſſent to whatever elſe ſhould be offered for clearing and ſecuring property, ſtrengthening and facilitating the adminiſtration of juſtice, reſtraining and puniſhing crimes, preſerving peace and quietneſs, &c. He next aſſured them of his great concern, for not being able to aſſert the company's right of eſtabliſhing a colony at Darien, without diſturbing the peace of Chriſtendom, and bringing that antient kingdom into an inevitable war, without hopes of aſſiſtance. With theſe plain reaſons he doubted not but they would be ſatisfied; and therefore, recommending to them unanimity, and the raiſing of competent taxes for their defence, he concluded, with only acquainting them further, that he had thought fit to continue the duke of Queenſberry high commiſſioner; and bid them heartily farewell.'

It muſt be obſerved, that, during the interval between the two ſeſſions of parliament, came the news to Scotland of the entire ſurrender of their ſettlement at Darien [f]. This occaſioned the company to repreſent to the parliament, the firſt day of their ſeſſion, 'That, for want of due protection abroad, ſome perſons had been encouraged to break in upon their privileges even at home.' This repreſentation was ſeconded with a national addreſs to the king upon that ſubject, whoſe anſwer was, 'That he could not take farther notice of it, ſince the parliament was now met; and he had made a declaration of his mind for the good of his people, with which he hoped all his faithful ſubjects would be ſatisfied.'

Though people were in ſo bad a humour, that much practice was neceſſary to bring them into any temper; yet after ſome heats about the miſcarriage of the Darien affair, the ſeſſion, in concluſion, ended well. After having ſate about three months, the parliament came to this reſolution, 'That in conſideration of this great deliverance by his majeſty, and, in that, next under God, their ſafety and happineſs depended wholly on his preſervation and that of his government, they would ſupport both to the utmoſt of their power, and maintain ſuch forces, as ſhould be requiſite for thoſe ends.' Accordingly an act paſſed for keeping on foot three thouſand men, till the 1ſt of December 1702, and another for a land tax to maintain thoſe troops; which done, the commiſſioner produced the king's letter, wherein it was deſired he might have eleven hundred men on his own account to the firſt of June following; which was readily complied with, and then they were prorogued to the 6th of May. The troops, that were ordered to be broke, were ſent to the States, who were now increaſing their force. This ſeſſion was chiefly managed by the duke of Queenſberry and the earl of Argyle, and, in reward of it, the one had a garter, and the other was made a duke.

In October the pope died; and at the ſame time all Europe was alarmed with the deſperate ſtate of the king of Spain's health. When the news came to the court of France, that he was in the laſt agony, monſieur de Torcy the French ſecretary of ſtate, was ſent to the earl of Mancheſter, the Engliſh embaſſador there, deſiring him to let the king his maſter know the news, and to ſignify to him, that the French king hoped, that he would put all things in readineſs to execute the treaty of partition, in caſe it ſhould be oppoſed; and in his whole diſcourſe, he expreſſed a fixed reſolution in the French councils to adhere to it. A few days after that, the news came of the king of Spain's death, and of his will, declaring the duke of Anjou, ſecond ſon of the Dauphin, the univerſal heir of the Spaniſh monarchy; and, in caſe that duke ſhould die without children, or ſhould inherit the crown of France, then the whole Spaniſh monarchy ſhould go to the duke of Berry; and if the ſame ſhould happen to him, then the archduke Charles and his heirs were to inherit; and that monarchy was at laſt limited to the duke of Savoy and his heirs. The will likewiſe recommended, that the duke of Anjou ſhould marry one of the archducheſſes. It is not yet certainly known by what means this was brought about, and how the king of Spain was drawn to conſent to the will, or whether it was a mere forgery, made by cardinal Portocarrero, and ſome of the grandees, who partly by practice and corruption, and partly for ſafety, and that their monarchy might be kept entire (they imagining, that the power of France was far ſuperior to all, and that the houſe of Auſtria would not be able to engage in its intereſts) had been prevailed on to prepare and publiſh this will; and, to make it more acceptable to the Spaniards, among other forfeitures of the crown, not only the ſucceſſor's departing from what they call the catholic faith, but even his not maintaining the immaculate conception of the virgin, was one [g].

[f] The Spaniards had, ſome time before, routed the Scots, and retaken what the latter had poſſeſſed themſelves of by articles of capitulation, ſigned by Mr. Gibſon, Mr. Vetch, and others, of the Caledonian council and ſettlement; which were, 1. 'That the Scots ſhould have liberty to retire, with their ſhips and effects, unmoleſted. 2. That the priſoners, on both ſides, ſhould be exchanged. 3. That, if any ſhips came thither, in ſix months, they ſhould have leave to anchor in the harbour, and the privilege of wood, water, and proviſions, if they needed them.' Thus ended the affair of Darien.

[g] The circumſtances of the death and will of the king of Spain, will appear from the following extracts of M. Cole's memoirs.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Octob. 9, 1700.

I am of opinion, that we ſhall now ſoon ſee matters of great importance tranſacted all over Europe; becauſe it is expected, that, in a few days, we ſhall hear, that the king of Spain is dead. They have, at court, received a courier from Madrid; and, on the 26th of September, the king was ſo ill, he having continual vomitings, and a great looſeneſs, that his phyſicians believed he could not live a week. Laſt night, late, the emperor's envoy was with me, who had juſt received news of the 30th, by an expreſs. His letters mention, That the king had received the ſacrament, the extreme unction, &c. and that he had taken leave of the queen, &c. ſo they deſpaired of his life: But, on the day this was wrote, there was ſome little hopes of him, his looſeneſs having abated. He told me, he was then going to Fontainbleau. It is certain, that the whole council of Spain, and even thoſe that were creatures of the queen, who is entirely for the houſe of Auſtria, are all for the duke of Anjou. They flatter themſelves, that the French king will accept this offer. I hope the emperor, before it is too late, will ſee it his intereſt to ſign the treaty.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, Octob. 11, 1700.

Monſieur de Torcy told me, that they had an expreſs from Spain, with letters of the 26th of laſt month; and that the king of Spain was ſo extreme ill, that his phyſicians thought he could not live eight days. That, thereupon, they had diſpatched a courier to monſieur de Villars, with orders to acquaint the emperor with it, and to let him know, That, as they had not yet named a ſucceſſor, ſo it would be neceſſary to know his further reſolutions, ſince the caſe might ſoon happen, which would oblige them to take ſuch meaſures, as would be proper, in caſe the emperor did not think fit to ſign the treaty. Monſieur de Torcy made an excuſe, that the time did not permit the firſt concerting with the king; that, elſe, it would have been done; though he did not ſee any difficulty but that his majeſty would approve of it. He deſired I would write; which I aſſured him I would not fail to do: And then I took notice of the augmentation of their forces, which will amount to twenty-ſix thouſand

As ſoon as the news came to Rome, it quickened the intrigues of the conclave, ſo they ſet up cardinal Albano, a man of fifty-two years of age; who, beyond all men's expectation, was choſen pope, and took the name of Clement XI. He had little practice in affairs, but was very learned; and in ſo critical a time, it ſeems, a pope of courage and ſpirit, not ſunk with age into covetouſneſs or peeviſhneſs, was thought the fitteſt perſon for that ſee. France had ſent no excluſion to preclude him, not imagining he could be thought on. At firſt, the French court did not ſeem pleaſed with the choice, but it was too late to oppoſe it; and therefore they reſolved to gain him to their intereſts, in which they ſucceeded beyond what they then hoped for.

When the court of France had notice ſent them of the king of Spain's will, real or pretended, they ſeemed to be at a ſtand for ſome days; and the letters wrote from the ſecretary's office gave it out for certain, that the king would adhere to the partition treaty. But madam de Maintenon had an unſpeakable fondneſs for the duke of Anjou; ſhe therefore prevailed with the Dauphin to accept of the will, and ſet aſide the treaty; and ſhe engaged monſieur de Pontchartrain to ſecond this. They being thus prepared, when the news of the king of Spain's death came to Fontainbleau, where the court was at that time, a cabinet council was called within two hours after, which met in madam de Maintenon's lodgings, and ſate about three hours. Pontchartrain was for acthouſand foot. There is to be alſo one of the horſe; but the number is not yet declared. I ſaid, That I heard, that monſieur de Neſmond was to remain at Cadiz. He ſaid, As to the firſt, that, as affairs ſtood, it was convenient; but, as for the latter, monſieur de Neſmond had orders to return to Toulon. There was alſo a courier ſent to monſieur de Tallard, who will already have informed you of all this matter. I returned to Paris the ſame day; where I found the emperor's envoy at my houſe. He had received a courier from Madrid of the 30th; which confirms the ſame news of the king; but ſays much more, that he had received the ſacraments, and had taken leave of the queen, &c. That all about him took it for granted, he could not live: Yet, in a poſtſcript, they write, That that night they had ſome little hopes, his looſeneſs, which had been very violent, had been abated. He went ſtrait to Fontainbleau, and is very uneaſy, and the more ſo, becauſe all of the council of Spain are entirely for the duke of Anjou: Cardinal Portocarrero and count of Aguilar, who are in the queen's intereſt, being alſo for it; and they flatter themſelves, that the offer will be accepted with France. There is no courier arrived ſince; though, at this place, the only diſcourſe is, that the king of Spain is dead. I am of opinion, that we ſhall ſoon hear it. I hope your lordſhip will ſend me what directions his majeſty thinks proper, in caſe this ſhould happen, that I may act accordingly.

Monſieur Schonenberg to the earl of Mancheſter.

Madrid, Octob. 21, 1700.

It ſeems, that the 8th has been the day we call, here, critical in ſickneſs, becauſe that was properly the time, that the king gave probable proofs of mending. In effect, his looſeneſs is ſo much abated, ſince that time, that his health is grown better, daily; ſo that, if no relapſe, or unforeſeen accident, comes acroſs, the phyſicians judge, unanimouſly, that he is abſolutely out of danger. In the mean while, his majeſty ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded, when he was in the higheſt of his illneſs, that is, on the 3d inſtant, to ſign a teſtamentary diſpoſition, in favour of the ſecond ſon of the Dauphin: But, ſince he is better, he ſhews ſuch indignation againſt thoſe, who, under pretence of conſcience, perſuaded him to make this ſtep, that he is grown diffident of all his miniſters; inſomuch that he has even recalled the power given to the ſecretary of ſtate, for the univerſal diſpatches, relating to the moſt preſſing affairs; which he had truſted, during the greateſt violence of his illneſs, to three or four counſellors of ſtate, in conjunction with the ſaid ſecretary, his majeſty not thinking it proper to confide in thoſe who inſpired him with a reſolution to make a will.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Octob. 22, 1700.

We have, this day, letters from Madrid of the 8th, by the ordinary poſt. The Spaniſh embaſſador has one, of the 9th; and his Depeche is ſigned by the king himſelf, as ſeveral others were, that are ſent into Italy. I ſuppoſe, this was done, to convince them, the more, that he was in a way of recovery: But you will find, by the incloſed, that there is little hopes of it. We have had no courier, of late, which, ſince that time, would have come, in caſe of any alteration. That, which occaſions the greateſt diſcourſe, is, his will; which he ſigned on the 3d. By all the letters, it is thought in favour of one of the princes of France; and, as to the perſons concerned, and, who were witneſſes to it, it is certain, they have been ever that way diſpoſed, to prevent their monarchy's being diſmembered. Some letters do alſo ſay, That, ſince that, the queen has prevailed with him to add a codicil: That ſome, that were named for the regency, are changed; at leaſt, the queen ſeemed, after that, very eaſy. In ſhort, theſe are all conjectures; and I am of opinion, that it will not be known, what it contains, till the king's death.

The emperor's envoy is gone to Paris, to meet count Averſberg, in his way to Spain, who, it is believed had ſome further inſtructions; and, it may be, in caſe the king of Spain was dead, the emperor has given orders to declare, he accepts the treaty, though with ſome alterations. I cannot but think, that he has no other way to take, unleſs he has a mind to loſe the whole. We ſhall, now, ſoon ſee, how our parliament will behave in this affair.

Mr. Stanhope to the earl of Mancheſter.

Hague, Octob. 22, 1700.

The king arrived here laſt night.——His majeſty queſtioned me this morning what news of the king of Spain. I had not then received your advices, but anſwered him to the ſame purpoſe, by what don Quiros had communicated to me. He intends to embark for England on Wedneſday next, if wind and weather permit; though it is probable, an expreſs, with what we fear from Spain, may keep him here ſome days longer, that being the important affair now on foot in Europe; yet whether in order to that, his majeſty's preſence here, or in England, be of greater concern, I ſhall ſubmit to greater ſtateſmen to determine. Don Quiros ſets a good face on a bad game; ſays the militias of Spain, in the memory of men, made the prince of Condé, as great a captain as the marquis d'Harcourt, raiſe the ſiege of of Fontarabia with diſhonour, though he had fifty thouſand men all regular troops; and he promiſes himſelf no leſs bravery from the preſent Spaniards in a cauſe, where their honour, as well as their monarchy, is at ſtake. This way of reaſoning ſeems to us very extraordinary; and I am obliged at the ſame time to do him juſtice, in ſaying he has as little of that rodomontade humour, as any of his countrymen I have ever known.

Monſieur Schonenberg to the earl of Mancheſter.

Madrid, Octob. 22, 1700.

After having ſent my diſpatches of the 21ſt inſtant to the poſt, I juſt now learn, that the catholic king, angry at thoſe, who were preſent at the ſigning of the former will in favour of a ſecond ſon of the Dauphin, made them all come before his royal perſon, and he has ſigned another will, that was cloſed up. Some ſay, that it was only a codicil relating to the firſt teſtamentary diſpoſition, &c.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Fontainbleau, Octob. 24, 1700.

We have been expecting every day to hear the death of the king of Spain; but your lordſhip will ſee by the incloſed, that he is rather better, it being the beſt account that is come. I have had none from Mr. Schonenberg this poſt, which I wonder at. The Spaniſh embaſſador has a letter ſigned by the king himſelf, as others that were ſent into Italy. Notwithſtanding all this, monſieur d'Harcourt ſet out yeſterday for Catalonia, and the troops are marching on that ſide. Monſieur la Prata, chief engineer under monſieur de Vauban, went ſome days before. The emperor's envoy is gone to Paris to meet count Averſberg in his way to Spain. I found by him, that he was in hopes to have ſome further inſtructions. I do not know what they mean at Vienna, for all letters do agree, that the will, which the king of Spain has made, is in favour of a prince of France for the whole ſucceſſion. Whether we ſhall agree to that, is another queſtion, if France was willing to accept of it. I ſuppoſe you have had work enough with the count de la Tour. His maſter would fain find his account in this affair, as I perceive by his miniſter; and the common report is, that he would give Savoy to France in lieu of Naples, which they will hardly perſuade them to with all their rhetoric.

[While king William was at Loo, the count de la Tour, the duke of Savoy's miniſter, came with a ſecret commiſſion from his maſter. Don Bernardo de Quiros imagined it was to try to get the duke named in the room of archduke Charles. But the truth was, that the duke, having learnt by the treaty of Partition, that he had no part in it, thought to reap ſome advantage from thence. For this reaſon, he had ſent la Tour to the court of France to complain, as he did, that, notwithſtanding his conſanguinity, the moſt Chriſtian king had done nothing for him. At the ſame time la Tour made a propoſition, with an offer, if it was accepted, that the duke ſhould guaranty the treaty. The propoſition was, that the duke would reſign to France the duchy of Savoy with all its pretenſions, in exchange for the kingdom of Naples. The anſwer of the French court was, that his propoſition ſhould be conſidered, but it muſt alſo be laid before the other allies, England and Holland. This la Tour did, but without ſucceſs. One of the principal reaſons of its being rejected by king William and the States, was, that, the king of France having Savoy, with all its pretenſions, juſt and unjuſt, he would be better able to aſſert them than the duke; and by that means, Geneva and the country of Vaca, where the proteſtant religion is profeſſed, might be in danger. Beſides, it was not diſagreeable to give the duke ſome mortification, for having, after his peace with France, cauſed a ſpeech to be made to king James, which ſeemed directly contrary to that which la Tour had made at London, upon the king's advancement to the throne. Lambert, vol. I. p. 120.]

Mr. Sutton to the earl of Mancheſter.

Vienna, Octob. 26, 1700.

There is no anſwer given to the new invitation made by the contracting parties to the emperor to come into the treaty of diviſion, before which it cannot be ſaid poſitively what his Imperial majeſty will conclude upon. Your excellency judges very juſtly, that it appears to be his intereſt to accept the offer, when the condition of his affairs is conſidered; but his having refuſed it before, and the king of Spain being in ſome meaſure recovered, make it probable, that he will anſwer again in the negative.

Nevertheleſs it is inviſible what meaſures are taken to fence off the blow. It is true, there have been many conſultations, but either nothing is concluded in them, or no concluſion executed. And yet one ſees very little emotion in the Imperial family at the alarming news of the king of Spain's deſperate illneſs, which would perſuade one, that they very leiſurely expected another miracle to be wrought in their favour. If the offer be made them after the king of Spain's death, perhaps the ſeeing themſelves evidently unable to withſtand the execution of the treaty may force them to yield to it, though their averſion to it be ſo great, that it muſt be a great ſtreſs to bring them to it. They have rather choſen hitherto to abandon themſelves to providence and chance. They ſeem to flatter themſelves, that their ſteadineſs will make ſome impreſſion, and procure them fairer offers. The duchy of Milan, the marquiſate of Final, and the 'Stato delli Preſidii,' would in all likelihood buy their conſent; and they would rejoice heartily at the bottom to ſee them added to the archduke's ſhare, to which they would join themſelves the duchy of Mantua after the duke's death. I am afraid they are not likely to be gratified in their deſire; but they ſeem to think, that, rather than cepting the will, and the reſt of the miniſtry for adhering to the treaty. But the Dauphin joined, for accepting the will, with an air of poſitiveneſs, that he had never aſſumed before; ſo that it was believed to be done by concert with the king, who was reſerved and ſeemed more inclined to the treaty. In concluſion, madam de Maintenon ſaid, What had the duke of Anjou done, to provoke the king to bar him of his right to that ſucceſſion? And upon this all ſubmitted to the Dauphin's opinion, and the king ſeemed overcome with their reaſons.

Though the matter was reſolved on, yet it was not publiſhed till five days after. For then the French king, ſending for the duke of Anjou into his cloſet, ſaid to him in the preſence of the marquis des Rios: 'Sir, the king of Spain has made you king. The grandees demand you, the people wiſh for you, and I give my conſent. Remember only you are a prince of France. But I recommend to you to love your people, to gain their affection by the lenity of your govenment, and render yourſelf worthy of the throne you are going to mount.' All the princes of the blood came to congratulate the new king; but, however, the duke of Orleans, the king of France's only brother, and his ſon the duke of Chartres, proteſted againſt the will, becauſe the archduke was put next in the ſucceſſion to the duke of Berry; whereas they alledged, that the duke of Orleans and his heirs ought to come before him, as younger ſon of Anne of Auſtria, whoſe renunciation could be of no more force than that of Maria-Tereſa. However, this was no obſtruction to the new king's ſetting out for Spain, which he accordingly did on the 4th of December, accompanied by his two brothers, who went with him as far as the frontiers of that kingdom [h].

An expreſs of the king of France's accepting the will being ſent to the count de Briord at the Hague, he immediately went to the penſionary, and, purſuant to the orders he had received, told him, that his maſter, taking taken into conſideration the preſent ſituation of affairs, and ſeeing the emperor had not acceded to the treaty, nor but few of the northern princes, and that the king of England was uneaſy at Sicily being in the hands of the French, he had, after two days mature deliberation, reſolved to yield to the deſires of the Spaniards, and give them the duke of Anjou for king. My maſter (added he) is very ſenſible he ſhall be a great loſer by it; but he had rather renounce the advantages which would accrue to his crown by the treaty of partition, than give occaſion for a war to the diſturbance of all Europe; and therefore hopes his reſolution will be approved, as being conducive to the public tranquility. The penſionary was ſtruck with this, and made ſtrong but fruitleſs remonſtrances againſt than enter into a chargeable war, his moſt Chriſtian majeſty will enlarge their portion. Your lordſhip will be more eaſily and better informed, than I, of what diſpoſition there may be hitherto.

Your excellency will obſerve by the following account, in what condition this court is to oppoſe the execution of the treaty. They have diſcourſed a good while of remounting and recruiting their troops, and give out, that they have money ready for it. I can ſcarce believe, they have money ſufficient for remounting according to their own reckoning, and a great part of the colonels will not undertake the work at the rates the court offers. Yet it is ſaid that aſſignations are delivered to ſome of them. Their troops would amount to ſeventy thouſand men, if they were complete; but they are far from it, and the cavalry half diſmounted. They cannot diſpenſe themſelves from having near thirty thouſand men in Hungary and Tranſylvania. Their places upon the Rhine are very thinly garriſoned, and will never be well furniſhed or repaired, though there be ſome artillery paſſed by from Buda towards Briſac. They have no forces near Italy, and very few within a great diſtance of it in quarters. The emperor is between twenty and thirty millions of florins in debt, and pays extravagant intereſt. It has been diſcourſed, that the hereditary countries would take the payment of the debts upon them. I do not find any certainty thereof; but, if it ſhould happen, there muſt be a term of years allowed for it, and they will ſcarce be able to give the emperor any further aid. The chamber of Finances is in ſo bad a reputation, that they have no credit, and have had much ado for a long time to ſupply the emperor's neceſſities. I do not hear of any recruits, that are yet making, though I hearken after it: but peradventure in two months they may begin to make them, and they muſt begin ſome time, otherwiſe they will ſhortly have no troops at all. In fine, my lord, it is apparent, that, whenever the king of Spain comes to die, this court will be found unprepared to make any great reſiſtance, as I believe any body, that is acquainted with the preſent conſtitution thereof, would eaſily own. But they will preſume things cannot go worſe for them, than according to the diſpoſition of the treaty. They now hold daily conferences. We ſhall ſhortly ſee the reſult of them. I have aſked audience three days together, and cannot yet have the honour to have one to deliver the king's orders.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, Nov. 3, 1700.

Before I left Fontainebleau, I was with monſieur de Torcy, who, I find, is well ſatisfied with the proceedings in Holland. I muſt own, that, during my ſtay there, the king took all occaſions to oblige me. You know already, that monſieur Calliere is gone to the duke of Lorrain. The duke of Savoy has declared, that he will not act againſt the treaty. His embaſſador here is now more in hopes than ever, that his maſter will have ſome advantage in the Partage; but I found by monſieur de Torcy, that the French king was ſatisfied with the diviſion already made, and yet he would conſent to any reaſonable alteration, if that was to make the king, our maſter, eaſy. This was meant in relation to our trade in the Levant; and, I ſuppoſe, that monſieur de Tallard has already told you as much. He arrived here on Monday, late at night; and, the next morning, I was to wait on him. He expreſſed a great ſenſe of the king's favours to him: That he was juſt going to Fontainebleau, to give the king, his maſter, all the aſſurances imaginable of the friendſhip of the king, and of the States General; which he could do with great truth. In ſhort, he ſeemed extremely pleaſed.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Nov. 3, 1700,

Here are letters from Madrid of the 22d paſt, by an expreſs; which ſay, That, on the 21ſt, the king of Spain made a new will in favour of the archduke: That he called on thoſe, that were preſent, and had perſuaded him in his ſickneſs, to make the former in favour of the ſecond ſon of the Dauphin; and ſhewed a very great diſlike to what they had done, ſigning, in their preſence, another. This laſt action has ſtill increaſed the factions and diſcontents here.

Mr. Methuen to the earl of Mancheſter.

Liſbon, Nov. 4, 1700.

The 13th of the laſt month I received by an expreſs which came from Paris to the French embaſſador, his majeſty's commands to propoſe to the king of Portugal the forms or projects of the two acts of acceſſion and admiſſion, for his being comprehended in the guaranty of the treaty of repartition, that of acceſſion to be ſigned by the king of Portugal, and that of admiſſion by his majeſty. I have at laſt prevailed with the king of Portugal to ſign that of acceſſion, which will be ſent to England by the ſame expreſs, which carries this; ſo that the king of Portugal will be guarantee of the treaty for the diviſion of the Spaniſh monarchy, without any particular treaty or convention with England or Holland for that purpoſe.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Nov. 6, 1700.

The account we have from Fontainebleau is, that the king of Spain is very weak, and extreme ill again, and not like to live any time. The laſt will, which he made, and which I have already given you an account of, is kept here as a very great ſecret, and there is no mention made of it at court, though I am ſatisfied it was the occaſion of ſending an expreſs. There may be reaſons for concealing it till they ſee what the emperor will do.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Nov. 9, 1700.

We have now news, that the king of Spain died the 1ſt inſtant between two and three of the clock in the afternoon, which the incloſed will inform his majeſty of. The cardinal Portocarrero was declared, by a commiſſion under the privy ſeal, chief governor during his illneſs; and by the teſtament, which they have ſince opened, he is continued. He ſent monſieur de Blecourt a copy. The ſubſtance of it is, That whereas the king of Spain was ſatisfied, that the intention and deſign of the renunciation, which the late queen of France, &c. made, was only in order to prevent the union of the two monarchies in one perſon; and whereas the Dauphin has ſeveral ſons, to whom in conſcience the ſucceſſion does belong; he does therefore appoint and declare the duke of Anjou his heir. In caſe he ſhould die without children, or inherit the crown of France, then to the duke of Berry, and, if the ſame ſhould happen to him, then to the archduke and his heirs: And he limits it at laſt to the duke of Savoy and his heirs. He does alſo recommend to the emperor and the king of France a marriage between the duke of Anjou and one of the archduchеſſes, in order to keep up the ſame good underſtanding, that is at preſent.

The queen finding, that ſhe had no part in the government, is fallen very ill. I waited upon monſieur de Torcy, who gave me an account of theſe matters, and I did endeavour to learn what meaſures they intended to take. The king ordered a council immediately, and I believe you will ſoon ſee monſieur de Tallard. I can ſee they are very well pleaſed here with all theſe circumſtances; and, what effect they will have, time muſt ſhew; though I am of opinion, that they will keep firm to the treaty, as that is moſt for their advantage.

Monſieur Zinzendorf aſſures me, that he has no private directions concerning the emperor's accepting the treaty, in caſe of the news of the death of the king of Spain, as it was thought. I have had ſome diſcourſe with him, and he is ſatisfied now, that there is no other party for the emperor to take, and he does intend to write as much. He is very apprehenſive leſt France ſhould now preſs the naming of another, as by treaty they may, the time being elapſed.

[h] This account may be compared with the following letter.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, Nov. 12, 1700.

I am juſt come from Fontainebleau, where I received yours of October 28, concerning the duke of Savoy; but I muſt now acquaint you, that there is an end of our treaty. This morning I was with monſieur de Torcy, who began with ſaying, that he did not doubt I was ſenſible, that ſince they had an account of the king of Spain's death, and the diſpoſition he had made by his will, great difficulties muſt have ariſen: That the king had well conſidered the occaſion and the intent of the late treaty with England, &c. which was to prevent a war in Europe. That the emperor not having ſigned, and the duke of Savoy actually refuſing to accept of Naples and Sicily; that there having appeared diſcontentments both in England and Holland againſt the French being maſters of thoſe two kingdoms, in relation to the trade of the Levant: beſides that none of the princes, that the treaty has been communicated to, have promiſed more than a bare neutrality; the king could not but it to count Briord. The reaſon of the count's ſpeaking of king William's uneaſineſs about Sicily, was, becauſe the king, before his departure for England, had propoſed the giving it to the elector of Bavaria, for fear (ſaid Briord) the parliament might be diſguſted, if it remained to France, on account of the Levant trade, which might be obſtructed by it.

The day after this notification, the States-General met earlier than uſual to conſider of it, but came to no reſolution, becauſe they wanted to know king William's intentions. However, after many conſultations, they ſent orders to Heemſkerke, their embaſſador at Paris, to repreſent in a memorial, that they did not expect the reſolution which his moſt Chriſtian majeſty had taken of accepting the king of Spain's will, contrary to the late treaty; and hoped, that as the time of the emperor's acceding was not yet expired, and as they had, upon news of the king of Spain's death, renewed their inſtances to him, his majeſty would take the matter into conſideration again, and adhere to the treaty in every article. To this memorial a very long anſwer was ſent to the States, which was alſo diſpatched with the king of France's reſolution to all the courts of Europe, the ſubſtance whereof was, That the king of France conſidered chiefly what was the principal deſign of the treaty, namely, to maintain the peace of Europe; and therefore, to purſue this, he departed from the 'words' of the treaty, but adhered to the 'ſpirit,' and chief intent of it. This infamous excuſe, for ſo notorious a breach of faith, ſeemed to be an equivocation of ſo groſs a nature, that it looked like the invention of a jeſuit confeſſor, adding impudence to perjury. With this anſwer the king of France ſent a letter to the States, wherein he told them, that the peace of Europe was ſo firmly eſtabliſhed by the king of Spain's will in favour of his grandſon, that he did not doubt their approbation of his acceſſion to the Spaniſh crown. To this letter the States did not return an anſwer till the 8th of December, wherein they hoped, that his majeſty would conſider, that they could not immediately declare upon an affair of ſo great moment, without conſulting their reſpective provinces. Beſides, it was a matter which concerned in common both themſelves and his Britannic majeſty, and conſequently they could not act without his concurrence. This letter being delivered to the king of France by monſieur Heemſkerke, he replied, That the States did well to wait for the reſolution of their provinces, according to the conſtitution of their government, and hoped their reſolution would be agreeable to his wiſhes. In the mean time, he ſhould be ready to concur in whatever the States ſhould deſire, for the ſecurity of the Spaniſh Netherlands.

Theſe fair words were by no means ſatisfactory to the States, eſpecially when they conſidered the haughty expreſſions in the long anſwer, not fit to be uſed in a ſovereign ſtate. Soon after don Bernando, the Spaniſh embaſſador, received a letter from the new king for the States, dated December 18, at Poictiers. When this letter was offered to the States, the preſident of the week made ſome ſcruple to receive it, and deſired the embaſſador to ſtay a few days before he delivered it. But, being told that it was ordered to be immediately preſented, the preſident received it, adding, that it muſt not be thought ſtrange, if the States did not anſwer it ſo ſoon as expected. [i]

During theſe tranſactions at the Hague, the Spaniards ſeeing themſelves threatened with a war from the emperor, who declared againſt the treaty and will, and apprehending that the empire, together with England and the United-Provinces, might be engaged to join in the War, and being unable to defend themſelves, delivered all into the hands of France. And upon that, both the Spaniſh Netherlands, and the duchy of Milan, received French garriſons; the French fleet came to Cadiz; a ſquadron was alſo ſent to the Weſt-Indies; ſo that the whole Spaniſh empire fell now, without a ſtroke of the ſword, into the French power. All this was the more formidable, becauſe the duke of Burgundy had then no children; and, by this means, the king of Spain was in time likely to ſucceed to the crown of France. And thus the world ſaw the appearance of a new univerſal monarchy, like to ariſe out of this conjunction.

The king of Spain wrote to all the courts of Europe, giving notice of his acceſſion to that crown; only he forgot England. And it was publickly given out, that he had promiſed the pretended prince of Wales, that, in due time, he would take care of his intereſts. The king and the States-General were much alarmed, when they beheld the French poſſeſſed of the Spaniſh Netherlands. A great part of the Dutch army lay ſcattered up and down in thoſe garriſons, more particularly in Luxemburg, Namur, and Mons; and theſe were now made priſoners of war. Neither officers nor ſoldiers could own the king of Spain, for their maſters had not yet done it. At this time, the French preſſed the States very hard to declare themſelves. A great party in the States were for owning him, at leaſt in form, till they could get their troops again into their own hands, according to capitulation. Nor were they then in a condition to reſiſt the impreſſion, that might have been made upon them from the garriſons in the Spaniſh Guelder, who could have attacked them before they were able to make head. The States therefore came to a reſolution of owning the king of Spain, but think there was a neceſſity of accepting what the will of the king of Spain declared in favour of the duke of Anjou. Then he read to me the motives, which he had drawn up, that I might the better inform his majeſty. I deſired he would let me take the copy, which I ſend your lordſhip, and moſt, that paſſed, is contained in it. You may eaſily imagine I had little to ſay, when he told me of the reſolution the king had taken. It is certain, that the proceedings of the emperor have put them in ſome meaſure on this neceſſity, for monſieur de Torcy obſerved to me, that, if the king had refuſed, the archduke had then a double title, viz. that of Philip IV. and that of the late king's will: And he could not tell but the Spaniſh embaſſador had orders to ſend word to Vienna, that, the moment the emperor conſented to the treaty, the duke of Savoy had a good title; and his humour is ſo well known, that we are ſure he would not let ſlip ſuch an opportunity; and then there muſt have been a war, not likely to be ſoon ended, whatever the ſucceſs would be: That the whole kingdom muſt be conquered, the Spaniards being entirely againſt dividing their monarchy. That the ſhips, we and Holland were to furniſh, would not be ſufficient for ſuch a war: That it was very doubtful, whether England and Holland would engage themſelves in a greater expence; which muſt neceſſarily be the conſequence. That it was certain, that the treaty was more advantageous to France, and was what the king could have wiſhed. He then ended, ſaying, That the king hoped, that the ſtrength of theſe reaſons would ſo far prevail with the king, our maſter, that there might be ſtill the ſame good underſtanding as ever, which was ſo neceſſary for the good and quiet of Europe. I made no other anſwer, than that I would faithfully acquaint the king with what he ſaid to me, by order, on this ſubject. I only aſked him, if I might have a copy of the will. He ſaid, he would firſt aſk the king, and then ſend it me. It will now, be ſeen public. I have already acquainted Mr. ſecretary Vernon with the ſubſtance of it; but, for fear my ſervant, whom I diſpatched on the 9th, ſhould not be arrived, I now repeat, that the diſpoſition of the will is in favour of the duke of Anjou, and his heirs, &c.

The account of the king of Spain's death came on Tueſday, the 9th, about one o'clock in the afternoon; and, at three, there was a council in madam de Maintenon's lodgings; at which ſhe was preſent, with the chancellor, the duke de Beauvillier, and monſieur de Torcy. The Dauphin was out a hunting. The next morning, there was another council, in the ſame manner, when the Dauphin was preſent. Monſieur Blecourt had ſent a copy of the will, which the regents had given him. On the 10th, the Spaniſh embaſſador received a courier, with orders to notify the king's death. He had a letter alſo for this king, ſigned by the regents: and the queen's name was firſt. He went ſtrait to monſieur de Torcy; and, that night, there was another council, where the matter was determined as I ſuppoſe. On the 11th, the Spaniſh embaſſador had a private audience, when the will was read all over, to the king, who declared, he accepted it. Soon after this, the Spaniſh embaſſador ſent a courier for Spain; and there is no doubt, but, as ſoon as he arrives, the duke of Anjou will be proclaimed. I did perceive, that this would be their reſolution; but monſieur de Torcy did not explain himſelf to me, till this morning. The king will not declare it till on monday next, when he will be at Verſailles; and, I believe, the duke of Anjou will, ſoon after that go for Spain. Monſieur de Tallard deſired me to let you know, That he ſhould have ſent the account of the king of Spain's death, as he promiſed; but that I did. He tells me, he has orders to be ready; and ſays, he ſhall ſoon be in England. I think, he ought to go. As to what is to be judged at this court, by their looks, I did perceive, that, the moment this reſolution was taken, the king was very civil; but looked always much concerned, whenever I came near him.

It is, without diſpute, by the queen's ſigning, that ſhe has been all along in the French intereſt, whatever ſhe ſeemed to the emperor's miniſter. And, if the preſent poſture of affairs is conſidered, as ſhe was hated by all, this was the only way to ſave herſelf; and it was ſo managed, that, in June laſt, the king of Spain ſigned a will in favour of the archduke; which was ſent to Vienna. That made the emperor proceed as he did. Beſides, they have never obliged her in any thing ſhe deſired. The king of Spain cancelled that, and made this on the 2d of October. Monſieur Zinzendorf told me this in diſcourſe; and he would not believe what he ſees, now, to be poſſible; though he does not yet know, that the French king has accepted the will.

I cannot tell what reſolution the king will take; and I am far from giving any opinion, though, if your lordſhip will permit me, I cannot ſee but we muſt acquieſce. You are ſenſible of the poſture of our affairs, and of the diſcontent there was in England againſt the treaty, inſomuch that my lord Portland, and all, that were concerned in it, were the next ſeſſion to be ſacrificed, if poſſible. I am ſatisfied, that this was the deſign; whether the Parliament will approve of it, is what I cannot ſay. I muſt deſire of your lordſhip, that you ſend my inſtructions in French, eſpecially if I am to have an audience of the king, that ſo I may make uſe of the ſame expreſſions, which I will punctually obſerve. This is ſo nice a matter, and of ſo great a conſequence, that you will forgive me, when I declare it.

It is obſervable, that, not long after the king of France's accepting the will, he cauſed letters patents to be regiſtered in the parliament of Paris, to preſerve to the king of Spain, his grandſon, his right to the crown of France, in caſe the duke of Burgundy, his elder brother died without heirs. Theſe letters were given in December; but were not ſealed till January, nor regiſtered till the 1ſt of February: they were, ſays Lambert, (I. 338.) not only contrary to the renunciation of Maria Tereſa, but may moreover, one day, occaſion diſputes, to ſet aſide the famous, but trifling renunciations, made at the peace of Utrecht.

[i] While the States were thus delaying to declare themſelves, an accident happened, by which they gained ſome time. Briord, after a public audiance, having invited to dinner, according to cuſtom, ſome of the members and accordingly wrote a letrer that ſame day to the French king for that purpoſe. This being done, their battalions were ſent back, but they were ill uſed, contrary to capitulation, and the ſoldiers were tempted to deſert their ſervice; yet very few could be prevailed on to do it.

There was at this time a black appearance of a new and diſmal ſcene. France was now in poſſeſſion of a great empire, for a ſmall part of which they had been in wars (broke off indeed in intervals) for above two hundred years; while England, who ought to have protected and defended the reſt, was, by wretched factions and violent animoſities, running into a feeble and disjointed ſtate. The king indeed, upon the news of the French king's reſolution to accept the will, and recede from the treaty, was full of indignation to find himſelf ſo much abuſed, but he appeared quite the contrary. Inſomuch, that his cold and reſerved manner, upon ſo high a provocation, made ſome conclude, that he was in ſecret engagements with France; and that he was reſolved to own the new king of Spain, and not to engage in a new war.[k] This ſeemed ſo different from his own inclinations, and from

of the States-general, and the entertainment laſting a good while, he wanted to make water. But thinking it uncivil to riſe from table on that account, he brought upon himſelf a ſtoppage of urine, which was like to have killed him. Surgeons were ſent for from Amſterdam, but, the indiſpoſition continuing, an expreſs was diſpatched to Verſailles, and count d'Avaux was ſent to carry on the negociations. However, by this means above a month was gained, for d'Avaux did not come till Feb. 6. N. S.

k. The reader may ſee the progreſs of affairs in this remarkable period, in the following extract from Mr. Cole's memoirs.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Count Zinzendorf had an audience of the king ſoon after the ceremony of declaring the duke of Anjou king of Spain. That was appointed before he knew of this: It was to acquaint the king, That the queen of the Romans was brought to-bed of a prince. He made all the haſte he could to Paris, to let me know, that the duke of Anjou was declared. I fear, the emperor may thank himſelf; for it is probable, that he might have prevented it. He tells me, that he has news, by a courier, that the emperor's troops are marching for Italy; but I do not always rely upon his news: We ſhall ſoon hear, if it be ſo.

I do aſſure you, there is great joy at St. Germain's. The late king goes, this day, to wait on the duke of Anjou. I was, laſt night, at monſieur's, who is at Paris, where I found lord Melfort; who gave himſelf other airs, than he uſed to do.

I am juſt now told, that an offer is made to the elector of Bavaria, to continue in the government of the Netherlands, during his life; and that this new king of Spain will confirm it to him.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Novem. 20, 1700.

Since my laſt, there is another courier arrived to the Spaniſh embaſſador, with the entire will; for, before, they had only an abſtract. There is alſo a codicil, which was added to the will on the 21ſt of October; and relates only to the queen's dowry, which was but three hundred thouſand ducats, and, now, it is four. She has the choice of Naples, Milan, Sicily, or Flanders; where ſhe is to govern with a council; which the new king has power to appoint. There are ſome letters, which ſay, That count de Harrach, the emperor's miniſter, has made a proteſtation againſt the will, both as to the matter and manner; where he alledges, that the king's hand was guided.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Novem. 27, 1700.

My being at Fontainbleau was the reaſon of my being ſo ſoon informed of the intentions of the court. They could not well do otherwiſe than tell me; for, when we had the news of the king of Spain's death, I preſſed monſieur de Torcy to tell me what meaſures they would keep, in relation to the treaty. He anſwered me, from time to time, in a doubtful manner, which gave me reaſons to ſuſpect what was doing: So, at laſt, he had orders to acquaint me with it. Beſides, he ſaid, it was proper, that the king ſhould know it, otherwiſe, than by the public news.

Mr. Secretary Vernon to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, Nov. 18, 1700. O. S.

I have received your excellency's letter, of the 24th inſtant, N. S. and have laid it before his majeſty; but the king has not given me any thing, in command, at preſent to write to you. Their reſolutions are taken; therefore his majeſty may be allowed to conſider a little, what may be the conſequence of ſo ſudden a change in that court; as likewiſe to expect, what are the ſentiments of other princes and ſtates, who are equally concerned in the preſervation of the peace of Europe, and the preventing the balance of power from being broken, by the uniting too many dominions under any one prince; which was the juſt foundation of the late treaty. But, how does it yet appear, that the ſecurity of Europe is better provided for, by a prince of France being made king of Spain? Or, what care is taken to ſatisfy the world therein?

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Decem. 1, 1700.

I was very much in doubt about my going to Verſailles, till I received yours of the 4-14 inſtant, which determined me. I had a very good excuſe becauſe all, that go there now, have put their coaches in mourning, and mine are not yet done. They do already ſay at court, that, till I had orders to compliment the duke of Anjou, I do well not to appear there. I did find by the Dutch embaſſador, who went yeſterday for an anſwer to a memorial he had given in by order of the States, that monſieur de Torcy did intimate to him as much, as for himſelf.

The duke of Anjou is to ſet out on ſaturday next. I cannot tell but it may be deferred; and, if ſo, I ſhall be under ſome difficulties. Monſieur de Tallard was with me. He talks of going, but he has as yet no orders. I am ſtill of opinion, that you will not ſee him very ſoon, unleſs the king our maſter does ſignify his conſent to what has paſſed here.

The prince of Vaudemont has proclaimed the duke of Anjou, and has writ to the Spaniſh embaſſador here to aſſure the king of his fidelity, and he hopes he ſhall receive his orders before he goes for Spain, which he will punctually obſerve. The Savoy embaſſador has received orders to compliment him on his acceſſion to the throne, which he did yeſterday. The emperor's envoy has no orders as yet; and they do here not ſeem to value what the emperor can do. I am nevertheleſs told for certain, that a marriage will be propoſed to the emperor for one of the archdutcheſſes, according to the deſire of the late king of Spain, by his will. If that is not accepted, then they will marry him to a daughter of the duke of Savoy, who is about thirteen years old.

They begin to ſay here, that, as for Holland, if they are diſſatisfied, the king of Spain ought to bring them to obedience, as formerly belonging to that monarchy. And, if we diſpute, the little gentleman at St. Germain's is to be made uſe of. I wiſh that may not be the conſequence at laſt, though we ſhould act otherwiſe.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Stanhope.

Paris, Dec. 3, 1700.

The duke of Anjou ſets out to-morrow for Spain.—We hear as yet of no propoſals to make the Dutch ſecure; and I believe there is no thought of it; ſince they ſeem to ſay, that this will depend on Spain, and not on them. Monſieur de Bedmar has been here, and was at Marly. I am told, that the French king aſſured him, that, if there was occaſion for his aſſiſtance in Flanders, he would ſend what troops they deſired. I cannot think, that the elector of Bavaria will keep the government long, notwithſtanding what he has done, neither will the Dutch troops be permitted to ſtay there. Whatever propoſals will be made to the States, they will come from the French embaſſador at the Hague, and I hope you will let me know what ſteps he makes—I fear that the affairs of Europe are in a very ill condition, and that in a few years France will be maſter of us all. There goes a report about Paris, that I have aſked an audience of the king, which he denied me, becauſe I did not acknowledge the duke of Anjou. You will do well to let every body know, that there is no ſuch thing, and that I have no orders of that nature. What I had to ſay was much the ſame with what the Dutch embaſſador ſaid, and I only acquainted monſieur de Torcy with it, and did not give it in writing.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Dec. 4, 1700.

I take it for granted, that the duke of Anjou is to ſet out this morning.———I intend to go to court on Tueſday next, and ſee what is doing.—I do take all the care I can to behave myſelf as prudently as is poſſible at this juncture, ſince all perſons eyes are upon me; which I conceive is right, whatever the king's reſolution may be at laſt. But it is impoſſible to prevent idle diſcourſes here. I ſuppoſe you will hear, that I had aſked an audience of the king; and was refuſed, by reaſon I had not complimented the new king of Spain. There was no ground for this; you know very well, that I had no occaſion of doing it; having received no orders of that nature: Yet I am of opinion, that this might poſſibly have happened, if I had, and that there will be ſoon a declaration, that thoſe miniſters, whoſe maſters do not own the duke of Anjou, will not be received here. Their way has always been to carry things high. Not that I think, that they are in a condition of doing it, were other princes united.

Yeſterday I received the incloſed from monſieur Schonenberg to the king. What he acquaints me with is not worth taking notice of; but I am told from other hands, that there are a great many Spaniards diſſatisfied, and who do not approve of the conduct of the regents. The queen does not come to the council; perhaps this is only, that the houſe of Auſtria may have a better opinion of her. The count de Harrach has entered a proteſtation; as has alſo the pope's nuncio, in relation to Naples; and, his pretence is, that the king, dying without children, it reverts to the pope, as his fief. Both theſe proteſts I have ſent you, with the French king's letter, in anſwer to thoſe of the Spaniſh regents. The ſtyle is worth obſerving. I am told, that orders are given for a fleet to be ſet out. It is not yet known of what number of ſhips it is to conſiſt. Some of the forces, that were towards Bayonne, have orders to march this way.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Dec. 8, 1700.

I can now aſſure you that monſieur de Tallard takes his leave of the king, to-morrow, and will be ſoon in England. I did perceive by monſieur de Torcy, that he has a letter to the king; ſo that a little time will ſhew what we are to expect. I did not enter into diſcourſe on that ſubject, nor on the late proceedings of theirs; and it is to no purpoſe. The leſs I ſay, the better, unleſs I do it by order. What aſſurance Europe will have of it's ſecurity, I cannot tell, unleſs what they ſay here will be thought ſufficient, viz. that the French king will end his days in peace, and that his ambition is now ſatisfied. Here is arrived a courier from Madrid: the letters ſay, That they had proclaimed the duke of Anjou; and that there were ſhewn great expreſſions all the former parts of his life, that it made many conclude, that he found himſelf in an ill ſtate of health, the ſwelling of his legs being much increaſed, and that this might have ſuch effects on his mind, as to make him leſs warm and ſions of joy in all parts. They have alſo the ſame account from Naples. We ſhall ſoon ſee what the emperor thinks of all this matter. It is certain, this might have been prevented, if he had accepted the treaty. And, as it is, it may be very fatal to England, even without remedy. We are not united enough at home, to expect any good; and, I fear that thoſe, that diſapproved of the late treaty, will ſoon have reaſon to wiſh it had took place. My being in France has not given me a better opinion of their ſincerity, or good inclination towards us: And I cannot ſee, let this matter turn which way it will, that there is any occaſion for the king to be at the expence of an embaſſador, here; neither do I believe that monſieur de Tallard will ſtay long with you.

Mr. Stanhope to the earl of Mancheſter.

Hague, Dec. 10, 1700.

A courier was laſt night diſpatched by the ſtates to Paris, with their anſwer to the king's haughty letter. The anſwer contains, after ſuch thanks as he expects, that his majeſty knows very well the nature of their conſtitution to be ſuch, that they can take no new reſolutions, eſpecially in matters of this great importance, without communicating them firſt to their provinces; which they are more indiſpenſably obliged to obſerve in this caſe, becauſe the treaty of partage was in a moſt ſolemn manner communicated to, and approved, and ratified by, them; and therefore they cannot lay the treaty aſide, but with the ſame eſſential formalities it was made: that they would immediately communicate his majeſty's letter to their provinces, and hoped he would pleaſe to allow them ſo much time, as till they could know their own minds about this weighty affair, ſeeing it was impoſſible for them to take any reſolution of themſelves. Something I hear was mentioned of the king, as their ſtadtholder, whom they muſt alſo conſult: the ſame in ſubſtance was ſent laſt night by the States agent, both to the French and Spaniſh embaſſadors, here: this expedient will probably, give them a little more time to conſider what they do: they ſeem to be grown much cooler, and more moderate, than they were at the firſt news, when they talked of nothing but war; and I am now verily perſuaded, the party, acknowledging the new king, will ere long, prevail, by a great majority. One ſaid to me, to-day, They would have been pleaſed, if their embaſſador at Paris had done it, tho' without orders; for then they had been at liberty to have owned or diſowned his action, according as they found it ſuited their intereſt afterwards. The emperor's court makes a great noiſe, and talks of ſending an army into the Milaneſe early in the ſpring: But little is to be expected from a prince ſo irreſolute, and whoſe finances are in ſo lamentable a diſorder; beſides that, the German name, by their barbarous actions in the laſt war in Italy, is become much more odious than the French; and, beſides that, their unreaſonable project, of reviving his antiquated pretenſions to the imperial fiefs, has made all there fear, and conſequently hate, the nation.

While things are in this uncertain condition between this State, and France, and Spain, nothing can be moved on either ſide about the Dutch troops in Flanders. It would be moſt natural to expect the propoſals from the French, rather than Spain; becauſe they are jealous of the French, and not of Spain: But, in diſcourſe with the French embaſſador on the ſubject, he told me, If theſe people had any thing to move concerning it, they ought to addreſs themſelves to the king of Spain; for it no way concerned the king, his maſter.

The earl of Mancheſter, to Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Dec. 11, 1700.

I cannot tell from whence they have, at St. Germain's, an apprehenſion, that the prince of Wales will be carried away into England, with his own conſent; and, upon this, they have increaſed his guards; whereas, formerly, he had ſix, he has now fourteen. They think their game ſo very ſure, that there is no occaſion he ſhould make ſuch a ſtep. Beſides, the changing of his religion will never be ſuffered; and they have lately declared they would rather ſee him dead.

Juſt as I had wrote this letter, count Zinzendorf came to me, and told me, He had received orders to go to court, now the duke of Anjou is gone, as he uſed to do. He is to repreſent to monſieur de Torcy the right the emperor conceives he has to the crown of Spain. He alſo tells me, that the count de Goes, at the Hague, has full inſtructions; and that there is an envoy named for England, who will be ſoon there. In ſhort, I do perceive the emperor is willing, now, to do any thing the king ſhall like—Count Zinzendorf ſays alſo, That orders are given for the troops to march towards Italy and the Rhine.

The earl of Mancheſter to the earl of Jerſey.

Paris, Dec. 15, 1700.

Monſieur de Tallard is now with you, which will bring this great affair to a point. I cannot perceive, that he has orders to make any propoſal in relation of what may make England and Holland ſecure; and I am unwilling to make any ſteps that way, in order to find out what their thoughts are here, till I am a little informed of the opinion the king is of, and in what manner he could wiſh this would end. Some pretend, that they will give all the aſſurances, that can be deſired; but I take it, that we ſhould, if poſſible, have ſomething more ſubſtantial. To others they ſay, that what relates to Flanders, is not in their power, but what propoſals are to be made, muſt be made to Spain, which cannot be done, till we acknowledge the new king. Here is a diſcourſe, as if Spain would exchange Flanders for Rouſſillon, or ſome other place near them. It is not improbable, but this may be done in time, though at preſent they know their intereſt too well to give ſuch jealouſies, as this would do. The emperor's late proceedings, and the account, that he is ſending forces into Italy, have made the French take the reſolution of ſending count de Teſſe to Milan. He is declared general of the French forces, and goes away poſt on Saturday next. Twenty-five battallions, and three thouſand horſe, are marching with all diligence towards Savoy. It is ſaid, count Teſſe is to ſee in what condition affairs are there, and to concert with prince Vaudemont; whom, as I believe, they begin to miſtruſt, notwithſtanding what has paſſed. There is no doubt but he is to aſk the duke of Savoy for leave to paſs though his country; ſo that now he muſt explain himſelf, and they are not ſorry it happens ſo. Monſieur Zinzendorf was yeſterday at Verſailles. He had orders to acquaint monſieur de Torcy, that the emperor had received a letter from the States-General, jointly with their confederates, the kings of England and France, whereby they ſtill invite him to ſign the treaty, and ſay, that he had yet time to do it: That monſieur de Villars had, notwithſtanding this, declared, that his maſter had accepted the will, and that the duke of Anjou was king of Spain, which was a ſort of contradiction. The anſwer, which monſieur de Torcy made him, was, That he did not know what the States may have done, but that the king had no part in it: That he knew what had paſſed here in relation to the duke of Anjou, and that the king was reſolved to ſupport him with all his forces, which he did not doubt but was eaſy to do. This was the ſubſtance of what monſieur de Torcy told me. Count Zinzendorf did only ſet out the right of the emperor to Spain, by the will of Philip IV, the renunciation of France, and ſeveral treaties. There is no doubt but that the anſwer he had to all this was in very high terms, which I think could not have been expected otherwiſe.

Monſieur de Schonenberg to the earl of Mancheſter.

Madrid, Dec. 16, 1700.

The marquis of Harcourt is returned hither ſince Monday laſt. They careſs him extremely, and it is certain, that his commiſſion extends itſelf to affairs of more impotance, than the regulating only what relates to the reception of the new king. It ſeems, that thoſe, who have the greateſt credit in the Junta of the regency (that is to ſay, the cardinal Portocarrero and his adherents) have made a vow to abandon the fate of the monarchy to the arbitration and the good-will of France. Who would have thought, two years ago, that the Spaniards ſhould become ſo cordially tractable on this article? Thus it is true, that political maxims are no leſs ſubject to variation than other affairs. In the mean while, this court has ſent orders to the government of the Netherlands, ordering all, without exception, abſolutely to obey every thing, that his moſt Chriſtian majeſty ſhould judge proper to order the new king to do. Orders are alſo ſent to tranſport into the Milaneſe the few troops, that remain in Catalonia; and it is reſolved to raiſe fifteen hundred men in Italy, to be tranſported to Flanders, whence they will, no doubt, endeavour to remove the foreign troops, to put the French in their places.

It is almoſt inconceivable how much animoſity the ill intentioned at this court ſhew againſt England and the United provinces; but we have reaſon to hope, that the perfect union of thoſe two proteſtant powers (ſo abſolutely neceſſary in the preſent conjuncture) will diſſipate the ill deſigns of their implacable enemies.

What is moſt ridiculous in theſe indiſcreet miniſters is, that the monarchy is ſo generally decayed, that of themſelves they can do nothing; ſo that, if they ſhould come to be attacked by very moderate forces, they would be every way expoſed to irreparable loſſes, and eſpecially in America. It is true, that they would be ſafe under the proteſtion of France; but, in order to make them ſecure every way, as powerful as that crown is, it would be obliged to exhauſt itſelf.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Dec. 18, 1700.

The Dutch embaſſador had yeſterday his audience. The king's anſwer was, that he waited with impatience for the laſt reſolution of the States, which he hoped would be comfortable to what he ſo much deſired, the peace and quiet of Europe; and that he might aſſure his maſters of his friendſhip, which he would be glad to continue to them. Monſieur de Torcy told him afterwards, that the king was ready to give the States all the aſſurances they could deſire, in relation to their ſecurity. I am told, that the French embaſſador at the Hague has the like orders. It is certain, that here they are not for war, if it can be avoided; and that is not to be doubted, ſince they cannot hope for any advantage by it more than they have. They ſeem to value but little what the emperor can do, yet they are reſolved to take right meaſures in caſe of the worſt. The poſture of affairs at Vienna is ſuch, that, if the princes of Italy were not reſolved to oppoſe the Imperialiſts, yet they would not be in a condition to march theſe three months; but it ſeems, there is ſuch hatred againſt them there, by reaſon of their proceedings in the late war, that I find by all the Italian miniſters, that they like French troops better than Germans; ſo that I cannot ſee, but the great preparations, that are now talked of, will come to nothing. The emperor would be glad, that others would undertake his cauſe.

The envoy of the great duke had on Thurſday laſt a public audience, to congratulate the king on the duke of Anjou's acceſſion to the crown of Spain.

I have your's of the 2d, and I ſhall take what care I can to inform you of what orders are given in relation to the fitting out of a fleet. There is no doubt, but they are taking their meaſures, to have it in readineſs; and they ſay here, that we are doing the ſame.

Mr. ſecretary Vernon to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, Decemb. 10, 1700.

I now ſend you back Mr. Chetwynd, his majeſty having thought it proper, that he ſhould bring you the incloſed letter for monſieur Schonenberg; which his majeſty would have you ſend to Madrid, by the quickeſt and ſafeſt way you can think of. I ſend you the letter unſealed, that you may ſee it contains the copy of an inſtruction, which his majeſty gives Dr. Aglionby, who is appointed to carry his majeſty's anſwer to the letter, that his majeſty received, the laſt week, from the regency of Spain, notifying the king's death, and the diſpoſition he made of the crown. He is ordered to go by the way of the Groyne, and, I believe, will ſet forwards to-morrow. His majeſty would be glad, that he might reach Madrid, before the king of Spain's arrival there, it being of conſequence, that no time ſhould be loſt in executing theſe inſtructions. But, ſince he may be delayed by contrary winds, his majeſty has thought fit, that a copy of the inſtructions ſhould be ſent directly, and with ſpeed, to Mr. Schonenberg, that he may, in the mean time, make his majeſty's intentions, of living in his former friendſhip with Spain, rightly underſtood active, leſs diſpoſed to involve himſelf in new troubles; and that he might think it too inconſiderate a thing to enter into a new war, that was not likely to end ſoon, when he ſele himſelf in a declining ſtate of health. But the true ſecret of derſtood, and uſe his endeavours, either to keep them in, or bring them to the ſame diſpoſition towards us.

Now your excellency ſees, what will be his majeſty's conduct towards Spain, if he meets with ſuitable returns from thence; his majeſty would have it ſerve as an inſtruction to you, how to govern yourſelf in the converſations you may have an opportunity for with the Spaniſh embaſſador, reſiding at Paris, or with ſuch of the grandees, as are coming thither from the regency, to prevent their taking any ill impreſſions, in relation to his majeſty and his kingdom. But you will defer acquainting him with what his majeſty has now ordered, ſince it may be doubted, what uſe he would make of ſuch an information in that court. It ſeems fit likewiſe, that nothing be ſaid of the particulars to the emperor's miniſter.

——Monſieur Tallard took occaſion to tell me yeſterday, That he never intended to ſtay in England above three months. Thoſe will be expired in March next; and therefore, about February, he hoped to have orders to return home; but his maſter would ſend another to ſupply his place, and ſuch a one, as ſhould be agreeable to his majeſty. He touched upon the alterations, that had happened ſince his being here laſt, as to their accepting the will. He ſaid, The reaſons for it were contained in a memorial ſent into Holland; which he did not doubt but I had ſeen, and he could repeat them all by heart, if it were neceſſary. He did repeat moſt of what ſhewed the neceſſity of accepting the will, thereby to prevent the emperor's and the duke of Savoy's having a new title to the crown of Spain. He ſaid, if the emperor thought of invading Milan, his pretenſions would be unjuſt, ſince they had the original grant, by which Charles V. conferred that duchy upon Philip II. and his heirs, as well females as males. I aſked him, whether, if the emperor thought he had a right to Milan, and would aſſert it, that that ought to give jealouſies of diſturbances in parts far remote from it, and whether that would occaſion the marching of French troops into Flanders. That we were ſurprized to hear of meſſages ſent to the elector of Bavaria, to tell him, that the French troops ſhould march into Flanders, whenever he thought it neceſſary. I aſked if Holland had given any occaſion for it, or whether they imagined any alarm could come from thence. All he anſwered to it was, that he had not heard of any ſuch meſſages or orders. I told him, that the advantages, which accrued to France and Spain by the accepting the will, were viſible; but what had others to rely upon, who ſaw their treaty laid aſide, from whence they promiſed themſelves a proſpect of peace and tranquillity? His anſwer was, that Spain would remain as it has been, and they might have the ſame conteſts with them hereafter, as they had formerly. But his maſter loſt by complying with the will, but was ſatisfied, that juſtice had been done to his family, and the preſerving of peace was all he aimed at.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Decem. 22, 1700.

I was yeſterday at Verſailles, and I continue to go as I did formerly. I know they are a little ſuſpicious of what we are doing, and will be more ſo in caſe monſieur de Tallard believes all that is ſaid at London. I did take notice to monſieur de Torcy, in general words, of the change of the ſcene of Europe in a little time: That all princes would now be obliged to begin again, and to take meaſures conformable to the preſent poſture of affairs. He could not but allow it; but ſtill he was of opinion, that the peace of Europe was much more ſecured by this alteration. When I mentioned Portugal, he ſaid they could not think themſelves in any danger, ſince the king had ordered his miniſter there, as ſoon as he accepted the will, to aſſure the king of Portugal, that he was ready to enter into a league offenſive and defenſive with him.

By this you will ſee they are before-hand with any propoſal or offer the emperor can make. As to Holland, the French embaſſador there will have given them aſſurances; but you may rely on what I acquaint you, that it will be on condition, that their troops leave Flanders, which they will not admit here on any terms; and I am apt to think, that they will be ingenuous enough to own it. Yet at the ſame time they will ſend no French troops, but in defence of the country, in caſe the new king of Spain deſires it. They will, if poſſible, make the States declare themſelves before the meeting of our parliament. There is nothing ſtirring at St. Germain's. They now diſown and are aſhamed of what I told you concerning the prince of Wales.

Mr. ſecretary Vernon to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, Decem. 3, 1700.

Count de Tallard at his audience delivered his letter to the king, ſaying very little at the preſenting of it, and then ſtood ſilent. The king ſaid ſomething to him about his own inclinations to preſerve the peace of Europe, in manifeſting whereof he might perhaps have advanced too far; but he was very deſirous, that all the world ſhould be ſatisfied of his diſpoſitions towards the public tranquillity. I underſtand the embaſſador's anſwer was to this effect, That his maſter had the ſame inclinations to peace, and thought he had given proof of it by accepting the king of Spain's will. His majeſty ſeemed not to underſtand how that could be made out, and the embaſſador proceeded no farther, but only made a compliment on his own account, how much he valued the honour of returning hither again, to aſſure his majeſty of his profound reſpects, and ſo took his leave, and went immediately back to London. His majeſty had not opened the letter, while the embaſſador was with him, it not being uſual, but, reading it afterwards, he finds it is there ſaid of the embaſſador, 'That he will explain diſtinctly the juſt reaſons, that have obliged us to prefer the public tranquillity to our private intereſts, by accepting, as we have done, the will of the late catholic king, in favour of the king our grandſon.' And therefore his majeſty ſeems a little ſurpriſed, that he did not enlarge further at his audience, or deſire ſome other time for the doing it.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Decem. 25, 1700.

A perſon of diſtinction is come here from prince Vaudemont; his name is Colmonero. It is thought, that he brings an account of the affairs at Milan, and of the march of ſome of the emperor's troops towards Italy. Whereupon fixteen battalions are ordered thither, who are to embark, the eighth of next month this ſtile, at Antibes.——All the forces, that were in Catalonia and towards Bayonne, are marching into Dauphiné. The army that is intended for Italy, is to conſiſt of ſixty battalions, and eighty ſquadrons of horſe; four lieutenant-generals, and ſix major-generals. The two firſt of the lieutenant-generals are to embark with theſe ſixteen battalions. It is ſaid, that the whole army will amount to forty thouſand men, if there be occaſion. There is no doubt but they will ſend what they can, ſince they may by theſe means not only oppoſe the Imperialiſts entering into Italy, but they may attack them in their country.

I was yeſterday to make a viſit of ceremony to monſieur de Chamillard. I was willing to know his thoughts a little on what has happened, by way of diſcourſe, which cannot have any conſequences. His expreſſion, as to Holland, was, that he owned it was very difficult to prevent people's fears of what may happen hereafter; but that in great meaſure it may be done by making of leagues offenſive and defenſive with each other, &c. and that the king would contribute all he could towards it. It is certain, that at preſent they do not deſire to break with England. What they will aim at, here, is the ſending the Dutch troops out of Flanders; and I am ſatisfied that is their deſign: ſo that it is very proper, that monſieur de Tallard ſhould be brought to explain himſelf on that ſubject. His coming ſo abruptly to Hampton-Court, before he had an anſwer from you, ſhews the nature of the man. But beſides, as they ſuſpect what we are doing, ſo I ſee they are here in the laſt impatience to know our reſolutions; and there is not a time I go to Verſailles, that they do not expect I ſhould ſay ſomething of that matter.

Mr. Secretary Vernon to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, Dec. 16, 1700, O. S.

Count Tallard has not been at court ſince his audience on Wedneſday, nor have I ſeen him, or heard from him, ſince I made him my viſit that day. I do not know whether he has taken any thing amiſs; that he can have no reaſon for it, you will judge by the accounts I have ſent you. If you find therefore, that the accounts he has writ into France are different from what I ſent you laſt poſt, you will endeavour to make things rightly underſtood, that we may not fall into coldneſſes upon being miſapprehended. But this reſerved humour, M. de Tallard ſeems to be in, looks as if he had writ ſomething home, upon which he expected further orders.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Dec. 29, 1700.

Monſieur de Torcy mentioned to me the project of a league between England, France, Spain, and Holland, for the ſecuring of Flanders; and any other prince may come into it. Monſieur Lelienroot had made this propoſal; and the king, here, is ready to conſent to it, and give all ſort of aſſurances, that can be deſired; and he hoped, I had, or would acquaint the king with the diſpoſition they were in, to contribute towards the public peace. I ſaid, That it could not be doubted, but the king had the ſame deſire and concern for the peace of Europe, which was manifeſt by the treaty; and it was plain, that he could have no other proſpect. As to the propoſal of monſieur Lelienroot, I knew nothing of it; but, I ſuppoſe, the meaning of it was, that all things, in Flanders, ſhould remain as they are. Then he explained himſelf, and ſaid, That, as the king did not intend to ſend any troops there, ſo it could not be expected, that the Dutch ſhould ſtay there, except only ſuch as belong to the king of Spain. I have long perceived, that this was their deſign; I only ſaid, that I thought Spain could never apprehend any thing, from the Dutch troops remaining there, though I could not tell, but it might give apprehenſions to others, if they were removed. He would have argued the matter, but I avoided it. I am confident that, if in Spain it ſhould be approved of, it will be oppoſed here: Yet, if the emperor can make any head, ſo as to be able to give them trouble, and Portugal ſhould be diſſatisfied, as, I hear, they are, I cannot but think they may be brought to what terms we pleaſe.

Monſieur Schonenberg to the earl of Mancheſter.

Madrid, Dec. 30, 1701.

The affairs, here, continue to repreſent a lively image of the inconſtancy of human affairs, the regency of Spain doing all that it can to draw on it the yoke of France; but, provided England and Holland keep firm, there may be means found to make them return to their true intereſt, and to maintain the new king in a convenient independency.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Jan. 1, 1701.

I cannot in the leaſt complain of Monſieur de Torcy. He is extremely civil to me; but, in general, there is a mighty ſhyneſs, of which I take no ſort of notice, and do as I uſed to do. All things move, here, as the king takes notice of them; and, ſince the accepting of the will, he has never ſpoken a word to me, though I continue to make my court every Tueſday.

I am told, That the French king has wrote again to the States, to declare themſelves, by ſuch a time; elſe he ſhall look upon them, as taking meaſures with the emperor, and act accordingly, to prevent their deſigns. By what I perceive of things, this was not ſo preremptory, as it was ſaid; though, that they will preſs the States, is not to be doubted. I am informed, juſt now, That an expreſs is come from Madrid; and that the regents have deſired the French king to accept the generalſhip of the monarchy of Spain; and, that they have ſent orders to all the viceroys, governors, &c. in all parts, to obey his orders, punctually, in all matters whatſoever. If this be true, as it is very probable, one may judge what will be the conſequence.

Mr. Secretary Vernon to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, Dec. 23, 1700, O. S.

Your excellency's letter, of the 29th inſtant, arrived yeſterday; and, as ſoon as I had decyphered it, I laid it before his majeſty, being then at Hampton-this unaccountable behaviour in the king was ſoon diſcovered.

The earl of Rocheſter was now ſet at the head of affairs, and was to bring the tories into the king's ſervice. He was himſelf declared lord-lieutenant of Ireland [1]; and, that the moſt eminent man of the whigs might not oppoſe them in the new parliament, they got Mr. Montague, now auditor of the Exchequer to be made a baron. He took the title of Hallifax, which was ſunk by the death of that marquis without iſſue-male. The lord Godolphin was made firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury; the lord Tankerville lord privy-ſeal, in the room of the lord Lonſdale deceaſed; and ſir Charles Hedges, one of the judges of the admiralty, was appointed one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate, in the room of the earl of Jerſey.

The tories had continued, from the king's firſt acceſſion to the throne, in a conſtant oppoſition to his intereſts. Many of them were believed to be jacobites in their hearts, and they were generally much againſt the toleration, and violent enemies to the diſſenters. They had been backward in every thing, that was neceſſary for carrying on the former war; they had oppoſed taxes as much as they could, and were againſt all ſuch as were eaſily levied, and leſs ſenſibly felt by the people; and were always for thoſe, that were moſt grievous to the nation, hoping, that, by theſe heavy burthens, the people would grow weary of the war and of the government. On the contrary, the whigs, by ſupporting both, were become leſs acceptable to the nation. In elections their intereſt was much ſunk; every new parliament was a new diſcovery, that they were become leſs popular; and the others, who were always oppoſing and complaining, were now cried up as the patriots. In the three laſt ſeſſions, the whigs had ſhewn ſuch a readineſs to give the king more force, together with a management to preſerve the grants in Ireland, that they were publickly charged as betrayers of their country, and as men, who were for truſting the king with an army. In ſhort, they were accuſed of too ready a compliance with the humours and intereſts of courts and favourites, and were therefore generally cenſured and decried. And now, ſince they had not ſucceeded to the king's mind, ſome about him poſſeſſed him with this, that either they would not, or could not ſerve him. In ſome of them indeed, their principles lay againſt thoſe things, whereas the tories principles naturally led them to make the crown great and powerful. It was alſo ſaid, that the great oppoſition made to every thing, which the king deſired, and the difficulties, that had been of late put upon him, flowed chiefly from the hatred borne to thoſe, who were employed by him, and who had brought in their friends and creatures into the beſt poſts. And they were now ſtudying to recover their loſt popularity, which would make them cold, if not backward, in complying with what the king might deſire for the future. The whigs alſo began to complain of the king's conduct, of his minding affairs ſo little, of his being ſo much out of the kingdom, and of his ill choice of favourites: and they imputed the late miſcarriages to errors in conduct, which they could neither prevent nor redreſs. The favourites, who thought of nothing but to continue in favour, and to be ſtill ſafe and ſecure in their credit, concurred to preſs the king to take other meaſures, and to turn to another ſet of men, who would be no longer his enemies, if they had ſome of the beſt places ſhared among them. And, though this method had been almoſt fatal, when the king had followed it ſoon after his acceſſion to the crown, yet there ſeemed to be leſs danger

Hampton-Court. His majeſty commanded me to acquaint you, That he does not know what monſieur de Lelienroot's project is, any further, than the account you give of it; nor does he know upon what grounds he propoſes it; but he ſuppoſes it ariſes from monſieur Lelienroot, or monſieur Palmguiſt, without any directions from the king of Sweden.

His majeſty approves of what you replied to monſieur de Torcy, upon his explaining, That it was the intention of that court, not to allow of the continuance of the Dutch troops in Flanders. If theſe methods are purſued, it will be hard to make it underſtood, that they are meant to free people from their jealouſies and apprehenſions.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Jan. 8, 1701.

I had the favour of your's, on Decemb. 23. I take it, that the propoſals, which monſieur Lelienroot makes, are of himſelf, and not by order; and that monſieur Palmguiſt does the ſame thing here. They might have their ends in it, for the ſervice of their maſter; but the ſucceſs, the king of Sweden has had lately, may be, will put an end to all thoſe projects.

Mr. ſecretary Vernon to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, Dec. 30, 1700, O. S.

Count Wratiſlaw, the emperor's envoy, arrived here on Saturday laſt. He goes, to-morrow, to Hampton-Court, where his majeſty has appointed him a private audience. I hear, he already begins to diſcourſe of both the emperor's pretenſions, as well to the Spaniſh ſucceſſion, as to the fief of Milan; and that they are publiſhing a manifeſto at Vienna, in maintenance of each of thoſe titles; and are reſolved to juſtify them, though they ſtand alone in the defence of them; but, they ſay, they cannot fall alone, ſince their ruin muſt draw others after them.

His majeſty is not very well; his appetite abates, and his legs are more ſwelled; but it chiefly ariſes from great thoughtfulneſs, in relation to the public.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Jan. 12, 1701.

I cannot but think, by the proceedings of the regents of Spain, that they are reſolved to have the French king for their king; and that the duke of Anjou is to have only the name. There is another expreſs come from them, by which they acquaint this king, That they have ſent orders to their miniſters in all courts, to act in concert with the French, and to obey the orders, which the French king ſhall ſend them; and to let them know, that Spain ſhall be included in whatever treaty France ſhall think fit to make; and that they may ſign it, without ſtaying for further orders from them. It is certain, that this king ſaid, on this occaſion, that he was Le premier miniſtre du Roy d'Eſpagne: I am of opinion, that the uſe he will make of this power, is, that he will ſhew all Europe, that, whoever intends to keep any meaſures with Spain, it muſt be by the means of France, or, at leaſt, with their approbation. Beſides, having ſuch a power, the French troops may poſſeſs themſelves of what places they pleaſe. So that there is ſome reaſon to fear, that, in caſe things ſhould begin to look like a war, the Dutch troops in Flanders may paſs their time ill. I am ſatisfied, that the French will avoid doing any thing of this nature, as long as they can, in hopes of preventing a war; and the meaſures, they now ſeem to take, are ſuch, that they may not be eſteemed the aggreſſors, but rather on the defenſive. They are too ſenſible of the condition of France, where there are no means left to raiſe any conſiderable ſum, but by a capitation, which is already ſigned; but, unleſs there be occaſion, it will not be levied. It is a very hard tax on the people, eſpecially when all other impoſitions remain as they were, during the late war, with an augmentation of five millions of livres for this year. The lottery, which, it was thought, would have ſucceeded, comes to nothing.

It is now thought, here, that the war in Italy is certain; and this court endeavours to perſuade the pope, and the reſt of the princes of Italy, to form a league againſt the emperor; for, ſay they, without ſomething of that nature is done, that country will, in all likelihood, be the ſeat of war.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Jan. 15, 1701.

There is nothing now left to make the great union betwixt France and Spain complete, but the ſettling their trade; and it is ſaid, that all the impoſitions on the produce of Spain will be taken off here, as the like will be done there, in relation to the produce of France. Several other regulations are conſidering of; and there is no doubt but France will find their account. The great point will be, whether France can furniſh them with commodities proper for the Indies. If ſo, we may greatly ſuffer.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Jan. 19, 1701.

I often meet the Spaniſh embaſſador, and I obſerve your directions. I do not in the leaſt take notice to him of what his majeſty's intentions are. He began to talk with me yeſterday at Verſailles, and aſked me, whether we would break with them; making many profeſſions, that whatever had paſſed, yet in Spain they had the ſame deſire to cultivate and increaſe, if poſſible, the friendſhip with his majeſty. I told him, that I did not know, but that there might be the ſame deſire on the king my maſter's part; but that he muſt allow, that the late proceedings of the regents cannot but have given great jealouſies to Europe, and the regents had acted, as if they were deſirous of being in a manner tributary to France, which would be alſo of fatal conſequence to themſelves at laſt. His anſwer was natural enough: He ſaid, what would you have them do, whilſt they are threatened with war from all parts, and are not in a condition to help themſelves? But, if there was any diſpoſition on our ſide to continue the antient good underſtanding, we ſhould ſoon ſee another effect. This he ſpake in a manner as if he had orders for what he ſaid; and that, if I doubted, he might venture to give it under his hand, that they would renew all treaties, &c. I find, that even here they are ſo apprehenſive of a general war, if England ſhould engage itſelf, that they will, I am ſatisfied, conſent to almoſt any thing to prevent it, even to leave the Dutch troops in Flanders, rather than fail. Theſe matters are proper to be tranſacted in Spain, where there may be ſome faith ſtill left. I am of opinion, that I partly know the propoſals monſieur Wratiſlaw will make; but I cannot ſee the emperor is able to perform his part; and it is ſaid, that prince Lewis of Baden is not for having the emperor engage in a war.

[1] The king writ the following ſhort letter, to the earl of Galway, a little before the earl of Rocheſter's promotion.

Loo, Aug. 15, 1700.

It is ſome time ſince I received your letter of the 13th of July, in which you deſire to know on whom I have caſt my eyes for the government of Ireland; and, as I am ſure that what I write you will be ſecret, I ſcruple not to tell you, that I intend to give it to lord Rocheſter, and to declare it at my return to England; but he will not go to Ireland till the next ſpring. You will eaſily conceive the reaſons of it. I ſhall expect your thoughts of a matter that concerns you, and you may always rely on my friendſhip.

William R.

in trying it now, than was formerly. The nation was in full peace; and it was commonly ſaid, that nobody thought any more of king James, and therefore it was fit, for the king's ſervice, to encourage all his people to come into his intereſts, by letting them ſee how ſoon he could forget all that was paſt. Theſe conſiderations had ſo far prevailed with him, that, before he went out of England, he had engaged himſelf ſecretly to them. It is true, the death, firſt of the duke of Glouceſter, and now of the king of Spain, had very much changed the face of affairs, both at home and abroad; yet the king would not break off from his engagements.

It might have been expected, that, when ſuch a new unlooked-for ſcene was opened, the king ſhould have loſt no time in bringing his parliament together, as ſoon as poſſible. It was prorogued to the 20th of November; and the king had ſent orders from Holland to ſignify his reſolution for their meeting on that day. But the miniſters, whom he was then bringing into his buſineſs, had other views. They thought they were not ſure of a majority in parliament for their purpoſes, and therefore prevailed with the king to diſſolve the parliament; and, after a ſet of ſheriffs were appointed, fit for the turn, a new parliament was ſummoned to meet on the 6th of February.

The man, on whoſe management of the houſe of commons, the new miniſtry depended, was Mr. Robert Harley, the heir of a family, which had been hitherto the moſt eminent of the preſbyterian party. His education was in that way; but he, not being conſidered at the revolution, as he thought he deſerved, had ſet himſelf to oppoſe the court in every thing, and to find fault with the whole adminiſtration. He had the chief hand both in the reduction of the army, and in the matter of the Iriſh grants. The high party truſted him, though he ſtill kept up an intereſt among the preſbyterians; and he had ſo particular a dexterity that he made both the high church party and the diſſenters depend upon him, ſo it was agreed, that he ſhould be ſpeaker.

All this while the new miniſters talked of nothing but negotiations, and gave it out, that the French king was ready to give all the ſecurity, that could be deſired, for maintaining the peace of Europe. At this time the emperor ſent over to England count Wratiſlaw, to ſet forth his title to the Spaniſh monarchy, ſettled on his houſe by antient entails, often repeated, and now devolving on him, by an undoubted right, ſince by the renunciation made by the late queen of Spain (as was ſtipulated by the treaty of the Pyrenees, and then made by her in due form) this could not be called in queſtion. But the new miniſters were ſcarce civil to the count, and would not enter into any conſultations with him. But the Dutch, who were about the king, and all the foreign miniſters, ſpoke in another ſtile. They ſaid, that nothing but a general union of all the powers in Europe could hinder the conjunction of the two monarchies. So, by what thoſe, who talked often with the king, gave out, it came to be ſoon known, that the king ſaw the neceſſity of a new war, but that he kept himſelf in a great reſerve, that he might manage his new miniſters and their party, and ſee if he could engage them to concur with him.

It will not be improper to cloſe the relation of this year, with which the century ends, with an account of the king of Sweden's glorious campaign. He made all the haſte he could to relieve Livonia, where not only Riga was for ſome months beſieged by the king of Poland, but Narva was alſo attacked by the Czar, who hoped, by taking it, to get an entrance into the Baltic: The Czar came in perſon againſt it, with an army of one hundred thouſand men: Narva was not provided for a ſiege: It had a ſmall garriſon, and had very poor magazines, yet the Moſcovites attacked it ſo feebly, that it held out beyond all expectation, till the end of the year. Upon the king of Sweden's landing at Revel, the Saxons drew off from Riga, after a long ſiege at a vaſt charge. This being done, and Riga both opened and ſupplied, that king marched next to Narva; the Czar, upon his march towards him, left his army in ſuch a manner, as made all people conclude, he had no mind to hazard his perſon; the king marched through ways, that were thought ſo impracticable, that little care had been taken to ſecure them; ſo he ſurprized the Muſcovites, and broke into their camp, before they apprehended he was near them; he totally routed their army, took many priſoners, with all their artillery and baggage, and ſo made a glorious entry into Narva. This is the nobleſt campaign that we find in any hiſtory; in which a king, about eighteen years of age, led an army himſelf againſt three kings, who had confederated againſt him, and was ſucceſsful in every one of his attempts, giving great marks, both of perſonal courage and good conduct in them all.

[1700-1] On the 6th of February, the parliament met, but was prorogued to the 10th, when the commons were directed by the king to chuſe a ſpeaker. Sir Thomas Littleton had been ſent for by the king, who told him, that he thought it would be for his ſervice, that he ſhould give way at that time to Mr. Harley's being choſen into that office; which Sir Thomas acquieſced in, and accordingly abſented himſelf from the houſe on the day of election, when Mr. Harley, being the firſt perſon propoſed for ſpeaker, and afterwards ſir Richard Onſlow named by others, the former had two hundred and forty-nine votes for him, againſt one hundred and twenty-five in the negative. The next day, the king made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"OUR great misfortune, in the loſs of the duke of Glouceſter, has made it abſolutely neceſſary, that there ſhould be a further proviſion for the ſucceſſion to the crown in the proteſtant line after me and the princeſs. The happineſs of the nation, and the ſecurity of our religion, which is our chiefeſt concern, ſeems ſo much to depend upon this, that I cannot doubt but it will meet with a general concurrence; and I earneſtly recommend it to your early and effectual conſideration.

"The death of the late king of Spain, with the declaration of his ſucceſſor to that monarchy, has made ſo great an alteration in the affairs abroad, that I muſt deſire you very maturely to conſider their preſent ſtate; and I make no doubt, but your reſolution thereupon will be ſuch, as ſhall be moſt conducing to the intereſt and ſafety of England, the preſervation of the proteſtant religion in general, and the peace of all Europe.

"Theſe things are of ſuch weight, that I have thought them moſt proper for the conſideration of a new parliament, to have the more immediate ſenſe of the kingdom in ſo great a conjuncture.

"I muſt deſire of you, gentlemen of the houſe of commons, ſuch ſupplies, as you ſhall judge neceſſary for the ſervice of the current year; and I muſt particularly put you in mind of the deficiencies and public debts, occaſioned by the late war, that are yet unprovided for.

"I am obliged farther to recommend to you, that you would inſpect the condition of the fleet, and conſider what repairs or augmentations may be requiſite for the navy, which is the great bulwark of the Engliſh nation, and ought, in this conjuncture moſt eſpecially, to be put in a good condition; and that you would alſo conſider what is proper for the better ſecurity of thoſe places, where the ſhips are laid up in winter.

"The regulation and improvement of our trade is of ſo public a concern, that I hope it will ever have your ſerious thoughts; and, if you can find proper means of ſetting the poor at work, you will eaſe yourſelves of a very great burden, and at the ſame time add ſo many uſeful hands to be employed in our manufactures, and other public occaſions.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I Hope there will be ſuch an agreement and vigour in the reſolutions you ſhall take upon the important matters now before you, as may make it appear we are firmly united among ourſelves; and, in my opinion, nothing can contribute more to our ſafety at home, or for our being conſiderable abroad."

As ſoon as the parliament was opened, it appeared, that the French had a great party in it. It is certain, great ſums came over this winter from France; the packet-boat came ſeldom without ten thouſand Louis d'Ors; it often brought more. The nation was filled with them, and in ſix months time a million of guineas were coined out of them. The merchants indeed ſaid, that the balance of trade was then ſo much turned to our ſide, that, whereas we uſed to carry over a million of our money in ſpecie, we then ſent no money to France, and had at leaſt half that ſum ſent over to balance the trade. Yet this did not account for that vaſt flood of French gold, that was viſible in the nation. And, upon the departure of monſieur de Tallard, the French embaſſador, whoſe place was ſupplied by monſieur Pouſſin, with the character only of ſecretary, a very viſible alteration was found in the bills of exchange. For which reaſon reaſon it was concluded, that great remittances had been made to that embaſſador, and that theſe were diſtributed among thoſe, who reſolved, to merit a ſhare in that wealth, which came over ſo copiouſly beyond the example of former times.

Upon the view of the houſe it appeared evidently, that the tories were a great majority; yet they, to make the matter ſure, reſolved to clear the houſe of a great many, who were engaged in another intereſt. Reports were brought to them of elections, that had been ſcandalouſly purchaſed by ſome, who were concerned in the new Eaſt-India company. Inſtead of drinking and entertainments, by which elections were formerly managed, now a moſt ſcandalous practice was brought in of buying votes, with ſo little decency, that the electors engaged themſelves by ſubſcriptions to chuſe a blank perſon, before they were truſted with the name of their candidate. The old Eaſt-India company had driven a courſe of corruption within doors with ſo little ſhame, that the new company intended to follow their example, but with this difference, that, whereas the former had bought the perſons, who were elected, they reſolved to buy elections. Sir Edward Seymour, who had dealt in this corruption his whole life-time, and whom the old company was ſaid to have bought before at a very high price, brought before the houſe of commons the diſcovery of ſome of the practices of the new company. The examining of theſe took up many days. In concluſion, the matter was ſo well proved, that ſeveral elections were declared void; and ſome of the perſons ſo choſen were for ſome time kept in priſon, after they had been expelled the houſe. In theſe proceedings great partiality appeared; for, when in ſome caſes corruption was proved clearly againſt ſome of the tory party, and but doubtfully againſt ſome of the contrary ſide, that which was voted corruption in the whigs, was called the giving alms in the tories.

A deſign was laid in the houſe of commons, to open the ſeſſions with an addreſs to the king, that he would own the king of Spain. The matter was ſo far concerted that they had agreed on the words of the vote, and ſeemed not to doubt of the concurrence of the houſe. But Mr. Monkton oppoſed it with great heat, and among other things ſaid, that, if this vote was carried, he ſhould expect, that the next vote would be for owning the pretended prince of Wales. Upon this occaſion it appeared, how much popular aſſemblies are apt to be turned by a thing boldly ſaid, though the conſequence is ever ſo remote; ſince the connexion of theſe two points lay at ſome diſtance; for the iſſue of the debate was quite contrary to that, which was deſigned, and the addreſs was laid aſide.

On the 14th, upon reading the king's ſpeech, the conſideration of it was adjourned till the next day; but in the mean time the houſe came to this reſolution, 'That they would ſtand by and ſupport his majeſty and his government, and take ſuch effectual meaſures, as may beſt conduce to the intereſt and ſafety of England, and the preſervation of the proteſtant religion.' This reſolution was preſented to the king by the whole houſe, on the 17th of February, to which he gave them this anſwer:

"I thank you for this addreſs, and your ready concurrence to thoſe great ends therein mentioned, which I take to be extremely important to the honour and ſafety of England; and I aſſure you, I ſhall never propoſe any thing but what is for our common advantage and ſecurity. Having this occaſion, I think it proper to acquaint you, that yeſterday I received a memorial from the envoy extraordinary of the States-General, a tranſlation whereof I leave with you. As to the firſt part of it, I think it neceſſary to aſk your advice; and as to the latter part, I deſire your aſſiſtance."

In this memorial, mentioned by the king, the States-General acquainted his majeſty, 'That they having conſidered, that their delay of owning the duke of Anjou for king of Spain was ſubject to malicious interpretations, as if their aim had been only to gain time to put themſelves in a warlike poſture, they thought themſelves obliged to acknowledge the duke of Anjou without any condition, reſerving to themſelves to ſtipulate, in the negotiation ready to begin, the neceſſary conditions to ſecure the peace of Europe; in which negotiation they are firmly reſolved to do nothing without the conſent of his majeſty and the other powers intereſted in the maintenance of the peace, as they have expreſsly declared to the embaſſador of France. That therefore they prayed him to ſend to his miniſter at the Hague, neceſſary inſtructions and orders to act conjointly in this negotiation, and that nothing be concluded but wherein England and Holland may equally find their ſecurity, and which at the ſame time may tend to ſtrengthen the public tranquillity. But as it may happen not to be poſſible to agree with France and Spain on reaſonable conditions, and that, the negotiation being interrupted, they may be ſuddenly attacked by the numerous troops, which France has ordered to move towards their frontiers, their envoy is to repreſent to his majeſty the urgent neceſſity they ſhould have, in ſo great a danger, of the aſſiſtance of England, and to deſire him to get the ſuccours, ſtipulated by the treaty, in readineſs, that they may rely on them, if occaſion required."

The next day, this memorial was communicated to the houſe of lords. And the commons, upon report of the king's anſwer to their addreſs, reſolved, "That an humble addreſs be made to his majeſty by ſuch members, as are of his privy-council, that he will pleaſe to cauſe the treaty between England and the States-General of the 3d of March 1677, and all the renewals thereof ſince that time, to be laid before the houſe." Which being done by Mr. ſecrerary Hedges; the houſe reſolved, "That an humble addreſs be made to his majeſty, that he will pleaſe to enter into ſuch negotiations, in concert with the States-General of the United-Provinces, and other potentates, as may moſt effectually conduce to the mutual ſafety of theſe kingdoms, and the States General, and the preſervation of the peace of Europe; and giving him aſſurances of ſupport and aſſiſtance, in performance of the treaty made with the States-General the 3d of March 1677."

It is obſerved, that the deſiring the king in this addreſs to enter into a new alliance with the States for our mutual defence, and for the preſervation of the peace of Europe, was not carried without much difficulty; thoſe words being conſidered, as indeed they were, an inſinuation towards a war.

The addreſs was preſented, the day following, by the whole houſe, when the king made them this anſwer: "Gentlemen, I thank you heartily for the advice you have given me, and your unanimous reſolution to ſupport and aſſiſt me in making good the treaty mentioned in your addreſs; and I will immediately order my miniſters abroad to enter into negotiations in concert with the States-General and other potentates, for the attaining of thoſe great ends, which you deſire. Nothing can more effectually conduce to our ſecurity, than the unanimity and vigour you have ſhewn on this occaſion. And I ſhall always endeavour, on my part, to preſerve and encreaſe this mutual truſt and confidence between us."

On the 17th of February, Mr. ſecretary Vernon communicated to the commons by his majeſty's orders a letter, which came to London not deſignedly, as is ſuppoſed, in the French mail. This letter, was dated the 18th of February, N. S. and was written by the earl of Melfort to his brother the earl of Perth, then governor to the pretended prince of Wales. It contained his ſchemes to ſet on foot another invaſion, and diſcovered that he held a cloſe correſpondence with the earl of Arran, now duke of Hamilton. Melfort urged in it many arguments, to get the earl of Middleton diſcarded, and recommended himſelf, as much fitter to be truſted.

This letter was alſo communicated to the houſe of lords, who ordered it to be printed [m], and the next day preſented an addreſs to the king, "Humbly returning their thanks and

[m] This letter was as follows:

My deareſt brother,

Since I promiſed to put in writing what we had not time to talk fully of, I am ſet down to it in the morning, that my letter may be ready for the meſſenger, if any call. I told all that I had heard at Verſailles, and the favourable audience I had of madam Maintenon; for which I beg it of you to return my moſt humble thanks to the queen, and beg her to be ſo good, as to thank madam Maintenon, and know of her, what can be done in that matter: It will be a great charity in the queen. I told you, among other things, the great fleet the king intends to put out this ſummer; the orders being given, and the money ready, the ſtores full, and every one concerned active in their ſtation. There is no doubt, but this fleet will be maſter of the ſea for ſome time, if not for all the ſummer; becauſe the Dutch dare not ſtir, till the Engliſh be ready: and they have long debates, yet, before they can be in a condition to act, if they have the will; and it is a queſtion, if they will have it at all. The king never had ſo favourable a conjuncture, if he can perſuade this king, that his affairs are really in the circumſtances they are in; but there is the difficulty. The king and queen have more authority with the king and with madam de Maintenon, than any other in the world can have; but that is not all. There ſhould be ſome one, acceptable to the miniſters, who ſhould lay before them thoſe proofs their majeſties cannot enter into the detail of, and explain the reaſons, make plans and memoirs, by their majeſties approbation, to convince them of the neceſſity, and ſhew the eaſineſs of reſtoring the king, the glory it brings their kingdom, and the advantage acknowledgments to his majeſty for his concern expreſſed in his ſpeech for the proteſtant religion, and his care for it's preſervation, by recommending to their conſideration a further proviſion for the ſucceſſion to the crown in the proteſtant line. They added, that, being deeply ſenſible of the weight of what his majeſty had further recommended to them, they could not but deſire he would be pleaſed to order all treaties made by him, ſince the late war, to be laid before them, that they might thereby be better enabled to give their advice. They likewiſe requeſted his majeſty to engage in ſuch alliances abroad, as he ſhould think proper for preſerving the balance of Europe, aſſuring him, that they would readily concur with whatever ſhould be conducive to the honour and ſafety of England, preſervation of the proteſtant religion, and the peace of Europe. Next they humbly thanked his majeſty for communicating the earl of Melfort's letter to them, and deſired he would be pleaſed to order the ſeizing of all horſes and arms of papiſts, and other diſaffected perſons, and have thoſe ill men removed from London, according to law; but eſpecially they deſired he would pleaſe to give directions for a ſearch to be made after arms and proviſions of war mentioned in the letter. Laſtly, they requeſted, that ſuch a fleet might ſpeedily he fitted out, as his majeſty in his great wiſdom ſhould think neceſſary for the defence of himſelf and kingdoms." His majeſty thanked their lordſhips for this addreſs, and 'for the concern they expreſſed in relation to the common ſecurity both at home and abroad;' and told them, 'he would give the neceſſary orders for thoſe things they deſired of him, and take care for fitting out ſuch ſhips, as in that conjuncture ſhould be neceſſary for their common ſafety.'

Among other inconveniencies occaſioned by the diſſolution of the laſt parliament, and delay of the ſeſſion, which was the conſequence of it, one was, that the allotted time for circulating Exchequer bills was ſo near elapſed, that the credit of thoſe bills muſt neceſſarily ſink, unleſs ſome effectual remedy were provided, which the ſhortneſs of the time ſeemed not to allow. However ſuch diligence and diſpatch was uſed, that, on the 26th of February, 'a bill for renewing the bills of credit, commonly called Exchequer bills,' was brought into the houſe, and on the 6th of March ſent up to the lords; and on the 13th paſſed the royal aſſent.

The king having earneſtly preſſed the parliament to provide for the ſucceſſion of the crown after himſelf and the princeſs of Denmark, the commons took the ſame into conſideration, and on the 3d of March reſolved, "That for the preſerving the peace and happineſs of this kingdom, and the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion by law eſtabliſhed, it is abſolutely neceſſary, a further declaration be made of the limitation and ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, after his majeſty, and the princeſs, and the heirs of their bodies reſpectively. And that further proviſion be firſt made for the ſecurity of the rights and liberties of the people."

The new miniſters ſpoke for this reſolution with great zeal; from which their friends made inferences in their favour, that certainly men, in the intereſts of France, would not promote a deſign ſo deſtructive of all they drove at. This was ſo little of a piece with the reſt of their conduct, that thoſe, who were ſtill jealous of their ſincerity, looked on it as a blind to cover their ill deſigns, and to gain them ſome credit; for they could not but ſee, that, if France was once poſſeſſed of the power and wealth of Spain, our laws and every thing that we could do to ſupport them, would prove but feeble defences. The manner, in which the motion of the ſucceſſion was managed, did not carry in it great marks of ſincerity. It was often put off from one day to another, and it gave place to the moſt trifling matters. At laſt, when a day was ſolemnly ſet for it, and all people expected, that it would paſs without any difficulty, Mr. Harley moved, that ſome things previous to that might be firſt conſidered. He obſerved, that the haſte the nation was in, when the preſent government was ſettled, had made them go too faſt, and overlook many ſecurities, which might have prevented much miſchief; and therefore he hoped they would not now fall into the ſame error; ſince nothing preſſed them at preſent. He moved then, that they would ſettle ſome conditions of government, as preliminaries, before they ſhould proceed to the nomination of the perſon; that ſo they might fix every thing that was wanting, to make their ſecurity compleat. This was popular, and took with many; and it had ſo fair an appearance, that, indeed none could oppoſe it. Some weeks were ſpent upon it. Suſpicious people thought, this was done on deſign to blaſt the motion, and to offer ſuch extravagant limitations, as ſhould quite change the form of the government, and render the crown titular and precarious. At laſt theſe preliminaries were agreed on:

I. That whoever ſhall hereafter come to the poſſeſſion of this crown, ſhall join in communion with the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed.

II. That, in caſe the crown and Imperial dignity of this realm ſhall hereafter come to any perſon not being a native of this kingdom of England, this nation be not obliged to engage in any war for the defence of any dominions or territories, which do not belong to the crown of England, without the conſent of parliament.

III. That no perſon, who ſhall hereafter come to the poſſeſſion of the crown, ſhall go out of the dominions of England, Scotland, or Ireland, without conſent of parliament.

IV. That, from and after the time, that the further limitation by this act ſhall take effect, all matters and things relating to the well governing of this kingdom, which are properly cognizable in the privy council, by the laws and cuſtoms of the realm, ſhall be tranſacted there, and all reſolutions taken thereupon ſhall be ſigned by ſuch of the privy council, as ſhall adviſe and conſent to the ſame.

tage to religion. How this will be done, their majeſties are wiſe enough to conſider; and I think, it is not a ſubject fit for me to enter upon; but their friendſhips, in general, who know not the half of what I know, in this matter, think, that it will not be well done by a proteſtant miniſter, lazy in his temper, an enemy to France by his inclination, tainted with commonwealth principles, and againſt the king's returning, by any other power, than that of the people of England, and upon capitulation and terms; who is ſuſpected of giving aid to the compounders, if not worſe. That Mr. Carril is qualified, nobody doubts, but in ſociety with the other. Thoſe, who muſt be inſtrumental, will not truſt him as they ought; ſo that, ſo long as the other is within diſtance of penetrating the affairs, they will never be ſecure. And yet the king has no ſuch game to play, as by theſe very perſons, who are thus diffident; namely, the true church of England party, the catholics, and the earl of Arran; and I ſhall ſay ſomething of every one of them.

The king cannot but be ſenſible, that the true church of England party, and their principal head, now the biſhop of Norwich, has been ſilent for a long time; and their majeſties may remember, what weight the court of France laid upon their joining the king (I mean the non-ſwearing clergy) in caſe of a landing. Therefore all arts ſhould be uſed, without delay, to get them to enter into a correſpondence again; and every impediment ought to be removed, I ſay, without exception. And though, ſometimes, it is of hard digeſtion for ſovereigns, who ought to be obeyed, without reſerve, to yield to the humours of ſubjects, yet prudence ſhould teach them, when they cannot, without injuring their affairs, do what they would, to do what they can; and remember the fable of the dog, who loſt the ſubſtance, by catching at the ſhadow. Aſſurances from the non-jurors, the ſoundeſt and moſt venerable part of the Engliſh church, would be of great uſe, at this time, to perſuade to undertake this great affair; for, beſides their own example, at landing, and their preaching and writing to the people, that their religion was in no danger, it is moſt certain, they know better than any other can do, what the church of England, in general, would do for the king's ſervice; and they, being to run all the hazard, would be better believed at the French court, than any other, as I found by experience.

As to the catholics, and other aſſociates with them, unfortunately for the king, they were thought to have too much inclination for me, and ſo have been reckoned as uſeleſs to the king. And I muſt beg leave to ſay, that undertaking was the beſt feather in his wing: and was moſt juſtly thought ſo by him, and the court of France, even to that degree, that they pretended, if this, and the other article, concerning the clergy, could be made appear, they would concur with the king to invade England. They conſiſted of ſeven regiments of horſe and dragoons; their arms, trumpets, kettle-drums, ſtandards, &c. were all ready, and are yet in ſurety. Their men were all liſted, and their officers choſen, and they had twenty horſes to a troop; which troops lying at a diſtance, in a horſe-country, twenty horſes would ſoon have mounted the reſt. Thoſe who could not divine the greatneſs and uſe of their undertaking, blamed the raſhneſs of it; and even ſome churchmen have not been diſapproved, for endeavouring undutifully (becauſe contrary to the king's written orders) to break the deſign. But I deſire you, now, for all this, to believe, that you have not ſuch an argument to uſe to the court of France, as this. And, if you can make it appear, as it might have been, ſome years ago, I ſhould have very good hopes of this ſummer's work; nay, let the king have what other hopes, even promiſes, you pleaſe, from the court of France, this is to be put into the circumſtances it was in. For, if there will ever be a landing in England, to purpoſe, it muſt be before they can be armed; and they cannot be armed, before the parliament come to a reſolution concerning the war; and, conſidering the few troops in England, ſuppoſe theſe men to be no better than militia, what a diverſion would it be? It is not neceſſary for me to ſay any more of this article, till I know whether their majeſties have as good an opinion of this undertaking, as I have. If ſo, I ſhall ſhew what I think is to be done in it; if otherwiſe, I ſave the pains. As to the earl of Arran, it would be of great uſe to have an underſtanding with him. He will have none, where Middleton can pry. His all is at ſtake, and he ought to be wary with whom he ventures to deal. I think it better for the king's ſervice, that the court party prevailed, in the manner they have done, in the parliament of Scotland, than that the country party ſhould have got their will. Oppoſition ſwells the water to a flood; and ſo long as the country party is not diſcouraged, they gain more ground in the kingdom, than they loſe in the government; ſo that the diſaffection of the government will increaſe; and one may judge of the nation, in general, which is of another temper, than this pretended parliament, or, rather, Preſbyterian rabble, in repreſenting the nation. For, ſince even in it there is ſuch a ſtruggle againſt the government, what would there be in a free parliament, which the prince of Orange durſt never hazard to call? The nation, then, at leaſt, a great part of it, being diſaffected to this government, it is of great conſequence, that the earl of Arran may know what to do, in caſe of an invaſion of England; or, in caſe he and his friends be obliged, for ſelf-preſervation, to riſe in their own defence. The army, who are

V. That after the limitation ſhall take effect, no perſon born out of the kingdom of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the dominions thereunto belonging, although he be naturalized, or made a denizen (except ſuch as are born of Engliſh parents) ſhall be capable to be of the privy council, or a member of either houſe of parliament, or to enjoy any office or place of truſt, either civil or military, or to have any grant of lands, tenements, or hereditaments from the crown to himſelf, or to any others in truſt for him.

VI. That no perſon, who has an office or place of profit under the king, or receives a penſion from the crown ſhall be capable of ſerving as a member of the houſe of commons.

VII. That after the limitation ſhall take effect, judges commiſſions be made, 'quamdiu ſe bene geſſerint,' and their ſalaries aſcertained and eſtabliſhed. But, upon the addreſs of both houſes of parliament, it may be lawful to remove them.

VIII. That no pardon under the great ſeal of England be pleadable to an impeachment by the commons in parliament.

The king was alarmed at theſe proceedings, for almoſt every article implied a reflection on him and his adminiſtration, chiefly that of not employing ſtrangers, and not going out of the kingdom. As theſe, as well as moſt of the other articles, were unacceptable to the king; ſo many, who had an ill opinion of the deſign of thoſe, who were now at the helm, began to conclude, that the delays were affected, and that theſe limitations were deſigned to raiſe diſputes be-are, and ever were, well affected, are to be gained by money; and a little goes a great way with them. The diſbanded troops will be engaged, and the officers are well inclined. The places of ſtrength would be ſecured, and ſuch as can be put in defence, without expences, fortified. To do all this, at leaſt, ſuch a part of them, as can be begun with, a ſmall ſum will ſerve; and he ought to have hopes of it, and of the command.

'Theſe being only heads to be diſcourſed of, and much to be ſaid of every part, it is not to be thought, that this letter can carry a final concluſion; for it may be, upon diſcourſe, I might change my mind, or be more confirmed in it, and ſee further. This makes me inſiſt, again, to you, upon two things, as appearing, to me, abſolutely neceſſary to put things upon a right foot. The firſt is, the removing of all impediments out of the way, and ſending all ſuſpected perſons to Champagne or Burgundy, according to their guilt. And the ſecond is of the laſt uſe, both to their majeſties and the prince; which is, the eſtabliſhing of ſuch a number, under no qualifications, to talk of their affairs, in their majeſties preſence; with whom we can freely converſe, and propoſe what may be for their majeſties ſervice.

As for the firſt; it will be for the king's reputation, both at the courts of Rome, and France, and with all his true friends in England, for many reaſons. As for the ſecond, it is according to ſcripture, 'In the multitude of counſellors there is ſafety.' Nothing is ſo dangerous, as to determine what will do, and then hear reaſons againſt it, and imitate the deaf adder, 'who hearkens not to the voice of the charmer, let him charm never ſo ſweetly.' Reaſons, againſt a reſolution taken, offend; and, the more force they have, they offend the more; whilſt, before the reſolution be taken, reaſon has it's effect, and the determinations are not the effect of humour and faction, but of prudence and juſtice. If in any thing I fail, I'll ſwear it is want of underſtanding, and not of will. And I beg, that their majeſties may be perſuaded, that it is no humour nor vanity, but their ſervice, I have in view; who am,

My deareſt Brother,

Moſt humbly your's.

There are ſome remarkable circumſtances, relating to this letter, in Mr. Cole's memoirs; as will appear from the following extracts.

Mr. ſecretary Vernon to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, Feb. 17, 1700, O. S.

I cannot but mention one expreſſion in the letter, viz. 'That this opportunity muſt be improved, now the court of France is diſſatisfied with the prince of Orange, for his treacheries diſcovered in their hands.' His majeſty does not know what they ſhould mean by it, unleſs it ariſes from the letters Jolly brought, which his majeſty knows nothing of. You know all that we have ſent to Spain; which is aſſurances of friendſhip, if they have the ſame diſpoſition on their ſide, and to exhort them to preſerve their liberty. If this be an offence, it is impoſſible to avoid it, with France. I ſuppoſe, you will hear a good deal of this letter, and that the parties concerned will not well like, that it is come hither, and made thus public.

Mr. ſecretary Vernon to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, Feb. 20, 1700, O. S.

I ſend you, incloſed, the earl of Melfort's letter, printed by order of the houſe of lords. I ſuppoſe, there will be no queſtion made at St. Germain's, whether the letter be genuine, or not; at leaſt, monſieur de Tallard does not call that in doubt, though he ſeems much offended at the letter's being communicated to the lords and commons. He endeavoured to ſpeak with me on Monday night, but I was gone to Kenſington; and, upon his writing to me, next morning, that I would appoint him a time, when he might ſpeak with me, I went to him. He was full of expoſtulation, of the letter's being carried to the two houſes, by my lord chamberlain and myſelf, as if it were done to create an animoſity between the two nations, and to give the alarm, That the French had formed a deſign to invade England; whereas this appeared to be only a chimerical notion of Melfort, who (as he often repeated) was 'un fou & un extravagant;' that he was baniſhed from the court of king James, and had nothing to do in the court of France; that his waiting upon madam de Maintenon was only to get two of his daughters put into the nunnery of St. Cyr; that he had no acceſs to the French miniſters, but was ſpinning cobwebs of his own; and there ought to have been no occaſion taken, from thence, to create jealouſies and miſunderſtandings. That the French had ſhewn their diſpoſition to live in friendſhip with England; and he thought care ought to be taken, on our ſide, not to give any grounds to believe, that we were picking a quarrel with them; and this he thought neceſſary to tell one, as a matter that deſerved attention.

I told him, The letter contained ſomething, that might appear notional, and like a project of his own; but other parts of it laid down facts, that it extremely concerned us to provide againſt; ſuch as the fitting out a fleet in France, that was likely to be maſter of the ſea this ſummer; that we could make no proviſion for our ſafety, but in parliament; and therefore it was fit they ſhould be acquainted with our danger, and that the proofs of it ſhould be laid before them. That, in France, they could diſpatch every thing 'dans le cabinet.' We had not ſo ready a way, in England, but what we did muſt be publicly, and 'dans le marché.' Whoever had ſuppreſſed ſuch an advice, here, might juſtly have expected an accuſation of treaſon againſt him.

He ſaid, He did not diſown, but they were fitting out ſhips to ſea; but they did it upon the preparations making in Holland, where they were at work, night and day, as well Sundays, as other days, to get out their fleet: therefore, they could not do leſs, in France; but they were not fitting ſo many ſhips, as was repreſented; and that they had no thoughts of being at ſea theſe three or four months.

I told him, I ſhould be glad there might be no occaſion for any fleets coming out on either ſide. I was ſure, all that we aimed at was, to be on the defenſive: and I ſhould be much better pleaſed, and think it more our intereſt, to be diſarming of ſhips than arming them. As to the character he gave my lord Melfort, of 'fou & intenſé,' when we ſaw him treated as ſuch in France, we ſhould be willing to have the ſame opinion of him; till then, we could not but remember what an inſtrument he had been, in promoting the intended aſſaſſination and invaſion, and muſt be concerned, that he is bringing himſelf again into play, upon the ſame bottom; and, by his way of writing, at leaſt, one muſt ſuſpect, that he is admitted into converſations with the French miniſters. It ſeemed very extraordinary, that he ſhould preſs the improving this opportunity, now the court of France had reſentments, upon the diſcovery of ſome treachery they thought his majeſty guilty of. He ſaid, this was a pure fiction of Melfort's. I told him, I was glad to hear them ſay ſo; and his majeſty was very well ſatisfied, that he had given no occaſion for any one's having ſuch hard thoughts of him. I aſked him, once or twice, whether he knew of any diſcovery of this kind? He ſaid, he never heard any thing like it, and there was no ſuch thing, in reality.

In concluſion, he ſaid, that people ought rather to appeaſe jealouſies on both ſides, than inflame them. I told him, he could contribute a great deal towards it, and, I hoped, he would make uſe of his power. What I could do, in any caſe, would be inconſiderable; but no endeavours of mine ſhould be wanting to remove miſunderſtanding, and ſo ſecure the public peace.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

I am glad, that the letter of my lord Melfort is fallen into your hands. Certainly, it will open people's eyes, in England; and thoſe, that ſeem to doubt, that they have ſuch thoughts here, have reaſons for it. The only hopes they have now left, at St. Germain's, are, that they are to be reſtored by a French power, in a ſhort time; and the intrigues, carried on in Scotland, are too apparent to be doubted on.

The expreſſion, in the letter, which you mention, muſt mean what was found in the pacquet of Mr. Jolly, which he grounded on the reports, at Paris; and this went ſo far, that they ſaid, there was a deſign to poiſon the king of Spain. This ſhews how little the French court truſts any of them, elſe they would have been better informed. There can have been nothing in monſieur Schonenberg's letter, but an anſwer to the inſtructions, he had; whereby we might have ſeen in what diſpoſition they were, in relation to us, &c. As for Spain's depending on France, I have often ſhewn to monſieur de Torcy, what jealouſy that might and does give to Europe. But he always aſſured me, that it was not the king's intention, though, at preſent, he could not but aſſiſt them, they not being in a condition to help themſelves: that ſo that matter can have no ill effect, &c.

I believe, this court will be very angry with lord Melfort; for it is plain, by ſeveral accounts, and particularly by monſieur de Tallard's printing M. d'Avaux's memorial, they are not willing to break with us; though I ſtill admire at their proceedings in Flanders.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, March 9, 1701.

I had not your letter of February 10, till I came from Verſailles, where I found, that a courier of monſieur de Tallard was arrived the day before with the reſolutions of the parliament, and a copy of lord Melfort's letter. The conference I had with Monſieur de Torcy was much the ſame with what you had with the count de Tallard, his diſcourſe turning in the ſame manner, that the expoſing this letter was only to create and excite animoſities in the nation: That it ſhewed a deſire of breaking with France: That he had ſent for lord Melfort, who was with him this morning; and did own, that he had wrote a letter of that date, and that it was loſt, which he believed gave occaſion for the framing of this: That he had mentioned ſomething in it of madam de Maintenon, whom he had ſeen about his private affairs; but he denies almoſt all that is in the letter. As for that of the biſhop of Norwich, he could have no grounds to ſay it, ſince he hardly knew him, and he was ſatisfied of the contrary. As for lord Arran, he was convinced he was not in king James's intereſt; that he was rather ſetting up for himſelf, as having ſome pretence to the crown of Scotland. In ſhort, I found his opinion was, that it was contrived only to frame a deſign to incenſe the nation, and to break with France, &c. He ſaid, that I was ſenſible how little credit lord Melfort had at this court, or at St. Germain's. He read the letter to me, as alſo a paper cried about the ſtreets of London of a new plot or conſpiracy of France againſt England. The anſwer I made him was, that by my laſt letter I had ſome account of this letter: That, by as much as I knew of it, I did not in the leaſt doubt but they were lord Melfort's thoughts, and wrote by him;

tween the two houſes, by which the bill might be loſt. When ſome time had been ſpent in theſe preliminaries, it came to the nomination of the perſon to the ſucceſſion, after the king and the princeſs of Denmark, and their heirs; ſir John Bowles, who was then diſordered in his ſenſes, and ſoon after quite loſt them, was ſet on by the party, to be the firſt, who ſhould name the electreſs dowager of Brunſwick; which ſeemed to be done to make it leſs ſerious, when moved by ſuch a perſon. He was, by the forms of the houſe, put into the chair of the committee, to whom the bill was committed. The thing was ſtill put off for many weeks. At every time, that it was called for, the motion was entertained with coldneſs, which ſerved to heighten the jealouſy. The committee once or twice ſat upon it, but all the members ran out of the houſe with ſo much indecency, that the contrivers ſeemed aſhamed of this management. There were ſeldom fifty or ſixty at the committee; yet in concluſion the bill paſſed, and was ſent up to the lords, where it was expected that great oppoſition would be made to it. Some imagined, that the act was only an artifice, deſigned to gain credit to thoſe, who were ſo ill thought of over the nation that they wanted ſome colourable thing to excuſe their own proceedings. Many of the lords abſented themſelves on deſign. Some little oppoſition was made by the marquis of Normandy; and four lords, the earls of Huntington and Plymouth, and the lords Guilford and Jefferies, proteſted againſt it [n]. Thoſe who wiſhed well to the act, were glad to have it paſſed any way, and ſo would not examine the limitations that were in it. They thought it of great importance to carry the act, and that, at another time, thoſe limitations might be better conſidered. Thus the act paſſed, and the king ſent it over by the earl of Macclesfield to the electreſs, with the garter. It was reckoned a great point carried, that there was now a law in favour of a Proteſtant ſucceſſor; for it was evident, that a ſtrong party was formed againſt it, in favour of the pretended prince of Wales. He was now paſt thirteen, bred up with a hatred both of the religion and conſtitution of England, in an admiration of the French government; and yet many, who called themſelves Proteſtants, ſeemed fond of ſuch a ſucceſſor; a degree of infatuation, that might juſtly amaze all who obſerved it, and ſaw the fury with which it was promoted.

In the mean time, the ſettlement of the ſucceſſion was a great ſubject of diſcourſe and alarm abroad. Thoſe Popiſh princes, who were deſcended from the blood-royal of England, and were more nearly related to the crown than the princeſs Sophia, were offended at being ſtruck off from their remote hopes, and preſumptive right. But the perſon more immediately concerned, as being higheſt in blood, after the king and princeſs Anne, was the ducheſs of Savoy, daughter to the late ducheſs of Orleans, and grand-daughter to king Charles I. who therefore ordered count Maffey, embaſſador from Savoy, to make a proteſtation of her right, to this effect: 'That Anne of Orleans, ducheſs of Savoy, &c. princeſs of the blood-royal of England, by the royal princeſs of Great-Britain, Henrietta her mother, put ſo high a value upon that prerogative, that ſhe gladly made uſe of the opportunity, that then offered, to ſet it forth before the eyes of the whole Engliſh nation, as an evidence, ſhe drew from thence, of having a right to that auguſt throne. That therefore being informed, that it had been reſolved in the parliament, that, being the only daughter of the late princeſs royal, Henrietta her mother, ſhe was the next in ſucceſſion after his majeſty, William III, and the princeſs Anne of Denmark, according to the laws and cuſtoms of England, which always preferred the neareſt to the remoteſt line. That her title being thus notoriouſly known and indiſputable, ſtood in need of no farther proof. However, that ſhe thought fit to proteſt againſt all reſolutions and deciſions contrary thereto, in the beſt and moſt effectual manner, that might be practiſed in ſuch a caſe; wherein ſhe complied rather with cuſtom than neceſſity, becauſe ſhe had ſo great an idea of the wiſdom and juſtice of the king and parliament, that ſhe had no cauſe to fear they would do any thing prejudicial to her and her children..'

This Savoy proteſtation ſeemed to be an affront to king James, his queen, and the pretended prince of Wales; ſince the ducheſs of Savoy vouchſafed not to take the leaſt notice of them, but ſubſtituted herſelf immediately after the princeſs of Denmark, and thereby appeared to confirm the juſt ſuſpicions of the pretender's birth.

The king being very ſolicitous to defend the ſtates of Holland from the inſults and approaches, that were made upon them by the French in Flanders, and, if poſſible, to reſtore and preſerve the balance of Europe, ſent inſtructions but at the ſame time I was ſatisfied, that the French court was far from taking ſuch meaſures. That, as to the communicating it to the parliament, if he knew our conſtitution, he would know, that it was impoſſible to do otherwiſe in this conjuncture, when greater preparations by ſea and land were never known to be made than are actually making now in France, which was no ſecret, nor did I believe, that there was any deſire, that it ſhould be ſo. That he muſt forgive me, if I thought lord Melfort was not ſo deſpicable a perſon, ſince I ſaw him often at court, which, here eſpecially, is no ſign of it, ſince men of that character were not permitted to approach ſo near the king. That, not having yet my letters of the laſt poſt from England, I could not tell what effect it had cauſed; but that my opinion was ſtill, that we were far from deſiring a war; neither could it be our intereſt; unleſs we were obliged to it for our own ſecurity, and conſequently that of Holland. I alſo took notice of the expreſſion of the diſcovery of ſome treachery, which the king was ſuppoſed to be guilty of, and which I did not underſtand, unleſs it meant the extravagant reports, that were at Paris, of letters found, which my ſervant, who was drowned, brought from Madrid; and I did not doubt but he knew the ſubſtance of them very well, and was convinced of the contrary of the reports. I told him alſo, that the proceedings of the viceroy of Navarre in opening the letters, and ſending them to Madrid, could not be any ways juſtifiable, ſince he could eaſily ſee, that they were directed to a public miniſter reſiding at the court of France. He did own, he could not tell the meaning of that expreſſion, ſince the king was far from having any ſuch thoughts. He ſeemed to know nothing of the letters, but he had heard of this accident; but he condemned very much the opening of them. I ſaid further, that as for the paper cried about the ſtreets, I did believe it was not done by order; that they printed what they pleaſed in England, though, if the authors were diſcovered, they were liable to be puniſhed. Becauſe it is not ſent to me, I am of opinion it is ſuch a paper, as we have often at London; but I do aſſure you, it makes more impreſſion here than the letter. Endeavours are uſed to make it to be believed, that it was forged only to ſerve a turn, as they ſay has been the cuſtom at the beginning of parliament. This muſt reflect on the honour of his majeſty; and I did venture to ſay to monſieur de Torcy, that, in caſe it could be ſuppoſed ſuch a letter was forged, I did not doubt but I might produce the original, if there was any occaſion. I wonder he did not mention to me what had paſſed between you and monſieur de Tallard. In ſhort, I am told, they take it for granted, that we ſhall enter into a war; and, as I happened to come a little later to Verſailles yeſterday than uſual, the court had it, that we had declared war; but when they ſaw me, it ſoon put a ſtop to that report.

Mr. Secretary Vernon to the earl of Mancheſter.

Whitehall, March 3, 1701, O. S.

I have your excellency's letters of the 5th and 9th to acknowledge. The firſt arrived late on Thurſday, and the other this morning. They have been both laid before his majeſty. I cannot but ſmile at the turn my lord Melfort gives to his letter, that he ſhould own his having loſt the letter he writ about that time, and think to impoſe upon any body, that gave occaſion to the forging of another. Monſieur de Tallard (as I acquainted you) made no doubt but it was his letter, and I imagine monſieur de Torcy thinks ſo too. My lord Seafield being newly come up from Scotland, I ſhewed him the original letter, this morning: He is well acquainted with lord Melfort's hand-writing and ſeal, and knows both to be genuine.

As to the printed paper, that was ſent to monſieur de Torcy, of the diſcovery of a new French plot upon England, I know nothing of it, nor have I met with any body that has ſeen it. I ſuppoſe it muſt be ſome Grub-ſtreet writer; and thoſe, you know, print any ſtuff, to get a penny; and their news dies as ſoon as it comes out: Therefore I wonder monſieur Torcy ſhould lay ſtreſs upon ſuch unknown, unauthorized pieces, which he knows creep out daily on both ſides, and are not taken notice of by either. It is not a fair charge upon us, that we ſeek occaſion to ſtir up animoſities, and to pick quarrels with them. For my part I ſhould be glad they would ſhew us the way, how they are to be avoided with any reaſonable ſecurity to ourſelves and neighbours.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, March 16, 1701.

Lord Melfort is ſent to Angiers. The court of France concerted with that of St. Germains firſt. Lord Middleton is not a little pleaſed.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr, Secretary Vernon.

Paris, March 19, 1701.

Lord Melfort was ordered to Angiers by a Lettre de Cachet, yet ſome will have it, that he has underhand had aſſurances, that he ſhall be reſtored, when affairs will admit of it.

The earl of Mancheſter to Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, March 23, 1701.

What I mentioned firſt to monſieur de Torcy, was to know, whether he ſtill doubted of lord Melfort's letter. He ſaid, not in the leaſt, and that his wife had owned it. The excuſe he made was, that the confuſion he was in, and its being read to him in French, made him think, that there was ſomething added; but that he ſince found it otherwiſe, and thereupon he was baniſhed. The uſe I made of this was to ſhew him thoſe ſuſpicions they had, that it was done to inflame the nation againſt France, could no longer remain; neither could I learn any thing about ſuch a paper as count Tallard ſent, and was cried about the ſtreets.

[n] Lamberty ſays, (I. 499.) Six lords came to the count de Briançon, and propoſed to him, that the duke of Savoy ſhould deliver up one of his ſons to be educated in England in the Proteſtant religion; declaring, that, in that caſe, the act for the Hanover ſucceſſion ſhould never paſs. But the duke refuſed to conſent to it.

to Mr. Stanhope, envoy extraordinary to the States, to enter into negotiations with the miniſters of France and Spain, purſuant to the addreſſes of both houſes. According Mr. Stanhope, after concerting matters with the States, delivered in propoſals to the count d'Avaux, the French embaſſador at the Hague, importing, that the king, his maſter, and the States General, had, on the 25th of March 1700, concluded a treaty of Partition with the French, to prevent a new war, which they had all the reaſon to apprehend, in caſe the king of Spain ſhould die without iſſue; and that among other things, the principal aim of the contractors was to preſerve peace, and particularly in thoſe parts; but it was evident, that, though his moſt Chriſtian majeſty had thought fit to accept the will of the late king of Spain, going in this manner off from the Partition, yet nevertheleſs his Britannick majeſty muſt not loſe the effect of that treaty; that is to ſay, the peace and general tranquility; and that particular ſecurity muſt be given him, by ſome equivalent or otherwiſe. That for this end Mr. Stanhope had orders to propoſe the following points and articles.

That his moſt Chriſtian majeſty ſhall, in a certain time limited, as ſhort a one as can be agreed on, withdraw all his troops out of the Spaniſh Netherlands, without leaving any there; and that he ſhall not be allowed the ſending any thither; but that hereafter no troops ſhall be kept in the Spaniſh Netherlands (except in the places of ſecurity, which will be mentioned in the following article,) but Spaniards, Walloons, or thoſe of other ſubjects of the monarchy of Spain exclusively, under the oath, and in the pay of Spain, and no troops of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, directly or indirectly; yet it ſhall nevertheleſs, be permitted to the king of Great Britain, and the States General, to ſend troops for the defence of the Netherlands, whenever they ſhall be lawfully required.

That, for the particular ſecurity of his Britannic majeſty, the cities of Oſtend and Nieuport, with their ports, caſtles, and citadels, and all the forts and fortifications thereunto belonging, ſhall be given up to the excluſive care of his majeſty; all in the condition which they are now in, with a power to put in what garriſon he pleaſes, either of his own troops, or of his allies, that he may deſire for that uſe, and what troops he ſhall think fit, whilſt France or Spain ſhall not be permitted to put the leaſt garriſon, or to build behind, or about theſe cities, ports, and fortreſſes, any other forts, lines, or fortified works, or to do any thing, that might cauſe a prejudice to the guarding of theſe cities and fortreſſes, and hinder its effect.

That his Britannic majeſty may augment, diminiſh, and change the garriſons of theſe cities and fortreſſes, as often as he ſhall think fit, and ſend thither proviſions, ammunition, arms, materials for fortifications, and in general, all that may be fit and neceſſary for the uſe of the garriſons and fortifications, without any hindrance by ſea or by land, directly or indirectly.

That his majeſty ſhall have the full power and authority over theſe cities, ports, caſtles, and fortifications, where he ſhall have ſuch his garriſons and commanders, as he ſhall think fit; ſaving, and without prejudice to the other rights and revenues of Spain over and in theſe caſtles.

That, beſides, his Britannic majeſty ſhall have liberty to fortify and repair the fortifications of theſe cities, ports, and fortreſſes, as he ſhall think proper; and in general to do all that he ſhall find neceſſary for their defence. That no kingdoms, provinces, cities, lands, or places belonging to the crown of Spain, within as well as out of Europe, and particularly no cities, places or lands of the Spaniſh Netherlands, ſhall be allowed to be yielded or transferred, nor be able to devolve or come to the crown of France, by donation, purchaſe, exchange, contract of marriage, ſucceſſion by will, or inteſtate, nor by any other title that can be; and that they ſhall not be liable to be ſubjected to the power or the authority of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty in any manner.

That the ſubjects of his Britannic majeſty ſhall keep and enjoy all the privileges, rights, immunities, and other advantages, in the dominions and kingdoms of Spain, as well within as out of Europe, and by conſequence alſo in the Spaniſh Netherlands, both in regard to their navigation, commerce, and liberty of the ports, and every thing elſe, which they did enjoy, or ought to have enjoyed, at the death of the late king of Spain, and that thus every thing whatever, except that, about which it ſhall be otherwiſe agreed in the treaty to be made, ſhall be left in the condition in which it was at the death of the late king of Spain.

That all the treaties of peace and commerce, and other conventions, between England and Spain ſhall be renewed in the manner it ſhall be agreed on together, as far as it ſhall be changed by the treaty, that ſhall be made.

That, beſides this, the ſubjects of his Britannic majeſty ſhall enjoy, in the kingdoms, dominions, cities, places, bays, and harbours of the crown of Spain, within and without Europe, the ſame privileges, rights and franchiſes, as alſo all the immunities and advantages, which the ſubjects of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, or of any other prince or potentate enjoy, as well as thoſe which ſhall be granted to any of them, and which they ſhall hereafter enjoy.

That it ſhall be promiſed ſolemnly, on the part of France, and of Spain, that this ſhall be exactly performed in all theſe points in general, and in each in particular.

That the treaty, to be made on this ſubject, ſhall be guaranteed by ſuch kings, princes, and potentates, which the one or the other of the contractors ſhall deſire to do it, and that in the ſtrongeſt manner they ſhall think fit.

All this to be done, with a reſerve, to enlarge on theſe points in the negotiation, as much as ſhall be found neceſſary, to clear up their true ſenſe and intention, as alſo to prevent all ſorts of diſputes.

Theſe propoſals were the ſame they ſeconded by others from the States General, which agreed with them in every thing material, except that inſtead of Nieuport and Oſtend, which were demanded by king William, as cautionary towns, the ſtates required to have thoſe of Venlo, Ruremond, Stevenſwaert, Luxemburg, Namur, Charleroy, Mons, Dendermonde, Damme, and St. Donas, with all their appurtenances.

The French embaſſador, after hearing both theſe propoſals read, ſeemed greatly ſurprized, ſaying, that as he expected the king of England and States General would demand to have the French troops withdrawn out of the Spaniſh Netherlands, ſo he came prepared to give ſatisfaction in that article, by aſſuring, that it ſhould be done as ſoon as the king of Spain ſhould have forces of his own to guard the country: But, as to the other articles, they were ſuch as could not be higher, if his maſter had loſt four battles; ſo that it was impoſſible he could give them any other anſwer for the preſent, than that he would tranſmit them to the king, as he did the ſame night. He added, that it ſeemed as if the ſtates reſolved to have war, and confirmed the advices he had from the French miniſter at Vienna, that they had lately concluded and ſigned a league with the emperor. From this charge the Dutch deputies cleared themſelves, by abſolutely denying, that there was any ſuch treaty, and alledging that it was notorious to all the world how much the ſtates were inclined to peace, when they might have it with ſecurity, which was all they aimed at by theſe propoſals.

The French, ſeeing theſe demands of the Engliſh and Dutch run ſo high, and being reſolved to offer no ſecurity for the peace of Europe, but the renewal of the treaty of Ryſwick, ſet all their engines at work in England, to involve us into ſuch contentions at home, as ſhould both diſable us, from taking any care of foreign affairs, and make the reſt of Europe conclude, that nothing conſiderable was to be expected from England. In this they were but too well ſeconded by the parliament, as will preſently appear.

On the 18th of March, the king ſent a meſſage to the commons by Mr. ſecretary Hedges, importing, 'That his majeſty having directed Mr. Stanhope, his envoy extraordinary and plenipotentiary at the Hague, to enter into negotiations in concert with the States General, and other potentates, for the mutual ſecurity of England and Holland, according to an addreſs of their houſe to that effect; and that Mr. Stanhope having tranſmitted to his majeſty copies of the demands made by himſelf and the deputies of the ſtates, upon that ſubject, to the French embaſſador there; his majeſty had thought fit to communicate the ſame to the commons; it being his intention to acquaint them from time to time with the ſtate and progreſs of theſe negotiations, into which he had entered, purſuant to their addreſs.'

When this meſſage was conſidered by the commons on the 21ſt of March, and the propoſals of Mr. Stanhope and the Dutch deputies to the French embaſſador were read, they reſolved, that the treaty of partition be read likewiſe; which being done, they voted, 'That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, to return the thanks of this houſe for his gracious meſſage, wherein he is pleaſed to communicate his royal intentions to acquaint this houſe from time to time with the ſtate and progreſs of thoſe negotiations, into which his majeſty has entered purſuant to the addreſs of this houſe: And alſo to lay before his majeſty the ill conſequences of the treaty of partition (paſſed under the great ſeal of England, during during the fitting of parliament, and without the advice of the ſame) to this kingdom and the peace of Europe, whereby ſuch large territories of the king of Spain's dominions were to be delivered up to the French king.'

When this addreſs was preſented to the king, he ſomewhat reſented the unkindneſs of it, and thought there was much more reaſon to complain of the perfidious breach of the treaty, than of the making of it: However, without taking any notice of that part of the addreſs, he returned the following anſwer: 'That he was glad, that they were pleaſed with his communicating to them the ſtate of the negotiations he had entered into; and that he ſhould continue to inform them of the progreſs, that ſhould be made in them; and be always willing to receive their advice thereupon, being fully perſuaded, that nothing could contribute more effectually to the happineſs of the kingdom, and the peace of Europe, than the concurrence of the parliament in all his negotiations, and a good underſtanding between him and his people.'

But the lords had, before this, on the 17th of March, entered upon the conſideration of the partition treaty, the debate being begun by Sheffield marquis of Normandy, and the reſt of the tories. This they managed with great dexterity, while the matter was as much neglected by the king, who went that day to Hampton Court, where he ſtaid ſome time. By this means no directions were given, and thoſe, who had been concerned in the treaty, were involved in great difficulties, before the court was aware of it. The king either could not prevail with his new miniſters to excuſe the treaty, if they would not juſtify it; or he neglected them ſo far, as not to ſpeak to them at all about it. Thoſe, who attacked it, ſaid they meant nothing in that but to offer the king advices for the future to prevent ſuch errors, as had been committed in that treaty, both as to matter and form. They blamed the giving ſuch territories to the crown of France, and the forſaking the emperor. They alſo complained of the ſecrecy, in which the treaty was carried on, it not being communicated to the Engliſh council or miniſtry, but privately tranſacted by the earls of Portland and Jerſey. They blamed likewiſe the putting the great ſeal, firſt to blank powers, and then to the treaty itſelf, which, the king's new miniſters ſaid, was unjuſt in the contrivance, and ridiculous in the execution [o].

[o] The treaty was likewiſe treated with great ſeverity of language in the books and pamphlets of that time. Davenant, in his 'Eſſay upon the Balance of Power,' repreſents, that the authors of the treaty 'knew well enough, that it muſt bring difficulties almoſt inſuperable upon any future miniſtry. They could not,' ſays he,' but foreſee, that the prodigious increaſe of power and ſtrength, which the partition treaty, had it taken effect, gave to the French, would to the laſt degree have alarmed all the thinking men of England. Did not Naples, and the influence they would have had upon Milan, entirely ſubject Italy to their dominion? If, with the ports they have already on the ſouthern coaſt of France, they had likewiſe had Sicily, had they not been maſters of the Levant-trade? And was not the province of Guipuſcoa a hook in the very throat of Spain? Had they not by this triple league in one inſtant more cities, people, and kingdoms, than probably they could have obtained by the ſword attended ſtill with victory in the courſe of a hundred years? But the emperor did not acquieſce in it. Portugal temporiſed, but would poſſibly have declared againſt it, if any ſtrong alliance had been formed. The conclave began to tremble. Venice did not think it ſafe; and all the princes and ſtates of Italy began to find it high time to enter into alliances for their common preſervation. Of all this, war muſt have been the conſequence.' Dr. Drake in his 'Hiſtory of the laſt Parliament,' endeavours to ſhew, that the late king of Spain's will was the product of the partition treaty; and that, if France had abode by that treaty, the balance of Europe had been as effectually broken, as it was by their acceptance of the king of Spain's will. Under this ſecond head he remarks, that 'the poſſeſſion of Naples and Sicily, and all the Spaniſh dependencies on the coaſt of Tuſcany, with the adjacent iſlands, Santo Stephano, Porto Hercole, Orbitello, Telamone, Porto Longone, Piombino, Final, with the marquiſate belonging to it, Fontarabia, St. Sebaſtian, with the whole province of Guipuſcoa, &c. gave the French ſuch a number of good harbours in the Mediterranean, that the advantages of them, improved with their uſual application and judgment, muſt have made them in a ſhort time abſolute maſters of the Mediterranean, and, in conſequence of that, of the ocean alſo. How far this would have gone towards that univerſal monarchy, which France ſo paſſionately longs for, the meaneſt capacity may judge. By this means, the Pope, the Tuſcan, the Genoeſe, and the Spaniard, had been directly locked up; not a ſhip belonging to any of them durſt have peeped out of harbour without a French paſs. The Spaniſh flota would conſtantly and inevitably have been at their mercy; for all their commerce with the Weſt-Indies muſt neceſſarily have ceaſed, and the king of Spain, how much ſoever he might have ſtomached it inwardly, muſt have lain as ſtill as King Log, while the French played at leap-frog over him. The leaſt ſhow of reſentment would have furniſhed him with a pretence to ſeize on the treaſures of the Weſt-Indies, and, like a kind neighbour, to have conveyed the galleons into their own harbours.'

The treaty was alſo animadverted upon, in a pamphlet, intitled, 'An account of the debate in town concerning peace and war, in letters to a gentleman in the country,' the third letter of which is directly againſt the partition treaty, the reaſons for which are repreſented as merely plauſible, but not ſolid; that it was a diſingenuous one; that great ſervices were done to France by it; that it was carried on without the confederates; that the parliament was not conſulted in it; that the balance of Europe was loſt by it; that the archduke ſhould have been ſent into Spain, which would have prevented that treaty; that the treaty produced the will of the king of Spain; and that the Spaniards complained of the treaty.

However, the treaty had ſome advocates in print, and particularly the author of 'two letters to a friend concerning the partition treaty,' republiſhed in the 'third volume of the State Tracts, p. 184. Biſhop Burnet had ſome hand in theſe 'letters,' in the former of which the occaſion of the treaty is thus ſtated: 'We and the Dutch had got through a war at a vaſt charge, and with infinite danger. We ſaw the weakneſs of Spain in the buſineſs of Barcelona. There was no reckoning on them as capable of making a ſtand, if the king of France were freed from a war, ſince, when that preſſed him on all hands, yet with a ſmall army he could at his leiſure take that important place. Had Spain any intrinſic ſtrength to reſiſt, there was time enough given them to have brought it all together. If, I ſay, France then with ſo ſmall a body made ſuch a conqueſt, what could be expected from Spain, when the French king ſhould ſend his whole ſtrength againſt them? A fleet before Cadiz, and two ſmall armies marching in through Catalonia and Navarre, might have found it hard to ſubſiſt, but not to conquer Spain. The emperor abandoning all other thoughts, had during the laſt war purſued his advantages againſt the Turks, and thereby had both exhauſted his own ſtrength, and diſguſted his allies. And, on the concluſion of the peace of Ryſwick, he had ſhewed ſo great an inclination to ruin hereſy at any rate, and ſo little regard to the honour of a prince to whom he owed ſo much, that this with ſome other things (which I love not to remember, becauſe I hope that court will grow wiſer) had given ſo juſt a diſcontent, that few ſeemed willing to engage in a new war for him and his family. And his councils were ſo dilatory and uncertain, that, inſtead of preſſing the renewal of a general alliance upon the concluſion of the peace, he ſeemed not to regard it, when preſſed thereto. We here were ſo weary of taxes, and ſo jealous of a ſtanding army, that we brought down our land-force, firſt to twelve thouſand, and then to ſeven. Our fleet kept proportion to our army. The Dutch did not diſarm ſo faſt; yet they had no force to ſpare; and, to be ſure, they would unwillingly engage in the quarrel deeper than we did. While the debates concerning the army were on foot, the ill health of the king of Spain was not forgot to be mentioned; and the danger of the progreſs, that the French might make, if we were reduced to ſuch an incapacity of protecting the Spaniards, was often repreſented, but was often rejected with indignation, as an artifice of the court to get an army kept up. Things being in ſuch a ſtate, might not the king think, that what was left for him to do, was to make the beſt bargain he could?' The author then proceeds to ſhew, that, how bad ſoever the partition might be, it ſeemed ſtill more deſirable to yield up ſome parts of the Spaniſh monarchy, than to let France conquer it, or rather take it all. Spain itſelf, the Weſt-Indies and Flanders, were the branches of that monarchy, in which we were chiefly concerned; and, while theſe were kept entire in the ſame hands, our intereſts were pretty ſafe. It is known, that, what advantage ſoever the Spaniſh grandees may make of the dominions in and about Italy, Spain itſelf is not the ſtronger or richer for them, but much to the contrary. It is true, their intereſts at Rome are fortified by them; but we are little concerned in thoſe. It was not to be imagined, that France, which had made ſo much noiſe with their pretenſions to that ſucceſſion, and (how ſlight ſoever they may be) had involved all Europe in war upon yet ſlighter, and that ſaw how near they were of conquering ſo feeble an enemy, and ſo weak a rival, would let all this go for nothing. They did not fear a new alliance againſt them; they knew well the temper both of the Engliſh and Dutch. They therefore pretended to the Italian dominions. If the king had been in condition to have talked roundly to them, certainly that had been both the wiſeſt and beſt method. But thoſe, who ſeem, now, the moſt inflamed againſt the partition treaty, know, in their conſciences, that they themſelves would never have engaged in a new war, if the dominions in Italy, much leſs if the duchy of Milan had been the only point in debate. I leave it to you to judge what a parliament would have ſaid, if they had been called, and had found the French king in poſſeſſion of, perhaps, all the Spaniſh monarchy (as, no doubt, by what we have ſeen, he would ſoon have been upon the death of the king of Spain) if they had diſcovered, that offers had been made to have compounded for that whole ſucceſſion, by yielding up the dominions in Italy, but that the king and his miniſters had rejected the propoſition. I doubt not, but then we ſhould have had impeachments upon impeachments; and the ſuſpicions of ſelling and betraying the world into the hands of the French, would have carried ſuch characters of probability, that we would, in reverſe of ſir Bartholomew Shower's ſubtle diſcovery, have concluded who they were, that were the inſtruments of France, and ſuppoſed them to have been for later ſervices.' The author then proceeds to ſhew, that the dominions in Italy, though very valuable, yet, no naval power belonging to them, were not, now, ſo conſiderable as they had been ſome years before; nor was it certain, that, notwithſtanding the partition treaty, they would have been a ſure acceſſion to the crown of France, which, perhaps, would have found as much oppoſition to it, as ſhe was like to receive now to her taking poſſeſſion of the whole. He next remarks, That king William did not build much upon the faith and honour of the French king, but might imagine, that age had qualified that unquiet ſpirit, which had given the world, ſo much diſturbance. "He might think, that a bigotted prince would, above all things, deſire to have the papacy under his protection, that is to ſay, at his mercy. He would, perhaps, chuſe rather to have the dominions, that were yielded to him by the treaty, which he might expect, without the trouble and charge of a war, of which it is not eaſy to ſee the end: A lady, that has great credit with him, might be known to be fond of this acceſſion of empire, both as laying a great obligation on the ſucceſſion, and as ſecuring the quiet and life of one, in whom ſhe has ſo particular an intereſt: A miniſtry compoſed of ſuch young perſons, as might hope to outlive their monarch, for all his immortality, would probably conclude, that it would be more meritorious, in another reign, to have extended the empire of France, than to have raiſed a younger ſon of France, ſo as, perhaps, he might be able, one day, to diſpute matters with his eldeſt brother. Upon one, or more, of theſe reaſons, or perhaps, upon much better, the king might have reckoned, that the treaty would have been better ſtood to by the French, without relying ſo entirely upon a faith, that had been ſo often given, and ſo ſeldom kept." He ſhews likewiſe, that his majeſty had other things to depend on; as, particularly, that it was reaſonable to think, that the emperor would have come into the treaty, though it had been only with this deſign, that, by his ſon's being in poſſeſſion of the beſt part of the Spaniſh monarchy, he might thereby be the better enabled to lay claim, and ſtruggle for the reſt. "Was it reaſonable to think, that a prince, who had no naval force, would have maintained a diſpute in oppoſition to all the naval power of the world, united againſt him? and, could a prince of ſuch exhauſted revenue hope to ſucceed, in competition againſt a court, ſo dextrous in all the methods of it, and ſo well furniſhed with all that was neceſſary for making it moſt effectual? The emperor's conduct, in this matter, had been ſo unaccountable, in being ſo inactive to prevent it, that there was no reaſon to ſuſpect his not ſubmitting to the partition treaty, when he ſaw it could not be helped. The king might likewiſe truſt, ſomewhat, to the virtues and to the vices of the Spaniards. They have had an antipathy to the French, of above

To all this it was anſwered, that, there not being a force ready and ſufficient to hinder the French from poſſeſſing themſelves of the Spaniſh monarchy, which they were prepared for, the emperor had deſired the king to enter into a treaty of partition, and had conſented to every article of it, except that which related to the duchy of Milan. But the king, not thinking that worth the engaging in a new war, had obtained an exchange of it for the duchy of Lorrain. The emperor did not agree to this, yet he preſſed the king not to break off the treaty, but to get the beſt terms he could for him; and, above all things, he recommended ſecrecy, that ſo he might not loſe his intereſt in Spain, by ſeeming to conſent to this partition. It is certain, that, by our conſtitution, all foreign negotiations were truſted entirely to the crown: That the king was under no obligation by law to communicate ſuch ſecrets to his council, or to hear, much leſs was he obliged to follow, their advice. In particular it was ſaid, that the keeper of the great ſeal had no ſort of authority, to deny the putting it, either to powers for a treaty, or to any treaty which the king ſhould agree to. That the law gives no direction in ſuch matters, and he could not refuſe to put the great ſeal to any thing, for which he had an order from the king, unleſs the matter was contrary to law, which had made no proviſion in this caſe. They inſiſted moſt on the above two hundred years ſtanding. The Spaniards have never, before this time, been guilty of betraying their country. A fidelity, without example, has long ſupported a ſinking monarchy; and ſo it might have been ſtill depended on. And their coming ſo tamely under a French yoke, is a thing that was ſo little looked for, that, till all ſaw it, none could believe it. Upon all theſe accounts it might ſeem reaſonable enough for the king to imagine, that the treaty would have been ſtuck to, without an abſolute confidence in the virtues of the Chriſtian king. And, after all, as the king of Spain had lived beyond all men's expectations, ſo the king might have hoped, that he might languiſh out yet a few years more; and then the revenue of the crown of England would have been cleared of all anticipations, and, in the mean while, the French king would have been obliged to keep ſuch meaſures, as would have ſecured us from all attempts, and have ſunk the hopes of a treacherous party among ourſelves, who had ſet up their reſt upon the greatneſs of France, and begin now to revive their dead hopes, which ſeemed quite withered by the peace of Ryſwick, and by the ſeeming friendſhip between our court and that of Verſailles." In the Second Letter, the author conſiders the objections made to the 'juſtice' and to the wiſdom of the treaty. It was ſaid to be unjuſt in itſelf, as being a diſpoſition of the dominions of a third perſon, then alive, made by a confederacy of two ſtrangers, with one of the pretenders to the ſucceſſion, without the conſent of the other; and as being inconſiſtent with the ſeparate article of the grand alliance, made in 1689, whereby the States General ſtipulated with the emperor, to aſſiſt him in taking the ſucceſſion of the Spaniſh monarchy, in caſe of the then king of Spain's death without iſſue. For the better conceiving the force of the objections and the anſwers, it will be proper to ſtate the ſeveral pretenſions to the ſucceſſion. Philip the third had iſſue, beſides his ſon Philip the fourth, three daughters; Anna, the eldeſt, married to Lewis XIII, father of Lewis XIV; Margaret, the ſecond, married to the emperor, Ferdinand III, father of the reigning emperor; and Catherine, married to the duke of Savoy. Philip the Fourth had iſſue, beſides the laſt king of Spain, dead without iſſue, two daughters; the eldeſt, Maria Thereſa, married to Lewis XIV, who had iſſue, the Dauphin; the other, Margaret, married to the then emperor, by whom ſhe had iſſue only Maria Antonietta, firſt wife to the elector of Bavaria, and they had one child, the late electoral prince, born in 1691, and who died the 6th of February 1698. Upon the ſeveral marriages of the two Infantas with Lewis XIII, and Lewis XIV, ſolemn renunciations were made of all claims to the ſucceſſion of the Spaniſh dominions, by them or their deſcendants. Thoſe renunciations the houſe of Auſtria inſiſted upon as valid, and ſo their claim took place. The French pretended to object to their validity, and claimed the ſucceſſion, as if nothing had paſſed to bar them. This being the caſe, it appears, that the firſt treaty of partition was not liable to the objection of want of proper parties; for, as the French king and the Dauphin entered into it, ſo the elector of Bavaria, in behalf of his ſon, in whom at that time the whole right of the houſe of Auſtria was indiſputably lodged, was not only conſenting, but promoted it. And this firſt treaty had a very good conſequence; for, as ſoon as the tranſaction took air, it not only occaſioned the king of Spain to make a will, by which he declared the electoral prince his univerſal heir, but it made the emperor to acquieſce in it, who, till that time, was vigorouſly ſoliciting, by his miniſter at Madrid, for a will in favour of the archduke. As to the ſecond treaty, it appears, by the powers, which are in print, that it began in Holland, by a joint negotiation of the emperor's plenipotentiary, with thoſe of England, France, and the States General; but, the emperor not thinking it fit to appear a party in ſuch a negotiation, for reaſons which were obvious enough, the treaty was afterwards concluded without him. "To ſay it was unjuſt for that reaſon, is, at the ſame time, to ſay, the ſeparate article of the grand alliance was unjuſt, for that was diſpoſing of the dominions of a king then living, by an agreement of two ſtrangers, with one only of the pretenders. As the emperor was no party to this laſt treaty, ſo France was no party to the firſt. If it was conſiſtent with juſtice for the king of England and the ſtates to agree, that one of the pretenders ſhould have the whole, without any privity or conſent of the other, or of Spain; how could it be unjuſt (as to the nature of the contract) to enter into an agreement with one, only, of the pretenders, for diſtributing the ſucceſſion among all that claimed? When controverſies ariſe between ſovereign princes, there is no judicature to determine of the right; and they are at liberty to refuſe to ſubmit to a mediation, which is often hard to bring about, becauſe both parties muſt agree in the mediators. Controverſies of this ſort, would never have an end, but in the ruin of one of the parties, and, perhaps, of neighbouring nations, in the conſequence, unleſs other princes and ſtates may, by a proper interpoſition, in ſuch a manner as they think moſt agreeable to the juſtice and to the good of their own ſubjects, oblige all the pretenders to recede from extremities, and in caſe of obſtinacy, on any ſide, to aſſiſt thoſe, who are willing to yield, for the ſake of peace. This has been the approved practice of all ages. A well founded apprehenſion of an unreaſonable increaſe of power, in a neighbouring prince, has been always held to be a juſt ground of making war: It may be better defended to be a juſt reaſon to prevent it by treaty. An acceſſion of the entire Spaniſh dominions, either to the emperor (whoſe claim was for himſelf and his lineal deſcendants,) or to France, muſt, unqueſtionably, have formed a power extremely terrible to the reſt of Europe. It was, therefore, neceſſary to think of dividing the ſucceſſion, or turning it out of the direct line, for the common ſecurity of chriſtendom. Princes are bound to provide for the ſafety of their ſubjects, by all reaſonable ways: If the moſt eligible cannot be arrived at, they muſt purſue ſuch methods as are practicable. It was viſible, the French king was reſolved not to acquieſce in the renunciations: His flatterers had abſolutely hardened him in the opinion, that all thoſe ſolemn acts were inſignificant; and, to make good theſe ſentiments, he had not only employed his lawyers, but his arms, in the diſpute, for many years. This the emperor well knew; nay, it is expreſly declared in the 'ſeparate article of the grand alliance:' So that, when the accident happened, the war was inevitable: and the accident was expected every day. No care had been taken to form the neceſſary alliances, on the concluſion of the treaty of Ryſwick; nothing was determined, as to the Spaniſh ſucceſſion; no proviſion for ſecuring any thing ſtipulated by the grand alliance. On the contrary, ſome things had paſſed, at that time, which neceſſarily made a ſtrangeneſs between the emperor and the proteſtant princes. No arguments were omitted to draw him into new meaſures, in order to make the 'ſeparate article of the grand alliance' ſignificant and effectual. And it was highly reaſonable to inſiſt upon terms, when it was ſo freſh in memory, where the burden of the laſt war lay. But, by reaſon of the very ſlow meaſures of the court of Vienna, and the particular intereſts, which the emperor thought himſelf under the neceſſity of managing with the court at Madrid, nothing had been done, or was likely to be done, on that ſide; and, at the ſame time, the ſubjects of England and Holland ſeemed neither willing, nor able, to enter into a new war. France did not only continue armed, as during the war, but was at vaſt expence in buying horſes for remounting their cavalry, and liſting the ableſt men, as faſt as they were diſbanded by the confederates. Without a treaty, a war was inevitable, or rather, France was maſter of all, without a war. This was the unhappy neceſſity, under which the king and the ſtates found themſelves. And, in ſuch circumſtances, where was the injuſtice to accept of the contract of the French king and the Dauphin, to content themſelves with a part only of the vaſt ſucceſſion, and ſuch a part, as would not only be at leaſt inconvenient to the parties contracting, but to the general liberty and ſecurity of Europe, rather than leave him in circumſtances to ſeize the whole, or, at leaſt, to take the immediate poſſeſſion of thoſe parts, which would neceſſarily and ſuddenly endanger the trade and ſafety of the Engliſh and the Dutch? Upon the foot of this treaty, the king and the ſtates acquired an explicit and direct right to compel the French king to acquieſce in the ſhare allotted to him, which perhaps was wanting before. For though Spain, in reſpect of the ſeveral renunciations and ſolemn acts, had an expreſs right to oppoſe the future pretences of France to any part of that ſucceſſion, yet it was not plain, that, by renewing his claim, he violated any league with England and Holland, which would be the caſe after his entering into that treaty. There is another very conſiderable thing to juſtify this treaty, if it be true, as it has been affirmed, that, during the tranſactions in Holland in the ſummer 1699, the emperor's miniſters, though they declared they could not make themſelves parties to an agreement for diſmembering of the Spaniſh monarchy, which would wholly ruin their affairs at Madrid, yet they did not expreſs any great averſion to be ſeemingly forced to ſome reaſonable terms. It has not often been known, that a deliberate act of three ſovereign powers, made upon very weighty grounds, has been ſo frankly called 'unjuſt.' The emperor has not found cauſe to give it that hard name; nay, the French themſelves, who have violated this treaty in the moſt open and ſhameleſs manner, and want to the higheſt degree an excuſe for breach of faith, and had a good one, if the treaty was unjuſt, yet they have never called it by that name, but have contented themſelves to take up the wretched pretence, that, by breaking the league, they have purſued the ſpirit and meaning of it." The Author then proceeds to juſtify the wiſdom of the treaty, and to ſhew, that it was the only means left to prevent the impending deſtruction of Europe; and that, in the making of it, the intereſt of the houſe of Auſtria was ſincerely eſpouſed, and a ſolicitous care uſed, that the balance of Europe ſhould not be entirely broken, and at the ſame time England and Holland did not neglect themſelves, but made ſuch a diſtribution, as might be leaſt prejudicial to their intereſt. "The three things, ſays he, which they were principally obliged to take care of, were their ſecurity, their trade, and the common intereſt of the proteſtant religion. In order to this, they were firſt to take care of the barrier in Flanders, for making good whereof ſo much money had been ſpent, and ſo much blood had been ſhed, it being demonſtrably plain, that, if France was poſſeſſed of the Spaniſh Netherlands, it was not poſſible for the Dutch to bear long the expence of ſupporting themſelves; and when they fell a prey to France (notwithſtanding the vain diſcourſes we heard not long before) England was not likely to be free any great while.

"The ſecond thing, which concerned both nations highly, was the preſerving the trade of Spain, and the uſe of her ports.

"The third thing, which concerned England and the Dutch not a little, was to keep the Weſt-Indies, and the trade thither, in the condition they then ſtood. For it will not be denied, if ever France can appropriate to itſelf the trade of Spain, and the management of the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies, ſhe will ſoon be miſtreſs of the world.

"Theſe were the things to be firſt looked after, and for theſe the treaty did fully provide. It is not to be denied but that the Turkey trade was of great conſequence to both nations, and the trade of Italy not inconſiderable, eſpecially, to Holland; and it were to be wiſhed, that every thing could have been entirely gained: But, when that was impoſſible, the moſt weight was to be laid on what was of the greateſt conſequence.

"—— The treaty of partition, if it had been ſtood to, had placed Spain, the Weſt-Indies, the Netherlands, and Milan in ſuch hands, as France could expect no ſincere aſſiſtance from. What real addition of power Naples and Sicily would have brought to her, is not ſo plain. France is a compleat united ſtrength. Whether ſhe would have been ſtronger by the poſſeſſion of two remote countries, whoſe natives have the utmoſt hatred to the French, experience only would have ſhewn. Italy would have been alarmed to the laſt degree, to find the French taking poſſeſſion of ſo large a part of it, which it could not be poſſible to prevent, conſidering the power and preparations of France. But this would not have been the firſt time, that the French had got to be maſters of Naples and Sicily, and yet were not able to hold them. Certain it is, the court of Rome would have found itſelf obliged to ſet all its engines on work to prevent the eſtabliſhing of that ſlavery, which was other ſide upon the concluding a treaty of this importance, without communicating it firſt to the privy council. During this debate, ſome lords having ſpoke very reflectingly on the French king, the earl of Rocheſter animadverted upon them, alledging, that all men ought to ſpeak reſpectfully of crowned heads; and that this duty was more particularly incumbent on the peers of a kingdom, who derive all their honour and luſtre from the crown. This was ſeconded by another earl, who ſaid, That the king of France was not only to be reſpected, but likewiſe to be feared. To whom another lord replied, That he hoped no man in England needed to be afraid of the French king; much leſs the peer, who ſpoke laſt, who was too much a friend to that monarch, to fear any thing from him. Thus ended the firſt day of the debate [P].

The earl of Portland apprehending, that this might fall too heavily upon him, got the king's leave to communicate the whole matter next day to the houſe, when he told them, that he had not concluded the treaty alone, but had, by the king's order, acquainted ſix of his chief miniſters with it, who were the earls of Pembroke and Marlborough, the viſcount Lonſdale, the lord Somers and Halliſax, and ſecretary Vernon. Upon which theſe lords, being likewiſe freed by the king from the oath of ſecreſy, informed the houſe, that the earl of Jerſey having in the king's name called them together, the treaty was read to them; and that they excepted to ſeveral things in it, but they were told, that his majeſty had carried the matter as far as was poſſible, and that he could obtain no better terms. That therefore when they were thus aſſured, that no alterations could be made, but that every thing was ſettled, they gave over inſiſting on particulars; and only adviſed, that his majeſty might not engage himſelf in any thing, that would bring on a new war, ſince the nation had been ſo uneaſy under the laſt. This was carried to the king, and that, a few days after, he told ſome of them, that he was made acquainted with their exceptions; but, how reaſonable ſoever they were, he had driven the matter as far as he could. The earl of Pembroke ſaid to the houſe of lords, he had offered the king thoſe advices, that he thought were moſt for his ſervice, and for the good of the nation; but that he did not think himſelf bound to give an account of that to any other perſons. He was not the perſon aimed at; for which reaſon there was nothing ſaid, either againſt him, or the earls of Marlborough or Jerſey. Upon this the debate went on. Some ſaid, this was a mockery, to aſk advice when there was no room for it. It was anſwered, that the king had aſked advice of his privy council, and they had given it; but that, ſuch was the royal prerogative, that it was ſtill free to him to follow it or not, as he ſaw cauſe.

In concluſion, after three days debate, the houſe of lords reſolved to ſet out this whole matter in an addreſs to the king, complaining both of the partition treaty, and of the method, in which it had been carried on. The lord Wharton moved an addition to the addreſs, that, whereas the French king had broke that treaty, they ſhould adviſe his majeſty to treat no more with him, or rely on his word, without a real ſecurity. This was much oppoſed by all thoſe, who were againſt engaging in a new war: They ſaid, all motions of that kind ought to come from the houſe of commons, who only could ſupport ſuch an advice, which did in effect engage us in a new war; nor could they lay the blame on the breaking of a treaty, which they were reſolved to condemn. They alſo excepted to the words 'real ſecurity' as ambiguous; but the majority of the houſe agreed to it, for there was ſuch treachery in the French negotiations, that they could not be relied on without a good guarantee, and the pledge of ſome ſtrong places. It now plainly appeared, that the deſign was to ſet on the houſe of commons to impeach ſome lords, who had been concerned in the partition treaty; for it was moved to ſend the addreſs to the commons for their concurrence, but that was not carried.

The addreſs was to this effect: 'That their lordſhips, having conſidered the treaty of the 21ſt of February, or the 15th of March 1700, made with the French king, together with the ſeparate and ſecret articles, which his majeſty had been pleaſed to communicate to them, did moſt humbly repreſent to him, that, to their great ſorrow, they found the matters thereof to have been of very ill conſequence to the peace and ſafety of Europe; for that, beſides the occaſion it might have given to the late king of Spain, to have made his will in favour of the duke of Anjou, if that treaty had taken effect, the prejudice to his majeſty and his ſubjects, and indeed to all Europe, by the addition of Sicily, Naples, ſeveral ports of the Mediterranean, the province of Guipuſcoa, and the duchy of Lorrain, had been not only very great, but contrary to the pretence of the treaty itſelf, which was to prevent any umbrage that might have been taken, by uniting ſo many ſtates and dominions under one head. That, by all the informations they had had of that fatal treaty, they could not find, that the verbal orders and inſtructions (if any were given to his majeſty's plenipotentiaries) were ever conſidered in any of his majeſty's councils; or that the draught of that treaty had ever been laid before his majeſty, at any meeting of his council, much leſs that it was adviſed or approved of by any council or committee of council. Wherefore they thought themſelves bound in duty to his majeſty, and juſtice to their country, moſt humbly to beſeech him, that, for the future, he would be pleaſed to require and admit, in all matters of importance, the advice of his natural born ſubjects, whoſe known probity and fortunes might give him and his people a juſt aſſurance of their fidelity to his ſervice: and that, in order thereunto, he would be pleaſed to conſtitute a council of ſuch perſons, to whom his majeſty might be pleaſed to impart all affairs both at home and abroad, which might any way concern him and his dominions. For as intereſt and natural affection to their country would incline them to wiſh the welfare and proſperity of it much more than others, who had no ſuch ties upon them; and as their experience and knowledge of their country would alſo render them more capable than ſtrangers, of adviſing his majeſty in the true intereſts of it; ſo they were confident, that, after ſuch large and repeated demonſtrations of his ſubjects duty and affection, his majeſty could not doubt of their zeal in his ſervice, nor want the knowledge of perſons fit to be employed in all his moſt ſecret and arduous affairs. And that, ſince it appeared the French king's accepting of the king of Spain's will was a manifeſt violation of that treaty, they humbly adviſed his majeſty, in future treaties with that prince to proceed with ſuch caution, as might carry a real ſecurity.'

This addreſs being carried by the lord-keeper alone to Ken-inevitably coming upon them. They would be diſcerning enough to ſee, that from that hour the French king became peaceably ſettled in the poſſeſſion of Naples and Sicily, the pope muſt ſink in his character, and would be no more than a French biſhop. The reſt of the catholic world would hardly conſider him as a common father, who could be made and unmade at the pleaſure of France. Without pretending to prophecy, one may ſay literally, that heaven and earth would have been moved upon this occaſion. The church would have drawn out all her forces ſpiritual and temporal; and, beſides the influence ſhe would always have upon the Italian princes and ſtates, which is avowedly not little, they themſelves are quick-ſighted enough to ſee, what different figures the princes of France make in this age from what they made heretofore, and to learn caution from ſo ſignificant examples. Beſides the pope's remonſtrances would have had the more authority as well as vigour, from the ſcandalous appearance it would have had to the whole world, that France, in conjunction with two heretic powers, ſhould diſpoſe of the fiefs of the church. The emperor would undoubtedly have been ſolicited by all ſorts of arguments to aſſiſt the church, and aſſert the liberty of Italy; and, how far he might have been able to reſiſt, might not be difficult to gueſs. All the catholic princes of Germany were at liberty to act as the conjuncture invited them. The Italians would not have apprehended any thing from Spain; they would have underſtood eaſily, which way the archduke's wiſhes would go. The duke of Lorrain's affection to the houſe of Auſtria is ſo well known, that it is certain the French could have depended on nothing from Milan in his hands. And though the late chancellor in his letter ſaid, 'That, if the treaty ſhould take place, and Milan could not be relieved by ſea, it would be of little ſignification in the hands of any prince,' we ſee he was miſtaken, and that very powerful reliefs might be ſent by land to Milan, and the emperor and empire might always have an open way into Italy through that country. The king of France would have been cautious to have left his frontier naked towards Flanders, when in poſſeſſion of a prince of the houſe of Auſtria, or to have left the Rhine unguarded, when the pope would be ſure to have a prevailing power with the eccleſiaſtical electors, and the other catholic princes of the empire. This would have been the higheſt ſecurity to the proteſtant intereſt, for which certainly we were above all other things concerned. Italy would have been the ſcene of the war, where upon all accounts we ought to wiſh it, and not only as being the moſt remote from us. The apprehenſion of a catholic league, which is no chimera, and which it is to be juſtly feared may be the immediate conſequence of a ſettled peace among the popiſh powers, when the zeal of the emperor, as well as of the French king, is conſidered, would have been far removed. In ſuch a ſtate of things we could apprehend nothing to our trade, not even in the Mediterranean. All parties would have found it reaſonable to be courting the great naval powers of the world. We might be neuter, if we thought fit, or might have made our own terms. We were not bound to take any other ſhare in the war than we pleaſed; for, though we ſtood obliged to ſee the treaty executed, yet in the utmoſt ſtrictneſs that was all. We were not bound to maintain the reſpective parties in poſſeſſion: We might have enjoyed the advantages of peace, or we might have otherwiſe found our advantages in return for our aſſiſtance, in caſe we choſe to give it to either ſide."

[P] There was ſo great warmth in the debates of the commons concerning this treaty, that more than one of the members broke in upon common decency and good manners to a high degree. Seymour, Bolles, and others compared the dividing 'another man's kingdom to robbing on the highway.' It was called a 'felonious treaty,' which, as the report then was, the king ſo highly reſented, that he dropped an expreſſion, ſignifying, that, if the diſparity of their condition had not reſtrained him, he would have demanded the ſatisfaction of him, which all gentlemen have a right to demand of one that gives the lie.

The

ſington, who there found two or three of the lords in waiting, to make a ſhew of a houſe, it was preſented, on the 24th of March, to his majeſty, who anſwered, 'That it contained matter of very great moment; and that he would always take care, that all treaties, he made, ſhould be for the honour and ſafety of England.' The king ſeemed to bear this cenſure of the treaty with his uſual coldneſs: And the new miniſters continued ſtill in his confidence, but he laid the matter much to heart. Now he perceived the error he had fallen into, by the change he had made in the miniſtry. It was plain, they reſolved to govern him in every thing, and not to be governed by him in any one thing.

[1701] On the 31ſt of March, the king acquainted the commons, 'That having received an account from Mr. Stanhope, his envoy, at the Hague, that the French embaſſador there had declared, that the king his maſter had no other anſwer to return to the demands of the States-General, than that he was ready to renew the treaty of Ryſwick, it being all the ſecurity the States were to expect; and that he had no orders to give any anſwer to his majeſty's envoy; but, if his majeſty had any thing to demand, it might be done by his embaſſador at Paris, or the French miniſter at London; and that he had no command to treat with any but the States. And his majeſty having alſo received two reſolutions of the States, and a memorial from their envoy in England, relating to the ſhips they were ſending to join his majeſty's fleet, and the ſuccours they deſired might be haſtened to them, by virtue of the treaty of March 3. 1677; his majeſty had thought fit to communicate the whole to that houſe, that they might be particularly informed of the preſent ſtate of affairs abroad, where the negotiations ſeemed to be at an end, by the poſitive anſwer the French embaſſador had given to the States, which his majeſty recommended to the ſerious conſideration of that houſe, as a matter of the greateſt weight and conſequence, and deſired they would give him ſuch advice upon it, as might be for their own ſecurity, and that of the States-General, and the peace of Europe.'

The commons, having taken this meſſage into conſideration on the 2d of April, reſolved unanimouſly, 'That the humble advice of this houſe be given to his majeſty, to deſire, that his majeſty will be pleaſed to carry on the negotiations in concert with the States-General, and take ſuch meaſures therein, as may moſt conduce to their ſafety; and that his majeſty would purſue the treaty made with the States-General, the 3d of March, 1677; and to aſſure him, that they would effectually inable him to ſupport the treaty of 1677.' By this treaty made by king Charles with the Dutch, England was bound to aſſiſt them with ten thouſand men, and twenty ſhips of war, if they were attacked. Though the king knew what the commons meant by confining him to the treaty of 1677, and ſpeaking in general terms of his providing for their ſecurity, namely, to evade his deſire of forming a confederacy for a new war, without which he foreſaw France would never yield up any part of the Spaniſh monarcy; he returned, however, to their reſolution of advice, this ſoft anſwer, 'That, according to their advice, he had given orders to his envoy at the Hague to carry on the negotiations in concert with the States-General, and to take ſuch meaſures therein, as might conduce to their ſecurity. He thanked them for the aſſurance they had given, that they would effectually inable him to ſupport the treaty of 1677; and told them, that he would purſue the ſame, as they adviſed; and he did not doubt, but the readineſs, which they had ſhewn upon this occaſion, would very much contribute to the obtaining ſuch a ſecurity, as was deſired.'

Though the commons could not, upon this occaſion, be carried farther than to adviſe the king to purſue the treaty of 1677; the houſe of lords, however, addreſſed him to enter into leagues offenſive and defenſive with the emperor and other princes and ſtates, who were intereſted againſt the conjunction of the French and Spaniſh monarchies. This coldneſs and uncertainty in the Engliſh councils gave the French great advantages, in their negotiations both in Germany and Portugal. They tried the courts of Italy, but without ſucceſs; only the duke of Mantua conſented, that they ſhould make a ſhew, as if they had ſurprized him, and ſo force him to put Mantua into their hands. The pope and the Venetians would not declare themſelves. The former favoured the French, as the latter did the emperor, who began the war with a pretenſion on the duchy of Milan, as a fief of the empire, that devolved on him; and he was making magazines, both in Tirol and at Trent. The French ſeemed to deſpiſe all he could do, and did not apprehend, that it was poſſible for him to march an army into Italy. Both the king and the States-General preſſed him to make that attempt. The elector of Bavaria and ſome of the circles had agreed to a neutrality this year; ſo that there was no hope of doing much upon the Rhine; and the French were making the Italians feel, what inſolent maſters they were like to prove. This produced a general uneaſineſs among them, which determined the emperor to ſend an army into Italy under the command of prince Eugene. England was all this while very unwilling to engage; yet, for fear we ſhould at laſt ſee our intereſt ſo clearly, that we muſt have fallen into it, thoſe, who were practiſed on to embroil the nation, ſo that we might not be in a condition to mind foreign affairs, ſet on foot a deſign to impeach the former miniſtry.

In the mean time, a letter written in Latin came to the king from the king of Spain, giving notice of his acceſſion to the crown [q].

This letter was delivered by Torcy on the 19th of April, N. S. to the earl of Mancheſter at Paris, who deſired him, as count Tallard had left England, to tranſmit it to his maſter. It was dated, the day after king Philip entered into Spain; but the date and the letter were viſibly written at different times. The king ordered the letter to be read in the cabinet-council on the 13th of April; where there was a ſhort debate concerning it, but it was never brought into any further deliberation there. The earl of Rocheſter ſaw, that the king ſeemed diſtruſtful of him, and reſerved to him in the matter, and was highly offended at it. He and the reſt of the new miniſtry preſſed his majeſty to own the king of Spain, and to anſwer the letter; and, ſince the Dutch had done ſo, it ſeemed reaſonable, that the king ſhould likewiſe do it. They prevailed at laſt, but with much difficulty. The thing was kept ſecret, and was not communicated to the privy council or to the two houſes; nor did the king ſpeak of it to any of the foreign miniſters. The Paris Gazette gave the world the firſt notice of it. This, being carried in ſuch a manner, ſeemed the more ſtrange, becauſe his miniſtry had ſo lately condemned a former one, for not communicating the partition treaty to the council, before it was concluded; and yet had, in a matter of great conſequence, ſo ſoon forgot the cenſures, which they had thrown out ſo liberally upon the ſecrecy with which that matter had been tranſacted. [r].

[q] The tranſlation of the letter is as follows.

"Philip by the grace of God, king of Spain, both Sicilies, &c. to the moſt potent prince and lord William king of Great Britain, &c. Our moſt dear brother and couſin, health and proſperity. Moſt ſerene and potent prince, moſt dear brother and couſin; ſince we are, after perfecting of our journey, arrived at this court, and have there taken poſſeſſion of all the kingdom and dominions belonging to the crown of Spain, we will not delay giving your majeſty notice of it, and to aſſure you at the ſame time, that nothing is more deſired by us than the cultivating of a mutual friendſhip with your majeſty and your crown, that ſo we may by real ſigns let your majeſty ſee the inclination of our mind, and that we may alſo in this imitate the examples of the moſt ſerene kings, our predeceſſors, always mindful of the welfare of the Chriſtian world. Thus may the moſt good and great God bleſs your life with his grace."

Your majeſty's moſt loving brother,

Given at our palace of Buen-Retiro, the 24 of March, 1701.

Philip, King.
Joſeph M. de la Puerta.

[r] His majeſty's letter to the king of Spain was likewiſe in Latin, and the tranſlation of it is as follows:

"William the third, by the grace of God, king of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, &c. to the moſt ſerene and potent prince, the lord Philip the fifth, by the ſame grace, king of Spain, both Sicilies, Jeruſalem, India, &c. Archduke of Auſtria, duke of Burgundy, Brabant, and Milan, earl of Hapſburg, Flanders, Tirol, &c. our moſt dear brother and couſin, greeting. Moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, brother, and couſin, we have received your majeſty's letter of the 24th of March laſt, which was for many reaſons very acceptable to us, as well becauſe it gave us notice of your happy arrival in your kingdom of Spain, and of your coming to the poſſeſſion of it, and taking upon you the government of the dominions thereunto belonging; as becauſe you have aſſured us, that your majeſty hath a mind, that the moſt ancient friendſhip and correſpondence betwixt the two crowns ſhall remain inviolable. We have indeed willingly embraced this opportunity to congratulate your majeſty, on your happy acceſſion to the crown of Spain, and to certify to you how much we value you; and how great a deſire we have, that your majeſty ſhould know, that we will, with great application, do all that we can, that the mutual union ſubſiſting betwixt us by treaties and friendſhip be cloſer united, and that the advantage of both nations may every day be more and more promoted and flouriſh; which we hope will alſo end in the advantage and proſperity of all Europe. For the reſt, we recommend your majeſty to the care and protection of Almighty God. Given at our palace at Kenſington, the 17th of April, in the year of our Lord 1701, and of the 13th of our reign."

Your majeſty's moſt loving brother and couſin,

William R.

James Vernon.

This

The earl of Mancheſter, having received an account from Mr. ſecretary Vernon of his majeſty's anſwer to the king of Spain's letter, informed Torcy, the French miniſter, of it; and took notice of it to the Spaniſh embaſſador, who did not know before, that his maſter had wrote to king William. But the emperor's miniſter at Paris, ſoon hearing what had paſſed, expreſſed great ſurprize to the earl of Mancheſter, and ſaid, that this ſtep would diſcourage the emperor's friends. The earl anſwered, that it was no more than what the States-General had done, and that he ſaw how the empire itſelf was divided.

Mr. Stanhope likewiſe complimented the Spaniſh embaſſador at the Hague, upon the recognition of the king of Spain by king William, while monſieur d'Avaux, the French embaſſador at the Hague, preſented an amuſing memorial to the States-General, ſetting forth, 'That having tranſmitted their reſolution of the firſt of April to his maſter, wherein they deſired the negotiations might be reſumed, in conjunction with the king of England's envoy, for maintaining the peace of Europe, and providing for their own ſecurity; and that their lordſhips having at the ſame time declared, they wiſhed nothing ſo much, as that thoſe negotiations might be brought to a ſpeedy and good concluſion with his maſter; to whom he had given an account of the anſwer he gave their lordſhips concerning the admittance of the Engliſh envoy, and he had entirely approved the ſame, and was pleaſed with the aſſurances given by their lordſhips of the deſire they had to preſerve the peace. And, as his majeſty continued in the reſolution of maintaining the public tranquility, he would conſent to every expedient, that might conduce towards ſecuring the common good and repoſe of Chriſtendom; and that, in order thereunto, his majeſty had no ſooner been acquainted with their lordſhips deſign of renewing the conferences, but he had commanded his embaſſador to reſume the ſame, and continue at the Hague.'

Notwithſtanding this ſpecious declaration, the deſign of the French politics was ſtill to keep out the Engliſh envoy, and to engage the States to treat ſeparately. The Dutch deputies immediately apprehended their meaning by the ambiguity of the memorial, and therefore preſſed count d'Avaux to explain himſelf, letting him know at the ſame time, that the States would not enter into any negotiation with France, but in conjunction with England, their intereſts in this caſe being inſeparable; and that they muſt inſiſt upon a poſitive anſwer to that point, eſpecially now that his Britannic majeſty's owning the king of Spain had removed the principal objection, that was before inſiſted upon againſt treating with the miniſters of England. The French embaſſador, to delay his anſwer, deſired time to ſend for new inſtructions to court, which they appeared no way forward to ſend him; their deſign being to draw the buſineſs into a conſiderable length; which gave them opportunity to ſtrengthen themſelves daily on the frontiers of Holland, and to ſecure the Milaneſe.

Two or three fruitleſs conferences paſſed at the Hague, wherein the French embaſſador was ſtill attempting to draw in the States to treat alone, without the concurrence of England, which they would by no means agree to. His majeſty in return did all that lay in his power to aſſiſt them; for which end he ſent the three Scots regiments, retained in his own pay in Scotland, over into Holland. When the States had procured all poſſible ſupplies and reinforcements by their money and intereſt from princes abroad, and had exerted their power to the utmoſt at home, they wrote a letter to the king, to inform him how matters ſtood with them, and to deſire the troops to be ſent over to their aſſiſtance without delay, as ſtipulated by the treaty of 1677 [a]. Upon which the king, on the 8th of May, ſent this meſſage to the houſe of commons.

"William R.

"HIS majeſty having lately received an account from Mr. Stanhope of the preſent poſture of affairs in Holland, and likewiſe a letter from the States-General, which

[a] This letter was as follows (Cole, p. 379.)

SIR,

After the proteſtations, which we have made to your majeſty, in our laſt letter, of the 23d of April, not to enter into any negotiation with France, but in concert with England, we have thought fit to aſk of the count d'Avaux, embaſſador extraordinary of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, if he was inclined and authorized to re-enter into the negotiation, in the manner it was begun, in conjunction with the miniſter of your majeſty; as you may ſee, by our reſolution of the 2d of this month, here annexed. Count d'Avaux having ſent this to his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, preſented us, after the return of his courier, with the memorial, of which we join likewiſe a copy to this letter. We have immediately communicated it to Mr. Stanhope, envoy extraordinary from your majeſty, and, after having concerted with him about it, we found in the ſaid memorial, certain obſcurities, which made us doubt of its true ſenſe: For that reaſon, we thought it neceſſary to ſhew the count d'Avaux the letter, which we did ourſelves the honour to write to your majeſty, on the 23d of April laſt, and our engagements to take no meaſures in the negotiation, but in concert with you. The count d'Avaux anſwered our deputies, That he was come hither only to treat about means to preſerve the general peace, and to eſtabliſh our particular ſecurity: That, if we concert on this with your majeſty, he had nothing to ſay againſt it; and that he was contented, that your majeſty's envoy ſhould aſſiſt at the conferences to be held about this; but that he was not at all authorized to enter into a negotiation with us, about the intereſts of England, which were to be treated of elſewhere. Upon this, our deputies repreſented, That, in the conferences about a general peace, your majeſty was equally concerned with us: That our ſecurity could not, by any means, be ſeparated from that of England: That the two nations had, in this, a common intereſt; and that we could not but look upon your majeſty as a principal party concerned, as much as we, in the preſent negotiations, without our injuring your majeſty. But, notwithſtanding ſeveral inſtances of our deputies, and all the reaſons they could alledge, count d'Avaux perſiſted in the forementioned anſwer, ſaying, That he had no other orders: That he would ſend our reſolution (of which your majeſty will here ſee the copy) to the court of France, without giving the leaſt hopes of an anſwer conformable to our ſentiments. Upon the report, which has been made to us, we have judged, that thus they would ſeparate the intereſts of England from thoſe of our republic. We look upon them as inſeparable; and, as it is a plain caſe that they are ſo, we could draw no other concluſion from this proceeding, but that, on the ſide of France, there was a deſign to end the conferences, and to conſent to none of the ſecurities demanded, which are ſo neceſſary to the preſervation of the kingdoms of your majeſty, and of our republic. We are obliged to give your majeſty notice of all this. We proteſt, that, our intereſts being the ſame with thoſe of your majeſty, in this negotiation, and inſeparable one from the other, we ſhall not ſuffer them to be divided in any manner. In the mean while, ſir, we cannot but repreſent to your majeſty the preſſing occaſion we have to be aſſiſted, without loſs of time, if we will prevent the ruin we are threatened with, and the apparent danger, in which we are. You know to the bottom, the ſtate of our affairs; and you can eaſily judge, if it be poſſible, in the ſituation in which we are, to reſiſt forces ſo much ſuperior, as thoſe of France are. It is that which made us deſire, with ſo much earneſtneſs, the execution of the treaty, which received the approbation of the parliament, in the year 1678, betwixt king Charles II. of glorious memory, and this ſtate. We repeat, now, our moſt earneſt inſtances to have quickly the ſtipulated ſuccours, and the entire execution of the ſaid treaty. We flatter ourſelves, that your majeſty will make a ſerious reflection on the condition in which we are, particularly after the poſitive aſſurances, which you have given us, that the reſolutions of your parliament were to intereſt themſelves vigorouſly in our preſervation, and to aſſiſt us in the neceſſity, in which we are, by furniſhing the ſuccours we are agreed about. We will tell you, ſir, in what condition France puts itſelf; and your majeſty will judge, by that, if our fear, which re-animates our demands, be ill-founded. France, not contented with having taken poſſeſſion of all the places in the Netherlands, that remained to Spain, has thrown into them, and cauſes, actually every day, formidable forces to march thither. They draw a line from the Scheldt, near Antwerp, to the Maeſe. They are going to begin to draw ſuch a line according to our advices, from Antwerp to Oſtend. They ſend a numerous artillery into the places, that are neareſt to our frontiers. They make, with great diligence, many magazines in Flanders, in Brabant, in Guelderland, and at Namur, which they fill up with all ſorts of ammunition for war and ſubſiſtence, beſides the great ſtores of forage, which they gather from all parts. They build forts under the cannon of our places. Beſides they have worked, and work ſtill, continually to draw the princes, that are our friends, from our intereſt, to make them enter into their alliance, or to engage them to a neutrality, at leaſt. In ſhort, by intrigues and diviſions in the empire, they make our friends uſeleſs, and increaſe thoſe of France. Thus we are almoſt ſurrounded, on all ſides, except on the ſide of the ſea. See here, ſir, without any diſguiſe, the true ſituation, to which we find ourſelves reduced, without adding any thing to what is fact. This makes us hope, that, as your majeſty underſtands our affairs perfectly well, you will agree with us, that at preſent our condition is worſe, than it was during the late war, and worſe than if we were actually at war; whilſt they make forts under the cannon of our ſtrong places, and lines along our frontiers, without our being able to hinder it, as we might do, if we were at war.

Theſe reaſons oblige us to put ourſelves in a ſtate of defence, more than if we were actually attacked, by overflowing our country, and even to cut the dikes, to ſecure our frontiers. We are forced to employ theſe means and all thoſe we could bear in an open war: ſo that our ſubjects ſuffer, already, more than they did, during the laſt war. Hitherto, the winter has ſerved us as a ſort of ſecurity. That ſeaſon is over, and we are at the brink of being invaded and overturned every moment, if we do not get prompt ſuccours. We promiſe ourſelves, ſir, that it will come from your ſide, eſpecially, ſince it has pleaſed your majeſty to aſſure us, that your parliament had taken reſolutions, that were favourable for us. As our neceſſity is preſſing, we pray you to conſider well the extremity in which we are, and the impoſſibility of avoiding our entire ruin, and the overthrow of our republic, if we are left in this condition. We believe, ſir, that the intereſts of England are ſo ſtrictly united with ours, that we would ſooner expoſe ourſelves to all hazards, than ſuffer, that they ſhould be ſeparated, or take any meaſures, but in concert with your majeſty. It is quite unneceſſary to repreſent to you, that the preſervation of your own kingdoms ought to induce you to prevent our ruin, whilſt we believe their loſs to be inſeparable from ours. The reaſons, ſir, are better known to you, than to us, as well as the fatal conſequences, to which we are expoſed, by leaving us in this condition. This convinces us, that your majeſty will direct every thing by your conſummate wiſdom, and the good intentions of your parliament, in ſuch a manner, as to ſhew to all Europe, that nothing is more advantageous to it, than the alliances with England and its friendſhip. As for us, we expect, without delay, the accompliſhment of the above-named treaty: And, we pray God, ſir, to preſerve the ſacred perſon of your majeſty, in long health, and your dominions in a flouriſhing proſperity.

Your majeſty's very humble ſervants,

Hague, May 13, 1701.

The States General of the United Provinces of the Netherlands.

J. Van Wicher.

By their order, F. Fagel.

The

is of the greateſt importance. And his majeſty, who has ſo perfect a knowledge of their country, being entirely convinced of the hardſhips of their preſent condition, and the great preſſures they now lie under, which are particularly expreſſed in their letter, has thought it abſolutely neceſſary to communicate the ſame to this houſe; that the expectations the States have of preſent aſſiſtances from his majeſty, may more fully appear. And his majeſty does not doubt, but this houſe will be ſo juſtly ſenſible of thoſe immediate dangers, to which they ſtand expoſed, as to take the ſame into their moſt ſerious and effectual conſideration; it being moſt evident, that the ſafety of England, as well as the very being of Holland, does very much depend upon your reſolution in this matter."

This meſſage was conſidered the next day, and the commons reſolved, "That they will effectually aſſiſt his majeſty to ſupport his allies, in maintaining the liberty of Europe, and will immediately provide ſuccours for the States-General, according to the treaty of the 3d of March 1677." This reſolution being preſented to the king by the whole houſe, May the 10th, he gave them the following anſwer:

"Gentlemen,

"I Return you my hearty thanks for the ready aſſurances you give me of providing immediate ſuccours for the States-General, and for the zeal you expreſs for the common cauſe. I know nothing, that can be more effectual for its ſupport both at home and abroad than the unanimous concurrence, which you have ſhewed upon this occaſion. And it will be a particular ſatisfaction to me, in my time, to revive the glory, which the Engliſh nation has formerly had, of maintaining the liberty and balance of Europe."

The king likewiſe communicated the letter from the States General to the houſe of lords, who, on that occaſion, preſented this addreſs on the 14th of May:

"WE your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, return your majeſty our moſt humble thanks, for communicating to us the letter from the States-General to your majeſty. It gives us an opportunity (with great ſatisfaction) to repeat to your majeſty the aſſurances of our duty, and zeal for your ſervice. And we take this occaſion further to aſſure your majeſty, we are very ſenſible of the great and imminent danger, to which the States-General are at preſent expoſed. And we do perfectly agree with them in believing, that their ſafety and ours are ſo inſeparably united, that whatſoever is ruin to the one, muſt be fatal to the other. And we humbly deſire your majeſty will be pleaſed, not only to make good all the articles of any former treaty to the States-General, but that you will enter into a ſtrict league offenſive and defenſive with them, for our common preſervation; and that you will invite into it all princes and ſtates, who are concerned in the preſent viſible danger, ariſing from the union of France and Spain. And we further deſire your majeſty, that you will be pleaſed to enter into ſuch alliances with the emperor, as your majeſty ſhall think fit, purſuant to the ends of the treaty of 1689. Towards all which, we aſſure your majeſty of our hearty and ſincere aſſiſtance, not doubting, but, whenever your majeſty ſhall be obliged to engage for the defence of your allies, and the ſecuring the liberty and quiet of Europe, Almighty God will protect your ſacred perſon in ſo righteous a cauſe; and that the unanimity, wealth, and courage of your ſubjects will carry your majeſty, with honour and ſucceſs, through all the difficulties of a juſt war. And in the laſt place, with great grief, we take leave humbly to repreſent to your majeſty, that the dangers to which your kingdoms and your allies have been expoſed, are chiefly owing to the fatal counſels, that prevented your majeſty's ſooner meeting your people in parliament."

To this the king returned the following anſwer.

My Lords,

"I thank you for all the expreſſions you make of your duty and zeal to my ſervice, and the concern you ſhew for the imminent danger, to which the States-General are at preſent expoſed. I ſhall take into conſideration your deſires to me, of entering into new meaſures with them and other princes and ſtates, for our common preſervation. And you may be ſure, it ſhall be always my care to make ſuch alliances with our neighbours, as may tend to our own and their greateſt ſecurity; which will be the moſt effectual means to raiſe the honour of the Engliſh nation, in our days, to the reputation it hath maintained in any former times."

The deſign of impeaching the former miniſtry was now beginning to be executed. The handle for bringing it about was given by the earl of Portland. When he was excuſing his own part in the partition treaty, he ſaid, That, having withdrawn himſelf from buſineſs, and being at his country-houſe in Holland, the king ſent for him, deſiring him to enter upon that negotiation. Upon this, he wrote to ſecretary Vernon, to aſk his advice, and the advice of his other friends, whether it was fit for him to meddle in that matter, ſince his being by birth a foreigner ſeemed a juſt excuſe for not engaging in an affair of ſuch conſequence. To this the ſecretary anſwered, that all his friends thought he was a very proper perſon to be employed in the treaty, ſince he had known the progreſs of all thoſe treaties, and the perſons who were employed on that occaſion; and he named the lord Sommers among thoſe who had adviſed this. The earl of Portland had miſtaken this circumſtance, which did not belong to the laſt partition treaty, but to that of the year before in favour of the electoral prince of Bavaria. The houſe of commons hearing of this, required ſecretary Vernon to lay before them that letter, with his anſwer to it; for the earl of Portland ſaid, that he had left all papers relating to that matter in Holland. The ſecretary ſaid, he had received no ſuch letter in the year 1699; but that led them to enquire farther, and they required him to lay before them all the letters he had, relating to both the treaties of partition. He anſwered, that thoſe were the king's ſecrets, writ in confidence by the perſons whom he employed. But as in ſuch a caſe a houſe of commons will not be put off, and a denial rather raiſes in them more earneſtneſs in following their point; it was replied, that the king had diſpenſed with the oath of ſecrecy, when he ordered all matters to be laid before them; and they would admit of no excuſe. The ſecretary upon this went to the king, and told him, ſince theſe were his ſecrets, he was ready to expoſe himſelf to the indignation of the houſe, and to refuſe to ſhew his letters. But the king anſwered, that his refuſing to do it would not only raiſe a ſtorm againſt himſelf, from which he could not protect him, but likewiſe occaſion an addreſs to the king, to order him to lay every thing before the houſe, which, in the ſtate that things were in then, he could not deny. The ſecretary, upon theſe orders given him at two different times, carried all the letters, and laid them before the houſe of commons. It appeared by theſe, that he had communicated the treaty to the king's miniſters, who were in town, about the end of Auguſt 1698: That lord Sommers being then at Tunbridge, he went to him; and that he had communicated the project both to the earl of Orford and lord Hallifax. Several objections were made by them to many parts of the treaty, which were mentioned in the ſecretary's letters; but, if better terms could not be had, they thought it was more eligible to conclude the treaty, than to leave the Spaniſh monarchy to be over-run by France, or to involve Europe in a new war. Lord Sommers had alſo put the great ſeal to blank powers for concluding this treaty. When all this was read, thoſe, who were ſet on to blow up the flame, moved the houſe to impeach ſome of the miniſters, who had been concerned in this tranſaction; yet in this they proceeded with ſo viſible a partiality, that though the earl of Jerſey had ſigned the treaty, and had been embaſſador in France, and ſecretary of ſtate, while the partition treaty was negociating; yet he, having joined himſelf to the new miniſtry, was not queſtioned about it. The party ſaid, that he had been too eaſily drawn into it, but that he was not in the ſecret, and had no ſhare in the councils that projected it.

On the firſt of April the houſe of commons reſolved, 'That William earl of Portland, by negociating and concluding the treaty of partition, (which was deſtructive to the trade of this kingdom, and dangerous to the peace of Europe) is guilty, and ſhall be impeached, of high crimes and miſdemeanors.' And they ordered ſir John Leviſon Gower to go up to the lords, and at their bar to impeach the earl, and to acquaint their lordſhips, that they will in due time exhibit particular articles againſt him. They then appointed a committee to draw up articles of impeachment[t]; and deſired a conference with the lords, at which the commons delivered this paper to the lords:

[t] The committee were as follow:

Mr. Finch,
Sir Chriſtopher Muſgrave,
Sir John-Leviſon Gower,
Col. Granville,
Sir Godfrey Copley,
Sir Thomas Powys,
Lord Mordaunt,
Sir Humphry Mackworth,
Sir Bartholomew Shower,
Mr. Howe,

'It appearing by your lordſhips journal, that your lordſhips have received information of ſome tranſactions between the earl of Portland and Mr. ſecretary Vernon relating to the partition of the Spaniſh monarchy; the commons, having the ſaid matter under their conſideration, deſire your lordſhips will be pleaſed to communicate to the commons what information your lordſhips have had of any tranſactions relating to any negotiations or treaties of partition of the Spaniſh monarchy, by letter or otherwiſe. And the commons are fully aſſured, that your lordſhips will readily concur in aſſiſting them in this inquiry, which they conceive abſolutely neceſſary for the ſafety and honour of this kingdom, and the preſervation of the peace of Europe.'

Upon this, the lords ordered to be delivered to the commons the two Latin commiſſions of powers granted to the earls of Portland and Jerſey, for negociating the treaties; one dated the 1ſt of July 1699, and the other on the ſecond of January 1700, with the paper of the earl of Portland's relating to his correſpondence with ſecretary Vernon about the firſt treaty.

But, though the earl of Portland was impeached firſt, the chief deſign was againſt the earl of Orford, and the lords Sommers and Hallifax. Their enemies tried again what uſe could be made of captain Kidd's buſineſs, who had been taken, and brought over. He was examined by the houſe of commons, but either he could not lay a probable ſtory together, or ſome remnants of honeſty, raiſed in him by the near proſpect of death, reſtrained him. He accuſed no perſon of having adviſed or encouraged his turning pirate. He had never talked alone with any of the lords, and never at all with lord Sommers. He ſaid, he had no orders from them, but to purſue his voyage againſt the pirates in Madagaſcar. All endeavours were uſed to perſuade him to accuſe the lords: He was aſſured, that, if he did it, he ſhould be preſerved; and, if he did it not, he ſhould certainly die for his piracy [n]; yet this could not prevail on him to charge them; ſo that he, with ſome of his crew, were hanged on the 23d of May 1701, there appearing not ſo much as a colour to faſten any imputation on thoſe lords. However, their enemies tried what uſe could be made of the grant of all that captain Kidd might recover from the pirates, which ſome bold and ignorant lawyers affirmed to be againſt law. This matter was therefore, for the fourth time, debated in the houſe of commons; and the behaviour of thoſe peers in it appeared ſo innocent, ſo legal, and, in truth, ſo meritorious, that it was again let fall. The inſiſting ſo much on it ſerved to convince all people, that the enemies of theſe lords wanted not inclinations, but only matter to charge them, ſince they made ſo much uſe of this. But ſo partial was a great part of the houſe, that the dropping this was carried only by a ſmall majority. When one deſign failed, another was ſet up.

It was pretended, that by Vernon's letters it was clearly proved, that the lord Sommers had conſented to the partition treaty; ſo a debate coming on in the houſe of commons concerning that, lord Sommers deſired he might be admitted to give an account of his ſhare in it. Some oppoſition was made to this, but, as it had been always granted, it could not be denied him. He had obtained the king's leave to tell every thing: So that, when he appeared before the houſe, he told them, the king had writ to him, that the ſtate of the king of Spain's health was deſperate; and that he ſaw no way to prevent a new war, but to accept of the propoſition, which the French made for a partition. That the king ſent him the ſcheme of this, and ordered him to communicate it to ſome others, and to give him both his opinion and theirs concerning it, and to ſend him over powers for a treaty, but in the moſt ſecret manner poſſible. Yet his majeſty added that, if he and his other miniſters thought that a treaty ought not to be made upon ſuch a project, then the whole matter muſt be let fall, for he could not bring the French to better terms. Lord Sommers upon this ſaid, that he thought it was the taking too much upon himſelf, if he ſhould have put a ſtop to a treaty of ſuch conſequence. If the king of Spain had died before it was finiſhed, and the blame had been caſt on him for nor ſending the neceſſary powers, becauſe he was not ordered to do it by a warrant in full form, he could not have juſtified that, ſince the king's letter was really a warrant, and therefore he thought he was bound to ſend the powers that were called for, which he had done. But at the ſame time he wrote his own opinion very fully to his majeſty, objecting to many particulars, if there was room for it, and propoſing ſeveral things, which, as he thought, were for the good and intereſt, of England. That ſoon after the powers were ſent over by him, the treaty was concluded, to which he put the great ſeal, as he thought he was bound to do; and that in this, as he was a privy councillor, he had offered the king his beſt advice, and, as he was a chancellor, he had executed his office according to his duty. That as for putting the ſeal to the powers, he had done it upon the king's letter, which was a real warrant, though not a formal one; that he had indeed deſired, that a warrant in due form might be ſent him for his own ſecurity; but he did not [n]. The author of the 'Full account of the proceedings, in relation to captain Kidd' publiſhed in 1701, and re-printed in the third volume of the 'State tracts, during the reign of king William,' has the following paſſage in his ſecond letter: 'Kidd was a fellow, whoſe actions did not only ſhew, that death muſt needs be terrible to him, but that he was not like to ſtick at any thing, upon the account of conſcience, to avoid it; and therefore, probably, would ſet himſelf to work, as ſoon as he ſaw his certain danger. This is not a mere conjecture, but it is proved by ſir Edward Seymour's ſo greedily laying hold of that information, which he made to the houſe, on Monday, March 31. viz. That he had a letter from Kidd, wherein he deſired to be brought up, having ſomething to ſay to the houſe. His manner of opening it, and the warmth with which it was ſeconded by a well-ſpoken gentleman, whoſe tongue, the earl of Bellamont ſays, in one of his letters, is as foul and corrupt as his breath, raiſed every one's expectations; and you may be ſure, Kidd was ſent for immediately. But, being come, and heard, the poor creature had nothing to ſay, which, in any ſort, anſwered the expectations of thoſe, who gave the information, or were ſo forward to ſend for him, and thereupon he was remanded. Sir Edward Seymour had ſuch indignation at his diſappointment, that he declared, The fellow was a fool, as well as a rogue; and that he would never credit what he ſhould ſay hereafter. To ſpeak the truth, it was no fault of that gentleman's that Kidd ſaid no more to the purpoſe. He watched his bringing up, and preſently got to him, alone, in the room where he was kept. Their converſation, through God's mercy, was quickly interrupted. Two worthy merchants, who heard that ſir Edward Seymour was alone with Kidd, had ſo much ſenſe of his behaviour throughout that whole matter, and ſo juſt an abhorrence of ſuch a practice, that they ruſhed immediately into the room, and put an end to the privacy. But, if there be a curioſity of knowing what paſſed in that little time it laſted, the miſtreſs of the tavern at Charing-Croſs, where Kidd ſtayed a little while, and he was carried back to Newgate that morning, and the keeper, who took care of him, and drank with him, are both alive, and can tell what Kidd naturally related of that ſhort conference, ſoon after it was over. I think I ought to tell you, how ſir Edward Seymour came to make this miſtake in procuring Kidd to be ſent for thus fruitleſsly, that you may the better ſee his zeal to make ſomewhat more than he could find. For though he told the houſe he had a letter from Kidd, that was but a mending the ſtory, to give the more expectation of what was to come, and therefore you will obſerve care was taken to omit any mention of a letter in the printed votes.' The fact was thus: 'When Kidd was brought up the firſt time, he became indebted to one Kiſtdale a coffee-man, near the houſe of commons, in ſeven or eight ſhillings. The coffee-man and his ſon went to him to Newgate, on the Sunday, to demand the debt; and, drinking together, Kiſtdale ſaid to Kidd, You are a fool to be hanged for any body, and you may certainly ſave yourlife, if you can ſay any thing againſt the lord Orford, and the lord Sommers. Kidd replied, I will hang for no body, and I am reſolved to ſpeak all I know. Kiſtdale and his ſon went immediately with this ſtory to ſir Edward Seymour, and upon that he founded the information he gave the houſe, which he called the receiving a letter; whether the coffee-man acted by order in talking ſo to Kidd, or whether he only gueſſed whether he ſhould be welcome with a bad ſtory, I know not. Sir Edward Seymour little knew himſelf, when he ſaid he would never credit Kidd again. He was ſo unwilling to let this matter end without more prejudice and reflection, on thoſe whoſe ruin he wiſhed, that ten days after, he and his good natured friend were engaged in bringing another yet more impertinent ſtory before the houſe. He informed them that Kidd, ſince his being in Newgate, had been in ſome other place beſides the houſe of commons; this occaſioned a new examination of all the keepers of Newgate. But there alſo followed a diſappointment, it proving to be a ridiculous as well as a falſe tale, and ended in the confuſion of thoſe whoſe malice and deſire to oppreſs innocence could never end. The ſtory is as follows: One Symmonds, who had been formerly an officer in the marine regiments, and lives now as he can, told ſir Edward Seymour and Mr. John Howe, that one Stockdale told him, that the firſt time Kidd was brought up to the houſe, as he was going back to Newgate, he was carried to the lord Hallifax's houſe in Weſtminſter. Stockdale ſaid, he ſaw him there, together with that lord and the lord Sommers; incredible ſtupidity and effrontery! My author proceeds, if you would know the quality of this Stockdale, he is a poor fellow that waits at an ale-houſe at Charing-Croſs, to be ſent on errands, but was brother to a maid ſervant in my lord Hallifax's family; by pretence of which, he uſed very often to get victuals there, and ſo knew the way into the houſe. Upon the examination of theſe two fellows, procured by Seymour and Howe, it appeared it was not poſſible the tale ſhould be true, becauſe all that day hundreds of people followed Kidd wherever he went, ſo that this interview muſt have been a very public one. If the gentlemen, who thought fit to give this notable information to the houſe of commons, had not been blinded with malice, they muſt have ſeen the folly of it. Was it probable that one of thoſe lords, who was wholly unconcerned in the buſineſs of Kidd, ſhould ſo unneceſſary deſire his company at his houſe on ſo remarkable a day? Or was it poſſible to believe, that the other of theſe lords, who certainly thought himſelf not a little fortunate, that Kidd upon his examinations had declared he had never ſeen him, would begin an acquaintance with him at that time? I have told you that this third enquiry vaniſhed into ſmoke; and I cannot forbear obſerving to you, that it ended without any cenſure or indignation expreſſed againſt thoſe who continued to act a part ſo ſhamefully malicious.'

think it became him to endanger the public, only for want of a point of form, in ſo critical a time, wherein great diſpatch was requiſite. Having finiſhed what he had to ſay, the ſpeaker aſked him the queſtion, which had been reſolved before his admiſſion, 'Who had informed him, that there was a debate in the houſe about him?' To which he anſwered, 'That he was ſtrangely ſurprized at a queſtion, that he never knew was put to any man, that came to deſire the favour of being heard; and that, if that queſtion was aſked to bring the leaſt prejudice to any man in England, ho would not only be content to lie under the cenſure of the houſe, but ſuffer the worſt thing that might befall him upon earth, rather than do adiſhoneſt thing.' He then withdrew, but came back immedately, and deſired to leave with the houſe the king's letter to him, and the copy of his anſwer; which, he acquainted the houſe, he had leave to lay before them. His defence of himſelf was ſo full and clear, that it was believed, if, upon his withdrawing, the queſtion had been quickly put, the whole matter had been ſoon at an end, and the proſecution let fall. But his enemies drew out the debate to ſuch a length, that the impreſſion which hisſpeech had made was much worn out; and, the houſe ſitting till it was paſt midnight, they at laſt carried this reſolution by a majority of ſeven or eight, 'That John lord Sommers, by adviſing his majeſty, in the year 1698, to the treaty of partition of the Spaniſh monarchy, whereby large territories of the king of Spain's dominions were to be delivered up to France, is guilty of a high crime and miſdemeanor.' And the houſe ordered Mr. Simon Harcourt to go up to the lords, and impeach him. Immediately after they reſolved, 'That Edward earl of Orford, and Charles lord Hallifax, be, for the ſame reaſons, impeached of high crimes and miſdemeanors.' Accordingly, the general impeachment was brought up the next day againſt all three, to the bar of the houſe of lords.

The commons were very ſenſible, that thoſe impeachments muſt come to nothing, and that they had not a majority in the houſe of lords to judge in them as they ſhould direct. They reſolved therefore on a ſhorter way, to fix a ſevere cenſure on the lords, whom they had thus impeached. They voted an addreſs to the king, for removing them from his council and preſence for ever; which was preſented by the houſe, on the 23d of April in theſe terms.

Moſt gracious Sovereign,

"WE your majeſty's, moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons in parliament aſſembled, do humbly crave leave to repreſent to your majeſty the great ſatisfaction we have from our late inquiry concerning the treaty of partition, made in the year 1698, (on which the treaty of 1699 was founded) to ſee your majeſty's great care of your people and this nation, in not entering into that negotiation without the advice of your Engliſh counſellors: And finding, that John lord Sommers, on whoſe judgment your majeſty did chiefly rely in that ſo important affair, did, in concert with Edward earl of Orford, and Charles lord Hallifax, adviſe your majeſty to enter into that treaty, of ſo dangerous conſequence to the trade and welfare of this nation; and who, to avoid the cenſure, which might juſtly be apprehended to fall on thoſe who adviſed the ſame, endeavoured to inſinuate that your majeſty, without the advice of your council, entered into that treaty, and under your ſacred name to ſeek protection for what themſelves had ſo adviſed; of which treatment of your majeſty, we cannot but have a juſt reſentment. And, that they may be no longer able to deceive your majeſty, and abuſe your people, we do humbly beſeech your majeſty, that you will be pleaſed to remove John lord Sommers, Edward earl of Orford, and Charles lord Hallifax, from your council and preſence for ever; as alſo William earl of Portland, who tranſacted theſe treaties, ſo unjuſt in their own nature, and ſo fatal in their conſequences to this nation and the peace of Europe. And we humbly crave leave, upon this occaſion, to repeat our aſſurances to your majeſty, that we will always ſtand by and ſupport your majeſty, to the utmoſt of our power, againſt all your enemies both at home and abroad."

To this addreſs the king returned this anſwer:

"I am willing to take all occaſions of thanking you very heartily for the aſſurances you have frequently given me, and now repeat, of ſtanding by and ſupporting me againſt all our enemies both at home and abroad; towards which nothing, in my opinion, can contribute ſo much, as a good correſpondence between me and my people. And therefore you may depend upon it, that I will employ none in my ſervice, but ſuch as ſhall be thought moſt likely to improve that mutual truſt and confidence between us, which is ſo neceſſary in this conjuncture, both for our own ſecurity, and the defence and the preſervation of our allies."

Such an addreſs had never gone along with an impeachment before. The houſe of commons had indeed begun ſuch a practice in king Charles the ſecond's time. When they diſliked a miniſter, but had not matter to ground an impeachment on, they had taken this method of making an addreſs againſt him; but it was a new attempt to come with an addreſs after an impeachment. This was puniſhing before trial, contrary to an indiſpenſible rule of juſtice, of not judging before the parties were heard. The houſe of lords ſaw, that this made their judicature ridiculous, when, in the firſt inſtance of an accuſation, application was made to the king for a cenſure, and a very ſevere one, ſince few miſdemeanors could deſerve a harder ſentence. Upon theſe grounds the lords prevented the commons, and ſent ſome of their body to the king with this counter-addreſs:

"WE your majeſty's moſt loyal and dutiful ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, beg leave to repreſent to your majeſty, that the houſe of commons have ſeverally impeached, and at the bar of our houſe, William earl of Portland, John lord Sommers, Edward earl of Orford, and Charles lord Hallifax, of high crimes and miſdemeanors.—We do moſt humbly beſeech your majeſty, that your majeſty will be pleaſed not to paſs any cenſure upon them, until they are tried upon the impeachments, and judgment be given according to the uſage of parliament, and the laws of the land."

The king made no other anſwer to this addreſs, than by letting the names of the impeached lords continue ſtill in the council-books, contrary to the addreſs of the commons. As this ſeemed to be a refuſing to grant what they had deſired, though it was but a piece of common juſtice, it was complained of, and it was ſaid, that theſe lords had ſtill great credit with the king. The commons had, for form ſake, ordered a committee to prepare articles of impeachment, but they intended to let the matter lie dormant, thinking that what they had done already, had ſo marked thoſe lords, that the king could not employ them any more; for that was the chief thing they aimed at.

Accordingly, the impeachments lay long neglected in the houſe of commons, and probably would have been dropped, if the lords concerned had not moved for a trial. On their motion, on the 5th of May, a month and five days after the impeachment of the earl of Portland, and twenty-one days after that of the other three lords, the houſe of lords, to quicken the proceedings of the commons, ſent them a meſſage to put them in mind, that, as yet no particular articles had been exhibited againſt the impeached lords; which, after impeachments had been ſo long depending, was due in juſtice to the perſons concerned, and agreeable to the methods of parliament in ſuch caſes. Upon this articles were framed againſt the earl of Orford, and, on the 9th of May, were ſent up to the lords by colonel Bierly, who, by order of the commons, demanded that the earl ſhould give ſecurity to abide the judgment of the houſe of lords; but, after inſpecting the journals, the commons were told that there was no precedent of giving any ſuch ſecurity upon an impeachment of high crimes and miſdemeanors.

In the articles, the earl was charged for taking great grants from the king; Kidd's buſineſs was objected to him; he was alſo charged for abuſes in managing the fleet, and victualling it, when it lay on the coaſt of Spain, and for ſome orders he had given, during his command; and in concluſion, for his adviſing the partition treaty. And, in ſetting this out, the commons urged, that the king, by the alliance made with the emperor in the year 1689, was bound to maintain his ſucceſſion to the crown of Spain, which they ſaid was ſtill in force; ſo the partition treaty was a breach of faith, contrary to that alliance; and this paſt current in the houſe of commons, without any debate or enquiry into it; for every thing was acceptable there, that loaded that treaty, and theſe lords: But they did not conſider, that by this they declared, they thought the king was bound to maintain the emperor's right to that ſucceſſion; yet this was not intended by thoſe, who managed the party, who had not hitherto given any countenance nance to the emperor's pretenſions: So apt are parties to make uſe of any thing, that may ſerve a turn, without conſidering the conſequences of it.

The earl of Orford put in his anſwer in four days; he ſaid he had no grant of the king, but a reverſion at a great diſtance, and a gift of ten thouſand pounds, after he had defeated the French at la Hogue, which he thought he might lawfully accept of, as all others before him had done: He opened Kidd's matter, in which he had acted legally, with good intentions to the public, and to his own loſs: His accounts, while he commanded the fleet, had been all examined and were paſt; but he was ready to wave that, and to juſtify himſelf in every particular, and he denied his having given any advice about the partition treaty; this was immediately ſent down to the commons; but they let it lie before them, without coming to a replication, which is only a piece of form, by which they undertake to make good their charge [w].

On the 19th of May, after another quickening meſſage from the lords, articles of impeachment were next ſent up to the peers againſt the lord Sommers, by Mr. Harcourt, and the demand for giving ſecurity to abide by their lordſhips judgment was repeated.

In theſe articles the two partition treaties were copiouſly ſet forth, and it was laid down for a foundation, that the king was bound to maintain the emperor's right of ſucceſſion to the crown of Spain; lord Sommers was charged, for ſetting the ſeals, firſt to the powers, and then to the treaties themſelves; he was alſo charged, for accepting ſome grants, and the manner of taking them was repreſented as fraudulent, he ſeeming to buy them of the king, and then getting himſelf diſcharged of the price contracted for; Kidd's buſineſs was alſo mentioned, and dilatory and partial proceedings in Chancery were objected to him. He put in his anſwer in a very few days: In the partition treaty, he ſaid, he had offered the king very faithful advice, as a councillor, and had acted according to the duty of his poſt, as chancellor; ſo he had nothing more to anſwer for: As for his grants, the king deſigned him a grant to ſuch a value; the king was not deceived in the value; the manner of paſſing it, was according to the uſual methods of the treaſury, in order to make a grant ſure, and out of the danger of being avoided. Kidd's buſineſs was opened, as was formerly ſet forth; and as to the court of Chancery, he had applied himſelf wholly to the diſpatch of buſineſs in it, with little regard to his own health or quiet, and had acted according to the beſt of his judgment, without fear or favour [x].

A copy of the lord Sommers's anſwer was, with great diſpatch, ſent down to the commons, and upon that they were at a full ſtand. At the motion of the earl of Orford, the lords, four days before, had alſo acquainted them, that the houſe had been deſired by the earl, that a day might be appointed for his ſpeedy trial; but, finding no iſſue joined by replication of the houſe of commons, they thought fit to give them notice of it. The ſame day they likewiſe put the commons in mind of the articles againſt the earl of Portland and lord Hallifax, and that the delay was not only a hardſhip to the perſons concerned, but very unuſual. Notwithſtanding theſe meſſages, the replication to the earl of Orford's anſwer, though framed and ingroſſed, was never ſent up to the lords; and no articles were drawn againſt the earl of Portland, which was repreſented to the king as an expreſſion of their reſpect to him. Nor was it till the 14th of June, that the articles againſt lord Hallifax were ſent up to the lords by Mr. Bruges, which ſhall be mentioned here to end this matter at once. The commons charged him for a grant that he had in Ireland, and that he had not paid in the produce of it, as the act concerning thoſe grants had enacted: They charged him for another grant, out of the foreſt of Dean, to the waſte of the timber, and prejudice of the navy of England: They charged him, for holding places that were incompatible, being at the ſame time both a commiſſioner of the treaſury, and auditor of the exchequer; and, in concluſion, he was charged for adviſing

[w] If the reader deſires a larger account of the articles and anſwer, it is as follows:

I. That in a long and expenſive war the earl had procured from his majeſty grants of ſeveral manors, meſſuages, &c. as alſo exorbitant ſums of money:

To which the earl anſwered, "That, he having for ſeveral years rendered to the king his utmoſt ſervice and duty, as a good and loyal ſubject, his majeſty was graciouſly pleaſed, upon ſeveral occaſions, to take notice of the ſame, and out of his wonted bounty was pleaſed to give him two grants, one a reverſionary grant for years of ſome houſes; the other a grant of the remainder of a groſs ſum amounting to about two thouſand pounds a year for five years."

II. That in breach of the truſt repoſed in him, whilſt he was commander in chief of the navy in or near the Streights of Gibraltar, he did receive great ſums of the public money, which he converted to his own private uſe, and unlawfully procured a privy-ſeal to diſcharge him from accounting to the public for the ſame. To which he anſwered, by denying the facts, and ſaying, "That he did make up, and upon oath paſs his accounts for the monies impreſſed to him, and hath his 'quietus eſt' in due courſe of law upon the ſame."

III. That he received from the king of Spain and others conſiderable ſums of money, and great quantities of wine, oil, and other proviſions for the fleet, for which he ought to have accounted; but that he converted the ſame to his own uſe; and, for ſecuring himſelf from rendering any account, he poſſeſſed divers great offices, inconſiſtent, and deſigned as checks one upon the other. To which the earl anſwered. "That whatever he received from the king of Spain, or any others, for the fleet, was duly delivered and diſtributed amongſt the officers and ſeamen; and he denied, that he enjoyed any offices inconſiſtent, or which ought to be checks one upon the other."

IV. That he hath clandeſtinely, contrary to the law of nations, ſold ſeveral veſſels taken under pretence of prize, without condemnation, and converted the money to his own uſe. To which he anſwered by denying the fact, and ſaying, "That he did from time to time give orders, that the prizes taken ſhould be carefully preſerved without embezzlement, and duly proceeded againſt, and the product anſwered as the law directs."

V. That he, preſiding in the commiſſion for executing the office of lord high admiral of England, had diſcouraged and rejected the requeſt and propoſal of the Eaſt-India company for ſuppreſſing piracies in the South Seas: and had procured a commiſſion for one William Kidd, who had committed divers piracies and depredations on the high ſeas, being thereto encouraged through the hopes of being protected by the high ſtation and intereſt of the ſaid earl. To which he anſwered, "That he did never diſcourage or reject the company's requeſt, unleſs it were by telling them, that the admiralty by law could not grant the ſame: And as to the matter of Kidd, his commiſſion was according to law, and his expedition intended for the public good and ſervice; and, if he had committed any piracies, he is anſwerable for the ſame, he never being ordered or encouraged by the ſaid earl ſo to do."

VI. That, while the kingdom was under an apprehenſion of an immediate invaſion from France, he, preferring his hopes of gain to himſelf, to the ſafety of the public, did order captain Steward, commander of the Ducheſs, to put on board captain Kidd a great number of able ſeamen, to the prejudice of the public ſecurity, and to the endangering the Ducheſs, if ſhe had been attacked by the enemy, to which he anſwered "That the men taken from on board the Ducheſs were but ſome of the very perſons, that were juſt before taken from on board of captain Kidd, and returned by their own conſent again, not being above twenty in number, and that when all fears of an invaſion were over."

VII. That, during the war, he did by miſrepreſentations procure an order for his majeſty's ſhip the Dolphin, to be employed in a private voyage for the advantage of himſelf and others concerned with him. To which he anſwered, "That what was done therein, was done after the peace was concluded, and by his majeſty's command, at the inſtance and requeſt of other perſons, contrary to his opinion."

VIII. That, during the time of his commanding the navy, he did, thro' neglect, and in contempt of orders, unneceſſarily hazard and expoſe the fleet, and loſe the opportunities of taking or deſtroying the French ſhips, and ſuffer them to return ſafe into their own harbours. To which he anſwered, "That he is not guilty of any neglect or omiſſion of his duty herein, nor did expect in this particular to be charged therewith, conſidering his faithful ſervices rendered againſt the French fleet."

IX. That he did in concert with other falſe and evil councillors, adviſe the king in the year 1698, to enter into one treaty for dividing the monarchy and dominions of Spain; in purſuance whereof, in 1699, another treaty was entered into for the like purpoſe; Both which treaties were prejudicial to the intereſt of the proteſtant religion all over Europe, ruinous to the trade of England, and diſhonourable to the king and the nation. To which he anſwered, "That he does deny, that he did adviſe his majeſty to enter into the treaty of partition; and, ſo far as he was any ways acquainted therewith, he objected to and gave his opinion againſt the ſame." Pr. H. C. III. 147.

[x] The following extract gives a larger account of this affair:

I. That John lord Sommers, well knowing the moſt apparent ill conſequences, as well as the injuſtice of the partition of the Spaniſh monarchy, did adviſe his majeſty to enter into a treaty for it, and did ſo far encourage and promote the ſame, that the ſaid treaty was concluded and ratified in 1698, under the great ſeal of England, then in cuſtody of the ſaid lord Sommers. To which his lordſhip anſwered, by a full and plain account of all the ſteps of that treaty, referring himſelf to the letters on that ſubject between the king and him, "wherein, as he conceived, he had fully and faithfully diſcharged his truſt, and the duty incumbent on him."

II. That, for the more effectual carrying on the ſaid treaty, commiſſions were prepared, amended, enlarged, or altered, by the lord Sommers, without any lawful warrant for his ſo doing, whereunto, without communicating the ſame to the reſt of the then lords juſtices of England, or adviſing with the privy council, he did preſume to affix the great ſeal of England, with a blank for commiſſioners names, to be afterwards inſerted.

III. That, having affixed the great ſeal without lawful warrant, in hopes of concealing that evil and moſt dangerous practice, after he had ſettled the ſaid commiſſions, he uſed his endeavour to procure a warrant to be tranſmitted to him for affixing the great ſeal, that it might not be known, but that he had it in due time. To which ſecond and third articles he anſwered, 'That having received his majeſty's expreſs commands to ſend his majeſty full powers under the great ſeal, for negotiating the ſaid treaty, with blanks for his majeſty's commiſſioners names, he thought it ſufficient warrant for him ſo to do. And that he did afterwards deſire his majeſty, that a particular warrant for ſigning the ſaid commiſſion might be ſigned and returned; not that he doubted his majeſty's ſaid letter to be a ſufficient warrant, but for that ſuch warrant would be more proper to be produced, if occaſion ſhould require.'

IV. That, contrary to the duty, he affixed the great ſeal of England to the ratification of the ſaid treaty in 1698, not having communicated the ſame to the reſt of the three lords juſtices, or adviſed with the privy council, leaving one entire blank ſheet, and many other blanks in the ſaid ratification, with an intent to be afterwards filled up by other perſons beyond the ſeas. To which he anſwered, 'That, Mr. ſecretary Vernon having prepared, by his majeſty's commands, the inſtruments for ratification, with blanks therein, he did affix the the two partition treaties. He was as quick with his anſwer as the other lords had been: He ſaid, his grant in Ireland was of ſome debts and ſums of money, and ſo was not thought to be within the act, concerning confiſcated eſtates; all he had ever received of it was four hundred pounds; if he was bound to repay it, he was liable to an action for it; but every man was not to be impeached, who did not pay his debts, at the day of payment. His grant in the foreſt of Dean was only of the weedings; ſo it could be no waſte of timber, nor a prejudice to the navy; the auditor's place was held by another, till he obtained the king's leave to withdraw from the treaſury; as for the firſt partition treaty, he never once ſaw it, nor was he ever adviſed with in it; as for the ſecond, he gave his advice very freely about it, at the ſingle time, in which he had ever heard any thing concerning it; this was ſent down to the commons, but was never ſo much as once read by them [z].

As it would be too tedious to relate the meſſages from the lords to the commons, preſſing the trials of the impeached lords, and the anſwers of the commons evading it on account of formalities, the ſubſtance of the whole, from biſhop Burnet and others, is inſerted as follows.

the great ſeal, which he conceives and is adviſed he might lawfully do, not communicating the ſame, becauſe he had his majeſty's command, that the ſaid treaty ſhould be kept ſecret.'

V. That, in the year 1699, another treaty of partition was concluded and ratified under the great ſeal, then in the cuſtody of the ſaid lord Sommers, evidently deſtructive to the trade of this realm, diſhonourable to his majeſty, highly injurious to the intereſt of the proteſtant religion, and manifeſtly tending to diſturb the general peace of Europe, by altering the balance of power therein, and ſtrengthening France againſt the good friends and allies of our ſovereign lord the king. To which he anſwered, 'That he had not any knowledge of the ſaid treaty, or any tranſaction in order thereunto, ſave only that a draught of the ſaid treaty was read over in the preſence of divers lords of the privy council (whereof he was one) to which draught he, as well as others then preſent, did make ſeveral objections; but they were afterwards informed by his majeſty's plenipotentiaries for tranſacting the ſaid treaty, who were then alſo preſent, that the ſaid treaty was ſo far perfected, that nothing could then be altered therein; and his majeſty afterwards, by his warrant, requiring the ratifying of the ſaid treaty under the great ſeal, he did affix the great ſeal to ſuch ratification, being as he conceives, obliged ſo to do.'

VI. That whereas, by the laws and uſages of this realm, all commiſſions under the great ſeal, for the making any treaty or alliance, ought to be inrolled and entered on record in the court of chancery, he, the ſaid lord Sommers, not minding the duty of his office, did not in any manner inroll or enter on record any of the ſaid commiſſions or ratifications. To which he anſwered, 'That he conceives it was not incumbent upon him as lord chancellor, to ſee the commiſſions or ratifications inrolled, the ſame being prepared and brought to the great ſeal, by the ſecretaries of ſtate, ready ingroſſed, and when ſealed, taken away by them, and the original treaties remaining in their cuſtody: But the care of inrolling the ſame, if neceſſary, (doth as he conceives) belong to the prothonotary of the court of chancery.'

VII. That the ſaid lord Sommers, contrary to his oath as lord chancellor of England, did paſs many great, unreaſonable, and exorbitant grants, under the great ſeal, of divers manors, lordſhips, and lands, &c. belonging to the crown of England; and did adviſe, promote, and procure divers like grants of the late forfeited eſtates in Ireland, in contempt of the advice of the commons of England. To which he anſwered, 'That he doth acknowledge he did paſs ſeveral grants to divers perſons of ſeveral lands, tenements, and hereditaments belonging to his majeſty in right of the crown of England; but that, before any of them came to the great ſeal, the ſame were regularly paſſed through the proper offices, and brought with ſufficient warrants for the great ſeal; and he believes more conſiderable grants have paſſed in the like number of years in moſt of his predeceſſors times; and conceives, and is adviſed, that, being required by his majeſty, by warrant, to paſs the ſame, he ought ſo to do; and denies that he did ever adviſe, promote, or procure any grant to be made to any perſon whatſoever, of any forfeited eſtate in Ireland, or did procure any act or bill prepared for confirming any ſuch grant in the parliament of Ireland, to be approved of in the privy council in England; and ſaith, that what bills of this nature were remitted under the great ſeal of England, to be paſſed into laws in Ireland, the ſame were firſt approved and paſſed in the privy council in England, according to the uſual form in ſuch caſes; and, being ſo approved, were by order of council, ſent to the ſaid lord Sommers, who was by the ſaid order required to affix the great ſeal thereto.'

VIII. That he did not only receive and enjoy the fees, profits, and perquiſites belonging to the great ſeal, but had received an annual penſion from the crown of 4000l. and had further begged and procured for his own benefit many great, unreaſonable, and exorbitant grants of revenues belonging to the crown of England. To which he anſwered, 'That the annual penſion or allowance of 4000l. had been allowed to ſeveral of his predeceſſors; but he denied, that he did ever beg or uſe any means to procure any grant whatſoever for his own benefit; but that what his majeſty was pleaſed to give him, proceeded from his majeſty's own motion, and of his mere bounty, and as his majeſty was pleaſed to declare upon that occaſion, as an evidence of the gracious acceptation of the ſaid lord Sommers's zealous endeavours for his ſervice.'

IX. That, in order to procure a grant of fee-farm rents, he did enter into ſeveral treaties, and had many communications with the auditor of the rates, and with the clerk of the truſtees for ſale of the ſaid rents, and contracted and agreed with them, as a reward for their diſcovery, one full fourth part of all ſuch rents ſo diſcovered.

X. That, notwithſtanding the ſaid pretended contracts, there was not any ſum of money really paid, but the contracts and payments were colourably and fraudulently contrived in deceit of his majeſty, and eluſion of the acts of parliament. To which ninth and tenth articles he anſwered, 'That after his majeſty had given directions to the lords of the treaſury for granting fee-farm rents to the benefit of him and his heirs; his majeſty's intended bounty would have been loſt, without information could be gained of ſuch particular rents; and therefore application was made to the ſaid auditor and clerk, as the moſt likely to give information therein; but they refuſed to give any account of ſuch rents, unleſs they might have near a fourth part for ſo doing; which the ſaid lord Sommers did, as he conceives he lawfully might, comply with. And there was not any ſum of money paid, as the conſideration of the grants of the ſaid rents, but the contracts were made, and the payment diſcharged, without any deceit of his majeſty, or eluſion of the acts of parliament.'

XI. That many rents ſtanding in charge for payment of penſions, ſtipends, ſalaries, annuities, alms, and allowances for ſchools, churches, bridges, &c. and many quit-rents of manors united and annexed to the caſtle of Windſor, for ſupport of the ſame, and maintenance of the officers, ſervants, and attendants in the ſaid caſtle, were conveyed by the ſaid truſtees, through the direction and power of the ſaid lord Sommers, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the ſaid acts of parliament, to the great vexation and oppreſſion of many of his majeſty's good ſubjects, and creating many new and unreaſonable charges on the other revenues of the crown. To which he anſwered, 'That ſome things might be inſerted by miſtaken informations, and not out of any deſign; but he denied, that as to his knowledge, or belief, any of the ſaid rents were ever united or annexed to the caſtle of Windſor, for any purpoſe whatſoever; or that any oppreſſion or vexation hath happened; and little or no new charge to the crown.'

XII. That by the direction of the ſaid lord Sommers, the perſons in whoſe names the purchaſes were made, did ſurrender ſeveral of the ſaid rents to them granted, amounting to the yearly value of 347 l. 11 s. 5 d. on ſuggeſtion of wrong conveyance, and procured other rents of the yearly value of 391 l. 0 s. 3 h. to be allowed by way of reprize, as if the ſaid rents ſo ſurrendered had been really and bonâ fide purchaſed. To which he anſwered, 'That the truſtees for ſale of the fee-farm-rents, by warrant of the commiſſioners of the Treaſury, did grant divers other rents, amounting to 391 l. 0 s. 3 h. in lieu and reprize of the 347 l. 11 s. 5 d. having appeared to be granted before, or not grantable by the ſaid truſtees, or not leviable on ſurrenders of ſuch rents, which he conceives might be and was lawfully done.'

XIII. That in the year 1695 the ſaid lord Sommers, being then lord keeper, procured a commiſſion to be granted to one William Kidd, a perſon of evil fame and reputation, and ſince that time convicted of piracy; and in a grant from his majeſty of ſhips, veſſels, and goods, to be taken by the ſaid William Kidd, unto Richard earl of Bellamont, Edmund Harriſon, merchant, Samuel Newton, gentleman, and others, the name of the ſaid Samuel Newton was uſed in truſt, and for the only benefit and advantage of the ſaid lord Sommers. To which he anſwered, 'That the ſaid William Kidd, had from his majeſty a commiſſion for preventing the piracy of others, and to apprehend certain pirates, and bring them to a legal trial; the granting of which commiſſion was then apprehended to be neceſſary for the preſervation of trade and navigation. He does admit, that there was a grant to the earl of Bellamont, Edmund Harriſon, Samuel Newton, and others, and that Samuel Newton was named by, and in truſt for, the ſaid lord Sommers, of ſhips and goods taken by the ſaid William Kidd, with account to be duly made to the uſe of his majeſty of a clear tenth part, whereby the public might have received benefit, had the ſaid Kidd faithfully diſcharged the truſt; which he failing to do, the owners of the ſaid ſhip have loſt all their expences, and had not received any benefit of his majeſty's ſaid grant.'

XIV. That the ſaid lord Sommers, to the great oppreſſion of the ſubject, and contrary to Magna Charta, and divers good ſtatutes of this realm, and in manifeſt breach and violation of his oath, as lord high chancellor of England, hath, in ſeveral cauſes depending before him, by many extraordinary methods and unwarrantable practices for ſeveral years, delayed proceedings in the ſaid cauſes; and by colour of his office hath made divers arbitrary and illegal orders, in ſubverſion of the laws and ſtatutes of this realm, and hath, of his own authority, reverſed judgments given in the court of Exchequer, and without calling before him the barons of the Exchequer, to hear their informations, and the cauſes of their judgments, as the ſtatutes in thoſe caſes expreſsly direct; aſſuming thereby to himſelf an arbitrary and illegal power; and hath declared and affirmed in public places of judicature, that particular ſubjects might have rights and intereſts, without any remedy for recovery of the ſame, unleſs by petition to the perſon of the king only, or to that effect: Which poſition was highly dangerous to the legal conſtitution of this kingdom, and abſolutely deſtructive to the property of the ſubject. To which he anſwered, 'That he did not delay any proceeding in any cauſe or cauſes depending before him, as chancellor of England, longer or otherwiſe than as the circumſtances and juſtice of each cauſe required, but did, to the very manifeſt impairing of his health, conſtantly apply himſelf to the diſpatch of the cauſes depending before him; and he denied, that he ever did make, by colour of his office, any arbitrary or illegal order, to the ſubverſion of any law or ſtatute of this realm, or did ever aſſume to himſelf any judgment given in the court of Exchequer, otherwiſe than as is warranted and allowed by the law, and in the preſence of the barons of the court of Exchequer, who were always preſent in the court of Exchequer chamber, when their judgments were examined, as the ſtatute in ſuch caſe directs; nor did ever deliver in any court of judicature, or other place whatſoever, any poſition whatſoever dangerous to the legal conſtitution of the kingdom, or deſtructive to the property of the ſubject.' Pr. H. C. III. 150.

[z] The articles againſt the lord Halliſax, and his anſwers more at large, were as follow:

I. That whereas it was the continued ſenſe of the commons of England, that it was highly reaſonable, that the forfeited eſtates of rebels and traitors in Ireland ſhould be applied in eaſe of his majeſty's faithful ſubjects of the kingdom of England, the ſaid lord Halliſax preſumed to adviſe, paſs, or direct the paſſing a grant to Thomas Railton, Eſq. in truſt for himſelf, of ſeveral debts, intereſts, &c. amounting to 13,000l. or thereabouts, accruing to his majeſty, from attainders, outlawries, or other forfeitures, in Ireland. To which he anſwered, 'That he did accept the ſaid grant, as it was lawful for him to do, without breach of his duty, and the truſt repoſed in him; which grant hath ſince been taken away by act of parliament; and he hath not made clear thereof, as yet, above 400l.'

II. That he has not repaid into the receipt of his majeſty's exchequer, in Ireland, the ſum of 1000l. which he had actually received to his own uſe, out of the profits of the forementioned grant, which he ought to have ſo repaid, by virtue of the 'act for granting an aid to his majeſty, by ſale of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland.' To which he anſwered, 'That he gave direction, after the ſaid act paſſed, to his agents in Ireland, to do, in relation to the money received, as ſhould be adviſed by counſel there; by whom his agents were adviſed, that the ſaid monies, being received out of the mean profits which were remitted by that act, were not within the firſt mentioned clauſe in the ſaid act.'

III. That, in the time of a tedious and expenſive war, he did adviſe, procure, and aſſent, not only to the paſſing of divers grants to others, but did obtain and accept of ſeveral beneficial ones for himſelf; which practices were a moſt notorious abuſe of his majeſty's goodneſs, &c. To which he anſwered, 'That he ſerved his majeſty faithfully in his ſtations, and his majeſty graciouſly accepted of his ſervice; and, as a mark of his royal favour, did

The lords had reſolved to begin with the trial of the earl of Orford; becauſe the articles againſt him were the firſt that were brought up; and, ſince the commons made no replication, the lords, according to clear precedents, named a day for his trial, and gave notice of it to the houſe of commons: Upon this, the commons moved the lords, to agree to name a committee of both houſes for ſettling the preliminaries of the trial, and they named two preliminaries; one was, that the lord, who was to be tried, ſhould not ſit as a peer; the other was, that thoſe lords, who were impeached for the ſame matter, might not vote in the trial of one another: They alſo acquainted the lords, that the courſe of their evidence led them to begin with the lord Sommers. The lords judged their laſt demand reaſonable, and agreed to it; but diſagreed to the other. They conſidered themſelves as a court of juſtice, and, how great ſoever the regard due to the houſe of commons might be, in all other reſpects, yet in matters of juſtice, where they were the accuſers, they could only be conſidered as parties. The king, when he had a ſuit with a ſubject, ſubmitted to the equality of juſtice; ſo the commons ought to pretend to no advantage over a ſingle perſon, in a trial; a court of juſtice ought to hear the demands of both parties pleaded fairly, and then to judge impartially; a committee named by one of the parties, to ſit in an equality with the judges, and to ſettle matters relating to the trial, was a thing practiſed in no court or nation, and ſeemed contrary to the principles of law, or rules of juſtice: By theſe means, they could at leaſt delay trials, as long as they pleaſed, and all delays of juſtice are real and great injuſtices. This had never been demanded but once, in the caſe of the popiſh plot; then it was often refuſed; it is true, it was at laſt yielded to by the lords, though with great oppoſition; that was a caſe of treaſon, in which the king's life and the ſafety of the nation was concerned; there was then a great jealouſy of the court, and of the lords that belonged to it; and the nation was in ſo great a ferment, that the lords might at that time yield to ſuch a motion, though it derogated from their judicature: That ought not to be ſet up for a precedent for a quiet time, and in a caſe pretended to be no more than a miſdemeanour; ſo the lords reſolved not to admit of this, but to hear whatſoever ſhould be propoſed by the commons, and to give them all juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction in it. The chief point in queſtion in the year 1679, was, how far the biſhops might ſit and vote in trials of treaſon; but, without all diſpute, they were to vote in trials for miſdemeanours; it was alſo ſettled in the caſe of the lord Mordaunt, that a lord tried for a miſdemeanour was to ſit within the bar; in all other courts, men tried for ſuch offences came within the bar; this was ſtronger in the caſe of a peer, who by his patent had a ſeat in that houſe, from which nothing but a judgment of the houſe, for ſome offence, could remove him: They indeed found that, in king James the firſt's time, the earl of Middleſex, being accuſed of miſdemeanors, was brought to the bar; but, as that proſecution was violent, ſo there had been no latter precedent of that kind, to govern proceedings by it: There had been many ſince that time, and it had been ſettled, as a rule for future times, that peers tried for ſuch offences were to ſit within the bar. The other preliminary was, that peers, accuſed for the ſame offence, might not vote in the trials of others: The lords found that a right of voting was ſo inherent in every peer in all cauſes, except where himſelf was a party, that it could not be taken from him, but by a ſentence of the houſe; a vote of the houſe could not deprive him of it; otherwiſe a majority might upon any pretence deny ſome peers their right of voting, and the commons, by impeaching many peers at once, for the ſame offence, might exclude as many lords as they pleaſed from judging: It was alſo obſerved, that a man might be a judge in any cauſe, in which he might be a witneſs; and it was a common practice to bring perſons, charged with the ſame offence, if they were not in the ſame indictment, to witneſs the facts, with which they themſelves were charged, in another indictment. And a parity of reaſon appeared in the caſe of lords, who were charged in different impeachments, for the ſame facts, that they might be judges in one another's trials. In concluſion therefore the lords, on the 12th of June, came to the following reſolutions, which were ſent down to the commons.

1. That no lord of parliament impeached for high crimes and miſdemeanours, and coming to his trial, ſhall upon his trial, be without the bar.

2. That no lord of parliament, impeached of high crimes and miſdemeanors, can be precluded from voting on any occaſion, except in his own trial.

Upon theſe points many meſſages paſſed between the two houſes with ſo much precipitation, that it was not eaſy to diſtinguiſh between the anſwers and replies. The commons ſtill kept off the trials by affected delays; and it was viſible, that, when the trials ſhould come on, they had nothing to charge theſe lords with: So the leaders of the party ſhewed their ſkill in finding out excuſes to keep up a clamour, and to hinder the matter from being brought to an iſſue. The main point that was ſtill inſiſted upon, was, a committee of both houſes to ſettle preliminaries; ſo according to the forms of the houſe it was brought to a free conference.

The day before the free conference, the king coming to the houſe of peers to paſs the bill of ſucceſſion, took occaſion to make the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I return you my hearty thanks for the care you have taken to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion to the crown in the proteſtant line. And I muſt not loſe this occaſion of acquainting you, that I am likewiſe extremely ſenſible of your repeated aſſurances of ſupporting me in ſuch alliances, as ſhall be moſt proper for the preſervation of the liberty of Europe, and for the ſecurity of England and Holland. Your ready compliance with my deſires, as to the ſuccours for the States-General, is alſo a great ſatisfaction to me, as well as a great advantage to the common cauſe. And as I have nothing ſo much at heart as the preſervation of the liberty of Europe, and the honour and intereſt of England, ſo I make no doubt of attaining thoſe great ends by the bleſſing of God, and the continuance of your chearful concurrence."

My lords and gentlemen,

"The ſeaſon of the year makes it neceſſary to have a ſpeedy receſs; and the poſture of affairs abroad does abſolutely require my preſence, for the encouragement of our allies, and for the perfecting of ſuch alliances, as may be moſt effectual for the common intereſt. And therefore I muſt recommend a diſpatch of the public buſineſs, eſpecially of thoſe matters, which are of the greateſt importance."

The commons, interpreting this ſpeech as an approbation of their proceedings in reſpect to their conteſts with the lords, preſented an addreſs of thanks for his majeſty's being pleaſed to approve of their proceedings, and aſſured him, they would ſupport ſuch alliances as he ſhould think fit to make, in conjunction with the emperor and the States-General, for the peace of Europe, and for the reducing the exorbitant power of France. So, without any further interruption, they remake, for his benefit, ſuch grants, as are mentioned in the precedent and ſubſequent articles, and none other. And, as to other perſons, he only, in conjunction with the other commiſſioners, did ſign ſeveral warrants and dockets for ſuch grants, as his majeſty was pleaſed to direct.'

IV. Whereas, by common law, and other ſtatutes, the king's foreſts ſhould be preſerved, the ſaid lord Hallifax, not regarding the laws and ordinances of this realm, nor his duty to his majeſty and the public, had procured a grant to Henry Segar, gent. in truſt for himſelf, of the ſum of 14,000l. of ſcrubbed beech, birch, holly, &c. under colour whereof, ſappling oaks, and many tons of well grown timber, had been cut and fallen, and ſold and diſpoſed of for his benefit. To which he anſwered; 'That his majeſty, out of his grace and favour, did grant, in truſt for him, the ſum of 2000l. per ann. to be raiſed by the fall of ſcrub-beech, birch, &c. for the ſpace of ſeven years; which grant was not prejudicial to any timber growing in the ſaid foreſt: And if any abuſe were, in cutting the woods, he conceives he is not anſwerable for the ſame, it being done by the direction of his majeſty's ſurveyor-general, and other his majeſty's officers.'

V. That he, the ſaid lord Hallifax, did grant, or procure to be granted, to his brother Chriſtopher Mountague, Eſq; the place and office of auditor of the receipts, and writer of the tallies, in truſt for himſelf; ſo that he the ſaid lord was, in effect, at the ſame time, one of the commiſſioners of the treaſury, chancellor of the Exchequer, and auditor of the receipts, and writer of the tallies, and enjoyed the profits of the ſaid ſeveral offices, which were manifeſtly inconſiſtent, and ought to have been a check to each other. To which he anſwered; 'That the grant of the ſaid office was done at his deſire and requeſt, becauſe he intended, in a ſhort time after, to leave his own employment and places in the treaſury, and to obtain a ſurrender from his ſaid brother of the ſaid office, and procure a grant thereof to himſelf; which has been ſince done, and, he conceives, was lawful for him to do.'

VI. That the ſaid lord Hallifax, well knowing the moſt apparent evil conſequences, as well as the injuſtice of the partition of the Spaniſh monarchy, did yet adviſe his majeſty to enter into a treaty for it, and did encourage and promote the ſame. To which he anſwered, 'That he never ſaw the ſaid treaty, nor heard the ſame read, or does as yet know the articles or agreement it contains; and denies, that he ever adviſed his majeſty to enter into or make the ſaid treaty, or was ever conſulted upon any clauſe or article thereof, or ever encouraged or promoted the ſame. That, as he remembers, Mr. ſecretary Vernon did at one time ſend for him, and diſcourſe with him and others, upon an intimation, that was given by a letter from the earl of Portland, as he remembers, that the French king was diſpoſed to commence a ne-turned to their diſputes with the lords.

The free conference began the 13th of June. In it the lord Haverſham, ſpeaking to the point, of lords being partial in their own caſes, and therefore not proper judges, ſaid, that the houſe of commons had plainly ſhewed their partiality, in impeaching ſome lords for facts, in which others were equally concerned with them, who yet were not impeached by them, though they were ſtill in credit, and about the king, which ſhewed, that they thought that neither the one nor the other were guilty [a]. The commons thought they had now found an occaſion of quarrelling with the lords, which they were looking for; ſo the lord Haverſham's expreſſions were inſtantly objected to by ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, and the managers for the commons immediately withdrew from the conference, [b] though they were told by the duke of Devonſhire, as they were going, that the lord Haverſham had no authority from the houſe of lords, to uſe any ſuch expreſſions towards the commons.

This affair being reported to the commons by Mr. Harcourt, the houſe immediately reſolved, 'That John lord Haverſham hath, at the free conference this day, uttered moſt ſcandalous reproaches and falſe expreſſions, highly reflecting upon the honour and juſtice of the houſe of commons, and tending to the making a breach in the good correſpondence between the lords and commons, and to the interrupting the public juſtice of the nation, by delaying the proceedings on impeachments: And that the ſaid lord Haverſham be charged before the lords for the ſaid words; and that the lords be deſired to proceed in juſtice againſt him, and to inflict ſuch puniſhment upon him, as ſo high an offence againſt the houſe of commons does deſerve.' And ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave was ordered to carry this charge and reſolution to the lords.

In the mean time the lords ſent a meſſage to the commons, to acquaint them, 'That they had been informed by their managers, that ſome interruption had happened at the free conference, which their lordſhips were concerned at, becauſe they wiſhed, that nothing ſhould interrupt the public buſineſs; and therefore deſired the commons to come again preſently to the free conference; which they did not doubt would prove the beſt expedient to prevent the inconvenience of a miſunderſtanding upon what had paſſed.'

But the commons, inſtead of coming to the conference, ſent up ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, who acquainted the lords, as he ſaid, with what had happened at the conference, and read the words ſuppoſed to be ſpoken by the lord Haverſham, concluding, 'Theſe were the words ſpoken by John lord Haverſham, [c]. He then read the reſolutions of the commons, with relation to that lord.

The commons had now got a pretence to juſtify their not going further in the trials, and they reſolved to inſiſt upon it. When therefore they were again preſſed by the lords to renew the free conference, they returned for anſwer, 'That it was not conſiſtent with their honour to renew the conference, until they had reparation, by their lordſhips doing juſtice upon lord Haverſham, for the indignity offered to the houſe of commons.' At the ſame time it was, that the articles againſt lord Hallifax were ſent up as has been related.

Upon this, lord Haverſham offered himſelf to a trial, and ſubmitted to any cenſure, that the lords ſhould think he had deſerved; but inſiſted that the words muſt firſt be proved, and he muſt be allowed to put his own ſenſe on them; the lords ſent this to the commons, but they ſeemed to think that the lords ought to have proceeded to cenſure him in a ſummary way, which the lords thought, being a court of judicature, they could not do, till the words were proved, and the importance of them diſcuſſed. Upon the commons refuſal to renew the conference, the lords likewiſe came to a reſolution, to inſiſt not to have a committee of both houſes concerning the trial of the impeached lords. They then proceeded to ſet the day for the trial of lord Sommers, and a meſſage was ſent to acquaint the commons, that the trial would be on Tueſday the 17th of June, at ten of the clock in Weſtminſter-Hall. To remove the obſtacle of the lord Haverſham's affair, they alſo told the commons, that all things were preparing to bring that matter to a ſpeedy judgment; and they likewiſe put them in mind of articles againſt the earl of Portland.

Inſtead of returning anſwers to theſe meſſages, the commons refuſed to appear, and ſaid, they were the only judges, when they were ready with their evidence, and that it was a mockery to go to a trial, when they were not ready to appear at it [d]. There were great and long debates upon this in the houſe of lords: the new miniſtry, and all the Jacobites, joined to ſupport the pretenſions of the commons: every ſtep was to be made by a vote, againſt which many lords proteſted; and the reaſons given, in ſome of their proteſtations, were thought to be ſo injurious to the houſe, that they were by a vote ordered to be expunged, a thing that ſeldom happens.

When the day appointed for the trial came, the lords entered upon a debate, and the queſtion was put, 'Whether the houſe ſhould go this day into the court in Weſtminſter Hall, in order to proceed upon the trial of the lord Sommers, a negotiation upon ſome general terms, that were then mentioned, to prevent a war, in caſe of the king of Spain's death, who was then reported to be very ill: and afterwards the ſaid matter was diſcourſed between the ſecretary, and the then lord chancellor, and the ſaid lord Hallifax, at Tunbridge-wells, when and where the ſaid lord Hallifax made ſeveral objections to the ſame; and denies, that he gave any opinion to encourage or promote the ſaid treaty, or ever afterwards was informed of any one particular relating to it, or was ever conſulted or adviſed upon any clauſe or article of it, or was ever after told or informed, that the ſaid negotiation or treaty did go on or proceed; and ſaith, that not being adviſed with, or any ways knowing of the ſaid treaty or negotiation (except as aforeſaid) he could not diſſuade or obſtruct it's taking effect; and ſaith, as he cannot tell what the effects of the treaty might have been, if the ſaid treaty had been obſerved, ſo he conceives and inſiſts, that he is not nor ought to be anſwerable for the ſame.' Pr. H. C. III. 167.

Burnett obſerves here, when, by theſe articles and the anſwers to them, it appeared, that after all the noiſe and clamour that had been raiſed againſt the former miniſtry (more particularly againſt the lord Hallifax) for the great waſte of treaſure, during their adminiſtration, that now, upon the ſtricteſt ſearch, all ended in ſuch poor accuſations; it turned the minds of many, that had been formerly prejudiced againſt them. It appeared, that it was the animoſity of a party at beſt, if it was not a French practice, to ruin men, who had ſerved the king faithfully, and to diſcourage others, from engaging themſelves ſo far in his intereſts, as theſe lords had done. They ſaw the effect that muſt follow on this: And that the king could not enter upon a new war, if they could diſcourage from his ſervice all the men of lively and active tempers, that would raiſe a ſpirit in the nation, for ſupporting ſuch an important and dangerous war, as this now in proſpect was likely to prove.

[a] The lord Haverſham's ſpeech was reported by Mr. Harcourt, who ſaid, that his lordſhip uſed theſe or the like expreſſions. 'One thing there is, though I cannot ſpeak it, becauſe I am bound up by the orders of the houſe; yet I muſt have ſome anſwer. This is as to the lords voting in their own caſe. It requires an anſwer, though I cannot go into the debate of it. The commons themſelves have made this precedent: for in theſe impeachments, they have allowed men guilty of the ſame crimes, to vote in their own houſe; and therefore we have not made any diſtinction in our houſe, that ſome ſhould vote and ſome not. The lords have ſo high an opinion of the juſtice of the houſe of commons, that they hope juſtice ſhall never be made uſe of as a maſk for any deſign. And therefore give me leave to ſay (though I am not to argue it) it is a plain demonſtration, that the commons think theſe lords innocent; and I think the propoſition is undeniable; for there are ſeveral lords in the ſame crimes, in the ſame facts; there is no diſtinction. And the commons leave ſome of theſe men at the head of affairs near the king's perſon, to do any miſchief, if their perſons were inclined to do it; and impeach others, when they are both alike guilty, and concerned in the ſame facts. This is a thing I was in hopes I ſhould never have heard aſſerted, when the beginning of it was from the houſe of commons.' Pr. H. C. III. 165.

[b] This was not uſual, and in a caſe not long before, where a member of the houſe of commons having ſaid what was much more liable to exception, than it could be pretended what lord Haverſham ſaid, was, ſome of the commons ſaying, that he had no direction from the houſe for what was ſaid, the lords ſtaid out of the conference, and complained of the words afterwards.

[c] Sir Chriſtopher Muſgrave had no warrant to ſay as he did, 'Theſe were the words', &c. for Mr. Harcourt in his report only ſays, 'He uſed theſe or the like expreſſions.' See note above.

[d] The commons, inſtead of appearing at the trial, ſent up to the lords, on the 17th of June, the following reaſons for their non-appearance.

'The commons, in this whole proceeding againſt the impeached lords, have acted with all imaginable zeal to bring them to a ſpeedy trial; and they doubt not but it will appear by comparing their proceedings with all other upon the like occaſions, that the houſe of commons have nothing to blame themſelves, but that they have not expreſſed the reſentment their anceſtors have juſtly ſhewed upon much leſs attempts, which have been made upon their power of impeachments.

'The commons, on the 31ſt of May, acquainted your lordſhips, that they thought it proper, from the nature of the evidence, to proceed in the firſt place upon the trial of the lord Sommers. Upon the firſt intimation from your lordſhips, ſome days afterwards, that you would proceed to the trial of the impeached lords, whom the commons ſhould be firſt ready to begin with, notwithſtanding your lordſhips had before thought fit to appoint, which impeachment ſhould be firſt tried, and affixed a day for ſuch a trial, without conſulting the commons, who are the proſecutors; the commons, determining to expedite the trials to the utmoſt of their power, in hopes of attaining that end, and for the more ſpeedy and eaſy adjuſting and preventing any differences, which had happened, or might ariſe previous to, or upon, theſe trials, propoſed to your lordſhips at a conference the moſt parliamentary and effectual method for that purpoſe, and that, which in no manner intrenched upon your lordſhips judicature, that a committee of both houſes ſhould be nominated, to conſider of the moſt proper ways and methods of proceeding upon impeachments, according to the uſage of Parliament.

'In the next meſſage to the commons, upon Monday the 9th of June, your lordſhips thought fit, without taking the leaſt notice of this propoſition, to appoint Friday then following for the trial of the ſaid lord Sommers; whereunto, as well as to many other meſſages and proceedings of your lordſhips upon this occaſion, the houſe of commons might have juſtly taken very great exceptions; yet, as an evidence of their moderation, and to ſhew their readineſs to bring the impeached lords to ſpeedy juſtice, the commons inſiſted only on their propoſition for a committee of both houſes to ſettle and adjuſt the neceſſary preliminaries to the trial; particularly, Whether the impeached lords ſhould appear on their trial at your lordſhips bar as criminals? Whether being under accuſations of the ſame crimes, they ſhould ſit as judges on each other's trial for thoſe crimes, or ſhould vote in their own caſes, as it is notorious they have been permitted by your lordſhips to do in many inſtances, which might be given, to which particulars your lordſhips have not yet given a dire& according to the order of the day'? Which was reſolved in the affirmative, though ſeveral lords proteſted againſt it [e]. A meſſage was then ſent to the commons, to acquaint them, that their lordſhips were going. The other impeached lords having aſked leave to withdraw, and not ſit and vote in the trial, a queſtion was propoſed, 'Whether the earl of Orford and the lord Hallifax may withdraw at the trial of the lord Sommers?' This was much oppoſed by ſome lords, becauſe the giving ſuch leave ſuppoſed, that they had a right to vote; but it was reſolved in the affirmative. And, after ſome other things of form; the lords adjourned into Weſtminſter-Hall, where the articles of impeachment againſt the lord Sommers, and his anſwers were read, and, the commons not appearing to proſecute, their lordſhips adjourned to their houſe, and entered into a long debate concerning the queſtion, that was to be put. The judges told them, that according to the forms of law, it ought to be 'guilty or not guilty.' But thoſe of the Tory party ſaid, as it was certain, that none could vote lord Sommers guilty; ſo, ſince the commons had not come to make good the charge, they could not vote him not guilty; and therefore, to give them ſome content, the queſtion agreed on to be put was, 'That John lord Sommers be acquitted of the articles of impeachment againſt him, exhibited by the houſe of commons, and all things therein contained; and that the impeachment be diſmiſſed?' That being ſettled, the lords returned to Weſtminſter-Hall, and, the queſtion being put, fifty-ſix voted in the affirmative, and thirty-one in the negative; and the lord-keeper declared, that the majority was for acquitting him. Then the lords adjourned to their houſe, and made an order for his being acquitted, and the impeachment to be diſmiſſed.

Upon this the commons paſſed ſome high votes againſt the lords, and, to juſtify their refuſal to appear at the trial, reſolved, 'That the lords have refuſed juſtice to the commons upon the impeachment againſt the lord Sommers, by denying them a committee of both houſes, which was deſired by the commons as the proper and only method of ſettling the neceſſary preliminaries, in order to the proceeding to the trial of lord Sommers with effect; and afterwards, by proceeding to a pretended trial of the ſaid lord, which could tend only to protect him from juſtice, by colour of an illegal acquittal. Againſt which proceedings of the lords, the commons do ſolemnly proteſt, as being repugnant to the rules of juſtice, and therefore null and void. That the houſe of lords, by the pretended trial of John lord Sommers, have endeavoured to overturn the right of impeachments lodged in the houſe of commons, by the ancient conſtitution of this kingdom, for the ſafety and protection of the commons againſt the power of great men, and have made an invaſion upon the liberties of the ſubject, by laying a foundation of impunity for the greateſt offenders. That all the ill conſequences, which may at this time attend the delay of the ſupplies given by the commons for the preſerving the public peace, and maintaining the balance of Europe, by ſupporting our allies againſt the power of France, are to be imputed to thoſe who, to procure an indemnity for their own crimes, have uſed their utmoſt endeavours to make a breach between the two houſes.'

The lords went as high in their votes againſt the commons, and the ſame day ſent this anſwer to their meſſage: 'The lords do acquaint the commons, that they might have known, by the records of the houſe of lords, that the lords had proceeded to the trial of the lord Sommers on Tueſday laſt, being the day appointed; and, the commons not appearing to maintain their articles againſt the ſaid lord, the lords had by judgment of their houſe, acquitted him of the articles of impeachment againſt him, exhibited by the commons, and all things therein contained, and had diſmiſſed the ſaid impeachment.

'And the lords had appointed Monday next for the trial of the earl of Orford, on which day they would proceed on the trial.

'The commons ſtill preſſing for a committee of both houſes, which their lordſhips could never conſent to for the reaſons already given, their lordſhips could infer nothing from their perſiſting in this demand, than that they never deſigned to bring any of their impeachments to a trial.

'As to the lord Haverſham, his anſwer was now before

[e] a direct anſwer, though put in mind thereof by the commons. Your lordſhips at a conference, having offered ſome reaſons, why you could not agree to a committee of both houſes, to adjuſt the neceſſary preliminaries, the commons thereupon deſired a free conference, and your lordſhips agreed thereunto; at which, it is well known to many of your lordſhips, who were then preſent, what moſt ſcandalous reproaches and falſe expreſſions, highly reflecting upon the honour and juſtice of the houſe of commons, were uttered by John lord Haverſham, whereby the commons were under neceſſity of withdrawing from the ſaid free conference; for which offence the commons have, with all due regard to your lordſhips, prayed your lordſhips juſtice againſt the lord Haverſham, but have as yet received no manner of ſatisfaction.

'The commons reſtrain themſelves from enumerating your lordſhips very many irregular and unparliamentary proceedings upon this occaſion; but think it is what they owe to public juſtice and all the commons of England, whom they repreſent, to declare ſome few of thoſe reaſons, why they peremptorily refuſe to proceed to the trial of the lord Sommers on the 17th of June.

'Firſt, becauſe your lordſhips have not yet agreed, that a committee of both houſes ſhould be appointed for ſettling the neceſſary preliminaries, a method never until this time denied by the houſe of lords, whenſoever the commons have thuoght it neceſſary to deſire the ſame.

'Secondly, ſhould the commons (which they never will do) be contented to give up thoſe rights, which have been tranſmitted to them from their anceſtors, and are of abſolute neceſſity to their proceedings on impeachments; yet, whilſt they have any regard to public juſtice, they never can appear as proſecutors before your lordſhips, till your lordſhips have firſt given them ſatisfaction, that lords impeached of the ſame crime ſhall not ſit as judges on each other's trials for thoſe crimes.

'Thirdly, becauſe the commons have as yet had no reparation for the great indignity offered to them at the free conference by the lord Haverſham. The commons are far from any inclination, and cannot be ſuppoſed to be under any neceſſity of delaying the trial of the lord Sommers. There is not any article exhibited by them in maintenance of their impeachment againſt the lord Sommers, for the proof whereof they have not full and undeniable evidence, which they will be ready to produce, as ſoon as your lordſhips ſhall have done juſtice upon the lord Haverſham; and the neceſſary preliminaries in order to the ſaid trial ſhall be ſettled by a committee of both houſes.

'The commons think it unneceſſary to obſerve to your lordſhips, that moſt of the articles, whereof the lord Sommers ſtands impeached, will appear to your lordſhips to be undoubtedly true from matters of record, as well as by the confeſſion of the ſaid lord Sommers in his anſwer to the ſaid articles; to which the commons doubt not but your lordſhips will have a due regard, when his trial ſhall regularly proceed.'

The lords ſent their anſwer to this meſſage, June the 20th, in theſe words:

'The lords, in anſwer to the meſſage of the commons of the 17th inſtant, ſay, the only true way of determining, which of the two houſes has acted with the greateſt ſincerity, in order to bring the impeached lords to their trials, is to look back upon the reſpective proceedings.

'The lords do not well underſtand what the commons mean by that reſentment, which they ſpeak of in their meſſage. Their lordſhips own the houſe of commons have a right of impeaching; and the lords have undoubted power of doing juſtice upon thoſe impeachments, by bringing them to trial, and condemning or acquitting the parties in a reaſonable time. This power is derived to them from their anceſtors, which they will not ſuffer to be wreſted from them by any pretences whatſoever.

'Their lordſhips cannot but wonder, that the commons ſhould not have propoſed a committee of both houſes much ſooner, if they thought it ſo neceſſary for the bringing on the trials; no mention being made of ſuch a committee from the 11th of April to the 6th of June, although, during that interval, their delays were frequently complained of by the houſe of lords.

'The manner, in which the commons demand this committee, the lords look upon as a direct invading of their judicature; and therefore, as there never was a committee of both houſes yielded to by the lords, in caſe of any impeachment for high crimes and miſdemeanors; ſo their lordſhips do inſiſt, that they will make no new precedent upon this occaſion. Many impeachments for miſdemeanors have in all times been determined without ſuch a committee. And if now the commons think fit, by any unprecedented demand, to form an excuſe for not proſecuting their impeachments, it is demonſtrable where the obſtruction lies.

'As to the preliminaries, which the commons mentioned in particular, as proper to be ſettled at ſuch a committee, they have received the reſolutions of the houſe of lords therein, by their meſſage of the 12th inſtant; from which (being matters entirely relating to their judicature) their lordſhips cannot depart.

'As to the laſt pretence the commons would make to ſhelter the delaying the trials, from ſome expreſſions, which fell from the lord Haverſham at the free conference, at which offence was taken, their lordſhips will only obſerve;

'Firſt, That they have omitted nothing, which might give the commons all reaſonable ſatisfaction of their purpoſe to do them juſtice in that matter, ſo far as it is conſiſtent with doing juſtice to that lord; and alſo to preſerve all good correſpondence with them; as appears by the ſeveral ſteps they have taken.

'Secondly, That this buſineſs has no relation to the trial of the impeached lords; and therefore their Lordſhips cannot imagine, why the commons ſhould make ſatisfaction and reparation againſt the lord Haverſham a neceſſary condition for the going on with the trials, and at the ſame time find no difficulties in proceeding on other buſineſs.' Pr. H. C. III. 169—175.

[e] This proteſt was thought ſo injurious to the houſe, that it was ordered to be expunged; but it was as follows:

'We do conceive it very improper to proceed to this trial, before the preliminaries are adjuſted, eſpecially ſince ſome of thoſe preliminaries are ſuch, as in our opinion are eſſentially neceſſary to the adminiſtration of juſtice.

'And after ſuch a proteſtation of the commons, as they have ſent to us againſt the proceedings to a trial, and which we conceive is founded upon juſtice, and the reaſonable method of parliament, we apprehended our proceeding now to this trial may tend to the diſappointment of all future trials on impeachments.'

This

the houſe of commons, and the lords reſolved to do juſtice in that matter.'

The commons on the ſame day, the 20th of June, having ordered, that none of their members ſhould appear on the Monday following, at the pretended trial of the earl of Orford, upon pain of incurring the utmoſt diſpleaſure of the the houſe, they adjourned to Tueſday morning. But the lords continued ſitting, and, having ſent a copy of the lord Haverſham's anſwer [f] to the commons, they reſolved, on the 21ſt of June, 'That, unleſs the commons charge againſt that lord ſhall be proſecuted by them againſt him with effect, before the end of the ſeſſion, the lords would declare and adjudge him wholly innocent of the charge.' And on Monday, June the 23d, it was reſolved by their lordſhips, That the reſolutions of the houſe of commons, in their votes of the 20th inſtant, contained moſt unjuſt reflections on the honour and juſtice of the houſe of peers, and were contrived to cover their affected and unreaſonable delays in proſecuting the impeached lords; and manifeſtly tended to the deſtruction of the judicature of the lords, to the rendering trials on impeachments impracticable for the future, and to the ſubverting the conſtitution of the Engliſh government; and that therefore, whatever ill conſequences might ariſe from the ſo long deferring the ſupplies for this year's ſervice, were to be attributed to the fatal counſel of the putting off the meeting of a parliament ſo long, and to the unneceſſary delays of the houſe of commons.

Then the lords adjourned to Weſtminſter-Hall, and, after two proclamations made for ſilence and proſecution, the articles of impeachment againſt Edward earl of Orford were read, and alſo his anſwer to thoſe articles; and, after taking the ſame methods as in the trial of the lord Sommers, his lordſhip, by unanimous votes (the lords on the other ſide withdrawing) was acquitted of the articles, and the impeachment was diſmiſſed:

The next day, being the laſt of the ſeſſion of the parliament, this order was made by the lords:

'The houſe of commons not having proſecuted their charge, which they brought up againſt John lord Haverſham, for words ſpoken by him at a free conference the 13th inſtant, the charge ſhall be and is hereby diſmiſſed.

'The earl of Portland being impeached by the houſe of commons of high crimes and miſdemeanors the firſt of April laſt, the impeachment is hereby diſmiſſed, there being no articles exhibited againſt him.

'The houſe of commons having impeached Charles lord Hallifax of high crimes and miſdemeanors on the 15th of April laſt, and on the 14th day of this inſtant June exhibited articles againſt him, to which he having anſwered, and no further proſecution thereupon, the impeachment and articles are hereby diſmiſſed.

'The houſe of commons having impeached Thomas duke of Leeds of high crimes and miſdemeanors on the 27th of April 1695, and on the 29th exhibited articles againſt him, to which he anſwered, but the commons not proſecuting, the impeachment and articles are hereby diſmiſſed.'

Each houſe ordered a narrative of the proceedings to be publiſhed [g]; and they had gone ſo far in their votes againſt one

[f] This anſwer was very long, and may be ſeen in the Proceedings of the Houſe of Commons (III. 174.) That part of it, which relates to his reflecting on the partiality of the commons, in his ſpeech at the free conference, was as follows:

That the nature of that conference was, that it ſhould be free: The occaſion of it, becauſe either houſe apprehended the other to be in an error; and the end of it, that each ſide may urge ſuch facts, as are true, and ſuch reaſons as are forcible to convince. That one article of impeachment againſt John lord Sommers was, that the treaty of Partition of 1699 was ratified under the great ſeal, which then was in the cuſtody of the ſame lord, then lord chancellor of England. That the commons on the 1ſt of April 1701 reſolved, that the earl of Portland, by negociating and concluding the treaty of Partition, was guilty of an high crime and miſdemeanor; and, purſuant thereto, lodged an impeachment againſt him in the houſe of peers. Which vote and impeachment could not have reference to any treaty, other than the treaty of Partition of 1699, the treaty of 1698 not being before the houſe of commons till after the time of that vote and impeachment. And yet the earl of Jerſey, who was then ſecretary of ſtate and privy councillor, and actually ſigned the ſaid treaty of 1699, as a plenipotentiary with the lord Portland, ſtands unimpeached, and continues at the head of affairs, being lord chamberlain near his majeſty's perſon, and in his preſence and councils, without complaint. That the earl of Orford and the lords Sommers and Hallifax are ſeverally impeached for adviſing the treaty of Partition of 1698; and yet Mr. ſecretary Vernon, who then was ſecretary of ſtate and a privy councillor, and acted in the promoting of the treaty of Partition of 1698, ſtands unimpeached, and ſtill continues one of the principal ſecretaries of ſtate. And ſir Joſeph Williamſon, who was then a privy councillor, and tranſacted and ſigned the treaty of Partition of 1698, as a plenipotentiary, ſtands unimpeached. That the lord Hallifax is impeached, for that he, being a commiſſioner of the treaſury, aſſented to the paſſing of ſeveral grants from the crown to ſeveral perſons of lands in Ireland: And yet ſir Edward Seymour, ſir Stephen Fox, and Mr. Pelham, who, being ſeverally lords commiſſioners of the treaſury, did ſeverally aſſent to the paſſing of divers like grants from his majeſty of lands in Ireland, ſtands unimpeached. That in the impeachments againſt the earl of Orford and lord Sommers, one of the articles againſt them is, for procuring a commiſſion to captain Kidd, and likewiſe a grant under the great ſeal of the ſhip and goods of certain perſons therein named, to certain perſons in truſt for them; and yet other lords, equally concerned in procuring the ſaid commiſſion and grant, ſtand unimpeached. That the ſaid Mr. ſecretary Vernon, ſir Edward Seymour, ſir Stephen Fox, and Mr. Pelham, notwithſtanding their being parties in the ſame facts charged in the ſame reſpective impeachments, have been permitted to ſit and vote in the houſe of commons touching the ſaid impeachments, and the matters thereof. That, theſe facts being true, and publicly known, the conſequences reſulting therefrom (as the lord Haverſham apprehended) are undeniable, viz. That the doing of the ſame thing by two perſons in equal circumſtances cannot be a crime in one, and not in the other. That the commons had no reaſon to inſiſt, that the lords ſhould not permit that in their members, which the commons had firſt permitted, and continued to permit, and ſo begun the firſt precedent in their own members. That it muſt be thought that the impeached lords (notwithſtanding the facts alledged in the impeachments) are innocent of danger to the king, when the lord Jerſey and Mr. ſecretary Vernon, who are reſpectively concerned in the Partition treaties, are permitted, without complaint, to be at the head of affairs, and in the king's preſence, and of his councils, as not dangerous. That the word innocent, uſed in the words ſpoken by the ſaid lord Haverſham, can extend no further than to ſuch matters, as were done by the impeached lords of the ſame nature with what was done by thoſe unimpeached. All which facts being true, and the conſequences obvious, the ſaid lord being ready to prove the ſame, he inſiſts, that the words, ſpoken by him at the ſaid free conference, were not ſcandalous or reproachful, nor falſe or reflecting on the honour or juſtice of the houſe of commons, but were ſpoken upon a juſt occaſion given, in anſwer to ſeveral expreſſions, that fell from the managers for the commons, remote (as he conceives) from the matter in queſtion, and reflecting on the honour and juſtice of the houſe of peers, and in maintenance and defence of the lords reſolutions and judicature, and conformable to the duty he owes to the ſaid houſe. And the ſaid lord humbly demands the judgment of their honourable houſe therein. And the ſaid lord Haverſham denies, that he ſpoke the words ſpecified in the ſaid charge, in ſuch manner and form, as the ſame are therein ſet down. And having thus given a true account of this matter, and it being true and indiſputable, that ſome lords in this houſe, equally concerned in facts, for which other lords are impeached by the houſe of commons, are ſtill near the king's perſon, in the greateſt places of truſt and honour, unimpeached; and alſo that ſeveral members of the houſe of commons, equally concerned in the ſame facts, for which ſome lords are impeached, do however remain unimpeached; the ſaid lord thinks, ſuch a truth could never have been more properly ſpoken, in the maintenance and defence of your lordſhips judicature and reſolutions; and inſiſteth, that what he had ſaid at the free conference was not any ſcandalous reproach, or falſe expreſſion, or any way tended to make a breach in the good correſpondence between the lords and commons, or to the interrupting the public juſtice of the nation, by delaying the proceedings on the impeachments, as in the ſaid charge alledged, but agreeable to truth, in diſcharge of his duty, and in the defence of the undoubted right and judicature of this houſe.

Haverſham.

[g] It may not be improper to ſubjoin here ſome remarks concerning thoſe proceedings, extracted from a MS. written by a very conſiderable perſon of that time.

'The Partition treaty, ſays he, was no ſooner publiſhed, but it appeared, that the French embaſſador, Monſieur Tallard, had formed a ſtrong party here againſt it, and had engaged Dr. Davenant to write againſt it. It was not enough for the French court to reſolve on breaking it, but, to complete the perfidy, it muſt die with infamy. At the firſt opening of the ſeſſion, addreſſes were made to the king from the houſes for all the treaties, that had been made ſince that at Ryſwick. This was done on the 12th or 13th of February, two or three days after the opening of the ſeſſion. The tranſlating and copying theſe went on ſo ſlowly, that they were not brought to the houſe of lords before the 26th of February. This delay was ſo uneaſy to thoſe, who were longing for an occaſion to diſcharge their engagements to thoſe, who had merited well at their hands, as well as to gratify their reſentments, by falling on that treaty, and on all concerned in it, that, I am told, on two or three occaſions they complained of it, yet by ſome ſecret but powerful charm all men were ſo reſtrained, that, from the 26th of February to the 20th of March, no notice at all was taken of it; but on the 20th the train was fired, and all was ſoon in a flame. I cannot certainly tell you what was the occaſion of this great patience and long ſilence, after ſome had ſhewn an eagerneſs, that ſeemed not very governable. I will only tell you what happened at that time at the Hague. After the French had poſſeſſed themſelves of the Spaniſh Netherlands, and found the States were not very eaſy in their neighbourhood, they deſired to treat with them, and know what would ſatisfy them. The States inſiſted upon the engagements given by the Partition treaty, and complained of the violation of it, and aſked ſuch ſecurities, as they thought neceſſary. The king ordered his miniſter to join with them in the like complaints and demands. Theſe were given in on the 8th of March; and as ſoon as the French embaſſador had an account of it, immediately the matter of that treaty was fallen on in the houſe of lords, while very few among them knew any thing of the negociation at the Hague, which was not communicated to them by the king till four days after. But ſome perhaps had better intelligence. The treaty then ſet on foot at the Hague was to have this diſgrace put upon it, that the Partition treaty, on which it was to be founded, was to be condemned. Some, that had been concerned in it, had advertiſements ſent them from the court of France of their danger; by all which the French party hoped, that the king himſelf, and ſuch as had been concerned in the matter, would be prevailed on to let that treaty be forgotten, and become more favourable to the French intereſt, if it were but to ſave themſelves from the ſtorm, that was otherwiſe ready to break out on them. I can affirm nothing in this matter, but, if you will lay all this together, you will acknowledge there is ground enough for jealouſy. So long a ſilence, and then the falling on the treaty in that critical minute, could not happen by chance without ſome ſecret and unperceived direction. But, by what accident or order ſoever it might be, this matter was taken up by the lords, and ſeverely arraigned firſt by thoſe, who value themſelves upon their finding fault with every thing that is done, becauſe they have not the doing of it; and though ſome of theſe had once a very friendly application of a Spaniſh proverb made to them, that 'he, whoſe houſe is of glaſs, ſhould throw no ſtones;' yet good nature and zeal for the public are too ſtrong to be long reſtrained, though it happens now and then, that they are put in mind of ſome things, that, though they are pardoned, will not eaſily be forgotten. But that, which ſeemed very ſtrange, and was a very extraordinary piece of of courtſhip, was that thoſe, who are moſt in the king's confidence, and feel the beſt effects of it, fell upon the treaty in a moſt particular manner. Words another, that it was believed, they would never meet again. The proceedings of the lords had the general approbation of the nation on their ſide. Moſt of the biſhops adhered to the impeached lords, and their behaviour, on this occaſion, was much commended. The violence, as well as folly of the party, loſt them much ground with all indifferent men, but with none more than with the king himſelf, who found his error in changeing his miniſtry at ſo critical a time; and he now ſaw, that the tories were at heart irreconcileable to him; in particular, he was extremely uneaſy with the earl of Rocheſter, of whoſe imperious and intractable temper he complained much, and ſeemed reſolved to diſengage himſelf quickly from him, and never to return to him any more. He thought the party was neither ſolid nor ſincere, and that they were actuated by paſſion and revenge, without any views with relation to the quiet of the nation, and affairs abroad.

The violent proceedings of the commons, and their ſlowneſs with relation to foreign affairs, had not only diſpleated the king, but given a general diſguſt to the nation, and particularly to the city of London, where foreign affairs, and the intereſt of trade were generally better underſtood; the old Eaſt-India company, though they hated the miniſtry that ſet up the new, and ſtudied to ſupport this houſe of commons, from whom they expected much ia-not very decent, if applied to the actions of the meaneſt ſubject, were employed to lay out the ridiculouſneſs, the injuſtice, the treachery and barbarity of the treaty, as things fit to give horror. Now ſince, what ſhare ſoever the late miniſtry might be ſuppoſed to have had in it, yet it was well known, that it was chiefly of the king's own deſigning, therefore though it is certain, that a parliament of England may with a due firmneſs, as well as with juſt reſpect, repreſent to the king ſuch errors, as he may fall into; yet a decency of ſtyle was but ſuitable, eſpecially in men bred in courts, and accuſtomed enough to a more 'ſubmiſſive dialect in former reigns.' This might have been expected from thoſe, who know, that the king thought it no leſſening of himſelf to own, that he believed he had made the beſt bargain poſſible, all circumſtances conſidered. This was not all; thoſe, who attacked the treaty, five or ſix in a ſtring, did all of them ſay, they meant not to find fault; that they had no other deſign but to amend what had been amiſs, and to prevent the like errors for the future. They did not intend to fall upon any one perſon, not ſo much as to a reprimand: All they meant was to have errors corrected, and to have things put in a better method.

While the debate went on, upon this foot, and that all thoſe, who were known to have a ſhare in the confidence, went into cenſuring the treaty, thoſe, who could not help the having other thoughts of it, could not of the ſudden know what was fit to be done. Many thought it was concerted at court to let the treaty be cenſured; and that all the ill humour raiſed upon it was to evaporate in ſome angry votes, without carrying the matter further. No intimations had been given, that the king deſired the thing might be better underſtood, before it ſhould be condemned The king was that day at Hampton-Court; ſo no application could be made to him; for, let men talk what they will of freedom in debate, there ever was, and ever will be, and ought to be, great regard had to our princes with relation to matters of ſtate. Not that the king's mind ought to have any influence on men's arguing or voting; but it is certain, that in many caſes men may reſolve to be paſſive in ſome of the king's concerns, when they think he intends to be ſo himſelf. They may reaſonably conclude, that he is willing to let ſome things go, at ſome times, that he may thereby put his people in better humour, in order to the gaining other things, that are of more conſequence. This is ſo frequently practiſed, that he muſt be a great ſtranger to the methods of managing a ſeſſion of parliament, who had not obſerved it almoſt in every ſeſſion. And this was the caſe in the houſe of lords upon this occaſion. No body was ſooner in their reflections on that decried treaty than thoſe, who were moſt in the confidence. Every man declared that no further uſe was to be made of the votes, that were propoſed for condemning it, but to offer good advice to the king for better conduct in future negotiations. Some, who intended to have excuſed, if not juſtified, the treaty, were prevailed on to ſay nothing; not ſo much out of caution, not to go againſt the ſtream, but becauſe they had no mind to ſeem more concerned in maintaining the honour of the king's treaties, than he was himſelf. They thought their oppoſition would ſignify little, and paſs for officiouſneſs and court-flattery. So they gave way, and the votes paſſed without contradiction. This point was no ſooner gained, than ſome of thoſe very perſons, who had made the fulleſt proteſtations of their having no intention to carry the matter further, immediately laid off the maſk; for you know, in parliamentary proceedings all men are not equally exact in performing what they promiſed, when they have once carried the point they aimed at. Theſe arts are ſo familiar to ſome, that, inſtead of being out of countenance, they value themſelves upon their dexterity at them. So it happened here. This is the true account of that matter, without any diſguiſe. The lords, ſince accuſed for it, did indeed offer ſuch an account of the ſhare they had in the treaty in the year 1699, that it was impoſſible to lay any blame on them for it; and the lord Sommers, whoſe health was out of order the firſt two days, in which this was before the lords, when he came to the houſe, gave ſo clear an account of the ſhare, that himſelf had in it, that there were not two in the whole houſe, who did not ſeem entirely ſatisfied with his behaviour in that matter. This was ſignified by ſhouts and acclamations, that were raiſed higher, and continued longer, than ſome, who had ſat long there, had ever obſerved before. If thoſe lords had known, that the king deſired, that right ſhould be done him in defending both his honour, juſtice, and wiſdom, as they were concerned in that treaty, they, who have often hazarded themſelves much further in his ſervice, would not have been wanting in that piece of duty and reſpect. But it was generally believed at that time, that the king was leſs concerned in that matter, than it has been apprehended he was afterwards, when the ſtroke was ſtruck, and could not be retrieved. Indeed a new ſcene opened ſoon after that, when it was ſuggeſted by the lord Wharton, that, what ſenſe ſoever the houſe might have of the partition treaty, yet ſince, to the obſervation of all Europe, the French king had broke it, it was fit to make that a paragraph of the addreſs, that the king, in all future treaties with that crown, ſhould not truſt to verbal aſſurances, but demand a real ſecurity. This was ſo conformable to the foot, upon which the king and the States did give in the memorials at the Hague, and was ſo contrary to the deſigns of the French, who intended to offer no other ſecurity but the renewing the treaty of Ryſwick, that it was no wonder, if men gained by the French gold ſhould have oppoſed it. But it ſeemed very ſtrange to ſee ſo great an oppoſition made to it by men, that muſt be preſumed incapable of corruption, and who are eſteemed ſteady to their country; yet as there are odd accidents that happen ſometimes, but that lie ſo far out of the way, that no account can be given of them; ſo this drew on, I cannot tell how, a debate of many hours, and of much heat. If Verſailles had dictated the arguments, they could not have choſen them better, or wiſhed them to have been more dexteroufly managed; though I am ſure you are not capable of letting this paſs upon you, as if thoſe great men were ſubject to the common frailty of loving for ready money. Therefore I will take no more pains to ſecure you from it. The vote was carried, and it was followed by a proteſt, on which I will make no reflections, for the perſons are 'above.' I muſt only obſerve one thing more, that votes are generally conceived in plain and ſimple terms; but, when addreſſes are to be made purſuant to them, rhey are enlarged in fuller expreſſions; and that was not wanting in this addreſs; much rhetoric was employed: The partition treaty was called that fatal treaty, and was heavily loaded; but the laſt paragraph, concerning a 'real ſecurity' to be demanded from France, was ſet down in the bare words of the vote, without the leaſt enlargement, how much ſoever ſome, who penned it, love the beauties of eloquence. Yet that was too tender a point to be touched with a rough hand; an addition of any weighty words might have been made a pretence to a diſcount by thoſe, who will have pennyworths for their money.'

The reader will undoubtedly be pleaſed to find here another paper from the ſame hand, never yet printed, concerning the conduct of the miniſtry and of the leading men in the houſe of commons during this ſeſſion, with reſpect to foreign affairs. 'It is well known, ſays he, that a few days before the king came over, which was in the beginning of November, he had ordered Mr. Blathwayte to write two poſt-days, one after another, to the lords juſtices, to prepare a proclamation giving notice, that the parliament was to meet to do buſineſs on the 18th of November. The king came over himſelf before this was to be publiſhed, and he ſoon after had the news of the king of Spain's will, and of his death, which was quickly followed with a declaration, that the French king did accept of the king of Spain's will: And therefore did not think fit to ſtand to the partition treaty. The king had a parliament current, and ready to meet in a few days, as he had intended it ſhould before this great turn of affairs. But the parliament was put off to a further day, and upon the hopes, and, as is ſaid, upon the undertakings of ſome, all was put off till the new ſheriffs were pricked; and, ſoon as they were fixed in their ſervice, the writs went out for a new parliament, ſummoned the 6th but prorogued to the 10th of February. Here was one parliament diſſolved, and another called, and by this means three months were loſt, which upon ſuch a great turn is a matter of no ſmall conſequence. England ſeemed uncertain or aſleep. This gave the French no ſmall encouragement, and was a great diſheartening to the emperor and the States. In all this time it is poſitively ſaid, that the new miniſtry preſſed the king vehemently to own the king of Spain. This is certain, that both they and their friends ſaid, in all companies, and on all occaſions, that it was no matter, who was king of Spain; the king of Spain muſt know his own intereſt; he muſt be governed by Spaniſh councils; and they muſt be true to their ancient allies, the Engliſh and the Dutch, for that was to be true to themſelves. They ſaid England was not for a war, and indeed not capable to go into one, while they were under ſo great a debt. They ſpared not to ſay, that the king was not for a war; and that he knew it was impracticable. They ſpoke of the emperor as a prince not capable of doing any thing, and for whom we were to have no regard. All this while the king was on a great reſerve, and was told, as has been very confidently reported ſince, that, if he ſhewed any inclination to a war, that would raiſe jealouſies, which would very much obſtruct all buſineſs; and therefore it was neceſſary for his affairs, that he ſhould not diſcover his own thoughts of things. This well-meant reſervedneſs of the king's was at the ſame time given out to flow from his own averſion to engage in the emperor's quarrels; but that he was ſtill in ſecret treaties and engagements with France.

'While they and their agents were infuſing theſe things into all, that came up, but, chiefly into the parliament-men, the citizens of London ſaw clearly that the leaſt ill effect of the union of France and Spain muſt be the ruin of the trade of England, and ſpake openly of the neceſſity of a war; and it was ſurmiſed, that the old miniſtry were likewiſe for a war; and many began to ſpeak it openly, that, as it ſeemed inevitable, that we muſt engage in a war, ſo this could not be managed but by a miniſtry, that was both zealous and reſolute, and that was poſſeſſed of the eſteem and confidence of the nation, chiefly of the city, who would never make the advances of money, that muſt be neceſſary in a war, unleſs they truſted the miniſtry. Whiſpers were ſet about, that the king retained a juſt ſenſe of thoſe, who had helped him through his former war, and might think they would be uſeful to him in this. This, with the French practices, raiſed the ſtorm againſt them by thoſe, who reſolved to conduct matters after their own way, and to keep them from a poſſibility of returning again into favour.

'As ſoon as the ſeſſion was opened, it was reſolved to carry a vote in the houſe of commons for an addreſs to the king to own the new king of Spain, though they knew, that he had not yet owned the king, or given notice of his acceſſion to that crown: But the honeſt zeal of Mr. Monkton, and others, had a happy effect. This was ſtopped, to the no ſmall grief of thoſe, who had taken much pains in it, and, no doubt, expected to be well rewarded for it. The ſtream run another way, and then it appeared, that, how much ſoever the prejudices of ſome had been wrought upon, yet the bulk of the houſe were ſtill true Engliſhmen; yet, they retained ſo good an opinion of ſome men, that had got too much credit among them, that things were ſuffered to cool, and the houſe was diverted to other matters, that can never be managed with temper. The houſe, indeed, declared for an alliance with the Dutch, and for a fleet; but, it was ſo long before they could be brought to declare for an alliance with the emperor, that, if the French had not deſpiſed all he could do, more, perhaps, than they do now, and, if they had not depended on the ſtrength of their intereſt here, they would have, perhaps, made ſuch offers to the emperor, as might have prevailed on him, when he had ſo little reaſon to hope for any concurrence from us. The king received frequent meſſages from the States, repreſenting the extremities, to which they were driven, of which, ſome were written in ſuch moving ſtrains, that few read them without feeling impreſſions of great tenderneſs. But there was a ſtupid apathy ſomewhere, that could not be wrought on: And when by the intercepting the earl of Melfort's letter to his brother, we all ſaw how confident thoſe of St. Germain's were of their affairs, yet Sir Edward Seymour, Sir T. M. and others, looked on that but as a court-artifice, and had not vour; yet they, as well as the reſt of the city, ſaw viſibly, that firſt the ruin of trade, and conſequently the ruin of the nation, muſt certainly enſue, if France and Spain were once firmly united. So they began openly to condemn the proceedings of the commons, and to own a jealouſy, that the Lewis d'ors, ſent hither of late, had not come over to England for nothing. This diſpoſition, to blame the ſlowneſs in which the commons proceeded with reſpect to affairs abroad, ſpread itſelf through all England, and more eſpecially in Kent. Thoſe of that county, in a diſlike of the conduct of the commons ſent up the following petition to that houſe:

'WE the Gentlemen, juſtices of the peace, grand jury, and other freeholders, at the general quarter ſeſſions of peace at Maidſtone in Kent, deeply concerned at the dangerous eſtate of this kingdom, and of all Europe; and conſidering, that the fate of us and our poſterity depends upon the wiſdom of our repreſentatives in parliament, think ourſelves bound in duty humbly to lay before this honourable houſe the conſequences, in this conjuncture, of your ſpeedy reſolution, and moſt ſincere endeavour, to anſwer the great truſt repoſed in you by your country.

'And in regard, that from the experience of all ages it is manifeſt, no nation can be great or happy without union; we hope, that no pretence whatſoever ſhall be able to create a miſunderſtanding among ourſelves, or the leaſt diſtruſt of his moſt ſacred majeſty, whoſe great actions for this nation are writ in the hearts of his ſubjects, and can never, without the blackeſt ingratitude, be forgot.

We moſt humbly implore this honourable houſe to have regard to the voice of the people, that our religion and ſafety may be effectually provided for; that your loyal addreſſes may be turned into bills of ſupply; and that his moſt ſacred majeſty (whoſe propitious and unblemiſhed reign over us we pray God long to continue) may be inabled powerfully to aſſiſt his allies, before it is too late.'

This petition was ſigned by the deputy-lieutenants there preſent, above twenty juſtices of the peace, all the grand-jury, and other freeholders, and was boldly delivered to the houſe of commons on the 8th of May; and William Colepepper, Thomas Colepepper, David Polhill, Juſtinian Champney, and William Hamilton, eſquires, being called in, owned the petition at the bar, and their hands to the ſame. They then withdrew, and, the petition being read, the houſe reſolved, 'That the petition was ſcandalous, inſolent, and ſeditious, tending to deſtroy the conſtitution of parliaments, and to ſubvert the eſtabliſhed government of theſe realms.' And then ordered, 'That all thoſe gentlemen ſhould be taken into cuſtody, as guilty of promoting the petition.' And on the 14th of May, the houſe being informed, that Mr. Thomas Colepepper had made his eſcape, and that the reſt of the perſons committed were like to be reſcued, ordered them to be delivered priſoners to the Gate-houſe, and agreed to addreſs his majeſty, to iſſue his proclamation for apprehending Mr. Colepepper, and for putting out of the commiſſions of peace and lieutenancy ſuch others, as were in any of the ſaid commiſſions. But Mr. Colepepper made a voluntary ſurrender of himſelf, and was confined with his neighbours [h].

not ſo much regard to it, as to order the printing of it, though the lords conſidered better of it. It was long before the houſe could ſee through the artifices of thoſe, who miſled them. The ten thouſand men, agreed to by old treaties to be ſent to the Dutch, could not be eaſily obtained: The matter was long delayed; and that the French intereſt might be ſerved one way, when another failed, five thouſand of theſe were to be drawn out of Ireland; but particular care was taken, that no new bodies ſhould be raiſed in their ſtead, that ſo Ireland might be left ſo naked, that there might be, perhaps, a new diverſion given us on that ſide, unleſs that is provided by the prudent management and great temper of the lord lieutenant.

'In this ſlow method were things carried on, to the diſcouragement of all Europe, who reckoned we were a ſold nation; or, that we could be no more depended on.

'I could here run out into a long digreſſion, to ſhew you the various methods their party have taken in this, as well as in former ſeſſions, to blaſt the public credit; the effect of which was well foreſeen by thoſe who laboured it. They knew, the breaking of credit muſt, for the future, hinder all advances of money; and this muſt have been fatal, eſpecially if we had engaged in a war. But I may, perhaps, entertain you with this on another occaſion. One particular only I will mention here. The credit of Exchequer notes was a noble contrivance, to furniſh us with near three millions of paper-money, till they ſunk gradually, as was projected in the firſt deſign. Pains were taken, in particular, to blaſt this; yet 50,000, as all the bankers ſaid, was ſufficient to keep up their credit. But thoſe, who had a mind to make the ſupply as little effectual as was poſſible, moved, that one ſhilling in the pound ſhould go towards the quicker ſinking of them; and, ſince it muſt have been looked on as indecent to lay on more than three ſhillings in the pound, while we were not actually engaged in a war, by applying one of theſe to this effect, there were only two left, to anſwer the public occaſions, while yet the nation was to be poſſeſſed with this appearance of their zeal, by their giving three ſhillings in the pound. It is true, they voted a full proportion of ſeamen for a good fleet; but even this was ſpoiled in the management. It is certain, that, in every appearance of war, we ought to be well guarded with a good fleet: But a fleet, that was to ply up and down in the channel, was only a defence to ourſelves, who were in no danger of being attacked. Three or four thouſand marines would have looked as if we intended to act offenſively with our fleet, and muſt have ſtruck terror all over both the French and the Spaniſh, and have put them to no ſmall charge to have ſecured themſelves. But, for this very reaſon, every motion, that way, was rejected; ſo, though it had been too bare-faced not to have ſet out a good fleet, yet care was taken, that neither the Spaniards, nor the French, ſhould ſuffer from it, not ſo much as to be diſturbed with any apprehenſions about any part of it, except that, which was neceſſary to be ſent to ſecure our plantations. The reſt was to be an uſeleſs piece of pomp, only to conſume ſo much of our ſtock, but was not to be furniſhed ſo as to be able to do our neighbours much hurt. All this was ſo ordered, that every thing went on very ſlowly, that ſo the French might have time to practiſe upon all the courts of Europe, in which their chief topic was, that it was in vain to rely on England: They had many good friends there, who would retard all their reſolutions, and ſo work on the animoſities, that were among the different parties, that inſtead of thinking to ſecure themſelves, they were now only ſet on ruining thoſe who had hitherto, with much zeal and great ſucceſs, ſupported the preſent government. The proceedings here made, that this was eaſily believed; and that, with ſome of thoſe ſecret arguments, that were employed here, has proved ſo effectual, that a great many of the circles and princes of the empire incline to a neutrality, and has had no ſmall effect on the king of Portugal; ſo well have our delays ſerved to carry on the deſigns of France. The emperor's miniſter was ſo ill uſed, that he was often upon the point of giving all for gone, and of going home; and, tho' the king uſed all poſſible methods to perſuade him to ſtay, yet he was ſo much diſcouraged, that he was often ſaying, he feared, his giving his maſter any hopes from hence would be fatal to him. In concluſion, the ſenſe of the city, and of the whole nation, diſcovered itſelf ſo evidently, that it broke all theſe men's meaſures. The greateſt part of the houſe, who had unhappily relied too much upon them, began to ſuſpect their conduct; and a fear of receiving the moſt public affronts, that the nation ever put upon a houſe of commons, forced them, in concluſion, though not without great and viſible reluctance, to come to reſolutions becoming a parliament of England, was more owing to other accidents, than to the honeſty of the managers. In one reſpect, ſome of them were honeſt, for they oppoſed them to the laſt, even to the forfeiting their own credit with moſt of their party. One advantage our friends had to let the king ſee they were not diſpoſed to quarrel with any thing he did, though it was viſibly the effect of their counſels, who deſigned their ruin. The king had aſſured both houſes, that he would acquaint them with the whole progreſs of the negotiation; yet an incident happened of great conſequence, in which they carried their deſigns, without adviſing, either with council, or parliament. The king of Spain, after long deliberation about it, at laſt, wrote to the king. By the date, and other circumſtances, it appeared, that Mr. Harley knew, why he moved the houſe to leave the matter of owning the king of Spain to the king. This was a thing of ſuch conſequence, that one would have thought it deſerved to be well conſidered, at home, and to be communicated to our allies, abroad, before it was done. But ſo imperious are ſome men in their advices, that a return was made to the letter, and the ſecret was truſted to the court of France, who publiſhed it in a very indecent manner, to the ſurprize of all Europe. Now, I leave it to you to judge, what complaints the other ſide would have made, if they had diſcovered ſuch a proceeding in the old miniſtry; and, you will ſoon ſee, with what advantage they could have fallen on this ſtrange ſtep, ſo oddly made; yet, ſo tender they were of the king, and ſo unwilling to find fault, when his honour was already engaged, that they choſe rather to let this go, than to perplex the king's mind, as well as his affairs, with new complaints.'

[h] The committing of theſe gentlemen is juſtified by Dr. Drake, in his 'Hiſtory of the laſt Parliament,' who aſſerts, 'That the commons had been wanting in their duty to the people, whoſe repreſentatives they are, if they had tamely put up ſuch an inſult upon their authority, without ſhewing their reſentment, and thereby deterring others from following an example of ſo dangerous conſequence.' And he cites a paſſage from Colonel 'Algernon Sidney's diſcourſe of government,' C. 3. § 44. p. 451, 454. upon the point of petitioning; whence he obſerves, 'It is plain, that the Kentiſh Petitioners were guilty not only of miſbehaviour and ill manners to the houſe, but of a notorious violation of the rights of the people, in aſſuming to themſelves a power, which belonged to the whole; and therefore the houſe could not, without breach of truſt, paſs over uncorrected ſuch uſurpations upon the whole commons, and ſuch affronts upon their repreſentatives, with whom their authority was lodged.'

On the other ſide, the Kentiſh gentlemen were vindicated in a piece, printed in 1701, and reprinted in the third volume of the 'State tracts during the reign of King William,' and intitled,' Jura Populi Anglicani: or, the ſubjects right of petitioning ſet forth; occaſioned by the caſe of the Kentiſh Petitioners. With ſome thoughts on the reaſons, which induced thoſe gentlemen to petition; and of the commons right of unpriſoning.' The author of this piece obſerves in his preface, 'That it was a melancholy reflection to conſider how univerſal a diſſatisfaction the management of the houſe of commons had this (laſt) ſeſſion cauſed in the people of England; and that among thoſe, who arraigned their proceedings, there were none, who did not make the treatment of the five gentlemen, who preſented the Kentiſh petition one article of impeachment againſt them; and that the moſt intelligent part of the people had been free in ſaying, that the puniſhment of them plainly demonſtrated very extraordinary deſigns, and muſt be allowed, even by men of candour and ſenſe to give juſt grounds for all the jealouſies and ſuſpicions, that had been entertained.' He then obſerves, 'That it was not to be wondered at, that the impriſonment of the Kentiſh Petitioners ſhould have the voices of the major part of the houſe of commons, when (beſides the great inclination diſcovered by the ſpeaker) 'Sir Edward Seymour, Sir Bartholomew Shower, Mr. John Howe, Mr. Hammond, Mr. Harcourt,' and others, preſſed violently for it. What ſo many leaders in the party contended earneſtly for, could not but have the approbation of thoſe, who voted as conſtantly with them, as if they thought it both their duty and intereſt ſo to do. But, though that was the act of the greater part, it was not of the whole houſe of commons. All thoſe worthy and honourable members, who have always firmly adhered to his majeſty's intereſt, who have aſſociated for him, who have given perpetual demonſtrations of their enmity to France and the abdicated family, and heartily deſired to have all thoſe things done, which the Kentiſh Gentlemen petitioned for, were averſe to this, as they were to other fatal proceedings, which yet they had not power to prevent.' He then endeavours to ſhew, that the 'Houſe of Commons are not repreſentatives of the whole people of England, and that the Houſe of Lords are no leſs repreſentatives of the people of England than they.' He obſerves, that the 'Tory party' had governed the Houſe of Commons the laſt ſeſſion. 'If we conſider

This impriſonment of the Kentiſh petitioners did but enflame thoſe people, who were before diſpleaſed with the proceedings of the commons, and gave occaſion to a piece, ſuppoſed to be drawn by Daniel de Foe, intitled, 'A memorial from the gentlemen, freeholders, and inhabitants of the counties of——in behalf of themſelves and many thouſands of the good people of England, and ſigned Legion.' This was ſent to the ſpeaker with a letter, charging and commanding him, in the name of two hundred thouſand Engliſhmen, to deliver it to the houſe of commons[1]. The memorial began with a preamble upon this maxim, 'That whatever power is above law, is burdenſome and tyrannical, and may be reduced by extrajudicial methods.' Then it charged the houſe with illegal and unwarrantable practices in fifteen particulars, of which the three firſt were as follow: 'I. To raiſe funds for money, and declare, by borrowing clauſes, that whoſoever advances money on thoſe funds, ſhall be reimburſed out of the next aids, if the funds ſhall fall ſhort; and then give ſubſequent conſider the men, ſays he, and compare what they have done with the pretended principles of their party, it will hardly ſeem odder to ſee Sir Edward Seymour bring in a bill to prevent bribery; or Mr. John Howe exclaim againſt exorbitant grants; or ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave violent either againſt grants or a ſtanding army; or to find them, who diſcovered a plain inclination to quiet France in the poſſeſſion of all the Spaniſh dominions, quarrel at the treaty of Partition for giving France too much; than to ſee them aſſume the name of Tories. Is not Robin Harley a ringleader in this Tory party? Is not his brother Edward a leading member? Does not he attend all ordinances, and as conſtantly every week-day frequent the ſervice of the church (for his is a church party) in St. Stephen's chapel, as he does the conventicle every Lord's-day? Are not the Foleys, Winningtons, St. Johns, H—y of Weymouth, B—ſton, Ha—n, R—yb, and others of that leaven, members of this fraternity? It is methinks hard to ſay how a faction blended with ſuch a number of names noted for their inveteracy to the true Tory principles, can be called a Tory party? Nothing ſure, but mere neceſſity and want of men to ſerve ſome great deſign, could make them, who pretend to be genuine Tories, and conſequently muſt hate a comprehenſion, and love to keep their party pure and unmixed, herd with a ſet of men ſo odious to them. But upon ſecond thoughts the wonder will not ſeem ſo great: whatever differences might formerly have been between them, it will upon a fair examination now appear, that there is a great agreement in their principles, and that thoſe, who keep up their faction by retaining the name of Tories, and running down Whigs, have nothing but the bare name of their party, and are that very thing, which they run down. This will be very evident to any one who will but take a ſhort view of what they have done, and compare the loyalty of their behaviour with their loyal principles.

Formerly the Tory doctrine was, that the king was the breath of our noſtrils; that we failed in our allegiance to him, and deſerved not the name of loyal ſubjects, unleſs we valued his life more than our own, and would do all that lay in our power to preſerve him and his government, by ſhewing an inclination to deſtroy his enemies. Is this the temper and ſpirit of our preſent times? Are not ſir Edward Seymour, ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave, and forty more, at this very time members of the houſe of commons, and of this Tory party, who, when the conſpiracy againſt the king was diſcovered, and an army lay ready to invade us, refuſed the voluntary aſſociation, which was reckoned the beſt expedient to preſerve the king's life, and prevent the ruin of this kingdom? Formerly Tories reckoned it an act of duty and loyalty to repoſe an entire confidence in the king, and to deſire, that he might be gratified, as with every thing elſe, ſo particularly with ſuch an army as he deſired. And in the late reign, when the army conſiſted of nineteen thouſand men, and the king had no other occaſion for them but to terrify and afflict his own ſubjects, ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave was pleaſed to ſay in the houſe of commons, 'It was a deplorable thing, that the king ſhould have no better army.' Was it not that good old loyaliſt, and the men of that party principally, who reduced his preſent majeſty to the allowance of ſeven thouſand men, and were the cauſe of all the calamities that have been occaſioned by it? In the reign of king Charles II. when that gentleman had grants from the king, it would have ſeemed no leſs a prodigy in theſe kingdoms, to ſee a Tory houſe of commons offer to intermeddle with the king's grants, as they have done, and make it an article of impeachment againſt a great miniſter, to take a grant from the crown, than to ſee a church party, who have told us, that the king is Chriſt's vicegerent, and head of the church here upon earth, and that he has an uncontroulable right to diſpoſe, as he pleaſes, of thoſe fees, with which the crown has endowed the church, offer to deſtroy the king's right, by bringing in a bill to prevent the tranſlation of biſhops from one ſee to another. This bill deſigned no great favour to the king or the hierarchy; yet ſir John Packington, who brought it into the houſe, muſt be thought a loyaliſt and true ſon of the church, becauſe he tells churchmen that he is ſo. Though it was a bill for the better ſecuring the Proteſtant religion, yet there are but few Proteſtants, I believe, concerned, that it is adjourned (as the neceſſary methods for ſecuring our religion are) to another ſeſſion of parliament. If it be the next ſeſſion tacked to a money-bill (as the Jacobites ſay it will be) then we ſhall ſee the Proteſtant religion as well ſecured, as ſome people would have it, who now turn the methods of ſecuring it into jeſt and ridicule. I could heartily wiſh that there were no other inſtances but thoſe I have here mentioned, of the ill treatment, which both the monarchy and hierarchy have had from this loyal church party (as they would fain be reputed) whoſe practices of late have been the plain reverſe of what they formerly profeſſed. Have not they arraigned the king's power in making treaties, which was never diſputed in any former reign, no not by thoſe demagogues in the reign of king Charles I. whoſe memories and practices they pretend to hate? Have not they pulled down one principal pillar and ſupport of the monarchy, by creating a diſtruſt between the king and his people, by repreſenting men unfit for the ſervice of the public, and excluding them from having any thing to do in the election of their repreſentatives, who are in places of truſt under the king? Have they not deſtroyed our very conſtitution, and made our government plainly popular, under their ſole management and direction? Is it not a popular government, and a very intolerable one, where they have uſurped the power of the king and the lords, and broken in upon the rights of the people, by taking the execution and legiſlation upon themſelves, and puniſhing contrary to law? Have not they aſſumed the power of the king, both executive and legiſlative, when they are grown to that exorbitancy of power, that they expect he will do whatever they require of him, though it be to puniſh ſome, who have long toiled in the ſupport of his government, and turn out others from places of public truſt, who have appeared with a warm and extraordinary zeal in his and their country's ſervice; when they take upon them to cenſure and condemn what he does, though it be profitable to us and our friends, and his undoubted right and prerogative to do it; when, to prevent the miſchief and confuſion, in which his enemies would involve his kingdoms, he has been forced to give the royal aſſent, where he knew it would not only hurt many of his friends, but a very great number of his good and loyal ſubjects, and be of very ill conſequence to his affairs abroad? Have they not invaded and uſurped the power of the lords, by endeavouring to deſtroy their juriſdiction, by tying them to new rules and methods in their judicature, and forcing their aſſent to laws, by tacking of clauſes, and leaving with them, together with the bill, all the ill conſequences that ſhould attend the rejecting it; which is plainly threatening them with the wrath and reſentment of the nation, impoſed on and incenſed by them? Have they not been highly injurious to the people, and invaded their rights, by taking the execution of the laws upon them, which belongs not to their province, and impriſoning ſuch numbers of their fellow-commons, as they have done this ſeſſion? It muſt be very extraordinary aſſurance, that can make a party, which has not only thus arraigned the actions of his majeſty, and been a conſtant clog upon the wheels of this government, but has likewiſe uſurped his power, and brought in an arbitrary popular government, aſſume the name of loyaliſts, and call others turbulent ſeditious republicans. If we would judge right between the two contending parties, we ought to conſider their actions, and not the names and characters they themſelves aſſume or give one to another. If it be evident, that the Tories have been highly prejudiced againſt his majeſty's government; if they have uſurped upon the crown, and deprived it of many of its juſt rights; and the Whigs have borne a conſtant affection to the king, and endeavoured to continue him in poſſeſſion of all his rights and prerogatives: if, in ſettling the ſucceſſion in the Proteſtant line, Tories have not only diſcovered a perfect averſion to the act, and uſed artifices to elude it, but likewiſe framed that new bill of rights which was not contrived to recommend the crown, and make it amiable to the ſucceſſors; and the Whigs, on the other hand ſhewed themſelves both eager to have the crown ſettled, and unwilling to have ſuch a breach made in the prerogative; then it will be evident, that the Whigs loyalty is greater than the Tories; or that the object they have placed it upon, makes it more agreeable to us, and apter to promote our happineſs and tranquillity. If Tories be of thoſe loyal principles they boaſt of, and the object be the abdicated family; if it be this loyalty of their principles, and the regard they have to the intereſt of that family, that has made them uneaſy to the king, and downright republicans under his government, true Engliſhmen will find but little reaſon, as things now ſtand, to admire their principles, or run into their party. The caſe in ſhort is thus: To this loyal Tory party (as they would be eſteemed) we find all thoſe attached, whoſe principles imbibed in the late reigns make them firmly adhere to the intereſt of king James. Here we find all thoſe in a manner, who were againſt the abdication, and recognition, who would not allow his preſent majeſty to be rightful king, and refuſed to enter into the aſſociation to preſerve him and his government. In this party are all thoſe likewiſe, whom either the love of money, or of the St. Germain family, or popery, has reconciled to the French intereſt. It is moſt certain, that there is not a man in the houſe engaged in any of theſe intereſts, who is not one of this party; and as certain it is, that all the papiſts, friends of king James and the French king, without doors, applaud their proceedings, and own, that they are fairly repreſented by them. From this account then it will appear, that the parties are truly and properly to be diſtinguiſhed into thoſe, who are for the Jacobite or French intereſt (for it is impoſſible to ſeparate them) and thoſe who are for our preſent ſettlement, or the true intereſt of England.'

The author having made theſe remarks in his preface, begins his diſcourſe with obſerving, that England has moſt reaſon of all other countries, to be apprehenſive of the growing power of France, 'when we conſider our ſituation, the affairs of commerce and religion, and the intereſt not only of the abdicated family, but of their great protector likewiſe, among us:' That theſe apprehenſions were the ground of the diſcontents and reſentments expreſſed by the people againſt their repreſentatives in the houſe of commons, from a ſuſpicion of a much greater inclination in that houſe to continue than to deſtroy the union of power by the ſettlement of France and Spain in one family, and that they gave occaſion to the Kentiſh petition; the preſenters of which being impriſoned by the houſe of commons, he inquires into theſe three points: I. 'What power that houſe has to impriſon: II. The ſubjects right of petitioning: III. What reaſon the gentlemen, juſtices of the peace, and grand jury of the county of Kent had to offer that petition, when they did.' With regard to the firſt point, he obſerves, that the repreſentatives of the people have no power above law; that the liberty of the people is taken care of by both common and ſtatute law; the former abhorring impriſonment, and never allowing it, unleſs when men have been guilty of force, and rendered themſelves enemies to the community; and the latter having frequently injoined, that it ſhall not be inflicted, unleſs by indictment, or ſuch due proceſs as the law requires. He affirms, that the power aſſumed by the houſe of commons was an invaſion of the legal rights of the people; and that the power of that houſe to impriſon extends only to their own members. As to the ſecond point, he ſhews, that the ſubjects right of petitioning is agreeable to nature, and confirmed by the ſtatute law of the land, and juſtified by the votes of the houſe of commons in 1685. With regard to the laſt point, he obſerves, that the reaſons, which the Kentiſh gentlemen had to petition, were the increaſing greatneſs of France, and the breaches which had been made in the proteſtant religion, ſince the beginning of the laſt age, with juſt ſuſpicions, that French gold had an influence on the management of public affairs.

[1] The letter was as follows:

Mr. Speaker,

'The incloſed memorial you are charged with, in behalf of many thouſands of the good people of England.

'There is neither 'Popiſh, Jacobite, ſeditious, court or party-intereſt' concerned in it; but honeſty and truth.

'You are commanded by two hundred thouſand Engliſhmen, to deliver it to the H—— of C——s, and to inform them that it is no banter, but ſerious truth; and a ſerious regard to it is expected; nothing but juſtice and their duty is required, and it is required by them, who have both a right to require, and power to compel, viz. the people of England.

'We could have come to the houſe ſtrong enough to oblige them to hear us, but we have avoided any tumult, not deſiring to embroil, but to ſave our native country.

'If you refuſe to communicate it to them, you will find cauſe in a ſhort time to repent it.'

funds, without transferring the deficiency of the former, is a horrible cheat on the ſubjects, who lent the money, a breach of public faith, and deſtructive to the honour and credit of parliaments. II. To impriſon men, who are not of your own members, by no proceedings but a vote of your own houſe, and to continue them in cuſtody 'ſine die,' is illegal, a notorious breach of the liberty of the people, ſetting up a diſpenſing power in the houſe of commons, which your fathers never pretended to; bidding defiance to the 'Habeas Corpus' act, which is the bulwark of perſonal liberty; deſtructive of the laws; and betraying the truſt repoſed in you; the king being at the ſame time obliged to aſk you leave to continue in cuſtody the horrid aſſaſſinators of his perſon. III. Committing to cuſtody thoſe gentlemen, who, at the command of the people (whoſe ſervants you are) came in a peaceable way to put you in mind of your duty, is illegal and injurious: deſtructive of the ſubjects liberty of petitioning for redreſs of grievances, which has by all parliaments before you been acknowledged to be their undoubted right.' After enumerating twelve other particulars [k], the memorial proceeds to a claim of right under ſeven heads, of which the three former run thus: 'We do hereby claim and declare, I. That it is the undoubted right of the people of England, in caſe their repreſentatives in parliament do not proceed according to their duty and the people's intereſt, to inform them of their diſlike, diſown their actions, and to direct them to ſuch things, as they think fit, either by petition, addreſs, propoſal, memorial, or any other peaceable way. II. That the houſe of commons ſeparately, and otherwiſe than by bill legally paſſed into an act, have no legal power to ſuſpend or diſpenſe with the laws of the land, any more than the king has by his prerogative. III. That the houſe of commons have no legal power to impriſon any perſon, or commit him to cuſtody of ſerjeants, or otherwiſe (their own members excepted) but ought to addreſs the king to cauſe any perſon, on good ground, to be apprehended; which perſon, ſo apprehended, out to have the benefit of the 'Habeas Corpus' Act, and be fairly brought to a trial by due courſe of law.' After other claims [l] it concludes, 'Thus, gentlemen, you have your duty laid before you, which it is hoped you will think of. But if you continue to neglect it, you may expect to be treated according to the reſentments of an injured nation; for Engliſhmen are no more to be ſlaves to parliaments than to kings. Our name is Legion, and we are many.'

The commons were extremely incenſed at this memorial, but could not deſcend to a particular cenſure of it. It was thought ſufficient, that a complaint was made to the houſe, of endeavours to raiſe tumults and ſeditions, in order to diſturb the public affairs; and a committee was appointed to draw up an addreſs to be preſented to his majeſty, humbly to lay before him the endeavours of ſeveral ill diſpoſed perſons, to raiſe tumults and ſeditions in the kingdom, and humbly beſeech him, that he would provide for the public peace and ſecurity.

But the Kentiſh gentlemen, who lay in priſon till the prorogation of the parliament, were much viſited and treated as confeſſors; for a deſign had been laid to get addreſſes of the ſame nature with theirs from all parts of England, and eſpecially from the city of London. The miniſters repreſented to the king, what an indignity this would be to the houſe of commons; and that, if he did not diſcourage it, he might look for unacceptable things from them; and that it might rather diſcourage than give heart to his Allies, if they ſhould ſee ſuch a disjointing, and both city and country in an oppoſition to the houſe of commons. Some went in his majeſty's name to the eminent men of the city, to divert it; yet with all this it came ſo near, for ſuch an addreſs in common council, that the lord mayor's vote turned it for the negative.

As, by theſe proceedings, a diſpoſition to a war, and to a more hearty concurrence with the king, appeared to be the general ſenſe of the nation, it had a great effect on the houſe of commons, and drew from them the addreſs beforementioned. Whereby they deſired the king to enter into ſuch alliances with the emperor and other ſtates, as were neceſſary for the ſupport of us and our allies, and to bring down the exorbitant power of France. It is true, this was oppoſed with great zeal by thoſe, who were looked upon as the chief conductors of the jacobite party; but many, who had in other things gone along with them, thought this was the only means left to recover their credit with the people; for the current ran ſo ſtrong for a war, that thoſe who ſtruggled againſt it, were conſidered as little better than public enemies. The commons alſo were from hence induced to ſettle good funds for a million and a half. Indeed, one of theſe funds was very unacceptable to the king; it was obſerved that the allotment for the civil liſt did far exceed the ſum that was deſigned, which was only 600,000l. and that, as king James's queen would not take her jointure, ſo, by the duke of Glouceſter's death, the charge on it was now leſs than when it was granted; ſo they took 3700l. a week out of the exciſe, and, upon an aſſignation made of that for ſome years, a great ſum was raiſed: This was very ungrateful to the court, and the new miniſters found it no eaſy thing to maintain, at the ſame time, their intereſt with the king and their party.

There was alſo a very good act paſſed this ſeſſion concerning the privilege of parliament. Peers had, by law, a cuſtom and privilege for themſelves and their ſervants, during the ſeſſion, and at leaſt twenty days before and after. Of late they had reckoned forty days before and after, in which neither they nor their ſervants could be ſued in any court, unleſs for treaſon, felony, or breach of the peace. The houſe of commons had alſo poſſeſſed themſelves of the ſame privilege, but with this difference, that the lords pretended theirs was a right, not ſubject to the order of the houſe of lords; whereas the commons held, that their privilege was ſubject to the authority of their houſe. Of late years ſeſſions were long, and continued by intermediate prorogations, ſo that the whole year round was a time of privilege. This made a great obſtruction in the courſe of juſtice, and none who were ſo protected could be ſued for debt. The abuſe was carried farther by the protections which ſome lords gave, or rather ſold to perſons who were no way concerned in their affairs; but, when they needed this ſhelter, they had a pretended office given

[k] Theſe were:

'VI. Proſecuting the crime of bribery in ſome to ſerve a party, and then proceed no further, tho' proof lay before you, is partial and unjuſt, and a ſcandal upon the honour of parliaments.

'VII. Voting the treaty of Partition fatal to Europe, becauſe it gave ſo much of the Spaniſh dominions to the French, and not concern yourſelves to prevent their taking poſſeſſion of it all. Deſerting the Dutch, when the French are at their doors, till it be almoſt too late to help them, is unjuſt to our treaties, and unkind to our confederates, diſhonourable to the Engliſh nation, and ſhews you very negligent of the ſafety of England, and of our proteſtant neighbours.

'VIII. Ordering immediate hearings to trifling petitions, to pleaſe parties in elections; and poſtpone the petition of a widow, for the blood of her murdered daughter, without giving it a reading, is an illegal delay of juſtice, diſhonourable to the public juſtice of the nation.

'IX. Addreſſing the king to diſplace his friends upon bare ſurmiſes, before the legal trial or article proved, is illegal, and inverting the law, and making execution go before judgment, contrary to the true ſenſe of the law, which eſteems every man a good man, till ſomething appears to the contrary.

'X. Delaying proceedings upon capital impeachments, to blaſt the reputation of the perſons, without proving the fact, is illegal and oppreſſive, deſtructive to the liberty of Engliſhmen, a delay of juſtice, and a reproach of parliaments.

'XI. Suffering ſaucy and indecent reproaches upon his majeſty's perſon to be publicly made in your houſe, particularly that impudent ſcandal of parliaments, J—n H—w, without ſhewing ſuch reſentments as you ought to do, the ſaid J—n H—w ſaying openly, 'That his majeſty had made a felonious treaty to rob his neighbours;' inſinuating, 'That the Partition treaty' (which was every way as juſt as blowing up one man's houſe to ſave another's) 'was a combination of the king to rob the crown of Spain of its due.' This is making a Billingſgate of the houſe, and ſetting up to bully your ſovereign, contrary to the intent and meaning of the freedom of ſpeech, which you claim as a right, is ſcandalous to parliaments, undutiful and unmannerly, and a reproach to the whole nation.

'XII. Your S—r exacting the exorbitant rate of 10l. per diem for the V—s, and giving the printer encouragement to raiſe it on the people, by ſelling them at 4d. per ſheet, is an illegal and arbitrary exaction, diſhonourable to the houſe, and burthenſome to the people.

'XIII. Neglecting to pay the nation's debts, compounding for intereſt, and poſtponing petitions, is illegal, diſhonourable, and deſtructive of the public faith.

'XIV. Public neglecting the great work of reformation of manners, though often preſſed to it by the king, to the great diſhonour of God, and encouragement of vice, is a neglect of your duty, and an abuſe of the truſt repoſed in you by God, his majeſty, and the people.

XV. Being ſcandalouſly vicious yourſelves, both in your minds and religion, lewd in life, and erroneous in doctrine, having public blaſphemers, and impudent deniers of our Saviour's divinity among you, and ſuffering them unreproved and unpuniſhed, to the infinite regret of all good chriſtians, and the juſt abhorrence of the whole nation.'

[l] A fourth claim was: 'That if the houſe of commons, in breach of the laws and liberties of the people, do betray the truſt repoſed in them, and act negligently, or arbitrarily, and illegally, it is the undoubted right of the people of England to call them to an account for the ſame, and by convention, aſſembly, or force, may proceed againſt them, as traitors and betrayers of their country.' Then they demanded in the name of themſelves and all the people of England;

'1. That all the public juſt debts of the nation be forthwith paid and diſcharged.

'2. That all perſons illegally impriſoned, as aforeſaid, be either immediately diſcharged, or admitted to bail, as by law they ought to be; and the liberty of the ſubject recognized and reſtored.

'3. That J—n H—w aforeſaid be obliged to aſk his majeſty's pardon for his vile reflections, or be immediately expelled the houſe.

'4. That the growing power of France be taken into conſideration, the them, that was a bar to all arrests. After many fruitless attempts to regulate these abuses, a bill was brought into the house of commons, that took away all privilege against legal prosecutions in intermediate prorogations, and did so regulate it during the sitting of parliament, that an effectual remedy was provided for a grievance, that had been long and much complained of. These were the only popular things that were done by this parliament, the rest of their proceedings shewed both the madness and fury of parties.

The misunderstanding between the two houses was so great, that there was hardly any public bill passed without amendments and conferences. The last contest was about a bill sent up by the commons, for appointing commissioners to examine and state the public accounts. To this bill the lords having made some amendments, the commons refused to consent to them, insinuating in their reasons, that there had been immense sums of the public money imbezzled by those that had the management of it. 'Many millions (say they) have been given to his majesty by the commons, for the service of the public, which remain yet unaccounted for [m].' To interrupt these disputes, the king, without taking any notice of them thought proper to put an end to the session of parliament on the 24th of June, when he made the following speech to both houses:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"THE session being now come to a conclusion, I must return you my hearty thanks for the great zeal you have expressed for the public service, and your ready compliance with those things, which I recommended to you at the opening of this parliament. And I must thank you, gentlemen of the house of commons, in particular, both for your dispatch of those necessary supplies, which you have granted for the public occasions, and for the encouragements you have given me to enter into alliances for the preservation of the liberty of Europe, and the support of the confederacy; in which, as it shall be my care, not to put the nation to any unnecessary expence; so I make no doubt, that whatsoever shall be done during your recess, for the advantage of the common cause in this matter, will have your approbation at our meeting in the winter.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I shall conclude with recommending to you all the discharge of your duties in your respective counties, that the peace of the kingdom may be secured by your vigilance and care in your several stations."

Then the lord-keeper, by his majesty's command, prorogued the parliament to Thursday the 7th of August.

Thus ended the session of parliament, which had the worst aspect of any that had sate during this reign. The new ministers pressed the king to turn out some of the whigs who were in employments, the lord Haversham in particular, who was in the Admiralty: But the king could not be prevailed with to do any thing; yet he kept himself so much on the reserve, that, when he went out of England, it was not certainly known, whether he intended to dissolve the parliament or not. The state of the king's health very ill consisted with his uneasiness at the opposition to his measures at home, and his concern for the success of his negociations abroad. He was thought to conceal his ill opinion of his own decaying constitution, even from his most favoured confidents, to prevent its taking air, which would have been fatal in the forming the intended confederacy, the princes entirely depending on his wisdom, courage, and zeal for the common cause. To provide against accidents, he gave the command of the troops that were ordered to Holland (making in all ten thousand men) to the earl of Marlborough, and appointed him to be plenipotentiary to the States-General, as knowing him to be equally qualified for council and action. On the 28th of June, the king nominated, to be justices in his absence, the archbishop of Canterbury, sir Nathan Wright lord-keeper, the earl of Pembroke, first commissioner of the admiralty, the duke of Devonshire, the earl of Jersey, and the lord Godolphin. Three days after, the gentlemen who were imprisoned for delivering the Kentish petition, being discharged of course at the end of the session, were splendidly entertained at Mercers-Hall, at the charge of the citizens, being accompanied by several of the nobility and gentlemen of the first rank. They were likewise very honourably received, upon their return into their own country.

This year died suddenly Henry Howard duke of Norfolk, who had been educated a papist, but leaving the church of Rome about the time of the Popish plot, continued to his death firm to the church of England, and had been a zealous promoter of the revolution. His place of earl-marshal was conferred on the earl of Carlisle, during the minority of his nephew, the lord Thomas Howard's eldest son (who succeeded the duke in his honour and estate) if at the age of eighteen he should conform to the church of England.

On Tuesday the first of July, the king embarked at Margate, and on the Thursday following arrived in the Maese, and went that night to the Hague. The next day he received the compliments of the embassadors and other foreign ministers, and of the courts of justice, and council of Brabrant; and in the afternoon went to the assembly of the States General, to whom he addressed himself in this manner:

High and Mighty Lords,

"I ALWAYS come into this country with joy, but more especially in this dangerous conjuncture of affairs, because I foresee my presence will be necessary for the service succession of the emperor to the crown of Spain supported, our protestant neighbours protected, as the true interest of England and the protestant religion require.

'5. That the French king be obliged to quit Flanders, or that his majesty be addressed to declare war against him.

'6. That suitable supplies be granted to his majesty for the putting all those necessary things in execution, and that care be taken that such taxes as are raised be more equally assessed and collected, and scandalous deficiencies prevented.

'7. That the thanks of the house may be given to those gentlemen, who so gallantly appeared in the behalf of their country with the Kentish petition, and have been so scandalously used for it.'

[m] The proceedings of the house of commons in this bill are vindicated by Dr. Drake, in his 'History of the last parliament begun at Westminster the 10th day of February 1701.' But on the other side were published, 'Some remarks on that bill, and on the proceedings thereon in both houses, printed in 1701, and inserted in the 'third Volume of the State tracts during the reign of king William.' The writer of these remarks first considers the six several acts for constituting such commissioners since the revolution, and what had been done by them; and then shews, how it was managed to lay the loss of the last bill upon the house of lords, and the reasons why the lords might not be willing to agree to that bill; and signifies the several amendments which they made in it. He observes likewise, that the lords might determine upon the characters of the commissioners named by the commons, as well as upon their business. 'Suppose then, says he, that one was known to have no estate to subsist on, and therefore could not afford to serve for nothing: Another to be too fond of his practice, to sacrifice it all to the public without a prospect of advantage: Another to have too much value for his wit, to venture the dulling the edge of it upon hard and crabbed accounts. Suppose that some lords knew the story of a certain gentleman's getting, by great solicitation, a pretended security of 10,000l. from his friend, when there was not sixpence due to him, nor he worth 100l. in the world, in order by that deceit to procure himself a wife. Suppose that other lords might think it ominous to see a new bill of accounts with a certain gentleman's name in it, and presently apprehend another assassinating year; and remember, who refused to act in the former commission, after Charnock's conspiracy was discovered, and subscribing the association made necessary to qualify him for acting. Suppose it to be known, that none of these commissioners were eminent for skill in accounts; might not these, or other better reasons, move the lords to dislike the bill for the sake of the commissioners?' The author remarks likewise, that the commissioners appointed in 1700 had stated the whole expence of the late war to amount to forty-one millions; 'in which, says he, they sufficiently exposed one of the commissioners named in that part of the bill, which was disagreed to by the lords; Dr. Davenant, who had before in print pretended, that, upon a nice calculation, the expence amounted to upwards of sixty millions. A mistake of nineteen millions is no small one, if men are so charitable to call it a mistake. But, whether this was his ignorance, or his ill meaning, either of them was a good ground for the lords not to agree to such a man's being intrusted as a commissioner to take this account again.' He afterwards takes notice, that all that part of the bill which related to the commissioners for stating the debts of the army, navy, and transport-ships, which was indeed the whole act that passed the preceding year, was passed by the lords without alterations; 'and therefore, if any public or private inconvenience should arise by the not continuing of that law, the blame will in no sort fall upon the lords, who passed it as it came to them, and returned the bill to the commons with all possible expedition. It was sent up to the lords on the 18th, and ordered to be returned to the house of commons on the 23d of June.' He then represents the unparliamentary proceedings of the commons upon the lords amendments. 'If, says he, the house of commons remained unsatisfied with any of the lords amendments, the known and only parliamentary method to set such a matter right was by desiring a conference, at which they might offer their reasons to the lords for disagreeing to their amendments, in order to convince them of the reasonableness of quitting them. To leave this method is to decline all parliamentary correspondence; for the two houses, after any difference in opinion, can never be brought to be of a mind (though both should be desirous to agree) unless by conferences. It cannot be denied, but the commons had time enough to have delivered their reasons to the Lords, to incline them to wave their amendments, if they had been pleased to take that natural course. But, instead of desiring a conference, and offering their reasons there, a vote without a precedent, was made, to print their reasons; which was offering them to the people, instead of offering them to the lords. Well-meaning men may be puzzled to think what construction ought to be put on this proceeding. The reasons, when printed, might have an effect on people without doors, but could not possibly have an effect towards passing the bill; suppose them to be strong enough to satisfy every individual lord, that he ought to wave the amendments; yet, for want of their being proposed at a conference, the lords could not, by the methods of parliament, desist from the amendments. If it should be said, that some men had less regard to the passing the bill, than to get a point of popularity at that time, it would not be easy to give a solid answer to such a reflection.'

of the State. I was in hopes, and desired to have passed the rest of my days in repose and peace; and, after the end of my days, to have left this state in a quiet and flourishing condition. To which end I have always laboured, particularly after the conclusion of the last peace. But since there have happened such great alterations in the affairs of Europe, that we know not what will be the disposal of Divine Providence concerning them. Nevertheless I can assure your High Mightinesses, that, whether affairs may be accommodated without coming to further embroilments, or whether we must be obliged to take arms again, I persist in the same affection and the same zeal, which I ever had for the service and prosperity of these provinces; and will contribute, as far as lies in my power, whatever may tend to advance the welfare of this State, the maintenance of their liberties and religion, and their particular security, as well as that of Europe. I am overjoyed to find all things still in a quiet condition; which, next to the blessing of the Almighty, must be ascribed to the speedy and unanimous resolution of your High Mightinesses, to put yourselves in a posture of defence. I am persuaded, that the respective Confederates will contribute strenuously towards it; which I look upon as the only means to prevent a war; or, in case of a rupture, to defend the State from the danger that threatens it. It is a great satisfaction to me, that I can assure your High Mightinesses, not only of my affection, but of the whole English nation; and that they are ready to assist this State, and strongly to contribute towards their defence, and to whatever may tend to the common security: and this is what your High Mightinesses may be fully convinced of. I hope the great God will bless the means which you have made use of, either by way of negociation, or by force of arms, in case of a rupture, to attain the end proposed; that is to say, reasonable security for the common cause, and particularly the preservation of this State in their liberties and religion. There is nothing which I wish with more fervency; and I will contribute towards it whatever lies in my power. This is what I thought necessary to say at present; only that I desire the continuance of your High Mightinesses affection and amity."

To this the States-General returned an answer to this effect: 'That they thanked his majesty with all their hearts for the honour he had done them to come again into their assembly; and at the same time time testified their inexpressible joy to see his happy arrival. That they were sensible how much his majesty's presence was necessary among them, in such a difficult conjuncture, to settle affairs in a good condition, and so to preserve them, with the assistance of God, out of the great confidence which they all had, from the highest to the lowest, in his majesty's prudence and extraordinary abilities. That they were extremely obliged to his majesty, and most heartily thanked him for his persevering in his kind inclinations for their repose and tranquillity. That they were fully convinced, that, since the last treaty of peace, his majesty's care and application had tended to the preservation of the said peace and the public tranquillity. That they were overjoyed, that their conduct, since the strange mutations in general affairs, had met with his majesty's approbation. And in regard the State was was in so much danger, that their religion and liberties lay at stake, they were resolved to use all possible means for the preservation of those inestimable pledges. That they could not omit to thank his majesty for his assurances, not only in his own, but in the name of the English nation, in favour of themselves and the common cause, well knowing, how much they might rely upon a people, whose courage and valour had gained so much reputation in the world. That they were always of opinion, that their interests were inseparable from those of England. In the mean time, they most ardently besought the Almighty to bless his majesty and his councils, and to grant him long life, health, and strength, that he might be able to continue his cares for the public good and the welfare of his own kingdoms and their States; assuring him of their perseverance in that amity and high esteem, which they have always had, and ever shall be bound to have of his majesty, so long as their State endures.'

After this, the king went to view the frontier garrisons, and, returning to the Hague, found, that count d'Avaux had delivered a letter from the French king to the States, accompanied with a memorial of his own, to notify his being recalled home. The letter was as follows:

"Most Dear Great Friends, Allies, and Confederates,

"WE have thought fit to recall the count d'Avaux, our embassador extraordinary to you, seeing the little fruit those conferences have produced, which you desired of us; and which you have since often interrupted. We are not the less inclined to the establishing of the peace, as he will further declare his intentions to you before his departure. Nothing remains for us but to assure you, that it still depends on you to receive marks of our ancient friendship for your republic, and of our desire to give you proofs thereof upon all occasions. So we pray God, that he may have you, most dear great friends, allies, and confederates, in his holy keeping. Given at Versailles, the 18th of July 1701."

Your Good Friend, Ally, and Confederate,

LEWIS.

Colbert.

The memorial, which accompanied this letter, contained in substance. "That his excellency was in hopes, that their lordships would have had that confidence in his master's affection and his desires of peace, that would have dissipated those vain fears, which the advancement of his grandson to the throne of Spain had infused into them, and that he should return to the king, his master, with the satisfaction of having been employed in preventing the new troubles that threatened Europe. Which hope was confirmed, when, by their acknowledging the lawful rights of the king of Spain, they wrote to congratulate him, and seemed thereby to disown the injustice of foreign pretensions, whatever they might persist in demanding for themselves; so that all things seemed to be in a fair way towards settling of peace, when the proposals made by your High Mightinesses and the king of England's envoy gave occasion to judge, that war rather than peace would be the fruit of that strict union, which the conformity of proposals denoted between that prince and your High Mightinesses. They protested, that their excessive demands were the effects of a just fear, grounded on the king's power. But if that fear, so lively expressed in their letter to the king of Great Britain, during the sitting of the parliament, were real, and that they had no other end in representing them than to prevent them, the means of doing it were in their own hands; there was no need of making all those preparations for the greatest war. That their lordships had desired the conferences, and it depended upon them to render them useful. But their lordships had again delayed the conclusion of them, by demanding the admission of the king of England's envoy into the conferences. Which, if he opposed for some time, it was out of his sincere desire to remove all obstacles, which the enemies to peace are continually laying in the way. Nor did his majesty believe their lordships would so easily have insisted upon the pretended satisfaction to be given to the emperor, confounding the interests of other princes with their own, and set themselves up for arbitrators between the houses of France and Austria; that so wise a republic should, in favour of the house of Austria against France, resolve to break these treaties, which they had looked upon as the confirmation and seal of their sovereignty; that they should engage themselves, at the expence of their provinces, their countries, and their wealth, to support foreign interests, when, a little before, they had acted quite the contrary, by acknowledging the king of Spain.

"That his excellency should abuse his master, should he write to him, that any success was to be expected from the conferences. That his master had too discerning a judgment, after the king of Great Britain's envoy had declared, that his master would never depart from the interest of the emperor; that he would not enter into any proposals of accommodation, unless satisfaction were given to that prince; that the ties between their lordships and the king of Great Britain were too strict, and had too well made known their blind submission to the sentiments of that monarch, and no doubt that they had already taken a resolution to make the same declaration to the most Christian king's embassador. Indeed they had done it already beforehand, by declaring, 'That the commissioners should not continue the conference without the intervention of the English envoy;' so that, if he should exclude himself, the conferences were suspended; and therefore it would be to no purpose for the most Christian king's embassador, sent only for the sake of those conferences, to continue any longer at the Hague; where, if he has not the satisfaction to fulfil his majesty's intentions in establishing a durable peace between him and the United Provinces, yet it will be some consolation to him, that he had made known his majesty's desire to contribute whatever depends on him, to prevent a rupture of the public peace. That he has taken arms in the defence of his grandson only; and that, if it had been been his deſign to make new conqueſts, he might have done it, when his forces, upon the frontiers of their republic, afforded him the means to have made his advantage of their weakneſs. He concluded with wiſhing, that their lordſhips, convinced by his majeſty's conduct of the ſincerity of his intentions, would, while it was yet time, take ſuch reſolutions, as might be conformable to their true intereſts."

To this memorial the States-General returned an anſwer, which was to this effect:

'That they were obliged to the moſt Chriſtian king, for ſending hither the count d'Avaux as his embaſſador extraordinary. They wiſhed, that ſufficient means might have been found in the conference, to have obtained a general peace, and reaſonable ſecurity for themſelves, and that he had tarried till that had been done. They were troubled, that he ſhould be recalled before thoſe things were effected; and ſo much the more, that the cauſe of it ſhould be imputed to their conduct. That, upon his moſt Chriſtian majeſty's ſignifying to them, that he accepted the will of the late king of Spain inſtead of the treaty of Partition, they gave him their reaſons, why they could not come to a ſpeedier reſolution in that affair; and, as ſoon as their conſtitution would allow it, they offered to enter into a conference with any that his majeſty ſhould think fit to appoint. That they appointed deputies accordingly to treat with the count d'Avaux, and, in compliance with his majeſty, owned the new king of Spain, that they might remove all occaſions of delays, and give a convincing proof of their deſire to preſerve the grand peace. They cannot apprehend, how they ſhould obſtruct the ſame by the intervention of the king of Great Britain, who was one of thoſe concerned in the treaty of Partition; or by the intervention of any other potentate, who has an intereſt in preſerving the general peace. That they had not thereby owned the juſtice or injuſtice of the pretenſions of a third party, nor ſeparated their intereſts from any, who are concerned in the general peace. That, ſince his majeſty's miniſters had repreſented to them, that the end of the treaty of Partition might be as well attained by the acceptation of the will, the count d'Avaux might make propoſals for the general peace, and their particular ſecurity; and, he excuſing himſelf, and deſiring propoſals from them, they had, in concert with his majeſty of Great-Britain, delivered him propoſals. They cannot comprehend, why the effect of that union betwixt them and the ſaid king ſhould be rather war than peace, ſince his majeſty of Great-Britain has, on all occaſions, given ſufficient proofs of his inclinations to peace. That they were ſtrictly united with him by alliances, many years ago, for their mutual ſecurity. That he was one of the chiefeſt parties in the treaty of Partition; and that they declared, before their propoſals were communicated, that they thought his conſent neceſſary, as well for thoſe reaſons, as for his private relation to their republic; and no objection was then raiſed againſt it. They were ſorry to ſee the king of France had returned no anſwer to their propoſals; which though they had heard to be called exceſſive, no body had undertaken to prove them ſuch. That the general peace could not be preſerved without ſatisfaction to the emperor, whoſe pretenſions were ſo far owned by the king of France himſelf in the treaty of Partition, that it was agreed how the ſame ſhould be ſatisfied. That therefore there was nothing in this article of their propoſal, that could be called exceſſive; and what they had demanded for their own ſecurity, was not equal to what they had before the death of the late king of Spain, or to what they had acquired by the treaty of Partition. That their forces were not grounded alone on their own private ſentiments, but on the opinion of their allies, who had not ſcrupled to ſend them the aſſiſtance they were obliged to by their alliances. That, had it been in their power to extricate themſelves out of their difficulties, without arming, ſeeking new alliances, and drowning their country, they would certainly have done it. That the difficulties raiſed about admitting the Engliſh envoy was not from them, but from the count d'Avaux, and not chargeable upon them for the reaſons before mentioned. That the king of France had reaſon to think they would inſiſt on ſatisfaction to the emperor, ſeeing that was the firſt of their propoſals, which the king of France himſelf thought juſt and neceſſary. That they had given no cauſe to think, that they preſumed to ſet up as umpires betwixt France and Auſtria, or to determine, which of the two laſt kings of Spain had a right to alter the laws of the ſucceſſion to that crown; but deſired his majeſty to remember, that, he himſelf, as well as the king of Great Britain and the States, thought a war would be unavoidable, if, upon the death of the late king of Spain, either he or the emperor ſhould inſiſt upon the pretenſions of their families to the ſucceſſion; and therefore they entered into the treaty of Partition. That their owning the king of Spain could not be judged to be a ſtep contrary to this, ſince it did not hinder giving reaſonable ſatisfaction to the emperor: And the king of France ought to be convinced, that they would do nothing to the detriment of their provinces, commerce, or riches, but what was abſolutely neceſſary to their preſervation. They had done nothing, that could be conſtrued a breach of the treaties, which confirmed and ſealed their ſovereignty, and did not well apprehend the meaning of that aſſertion: Their provinces were always free and ſovereign: Their anceſtors ſpent their lives and fortunes to aſſert their freedom; and they reſolved to do the like. They were ſorry to hear, that the count d'Avaux expected no ſucceſs from the conferences, becauſe of the Engliſh envoy's declaring, that ſatisfaction muſt be given to the emperor. They owned, that the king of Great Britain and themſelves thought it reaſonable to treat of ſatisfaction to that prince; and that the emperor ſhould, in order thereunto, be invited into the negotiation. That the States did not blindly follow the king of Great Britain's ſentiments, but had a great deference for his advice, becauſe they were perſuaded, that he was wholly inclined to preſerve peace, and convinced, that he ſought nothing but the welfare of their republic. That, if the conferences were ſuſpended upon that account, they ſhould look upon it as a great misfortune: But, if the king of France had thought fit to let them continue, and to allow ſatisfaction to the emperor, they had hopes of a good concluſion. That they had been obliged indeed to arm, but did not begin to do it, till they ſaw their barriers in the Spaniſh Netherlands, that coſt them ſo much blood and treaſure, poſſeſſed by French troops, their own forces detained, and great preparations of war made there. That their jealouſy was beſides conſiderably increaſed by the ſtrict union, that appeared every day between France and Spain, though the treaty of Partition was made for this, among other reaſons, to prevent jealouſies from the union of too many States. That they had endeavoured, by all poſſible means, to preſerve friendſhip; but, if they muſt contrary to their own inclination, enter into a war, they have no cauſe to blame themſelves for it, and therefore hoped, that God would protect them.'

Thus all the pretenſions of the French, to give the States a reaſonable ſecurity, went off with the count d'Avaux; who yet was willing to retire without any open breach, and therefore took his leave of the States in very obliging terms, accepted from them the preſent of a gold chain and medal, and left his ſecretary behind, under colour of renewing the negotiations, when he had made a report of them to his maſter. But the States underſtood the artful receſs of the embaſſador, and therefore daily augmented their army with the troops arrived from Ireland, and with other auxiliary forces, and were indefatigably at work on the fortifications of their frontiers.

An alliance was now formed between the kings of Great Britain, and Denmark, and the States General [n]. Great pains were likewiſe taken to mediate a peace between Sweden and Poland. The court of France, as well as that of Vienna, tried it; both ſides hoping, that Sweden, if not Poland, might enter into their intereſts. The French reckoned, that Denmark and Sweden could never [n] It was ſigned at Copenhagen, the 15th of June, 1701, and the chief articles were:

7. The king of Great Britain and the States-General promiſe to pay to the king of Denmark three hundred thouſand crowns a year, during the war.

8. The king of Great Britain promiſes to pay the arrears, due on the convention in 1689, to the ſeven thouſand Danes.

10. The king of Denmark ſhall ſend three thouſand horſe, one thouſand dragoons, and eight thouſand foot to the aſſiſtance of the king of Great Britain and the States-General, immediately after the treaty is ſigned; and they ſhall take the oath to the king and the States, as the ſeven thouſand did, to the king. The king and the States ſhall pay levy money, for an horſeman eighty crowns, a dragoon ſixty, and a foot-man thirty; one half as ſoon as the troops are marching, and the other, when they are arrived on the frontiers. Their pay ſhall be the ſame as that of the States, and be diſtributed by the Daniſh commiſſaries, to commence from the day of their march.

11. If a regiment or company happen to be ruined, the king and the States are to recruit them, and to reſtore them to the ſame condition they were in before; and the recruit money is to be paid to the Daniſh officers at the end of the campaign.

12. If the king of Denmark ſhould be in any wiſe attacked, the king of England and the States-General ſhall ſend his forces back with ſpeed, giving them one month's pay; and the like ſum, when they ſhall be ſent home after the peace; and they ſhall ſend the king of Denmark the ſuccours agreed on by the ſecret article of the treaty in 1690.

13. Succours may be demanded by any of the parties, if he is attacked by force be on the ſame ſide; and therefore, when they found they could not gain Denmark, they tried a mediation, hoping to get Sweden into an alliance with them; but all attempts for a mediation proved unſucceſsful. The dyet of Poland was ſuſpended, and their king, being delivered from them, reſolved to carry on the war. The Spaniards, and the ſubjects of their other dominions, began to feel the inſolence of the French very ſenſibly; but nothing was more uneaſy to them than the new regulations which they were endeavouring to bring in, to leſſen the expence of the court of Spain. The grandees were little conſidered, and they ſaw great deſigns, for the better conduct of the revenues of the crown, likely to take place every where, which were very unacceptable to them, who minded nothing ſo much as to keep up a vaſt magnificence, at the king's coſt. They ſaw themſelves much deſpiſed by their new maſters, as there was indeed great cauſe for it; ſo that they ſeemed well diſpoſed to entertain a new pretender[o].

The emperor's army was now got into Italy. The entrance towards Verona was ſtopped by the French; but prince Eugene entered by Vicenza; and, when the reinforcements and artillery came up to him, he made a feint of paſſing the Po near Ferrara; and, having thus amuſed the French, he paſſed the Adige near Carpi[p], where a body of five thouſand French lay, whom he routed, and obliged the French to retire to the Mincio. He followed them, and paſſed that river in their ſight, without any oppoſition[q]. The French army was commanded by the duke of Savoy, with whom were marſhal Catinat and the prince of Vaudemont, governor of Milan. Theſe differed in opinion; the duke of Savoy was for fighting; Catinat and prince Vaudemont againſt it. But marſhal Villeroy was ſent thither with orders to fight[r]. Catinat, who was the beſt general the French had left, looking on this as a diſgrace, retired and languiſhed for ſome time; yet he recovered. There were many ſmall engagements of parties ſent out on both ſides, in which the Germans had always the advantage. Yet this did not diſcourage Villeroy from venturing to attack them in their camp at Chiari; but they were ſo well entrenched, and defended themſelves with ſo much reſolution, that the French were forced to draw off with great loſs; about five thouſand of them being killed, whereas the loſs of the Germans was inconſiderable. Sickneſs likewiſe broke in upon the French, ſo that their army was much diminiſhed; and after this they were not in a condition to undertake any thing. Prince Eugene lay for ſome time in his camp at Chiari, ſending out parties as far as the Adda, who meeting often with parties of the French, had always the advantage, killing ſome and taking many priſoners. For many months that prince had no place of defence to retire to; his camp was all; ſo that a blow given him there muſt have ruined his whole army. Towards the end of the campaign he poſſeſſed himſelf of all the Mantuan territories, except Mantua and Goits. He blocked them both up; and, when the ſeaſon obliged the French to go into quarters, he took all the places on the Oglio, and continued in motion the whole winter following. The French had no other enemy to contend with, and therefore poured in their whole force upon him. He was then but a young man, and had little aſſiſtance from thoſe about him, and none at all, during the ſummer, from the princes and ſtates of Italy. For the pope and Venetians pretended to maintain a neutrality, though, upon many occaſions, the pope ſhewed a great partiality to the French. The people indeed favoured the prince, ſo that he had good force of arms, without his having firſt uſed force againſt the aſſailant.

14. This alliance ſhall continue ten years from the ſigning thereof, and the alliances of 1690 and 1696 are renewed by this.

Abſtract of ſome of the ſecret articles of the treaty.

1. If the ſuccour, which Denmark is to ſend to the king of England and the States, ſhould not be ſufficient, that king promiſes to ſend four thouſand men more, three months after demand.

2. If Denmark ſhould be attacked, and the ſuccour, mentioned in the ſecret articles of the treaty of 1690, ſhould not be ſufficient, the king of Great Britain and the States promiſe to aſſiſt him with all their forces, as Denmark will in the like caſe aſſiſt them.

5. The king of Great Britain and the States will endeavour, that the duke of Holſtein may conform himſelf to the treaty of Travendale, and maintain a good friendſhip with Denmark, while he ſends ſo many troops out of his own dominions.

7. The king of Great Britain and the States are content, that the emperor ſhall have two thouſand out of the twelve thouſand men, which Denmark will make good to them, in ſix months after the ſigning of this treaty.

10. In caſe of a war, his Daniſh majeſty ſhall not be obliged to enter into it, but be reputed to have made good his alliance by ſending the ſuccours of ſixteen thouſand men, and ſo putting this treaty in execution.

The earl of Mancheſter, in a letter from Paris, July 2d 1701, to ſecretary Vernon, writes thus concerning the treaty.

'The Daniſh envoy here owns the treaty, that we and the States have made with Denmark; tho' I find at the ſame time, that the diſputes between the king of Denmark and the duke of Holſtein are as great as ever. I can aſſure you, that if this court had come up to 150,000 livres more, Denmark would have ſigned a treaty with them; and it is to be feared, that this court will ſtill find ſome means to make that with us ineffectual, either by dealing underhand with Denmark, or elſe by engaging the king of Sweden not to make peace with Poland, which perhaps is not difficult; and I am told that overtures of that nature have been already made. I can tell you, that a treaty was lately near agreed on by the miniſters with Poland; but it broke off upon the point of advancing a conſiderable ſum of money, which here they deferred doing, in hopes that the treaty would not be neceſſary; and now it is believed, that the king of Poland will engage with the emperor.'

'Monſieur Schonenberg, in a letter to the earl of Mancheſter from Madrid, July 14th 1701, writes as follows:

'It is not to be conceived how great a horror the Spaniards entertain of a foreign government, which threatens them very nearly, and holds them already, as one may ſay, by the neck. The murmurs and diſcontents are univerſal: every body grows impatient; the court as well as the city, the clergy, the nobility, and the third eſtate. In a word, all the ſtates and kingdoms of this monarchy ſigh after liberty. Yet no body dares to ſtir, fearing to be ſooner overwhelmed than ſuccoured. Among all the Spaniards, the cardinal Portocarreo and his cabal are perhaps the only perſons, that attach themſelves deſperately to the French party; and it looks as if thoſe gentlemen had made a vow to ſacrifice Spain to it, and to engage all Europe in their fall.'

The ſame gentleman, in another letter to the earl from Madrid on the 28th of July 1701, has this paſſage: 'There is ſo general a want of money here, that they find it very difficult even to find any for the moſt common neceſſities. This makes them fear, that they ſhall not find enough for the expence of the king's journey towards Arragon and Catalonia. They have aſked the clergy for a free gift, and advance from the farmers and comptrollers of the royal rents; but the one and the other cry out mercy. In a word, ſcarcity and miſery reign univerſally; and the will of the late king Charles the ſecond of happy memory will coſt France dear; for unleſs they open their coffers to repair the horrible emptineſs of the Spaniſh finances, this court cannot ſupport itſelf, and the leaſt war will overwhelm it. The murmurs, which are cauſed by ſo univerſal a decay, go ſo far, that they have thought it neceſſary to inſpire the Spaniards with fear, by putting ſome ſtrangers in priſon, who are ſaid to have talked too freely. The duke of Arcos, one of the firſt grandees of Caſtile, has himſelf put into the king's hands a repreſentation, by which he makes excuſes, that he cannot equal himſelf to the dukes and peers of France. The young courtiers dreſs themſelves in the French faſhion to pleaſe the king, who has ſhewn, that he deſires it.

'The habits for the archers or life-guards, as alſo thoſe of all the livery-men, are come out of France; and that livery is the ſame with that of the houſe of Bourbon; ſo that the livery of the antient kings of Bourbon is baniſhed.'

[p] The earl of Mancheſter in a letter to Mr. Blathwayte from Paris, July 18, 1701, writes thus:

'We have an account here by an officer, who arrived out of Italy on the 16th that there had paſſed a conſiderable action between the Imperialiſts and the French at Carpi, where monſieur de St. Fremont was poſted with four regiments of dragoons, a regiment of horſe, a battalion or two of foot, and ſome pieces of cannon. Prince Eugene, having amuſed the French by paſſing ſome troops over the Po, they little expected to have heard of him in this place; but he has acted, as they all agree, very much like a general. The canal Blanco, was between them. He made a ſhew, as if he would paſs; ſeveral of his men went into the canal, to try if it was fordable: There they continued firing at the French. Whilſt this was doing, he made two bridges at a good diſtance from his troops above and below. When this was done, he withdrew his troops, as if all was over; but ſoon after he marched a conſiderable body of troops over both places with cannon, &c. and then fell on monſieur de Fremont, and entirely defeated his troops, making himſelf maſter of the poſts of Carpi, the baggage, the cannon, &c. The chevalier d'Albert, ſon of the duke de Chevreuſe, and colonel of dragoons, as alſo monſieur de Charbon, a perſon of diſtinction, are killed: Monſieur d'Eſtrades is dangerouſly wounded, twenty-five other officers are killed, and the reſt fled for it. Prince Eugene was there in perſon, and received a ſlight wound. They ſay here that he was poſted at Carpi upon the Adige when the expreſs came away, with fifteen thouſand men; and there is nothing between him and monſieur de Catinat, who is poſted at St. Pietro near Lagnago, and they are ſeven miles diſtant from each other. Monſieur de Catinat has ordered all his troops to join him from Rivoli, &c. They are very uneaſy at Verſailles, it being thought, that prince Eugene will attack the French army, which has no way of avoiding a battle, but by retiring over the Mincio. It is not known what loſs the Germans had.'

[q] The earl of Mancheſter in a letter to ſecretary Vernon from Paris, Auguſt 10, 1701, has this paſſage.

'I believe the account of prince Eugene's march will very much ſurpriſe you, as it does moſt people here. On Monday laſt arrived here a courier from prince Vaudemont. The letters are of the 3d. On the 28th paſt, ſix hundred German horſe marched over the Mincio at St. Lionne between Peſchiere and Borghetto, where the French were poſted. Monſieur de Catinat would not believe that they intended to paſs there; but, prince Eugene having made his bridge for the foot, and the river being fordable in many places, ten thouſand horſe paſſed, and the next day the whole army, and they continued their march to Deſenzano. Upon this, M. de Catinat held a council of war on horſeback, to reſolve, whether they ſhould advance, and give battle; but they were ſoon informed, that prince Eugene was no longer there, and that he was gone towards Breſcia; and, having got two days march before them, the prince of Vaudemont and count Teſſe, with moſt of the horſe and dragoons, made all the haſte they could, and were come to Piceghitone in the Cremonele upon the Adda. The duke of Savoy and M. de Catinat, with the reſt of the army, had paſſed Caneto upon the Oglio, and were expected that night at Cremona. It was thought, that their intention was to get, if poſſible, to the Adda, to cover the Milaneſe; prince Eugene was paſſed the Oglio, and it is believed he would ſoon be at Canonica upon the Adda. The duke of Savoy was, as ſoon as he came to the army, of opinion to paſs the Mincio, and give battle, but that was not agreed to.'

[r] He arrived in the French army in Italy on the 22d of Auguſt; and, as the earl of Mancheſter obſerves in a letter to Mr. Blathwayte, on the 26th of that month, held a council of war, 'and there declared, that he had orders to march directly to the enemy, and give them battle. He made bridges over the Oglio near Urago, and on the 28th at night the whole army was in march, conſiſting of ninety-two ſquadrons and ſixty-nine battalions; the reſt of the troops having been ordered to Como, Cremona, &c.' and ſeaſonable intelligence brought him of all the motions of the French; and in his whole conduct, he ſhewed both a depth of contrivance, and an exactneſs in execution, with all the courage, but without any of the raſhneſs of youth.

His attempt in January following upon Cremona had almoſt proved a deciſive one. Marſhal Villeroy lay there with ſix or ſeven thouſand men, and commanded a bridge on the Po. Prince Eugene had paſſed that river with a part of his army: The Princeſs of Mirandola drove out the French, and recovered a gariſon from them. The Duke of Modena put his country into his hands, and gave him Berſello, the ſtrongeſt place of his dominions. The Duke of Parma pretended, that he was the Pope's vaſſal, and ſo put himſelf under the protection of his holineſs. Prince Eugene would not provoke the pope too much, and therefore only marched through the Parmeſan. Here he laid the deſign of ſurprizing Cremona with ſo much ſecrecy, that the French had not the leaſt ſuſpicion of it. The prince put himſelf at the head of a body, that he brought from the Oglio, and ordered another to come from the Parmeſan at the ſame time to force the bridge. He marched with all ſecrecy to Cremona; and, at the ſame time, thro' the ruins of an old aqueduct, he ſent in ſome men, who got through, and forced one of the gates; ſo that he was within the town before marſhal Villeroy had an apprehenſion of an enemy being near him. He wakened on a ſudden with the noiſe, got out into the ſtreet, and there he was taken priſoner. But the other body did not come up exactly at the time appointed; by which means an Iriſh regiment ſecured the bridge; and thus the deſign, that was ſo well contrived, and ſo happily executed in one part, failed. Prince Eugene had but four thouſand men with him, ſo that, ſince the other body could not join him, he was forced to march back; which he did without any conſiderable loſs, carrying marſhal Villeroy and ſome other priſoners with him. In this attempt, though he had not an entire ſucceſs, yet he gained all the glory, to which the ambition of a military man could aſpire, ſo that he was looked upon as the greateſt and happieſt general of the age. He went on enlarging his quarters, ſecuring all his poſts, and ſtraitening the blockade of Mantua, and was in perpetual motion during the whole winter. The French were ſtruck with this ill ſucceſs. More troops were ſent into Italy, and the duke of Vendoſme went to command the armies there.

The duke of Savoy was preſſed to ſend his forces thither; but he grew cold and backward. He had now gained all that he could promiſe himſelf from France. His ſecond daughter was married to king Philip, and was ſent to him to Barcelona, where he met her. That king fell into an ill habit of body, and had ſome returns of a feveriſh diſtemper. He had alſo great diſputes with the ſtates of Catalonia, who, before they would grant him the tax, that was aſked of them, propoſed, that all their privileges ſhould be confirmed to them. This took up ſome time, and occaſioned many diſputes. All was ſettled at laſt; but their grant was ſhort of what was expected, and did not defray the charges of the king's ſtay in the place. A great diſpoſition to revolt appeared in the kingdom of Naples, and it broke out into ſome feeble attempts, that were ſoon maſtered, and the leaders of them taken and executed, who juſtified themſelves by this apology, that, till the pope granted the inveſtiture, they could not be bound to obey the new king. The duke of Modena was a ſevere governor, both on his maſter's account and on his own: Some of the Auſtrian party made their eſcape to Rome and Verona. They repreſented to the emperor, that the diſpoſition of the country was ſuch in his favour, that a ſmall force of ten thouſand men would certainly put that kingdom wholly into his hands. Orders were therefore ſent to prince Eugene to ſend a detachment into the kingdom of Naples; but, though he believed a ſmall force would ſoon reduce that kingdom, yet he judged that ſuch a diminution of his own ſtrength, when the French were ſending ſo many troops into the Milaneſe, would ſo expoſe him, that it would not be poſſible to maintain a defenſive war with ſuch unequal force. Yet repeated orders came to him to the ſame effect; but in oppoſition to thoſe he made ſuch repreſentations, that at laſt it was left to himſelf to do what he found ſafeſt and moſt for the emperor's ſervice. Upon this the matter was laid aſide, and it ſoon appeared, that he had judged better than the court of Vienna; but this was, by his enemies, imputed to humour and obſtinacy, ſo that, for ſome time after that, he was neither conſidered nor ſupported, as his great ſervices had deſerved. This might ariſe from envy and malice, which are the ordinary growth of all courts, eſpecially of feeble ones; or it might be the practice of the French, who had corrupted moſt courts, and that of Vienna in particular, ſince nothing could more advance their ends, than to alienate the emperor from prince Eugene; which might ſo far diſguſt him, as to make him more remiſs in his ſervice.

The confederate fleet of England and Holland, commanded by Sir George Rooke, gave terror this ſummer to moſt of their neighbours, though they continued merely on the defenſive; while the French had many ſquadrons in the Spaniſh ports (the uſe of which were refuſed to our fleet) and in the Weſt-Indies.

In the north, the war went on ſtill. The king of Sweden paſſed the Duna, and fell upon an army of tha Saxons, that lay on the other ſide over againſt Riga, and routed them ſo entirely, that he became maſter of their camp and artillery. From thence he marched into Courland, where no reſiſtance was made. Mittau, the chief town, ſubmitted to him. The king of Poland drew his army into Lithuania, which was much divided between the Sophia's and Oginſki's; ſo that all thoſe parts were falling into great confuſion. The court of Vienna pretended, that they had made a great diſcovery of a conſpiracy in Hungary. It is certain, the Germans acted the maſter very ſeverely in that kingdom, ſo that all places were full of complaints; and the emperor was ſo beſieged by the authors of thoſe oppreſſions, and the proceedings were ſo ſummary upon very ſlight grounds, that it was not to be wondered, if the Hungarians were diſpoſed to ſhake off the yoke, when a proper opportunity ſhould offer itſelf; and it is not to be doubted, but the French had agents among them by the way of Poland, as well as of Turkey, that ſo the emperor might have work enough at home.

This was the ſtate of affairs of Europe this ſummer. Several negotiations were ſecretly carried on; the elector of Cologne was entirely gained to the French intereſt, but reſolved not to declare himſelf, till his brother thought fit likewiſe to do it. All the progreſs, that the French made with the two brothers this ſummer was, that they declared for a neutrality, and againſt a war with France. The dukes of Wolfembuttle and Saxe-Gotha were alſo engaged in the ſame deſign. They made great levies of troops beyond what they themſelves could pay, for which it was viſible, that they were ſupplied from France. By this means there was a formidable appearance of great diſtractions in the empire. An alliance was alſo projected by France with the king of Portugal. His miniſters were in the French intereſt, but he himſelf inclined to the Auſtrian family. He for ſome time affected retirement, and avoided the giving audience to foreign miniſters. But, as he ſaw no good proſpect from England, and being preſſed to an alliance with France, his miniſters obtained leave from him to propoſe one, on terms of ſuch advantage to him, that it was not expected they would be granted, and ſo it was hoped this would run into a long negotiation. But the French were as liberal in making large promiſes, as they were perfidious in not performing them; for the French king agreed to all that was propoſed, and ſigned a treaty purſuant to it, and publiſhed it to the world[1]. Yet the king of Portugal denied, that he had conſented to any ſuch project; and he was prevailed upon with ſuch difficulty to ſign the treaty, that, when it was brought to him, he threw it down, and kicked it about the room. At laſt however he conſented; but it was generally thought, that, when he ſhould ſee a good fleet come from the allies, he would obſerve this treaty with the French, as they have done their treaties with all the reſt of the world.

During the courſe of theſe things, king William applied himſelf to the perfecting the alliances, which he was negociating abroad, and particularly that between the emperor,

[1] The earl of Mancheſter in a letter to ſecretary Vernon from Paris of the 13th of July 1701, writes thus:

'I have juſt now received a letter of the 21ſt paſt, from Mr. Methuen. The treaty betwixt France and Portugal was ſigned the 18th, and the next day he had an audience of the king, and a conference with the ſecretary of ſtate: but he could not get them to own, whether it was ſo or no. All they declared was, that they had done nothing to prejudice the treaty between England and that crown. I was in hopes to get a ſight of this treaty, but there is no copy come; only the original, for this king. There is ſome myſtery ſtill in that matter; but, ſince it is printed in the French gazette, as a league offenſive and defenſive, Portugal ſhould be made to explain that matter.' And Mr. Methuen, in a letter to the earl of Mancheſter from Liſbon of the 27th of September 1701, has the following paſſage: 'The 19th inſtant arrived here in Caſcaes road his majeſty's ſhip the Lynn, diſpatched to me by ſir George Rooke, with inſtructions from his majeſty; upon the receipt of which, I preſently demanded an audience of the king of Portugal, and it was appointed me the next morning at ten of the clock. I was almoſt two hours with the king, during which time having ſaid every thing to him, that I thought likely to make him ſenſible of his paſt errors and true intereſt, I concluded with acquainting him, that, it being abſolutely neceſſary for the king my maſter to be fully informed concerning the contents of the late treaties he had made with France and Spain, I deſired, that a true copy of them ſhould be communicated to me, together with a declaration of his final reſolution, how he intended to act, in caſe a war ſhould break out between England and France; adding, that I expected an immediate and poſitive anſwer, being reſolved not to detain the king's ſhip above four and twenty hours. The arrival of England, and Holland, which was concluded at the Hague on the 7th of September [t]. This treaty was framed in the nature of propoſals, upon which France might come in; and accordingly the ſame were communicated to the Spaniſh embaſſador; otherwiſe it was agreed to have ſatisfaction given to the houſe of Auſtria, in relation to the Spaniſh ſucceſſion, to recover Flanders out of the hands of the French; and that the Engliſh and Dutch ſhould keep whatever they ſhould conquer in the Weſt-Indies. This laſt article, ſo advantageous to England, was owing to the advice which the lord Sommers had formerly given to the king, when the Partition treaty was in agitation.

But to return to the affairs at home. In Ireland, the truſtees for the Iriſh forfeitures went on to hear the claims of the Iriſh, and in many caſes they gave judgment in their favour. But now it began to appear, that, whereas it had been given out, that the ſale of the confiſcated eſtates would amount to a million and a half, it was not like to riſe to the third part of that ſum. In the mean while, the truſtees lived in great ſtate there, and were maſters of all the affairs of that kingdom. But no propoſitions were yet made for the purchaſing of thoſe eſtates.

During the king's abſence the nation was in a great ferment, which was increaſed by many books, that were written to expoſe the late management in the houſe of commons and the new miniſtry, the earl of Rocheſter in particular, who was thought the promoter of all violent motions; and ſeveral tracts were publiſhed, to ſhew the dangers to be apprehended from the growth of the power of France, and the fatal conſequences of a treaty with that kingdom [u]. The few books, that appeared in defence of the conduct of the new miniſters, were ſuch wretched performances, that ſome were tempted to think, that they were written by men, who perſonated the being on their ſide, on deſign to expoſe them.

The earl of Rocheſter delayed his going to Ireland very long. He perceived, that the king's heart was not with him, and was very uneaſy at it; as, on the other hand, the king complained much of his intractable temper and imperious manner, and, by his intercourſe with him, the king came to ſee, that he was not the man he had taken him for; that he had no large nor clear notions of affairs abroad; and that, inſtead of moderating the violence of his party, he inflamed them; ſo that he often ſaid, that the year, in which he directed his councils, was one of the uneaſieſt of his whole life. The earl, finding the king's coolneſs towards him, expoſtulated with him upon it, and ſaid, he could ſerve him no longer, ſince he ſaw he did not truſt him. The king heard this with his uſual flegm, and concluded upon it, that he ſhould ſee him no more. But Mr. Harley made the earl a little more ſubmiſſive aud compliant. After the king was gone beyond ſea, the earl alſo went into Ireland, where he uſed much art in obliging people of all ſorts, diſſenters as well as papiſts; yet ſuch confidence was put in him by the high-church party, that they bore every thing at his hands. It was not eaſy to behave himſelf towards the truſtees for the Iriſh forfeitures, ſo as not to give a general diſtaſte to the nation, for they were much hated, and openly charged with partiality, injuſtice, and corruption. That, which gave the greateſt diſguſt in his adminiſtration there, was his uſage of the reduced officers, who were upon half-pay, a fund being ſettled for that by act of parliament. They had been ordered to live in Ireland, and to be ready for ſervice there. The earl called them before him, and required them to expreſs, under their hands, their readineſs to go and ſerve in the Weſt-Indies. But, they not complying with this, he ſet them a day for their final anſwer, and threatened, that they ſhould have no more appointments, if they ſtood out beyond that time. This was repreſented to the king as a great hardſhip put upon them, and as done on deſign to leave Ireland deſtitute of the ſervice, that might be done by ſo many gallant officers, who were all known to be well affected to the preſent government; upon which the king ordered a ſtop to be put to it.

We are now come to the laſt period of the life of king James II. He had led, for above ten years, a very

of the frigate, her remaining at the Caſcaes, my demands, and the little time I gave them, put this king and his miniſters into a great conſternation; for they ſuppoſed, that our fleet lay ſome where near the coaſt, expecting the return of the frigate with my anſwer; and this conſternation made them very uneaſy, which made me hope, that they would at laſt take ſome vigorous reſolution in our favour. But my hopes were ſoon defeated by the news I received by an expreſs from Caſcaes the ſame night, that Monſieur Chateaurenault appeared off with his ſquadron, which proved too true; for he came into this river the next day; and, the Portugueſe having plucked up their ſpirits, the ſecretary of ſtate ſent me an anſwer in writing, 'That the king of Portugal lay under no other obligation by his treaties with France and Spain, than thoſe, which he had communicated to me already, as alſo to Mr. ſecretary Vernon by his envoy in England; and that the king had no reaſon to change any thing, that had been ſtipulated with the moſt Chriſtian king, who had always been his good friend and ally.' Monſieur Chateaurenault's ſquadron conſiſts of fourteen men of war, five fire-ſhips, and one hoſpital, which are now come up the river, and lie all before the city. Three of the ſhips are of three decks, and from ninety to a hundred guns; moſt of the others carry from fifty to ſixty. This laſt ſtep being made to crown the reſt of their follies, I cannot think any thing can bring theſe people to their ſenſes again but a miracle, or popular tumult; the laſt of which is much more likely to happen than the firſt; for every body ſeems diſſatisfied at the preſent ſituation of affairs, excepting two or three of the miniſters.'

[t] It contained the following articles:

1. There ſhall be a perpetual and inviolable friendſhip between the emperor, the king of Great-Britain, and the States-General.

2. The allies think nothing more effectual for eſtabliſhing the general peace, than the procuring ſatisfaction to the emperor in the Spaniſh ſucceſſion, and ſufficient ſecurity for the dominions and commerce of the allies.

3. The allies ſhall employ two months time from the day of exchanging the ratifications, to obtain, by amicable means, the ſaid ſatisfaction and ſecurity.

4. But, if that cannot be obtained within the time limited, they engage to aſſiſt one the other with all their forces, according to the ſpecification to be agreed on in a particular convention.

5. The confederates ſhall, among other things, endeavour to recover the Spaniſh Netherlands, to be a barrier between Holland and France, as likewiſe the duchy of Milan, &c. for the emperor's ſecurity; and alſo the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, and the lands and iſlands upon the coaſt of Tuſcany, belonging to the Spaniſh dominions.

6. The king of Great-Britain and the States may ſeize what lands and cities they can, belonging to the Spaniards in the Indies, and keep them.

7. In a war, the confederates ſhall faithfully communicate their deſigns to one another.

8. No party ſhall treat of peace, truce, &c. but, jointly with the reſt, they ſhall prevent the union of France and Spain under the ſame government, or the French poſſeſſing the Spaniſh Indies. The ſubjects of the king of Great-Britain and the States ſhall enjoy all the privileges of trade, which they had before the death of the late king of Spain.

9. At the making of peace, the confederates ſhall provide for the maintaining the trade of the Engliſh and the Dutch to the dominions taken from the Spaniards: and likewiſe ſecure the States by a barrier.

10. They ſhall at the ſame time agree about the exerciſe of religion in the places acquired.

11. They ſhall aſſiſt one the other with all their forces, if the French king, or any one elſe, ſhould invade any one on account of this alliance.

12. After a peace, there ſhall remain a defenſive alliance between theſe allies, for the maintaining of the ſaid peace.

13. All kings, princes, and ſtates, that pleaſe, may enter into this alliance, but the empire ſhall be particularly invited, and the confederates may jointly or ſeparately invite whom they pleaſe.

14. This treaty ſhall be ratified by all the confederates within ſix weeks or ſooner.

[u] One of theſe tracts was intitled, 'The dangers of Europe from the growing power of France: With ſome free thoughts on the remedies, and particularly on the cure of our diviſions at home, in order to a ſucceſsful war abroad againſt the French king and his allies.' But the moſt conſiderable treatiſe upon this ſubject is thought to come from the hand of the lord Sommers himſelf, and was called 'Anguis in Herba:' Or, 'The fatal conſequences of a treaty with France: Wherein it is proved, that the principles, whereby the French king governs himſelf, will not allow him to obſerve any treaty longer than it is for his intereſt to break it. That he has always aimed at the union of the crowns of France and Spain ſince the Pyrenean treaty. That notwithſtanding his pretenſions to the contrary, ſuch is his deſign at this day. And that nothing can prevent it, but to reduce his power to ſuch a degree, as may perfectly break his meaſures.' This, as well as the piece above mentioned concerning 'the dangers of Europe,' is inſerted in the third volume of the State-tracts during the reign of king William III, and was re-printed at London in 1711 in 8vo. The author begins with obſerving, that there are three things abſolutely neceſſary to de done by thoſe, who aim at univerſal empire: 1. They muſt conceal their true deſign, leſt all their neighbours ſhould unite to deſtroy them, as common enemies and plagues to mankind: 2. They muſt divide their neighbours as much as poſſible in their counſels at home, and in their foreign intereſts in relation to one another: And, 3. That they never make a peace but of neceſſity, nor obſerve it longer, than till it become more profitable for them to break it than to keep it. Theſe being both in facts and reaſon the plain, neceſſary, and undeniable conſequences of aiming at univerſal empire, it is eaſy to be obſerved, 1. That whoever makes that his aim, cannot 'bona fide' be of any religion, whether natural or revealed; and of conſequence ſuch a prince is not to be bound by arguments or obligations deduced from any religion. 2. That all thoſe moſt groſsly deceive themſelves, who treat with ſuch a prince, out of a proſpect, that he will religiouſly and 'bona fide' obſerve the treaty; for that would ſtand in his way between him and his great deſign of empire. The neceſſary conſequence from theſe truths is, that, whenever providence ſhall ſo far ſecond the prudence of the meaſures of thoſe ſtates and powers, that are neighbours to ſuch a prince, as that an alliance can be formed of ſtrength ſufficient to be able to reduce ſuch an aſpirer to terms of moderation and equality, they are indiſpenſably obliged to make uſe of that force to reduce him to thoſe terms of moderation and equality, and never treat with him upon any other foot: For otherwiſe the princes and governors of thoſe ſtates and powers, with all thoſe who give them contrary advice, become anſwerable before God and man for that miſery and ruin, that ſhall afterwards fall upon ſuch ſtates, either through ignorance or treaſon of their governors or councils. He then remarks, that it is evident the French king had all along aimed at the empire of this part of the world, from his invaſions of France and Franche Compte, in 1666 and 1668, and of Holland, Flanders, Franche Compte, and Germany, from the year 1672 to the treaty of Nimeguen; his treatment of the empire and Spain, after the peace of Nimeguen had diſarmed them, and rendered them incapable of oppoſing him, by thoſe great advantages it gave him over them; and his placing his grandſon upon the throne of Spain, by which laſt ſtep France raiſed unactive life in France. After he had, in ſo poor a manner, abandoned firſt England, and then Ireland; he had entered into two deſigns for recovering the crowns, which he may be ſaid more truly to have thrown away than loſt. The one was broke by the defeat of the French fleet at ſea before Cherburg, in the year 1692: the other ſeemed to be laid with more depth, as well as with more infamy, when an army was brought to Dunkirk, and the deſign of the aſſaſſination was thought ſure; upon which it was reaſonably hoped, that the nation muſt have fallen into ſuch confuſions, that it would have been an eaſy prey to an army ready to invade it. The reproach, that ſo black a contrivance caſt upon him, brought him under ſo much contempt, that even the abſolute authority of the French court could hardly prevail ſo far, as to have common reſpect paid him after that [w]. He himſelf ſeemed to be the leaſt concerned in all his misfortunes; and, though his queen could never give over meddling, yet he was the moſt eaſy when he was leaſt troubled with thoſe airy ſchemes, upon which ſhe was employing her thoughts. He went ſometimes to the monaſtery of La Trappe, where the poor monks were much edified with his humble and pious deportment [x]. Hunting was his chief diverſion; and for the moſt part he led a harmleſs, innocent life, being ſtill zealous about his religion [y]. In the beginning of this year, he had been ſo near death, that it was generally thought the decline of it would carry him off. He went to Bourbon in April, where he continued till the latter end of May, but had no benefit of the waters there. In the beginning of September he fell into ſuch fits, that it was concluded he could not live many days. The French king came to ſee him, and ſeemed to be much touched with the ſight, and repeated to him what he had before promiſed to his queen, raiſed itſelf to the higheſt pitch of grandeur, and threatened the deſtruction of the remaining liberties of Europe and the Proteſtant religion. He afterwards remarks, that union at home was the beſt means to prevent the deſigns of the French king: That no accommodation can be made with him, but what muſt be deſtructive to Europe: That the leaving Milan and Flanders in his hands would infallibly ſecure to him the univerſal empire of Europe: That the duke of Anjou holding Spain would be under the French power, it being his intereſt to give all advantages to France, and particularly in point of trade, while England and Holland would not be able to reſent it: That the Spaniſh trade would greatly increaſe the French ſhipping: That France, by poſſeſſing of Gibraltar, would command the trade of the Streights; and that the ſeizing of Guipuſcoa would ſecure the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily. He next ſhews, that the poſſeſſion of the duke of Anjou is the poſſeſſion of France, and that the French king always aimed at the union of the two crowns of France and Spain, not thinking himſelf in the leaſt obliged by the renunciation made by his queen at the Pyrenean treaty, and never deſigning to obſerve it, even at the time when he was ſolemnly ſwearing the contrary at the altar. That however his meaſures for uniting thoſe crowns were broke by the revolution, and he was obliged by the treaty of Reſwick to reſtore all that he had taken in Catalonia and Flanders during the war, together with Luxemburg, the county of Chiny, Courtray, which he had taken ſince the peace of Nimeguen, and almoſt all his re-unions; and was driven out of Italy, having loſt Caſal during the war, and upon the peace of Savoy forced to reſtore his conqueſts, together with Pignerol, which had been in the hands of France ſince the year 1631.

He explains the deſigns of the treaty of partition, in which king William and the States-General had been deceived by the infidelity of the French king, who after all rejected that treaty. He remarks, that the duke of Anjou muſt enjoy both crowns, if the duke of Burgundy ſhould die childleſs, though contrary to the king of Spain's will. That England and Holland ought to declare to the world, that they begin the war upon the foot of turning the duke of Anjou out of the whole Spaniſh ſucceſſion, ſince nothing could ſo entirely reconcile the Spaniards to the intereſt of the houſe of Auſtria and the deſigns of her allies, as ſuch a declaration, or would ſo effectually deſtroy the credit, that France might ſtill have preſerved in Spain; for, though the houſe of Auſtria governed Spain for near two centuries, yet they loſt their intereſt there, when it was once known, that the Spaniſh ſceptre could not be continued longer in that family, without diſmembering her empire; while France, her immemorial enemy, offered to preſerve her monarchy entire, provided ſhe would receive the duke of Anjou for her king. 'This ſingle motive outweighed all other conſiderations; ſhe forgot her inbred antipathy to the French nation, and her friendſhip and obligations to the family of her former Kings. She accepted his moſt chriſtian majeſty's offer, tho' ſhe could not but foreſee, that a French king would neceſſarily make her own dependent on that of France. But the ſcene of affairs is much altered ſince that time. The exhauſted ſtate of France, the great confederacy formed againſt her, and the ſucceſs of the emperor's arms in Italy, ſufficiently declare to all the world, and to Spain itſelf, that France cannot preſerve her monarchy entire. The confederates can do it, if they are willing. France has taught us how the affections of that people are to be gained. Let us turn her own arts againſt her; nor can we fail to reap the greateſt advantages from ſuch a reſolution, whenever England and Holland ſhall think it a proper time to land an army in Spain upon this foot. Beſides, Spain will hereby recover her former independence. But, if we begin a war upon the foot of dividing her monarchy, we make an inſeparable union of intereſts between Spain and the duke of Anjou; and, in this caſe, we muſt expect to meet with the laſt efforts of an incenſed and deſperate nation.' He then ſhews, that 'all expedients to ſecure the trade of England and Holland are ridiculous, except that one of turning the duke of Anjou out of Spain. When this ſhall be effected, the reſt of the monarchy, except Flanders and Milan, that are garriſoned by French troops, muſt follow the fortune of their head. If we turn the duke of Anjou out of Spain, the houſe of Auſtria will be able to make us a good compenſation for the charges of the war; but, without that, we muſt expect no return for our expences. We know they cannot repay us in money; they can give us little or no advantage in our trade. And, for cautionary towns, I know none they could give us, that would be worth our acceptance, except Oſtend and Newport. But, inſtead of repaying us any part of our expence, theſe garriſons would be a perpetual charge to us, beſides the jealouſy that troops maintained there might create in the people of England. Moreover, the fate of Tangier and Dunkirk ought to make us ſenſible, that thoſe garriſons will be more ſecure, if we put the houſe of Auſtria in a condition to protect them, by making the archduke king of Spain, than if we kept them in our hands.' He aſſerts then, that 'it is either a malicious or an ignorant ſurmiſe to ſay, that, if the archduke were king of Spain, the houſe of Auſtria would become too powerful. The dominions of both branches of the houſe of Auſtria were united in the perſon of Charles V, who was great both for his wiſdom, courage and military conduct. The kingdom of Spain was then at leaſt four times more powerful than at this day. He was abſolutely maſter of the ſeas. The Duchy of Burgundy, with the ſeventeen provinces, were entire in him. Yet, notwithſtanding all thoſe advantages, he was barely a match for France. If his ſon Philip II. put France very hard to it, we muſt not attribute that to the power of Spain, but to the civil wars of France; but, as ſoon as Henry IV. had appeaſed the civil wars, and ſettled the diſtracted condition of the kingdom, the ſuperiority of France quickly appeared; and all the world allows that both the branches of the houſe of Auſtria could not have prevented ſome fatal blow, that he was preparing to ſtrike, had not a ſudden and violent death ſtopped his deſigns. Since that time France has taken from them a great part of Flanders, the duchy of Burgundy, the country of Rouſſillon, and ſome other places on the frontiers of Spain, and has made conſiderable conqueſts on the ſide of Germany. Spain is greatly diſpeopled, and her maritime power entirely loſt. And, ever ſince the time Guſtavus Adolphus broke the power of the German branch of the houſe of Auſtria, we find that both branches united have made no tolerable balance againſt France; the experience of which has coſt us and all Europe very dear the continuance of of the two laſt wars. Surely then it would be very extravagant, if, in order to make a balance in Europe, we ſhall take away from the weight of the houſe of Auſtria, which before was very much too light, and add to the weight of France, that was already exorbitantly great. And this muſt be the caſe, unleſs we turn the duke of Anjou out of the whole.'

[w] His friends had generally repreſented him as incapable of conſenting to ſo ſhocking an attempt, as that of aſſaſſinating King William. But it is evident, from an original letter of his, in the archbiſhop's library at Lambeth, printed in the firſt volume of ſecretary 'Thurloe's ſtate papers,' p. 666, that he was not averſe to the employing of Roman Catholics in ſuch a deſign againſt 'Oliver Cromwell,' even though they demanded, as a reward for it, a toleration of their religion in England. The letter is as follows:

Paris, May, 14, 1655.

'There is a propoſition has been made to me, which is too long to put in a letter, ſo that I will, as ſhort as I can, let you know the heads of them. There are four Roman Catholics, that have bound themſelves in a ſolemn oath to kill Cromwell, and then to raiſe all the catholics in the city and the army, which they pretend to be a number ſo conſiderable, as may give a riſe for your recovery, they being all warned to be ready for ſomething that is to be done, without knowing what it is. They demand ten thouſand livres in hand; and when the buſineſs is ended, ſome recompenſe for themſelves, according to their ſeveral qualities, and the ſame liberty for catholics in England, as the proteſtants have in France. 'I thought not fit to reject this propoſition,' but to acquaint you with it, becauſe the 'firſt part of the deſign ſeems to me to be better lay'd and reſolved on,' then any 'I have known' of that kind; and for the defects of the ſecond, it may be ſupply'd by ſome deſigns you may have to join it. If you approve of it, one of the four, intruſted by the reſt, will repair to you, his charges being borne, and give you a full account of the whole matter. In the mean time, he deſires, in his own name and theirs, that you would let but one or two, whom you muſt truſt, know it, and enjoyn them ſecrecy. This is all I can ſay of it at this time.'

[x] Father Brettonneau, the jeſuit, in his 'Abridgment of the life of king James II, extracted from an Engliſh manuſcript of the reverend father Francis Sanders, of the ſociety of Jeſus, and confeſſor to that king,' tells us that the king never miſſed going to 'La Trappe' once a year. He would ſtay there three or four days, and ſpend them in long meditations and ſpiritual conferences with the abbot and his confeſſor, whom he took with him. He aſſiſted at the choir-hours, except at night: He eat nothing but eggs, raiſins, and other pulſe, unleſs he was indiſpoſed. But he was never ſo infirm, but he would dine once with the religious in the refectory, where no meat nor fleſh is ever ſerved up. The king wrote likewiſe this account of his retirement there:

'Foraſmuch as it has pleaſed the divine goodneſs, graciouſly to touch my heart, when I was at La Trappe, more ſenſibly than ever; I have ſince, by the aid of the ſame grace, done my utmoſt to reform and amend my life. At firſt, I went thither, partly out of curioſity, to ſee, if the deſcription, which had been made me of this holy place, and the accounts I had read of it in England, were anſwerable to the idea I had formed of it; and partly to know, if the abbot, who firſt began this reform, merited the praiſes and commendations, that were given him. I was brought thither by an old friend of mine, the marſhal de Bellefont, for which I thanked him as long as he lived. I found, that I ſucceeded by degrees in the deſire, which I had of leading a better life. After I had been there about two or three days (which, I thank God, I continued to do every year, ſince my return from Ireland) I perceived I had made a conſiderable improvement; for I began to have a more perfect knowledge of the vanity of human grandeur. I was very well convinced, that nothing ought to be more paſſionately deſired than the 'love of God;' and that it is the duty of every good chriſtian to mortify himſelf, eſpecially ſuch a wretch as I am, who have lived ſo many years in an almoſt continued ſtate of ſin, till at laſt it has pleaſed thee, O my God, out of thine infinite mercy, to call me back to thyſelf by thy fatherly corrections.'

[y] Father Brettonneau tells us, 'That the king's confeſſor, after he had the honour to ſerve him, and be near his perſon nine years, thought he might ſafely affirm, that, in the moſt reformed ſtate of chriſtianity, and the moſt virtuous and pious ſouls, it is very rare to find more unſpotted intentions, a more exact watchfulneſs, and a greater delicacy and tenderneſs of conſcience with reſpect to the leaſt faults and the ſmalleſt imperfections.' The ſame writer likewiſe obſerves, 'That his ſelf-abhorrence and holy confuſion for his ſins inſpired him with ſuch a ſpirit of mortification, as would have carried him too far, if his confeſſor had not oppoſed it, and moderated his auſterities. He kept very ſevere faſts and would upon certain days bind his body with a very ſharp-pointed iron chain. His ſelf-diſcipline was very rigorous; and withal he took ſuch care to conceal thoſe exerciſes of penance, that, having once by chance left his inſtrument of diſcipline in a place, where the queen found it, he ſo bluſhed upon that occaſion, that her majeſty never ſaw him that he would, in caſe of his death, own the pretended prince of Wales as king of England. King James died on Friday the 16th of September, N. S. with great marks of devotion, and was interred in the church of the Engliſh Benedictines, in the ſuburbs of St. James at Paris, in a private manner, and without any ſort of ſolemnity, as he had deſired.

He was a prince that ſeemed made for greater things, than will be found in the courſe of his life, more particularly of his reign: he was eſteemed, in the former parts of his life, a man of great courage, as he was quite through it a man of great application to buſineſs: he had no vivacity of thought, invention, or expreſſion: but he had a good judgment, where his religion or his education gave him not a biaſs, which it did very often: he was bred with ſtrange notions of the obedience due to princes, and came to take up as ſtrange ones of the ſubmiſſion due to prieſts: he was naturally a man of truth, fidelity, and juſtice: but his religion was ſo infuſed in him, and he was ſo managed in it by his prieſts, that the principles, which nature had laid in him, had little power over him, when the concerns of his church ſtood in the way: he was a gentle maſter, and was very eaſy to all who came near him: yet he was not ſo apt to pardon, as one ought to be, that is the vicegerent of that God, who is ſlow to anger, and ready to forgive: he had no perſonal vices but of one ſort: he was ſtill wandering from one amour to another, yet he had a real ſenſe of ſin, and was aſhamed of it: but prieſts know how to engage princes more entirely into their intereſts, by making them compound for their ſins, by a great zeal for holy church, as they call it. In a word, if it had not been for his popery, he would have been, if not a great, yet a good prince. Burnet ſays, that, by what he once knew of him, and by what he ſaw him afterwards carried to, he grew more confirmed in the very bad opinion which he was always apt to have, of the intrigues of the Popiſh clergy, and of the confeſſors of kings. King James was undone by them, and was their martyr, ſo that they ought to bear the chief load of all the errors of his inglorious reign, and of its fatal cataſtrophe. As he was dying, he ſaid nothing concerning the legitimacy of his ſon; on which ſome made ſevere remarks; while others thought, that, having ſpoke ſo often of it before, he might not reflect on the fitneſs of ſaying any thing concerning it in his laſt extremity. He recommended to him firmneſs in his religion, and juſtice in his government, if ever he ſhould come to reign. He ſaid, that, by his practice, he recommended Chriſtian forgiveneſs to him, for he heartily forgave both the prince of Orange, and the emperor. The naming of the emperor, it was believed, had been ſuggeſted to him by the French, in order to render the emperor odious to all thoſe of his religion.

Upon his death it was debated in the French council what was fit to be done, with relation to his pretended ſon, whom the king had promiſed him to acknowledge as king of England, at the perſuaſion of Madam Maintenon, whom king James's queen had engaged for that purpoſe. The miniſtry adviſed the French king to be paſſive, to let him aſſume what title he pleaſed; but that, for ſome time at leaſt, his majeſty ſhould not declare himſelf. That this might be ſome reſtraint on king William, whereas a preſent declaration muſt precipitate a rupture. But the dauphin interpoſed with ſome heat for the preſent owning him king. He thought the king was bound in honour to do it: That he was of the blood, and was driven away on the account of his religion. Upon this orders were given to proclaim him at St. Germain's. His own court, it ſeems, was going about it, when a difficulty, propoſed by the earl of Middleton, put a ſtop to it. He apprehended, that it would look very ſtrange, and might provoke the court of France, if among the titles that of France ſhould be uſed; and it might diſguſt their party in England, if it were omitted: ſo that piece of ceremony was not performed [z].

Soon after this, the king of Spain owned the Pretender as him in ſuch a confuſion in her life. Notwithſtanding all which, he did not yet mortify himſelf to his mind. All the penances of this life ſeemed too light and eaſy for him. This made him aſk his confeſſor a queſtion, which has ſomewhat very particular in it, and ſhews the extreme deſire he had to ſatisfy the divine juſtice. 'Conſidering the life I have led (ſaid he in a queſtion which he had ſet down in writing) and ſeeing my age and condition will not let me practiſe all the penances and mortifications which are neceſſary to expiate my ſins, and to teſtify my repentance of them to God, ought I not, reverend father, to be content to have my pains in purgatory prolonged, and to lay out what I had deſigned to obtain the Divine mercy with, to have thoſe pains abridged, in charities for the relief of the poor, and prayers for the dead?' His confeſſor could not enough admire the principles which had inſpired him with ſuch a ſentiment; but preſently convinced him, that it carried him a little too far, and that one cannot deſire to ſee God too ſoon.'

[z] The circumſtances of his laſt illneſs and death, and the proclaiming the Pretender king, will beſt appear from the following extracts of the earl of Mancheſter's letters.

To Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, Sept. 5. 1701.

King James was taken on Friday laſt with fainting fits, which returned upon him yeſterday. He was then ſo ill, that they gave him the extreme unction, and he was thought a dying. There is a report that he is dead, but I do not believe it; though by the accounts I have he cannot live twenty-four hours. I do therefore expect every moment the news of his death. I do not think of ſending a courier till I ſee how the court of France will act, and whether they will own the P. prince of Wales. By what I can learn they are undetermined at preſent what to do, and whether they ſhall ſuffer thoſe of St. Germain's to proclaim him. I will take care to inform his majeſty of every ſtep that is made.

To Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Sept. 7. 1701.

On Sunday laſt king James had again ſeveral fainting fits, which laſted ſo long, that they thought him dead; but they brought him at laſt to himſelf. He received the extreme unction, and ſeems much reſigned. 'He exhorted my lord Middleton, and the reſt of his Proteſtant ſervants, to embrace the Romiſh religion, and deſired the P. prince of Wales to keep his faith, ſhewing him of how little value a crown was in compariſon to his ſalvation. In ſhort he continued long on this ſubject, and told the curate of St. Germain's, that he would be buried in their church with only an inſcription J. K. of England. The phyſicians cannot tell what his diſtemper is. They think, that an impoſthume is broke, for a great deal of corruption and blood comes continually from him. Yeſterday he had another fit, which laſted an hour. The French king and the whole court have been to take their leave of him; but he was not dead laſt night, though none expect he can recover. I know ſo much, that, as ſoon as he dies, the P. prince will take upon him the title of king of England, and he will be owned as ſuch by thoſe of St. Germain's. I am in doubt, whether the court of France will own him ſo ſoon. As ſoon as I hear how this court acts on this occaſion, I intend to ſend an expreſs to his majeſty for inſtructions and orders.'

To Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, Sept. 9, 1701.

King James is ſtill alive, but without any hopes of recovery. He ſeems much reſigned, and has exhorted the lords Middleton and Griffin, and the reſt of his Proteſtant ſervants, to embrace the Romiſh religion. I hear the latter is extremely uneaſy, becauſe the king of France was preſent, and took notice of him, and ſaid, that he hoped he would conſider what king James had ſaid to him. This will have the greater effect, becauſe if he ſhould not change, it is uncertain, whether the French court will have any ſuch regard for him, as it has had hitherto. They talk much of what king James ſaid to the P. prince to keep ſtedfaſt to his religion, and not depart from it on any account whatſoever. I can tell you, that, the moment king James dies, the other will take the title of king of England, and will be owned as ſuch by thoſe of St. Germain's. The French king is now at Marly, and at his return he goes to Fontainebleau: ſo it may be eaſily contrived not to ſee the P. prince till his return. The queen will be in a convent at Chaliot till the king is buried, and the P. prince at the duke of Lauſun's at Paris, and after that they will return to St. Germain's. I doubt not but the French will call him 'Roy d'Angleterre.'

To Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Sept. 14. 1701.

It was expected that king James would have died laſt night, but he was alive this morning, though they expect he will expire every moment, being dead almoſt up to his ſtomach, and he is ſenſible of no pain. The king of France was there laſt night, and did declare, that he would own the P. prince for king of England immediately. This he ſaid before ſeveral people, and I have it from ſuch good hands, that I hardly doubt it.

To Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, Sept. 16, 1701.

We have ever ſince Tueſday laſt been expecting to hear of the death of the late king. His grand diſtemper now is a lethargy, and he is often thought dead, though with cordials, &c. they keep him up without any hopes of recovery. The king of France was that day to ſee him, and then he declared publicly, that he would own the P. prince for king of England, and ordered the captains of the guards to pay him the ſame honours they did to the late king James. This is what his majeſty may rely upon. I know, that ſome of the foreign miniſters took notice of it yeſterday to M. de Torcy, who ſaid, that there was nothing in that contrary to the treaty of Ryſwick. I cannot tell how they will explain this here, but certainly it cannot be underſtood ſo; and it ſhews at leaſt, that this court does not intend to keep any meaſures with his majeſty. There is now in the preſs an edict to prohibit all trade with England; but, that it may not look like a declaration of war, they do permit the bringing in of beer, cyder, glaſs-bottles, and wool. Notice is already ſent to all the ſea-ports, and, after the firſt of November next, no perſon is to wear any of the manufactures of England under ſevere penalties.

To Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Sept. 17, 1701.

The late king James died yeſterday between three and four o'clock in the afternoon; and the P. prince was immediately proclaimed king of England by the title of James the Third. I do not hear, that there was any other ceremony than that, after he had taken the title of king, thoſe of St. Germain's kiſſed his hand, and treated him with majeſty. After that the French complimented him, and did the like. What was done in the town was in a tumultuous manner, by crying, 'Long live king James the third,' &c. I do not doubt but before now the king of France and the reſt of the court have complimented him, all that matter having been ſettled beforehand. He continues at St. Germain's, but the queen is come to Chaliot, a convent king of England, as likewiſe did the pope and the duke of Savoy; and the king of France preſſed all other princes to do it, in whoſe courts he had miniſters, and prevailed on the pope to preſs the emperor and other Roman Catholic princes to acknowledge him, though without effect. The king of Portugal's anſwer to the French miniſter upon this occaſion was, that he was reſolved to maintain a friendſhip and good correſpondence with his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, and to obſerve religiouſly all his alliances with him; but that he could not reſolve upon a thing of that nature, which might be attended with dangerous conſequences. The king of Denmark likewiſe made the ſame refuſal.

King William was no ſooner informed of this proceeding of the king of France, but he diſpatched a courier to the king of Sweden, as a guarantee of the treaty of Ryſwick, to give him an account of this manifeſt violation of it; and on the ſame day ſent an expreſs to the earl of Mancheſter, his embaſſador ar Paris, to order him to return to England, without taking his audience of leave. Upon which his excellency wrote the following letter to the marquis de Torcy, ſecretary of ſtate for foreign affairs.

SIR, Paris, Octob. 2, 1701.

'The king my maſter, being informed, that his moſt Chriſtian majeſty has owned another king of Great-Britain, does not believe, that his honour and his intereſt permit him to keep any longer an embaſſador with the king your maſter; and has ſent me orders to retire immediately; of which I do myſelf the honour to give you notice by this letter, and I do aſſure you at the ſame time, that I am, &c.'

This letter being communicated to the French king, who was then at Fontainebleau, he aſſembled his council, to deliberate upon an anſwer, which Monſieur de Torcy returned the ſame day in the following terms:

My Lord,

'I can add nothing to what I had the honour to tell you eight days ago, about the ſincere deſire which the king has always had to preſerve the peace with the king your maſter, confirmed by the treaty of Ryſwick. As to me in particular, I only pray you to be perſuaded, that, in whatever place you are, you will find nobody who is more truly than I ſhall be all my life-time yours, &c.

The French king likewiſe juſtified his conduct in owning the Pretender by the following manifeſto, which he diſperſed in all the courts of Europe.

'The king of England dying at St. Germain's on the 16th of September 1701, the prince of Wales immediately took the title of king, which belonged to him as ſon and heir of the late king his father. His moſt chriſtian majeſty made no difficulty of owning him under that title; and, even ſome time before the death of the king of England, his moſt chriſtian majeſty had aſſured him, that he would do ſo: As his majeſty had always treated him as prince of Wales, the conſequence is natural to ſtile him king of England, as ſoon as the king his father died. No reaſon oppoſes this, when there is no engagement to the contrary; and it is certain, there is none in the treaty of Ryſwick. The fourth article of that treaty declares only, that his moſt chriſtian majeſty ſhall not diſturb the king of Great Britain in the peaceable poſſeſſion of his dominions; nor aſſiſt with troops, or ſhips, or any other ſuccour, thoſe, who ſhall attempt to diſturb him. His moſt chriſtian majeſty's intention is to obſerve punctually this article; and it is certain, that the title of king of England, which the prince of Wales could not diſpenſe with taking upon himſelf, will not procure him any other aſſiſtances from his moſt chriſtian majeſty, than what the late king his father received ſince the treaty of Ryſwick, which were merely for his ſubſiſtence, and the alleviation of his misfortunes. The generoſity of his moſt chriſtian majeſty would not allow him to abandon either that prince or his family. He is no judge between the king of Great Britain and the prince of Wales. He cannot determine againſt the latter, by refuſing him a title, which his birth gives him. In a word, it is ſufficient, if his moſt chriſtian majeſty obſerves exactly the treaty of Ryſwick, and adheres ſtrictly to the terms of that treaty, at a time, when the conduct of the king of Great Britain and the ſtates general, the ſailing of their fleets, the ſecret aſſiſtance, which they give the emperor, the declarations, which they make in favour of that prince, the troops, which they are raiſing in all parts, might be regarded with much greater reaſon, as a real contravention to treaties.

'Beſides, it is not a new thing to give to children the titles of kingdoms, which the kings their fathers have loſt, though the princes, who give thoſe titles, are at peace with thoſe who are in poſſeſſion of thoſe kingdoms. Hiſtory furniſhes many examples among the kings of Naples and thoſe of Navarre. Laſtly, the kings of Poland of the houſe of Vaſa, having loſt the kingdom of Sweden, were treated by France as kings of Sweden till the peace of Oliva, at the ſame time that there was the ſtricteſt alliance with king Guſtavus and queen Chriſtina. I do not believe it to be neceſſary to cite theſe examples, ſince no perſon can conteſt, that his majeſty's conduct in this point is juſt, worthy of his genero-near Paris. I do not find, that the late king is much regretted at St. Germain's, ſince the French king has promiſed, that all things there ſhall remain on the ſame foot they were. I ſhall not give my opinion, and I do take it, that none are ſo proper to judge about this as the lords juſtices, ſince it does not only regard the honour of his majeſty, but alſo that of the nation; but I believe this is the firſt precedent of a king, who has owned another king; and whilſt his embaſſador is at court, he owns another again with the ſame titles. I know they ſay here, that there is nothing in this contrary to the treaty of Ryſwick, which they explain by their not intending to aſſiſt him in recovering his crown, at leaſt during the life of his majeſty; but I thought treaties between princes extended to them and their ſucceſſors; but that I ſuppoſe they will pretend to obſerve, ſince they have named a ſucceſſor. The foreign miniſters are extremely ſurpriſed, and ſay they could not have believed what they now ſee.

tend, that there is nothing in all this contrary to the treaty of Ryſwick; which notion they explain by their not intending to aſſiſt him in recovering the crown, at leaſt not during the life of his preſent majeſty. I thought treaties extended to the princes and their heirs and ſucceſſors; but even there I ſuppoſe they are right, as having named the ſucceſſor. I aſſure you, moſt of the French are ſurpriſed at this proceeding; but it is generally ſaid, that the French king has wrote to his majeſty, to ſhew the neceſſity he was under, and that M. de Torcy has ſpoke to me, whom I have not heard a word from; and therefore I do not believe the other. I cannot ſee what can be ſaid to palliate this matter. I do not intend to appear at court till I have his majeſty's orders, which I imagine will be rather to return to England. We ſhall ſee now, whether any of the foreign miniſters will compliment the P. prince. I ſuppoſe the Spaniſh embaſſador will, which I take it is in our power to reſent in the like manner.

To Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, Sept. 19, 1701.

I have already acquainted the lords juſtices (ſince I believe his majeſty will come to no reſolution till they have given their opinion) that the late king died on the 16th in the afternoon, and that immediately the P. prince was proclaimed king of England by the title of James the third. There was no other ceremony than that the queen waited on him, and treated him as king; after that thoſe of St. Germain's kiſſed his hand, and the French complimented him. What was done in the town was done in a tumultuous manner. Some ſay there was a herald, an Iriſhman. Lord Middleton, &c. did not appear, becauſe they could not tell how the title of France would be taken here, had they done it in form. Lord Middleton brought the ſeals to him, which he gave him again. Others did the like. I am told, that, before the French king made this declaration, he held a council at Marly, where it took up ſome time to debate, whether he ſhould own him or no; or, if he did, whether it ought not to be deferred for ſome time. The ſecret of all this matter is this, that in ſhort, there was a perſon, that governs here, who had ſome time ſince promiſed the queen, that it ſhould be done; ſo that whatever paſſed in council was only for form's ſake. The French king came to St. Germain's, and aſſured the queen and the P. prince, that he would own him as ſoon as the king was dead. Upon which the queen told him, that it would be a great conſolation to the late king, if his majeſty would tell him as much; which he did, and then his ſervants were called in, to whom he declared the ſame. To-morrow the French king goes to St. Germain's to make the P. prince the firſt viſit as king. The queen is now at a convent at Chaliot; but ſhe returns to-morrow to St. Germain's, where ſhe will continue. The body of the late king is brought to the 'Engliſh Benedidictines,' where it will be expoſed for forty days, and then left there till a proper opportunity of carrying it for England. I do hear, that at court they pre-

To Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Sept. 21, 1701.

I did not go to Verſailles yeſterday, for I thought it not proper till I had his majeſty's orders; and I am confident, that there are none here, if they dare to own their opinion, but they muſt ſay, that I am in the right. I think I ſhould have made a worſe figure than count Zinzendorf did, when he was preſent whilſt the duke of Anjou was declared king of Spain. I was ſatisfied, that the whole diſcourſe would be of their new 'Roy d'Angleterre,' and of the French king's going to make him the firſt viſit at St. Germain's, which he did that day. He ſtaid but a little with him, giving him the title of majeſty. He was with the queen a conſiderable time. The reſt of the court made their compliments the ſame day. I am told, that M. de Torcy declares, that this does not any way alter the intentions of the king from obſerving the treaty of Ryſwick, and he alledges ſeveral examples in the like caſes. He ſeemed concerned, that I was not there; and he did deſire one to let me know, that he ſhould be at Paris on Friday, and that he would either wait on me, or be glad to ſee me. I intend to ſee him, and to hear what he will ſay, and then I ſhall acquaint you with it. I have had a very difficult part to act, and I cannot but ſee this will make it worſe.

To Mr. Secretary Vernon.

Paris, Sept. 24, 1701.

I have ſeen Monſieur de Torcy, who did endeavour to put the beſt colour on this laſt proceeding. His chief aim was to ſhew me, that there was nothing in this contrary to the treaty of Ryſwick; and I could perceive, that the French king was brought to do it at the ſollicitation of the queen at St. Germain's. It is certain, that Monſieur de Torcy, as well as the reſt of the miniſtry fity, conformable to treaties, and to what he has done for the late king of England, ſince he ſought an aſylum in France.'

But this manifeſto could not paſs on the world, ſince the owning the pretender's right was a plain declaration, that France would aſſiſt him in claiming it, whenever the ſtate of their affairs would allow of it. However, monſieur Pouſſin, who had been ſecretary to monſieur de Tollard, and was left by him in England to manage the affairs of his court there, offered to preſent this manifeſto to ſecretary Vernon, who refuſing to receive it, he cauſed the ſubſtance of it to be publiſhed under the title of, 'The French king's reaſons for owning the pretended prince of Wales king of England,' ſuppoſed to be communicated in a letter from Paris to a friend in London. Theſe reaſons were ſuppreſſed by the command of government, and monſieur Pouſſin ordered to leave the kingdom by a limited time; though, a night or two before his departure, a thing happened, which made a great deal of noiſe; for he was found at ſupper at a public tavern, with three members of the houſe of commons, who were zealous oppoſers of the court, 'Mr. Anthony Hammond, Mr. John Tredenham, and Dr. Charles Davenant.' This gave an alarm of ſecret correſpondence; and, though they excuſed themſelves upon accident and common civility, yet they fell under great odium; and with others of their party were branded by the name of Pouſſineers, in a paper called the 'Black Liſt'.[a]

The conduct of the French court gave an univerſal diſtaſte to the whole Engliſh nation: All people ſeemed poſſeſſed with an high indignation upon it, to ſee a foreign power, that was at peace with them, pretend to declare, who ought to be their king. Even thoſe, who were perhaps ſecretly well pleaſed with it, were yet, as it were forced, for their own ſafety, to comply with the general ſenſe of the reſt in this matter. The city of London began with an addreſs, which was preſented to the lords juſtices, in which they expreſſed, 'That they were deeply ſenſible, how much they were in duty bound, highly to reſent that great indignity and affront offered to his majeſty by the French king, in giving the title of king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the pretended prince of Wales, contrary to his majeſty's moſt juſt and lawful title, and to the ſeveral acts of parliament for ſettling the ſucceſſion to the crown in the proteſtant line. That by this it was apparent, that he deſigned, as much as in him lay, to dethrone his majeſty, to extirpate the proteſtant religion out of theſe his majeſty's kingdoms, and to invade their liberties and properties, for the maintaining whereof his majeſty had ſignalized his zeal by the often hazarding his precious life. They therefore aſſured his majeſty, that they would at all times, and upon all occaſions, exert the utmoſt of their abilities, and contribute whatever lay in their power for the preſervation of his perſon, and the defence of his juſt rights, in oppoſition to all invaders of his crown and dignity.'

This addreſs being tranſmitted to the king in Holland, his majeſty gave ſpecial directions to the lords juſtices, to acquaint the lord mayor and aldermen with the great ſatisfaction he had upon the receiving it. According to this precedent, numerous addreſſes came from all parts of the kingdom. A great diverſity of ſtile appeared in theſe addreſſes; ſome avoided to name the French king, the prince of Wales, or the act of ſettlement, and only reflected on the tranſaction in France in general ſoft words. But others carried the matter farther, encouraging the king to go on in his alliances, promiſing him all faithful aſſiſtance in ſupporting them; and aſſuring him, that, when he ſhould think fit to call a new parliament, they would chuſe ſuch members, as ſhould concur in enabling him to maintain his alliances. This raiſed the diviſions of the nation higher.

The king having finiſhed his alliances, and eſpecially that between England, Holland, and the empire, began to prepare for his return; but was detained at the Hague above a month by a ſevere indiſpoſition, which was concealed as much as poſſible, becauſe the very news of his ſickneſs would have been an obſtruction to the intereſts of Europe: and, if his death had happened at that time, it muſt have occaſioned great confuſion in England, and other parts. The king be-miniſters, was againſt it; and only the Dauphin and madam de Maintenon, whom the queen had prevailed with, carried this point; which I am ſatisfied they may have reaſon to repent of. It begins to appear already, ſince I can aſſure you, that, if I take my leave, it will cauſe an univerſal conſternation here. I ſee, that they are in no condition to ſupport a war, and the affairs of France were never in ſo ill a poſture. I told him my mind very freely, and there is ſo much to ſay on this ſubject, that he could not anſwer me. I ſaid, that it was ſuch a precedent, as might come home to them at laſt: That there were others, who pretended to the crown of Spain, as well as the preſent king, and I left him to judge how that would be liked, if we ſhould act as they do. It is not neceſſary to repeat all that paſſed; but, when I take myſelf to be in the right, I am apt enough to ſpeak plain. I found him very calm, and even concerned. Without doubt they expect I ſhall be recalled; and they will be ſorry, if it ſhould happen ſo at laſt. I told him I would wait his majeſty's orders, and till then I could ſay nothing to this matter: That I ſuppoſed I ſhould have them ſoon, and then I would acquaint him with them. He ſaid, he hoped to ſee me at Fontainebleau. He entered on the ſubject of the negotiation, and how the peace would ſet all right. I told him, that it was viſible, what difficulties there have been in relation to the emperor; and that there was no occaſion for creating new ones, which might oblige us to take ſuch meaſures, as poſſibly we might otherwiſe not take. I know, that the king ordered Monſieur de Torcy to ſoften this matter to me as much as he could. I have thought of laying this whole conference, which laſted an hour, before his majeſty; though there is no relying on what this court ſays or does, after what we have ſeen. I am afraid of even giving my opinion; and it would be better, if I could have the honour to relate this to his majeſty by diſcourſe; though I fear there never will be any treating with this court without great vigour and reſolution, and with ſword in hand.

To Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, Sept. 26, 1701.

I have ſeen Monſieur de Torcy, who did endeavour to put the beſt colour on the late proceedings. The will of the late king James is opened, but not yet publiſhed; but I hear it is to be printed. What I have learned of it is, that the queen is made regent; the French king is deſired to take care of the education of the P. Prince: That, in caſe he be reſtored, the queen is to be repaid all that ſhe has laid out of her own: That all other debts, which they have contracted ſince they left England, and what can be made out, ſhall be paid: That the new king ſhall not take any revenge againſt his father's enemies, nor his own: That he ſhall not uſe any force in matters of religion, nor in relation to the eſtates of any perſons whatſoever. He recommends to him all thoſe that have followed him. I am told, that lord Perth is declared a duke, and Caryl a lord. I do not doubt but we ſhall hear of ſeveral new titles and garters. Certainly there ought to be ſome ſtop put to all this, elſe we ſhall not know where we are.

To Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Sept. 28, 1701.

I have received yours of the 11th, and am much obliged to their excellencies for the repreſentation they have made to his majeſty. I am confident, that the king will be of that opinion, ſince they are ſo. I was unwilling to preſs this matter, leſt conjectures might have been made to my diſadvantage; though I hope it is apparent, that the only aim I have is his majeſty's ſervice, and the honour of the nation. I am ſatisfied, that this court will contrive matters ſo, that it cannot be long before they will oblige me to be gone. Their actions ſhew, there is nothing now left but that. The owning the P. Prince, is againſt the fourth article of the treaty of Ryſwick, if words can mean any thing; and the prohibition of our commerce is againſt the fifth article of the ſame treaty. But theſe are ſmall matters to what you would have ſeen, had it been in their power. The only ſatisfaction we have is, that all Europe muſt be convinced, that his majeſty is not for engaging them in a war, if it can be prevented; but you know already my opinion. The will of the late king will be printed, and I hope to ſend it to you by the next poſt. There are to be great numbers ſent into England, ſo that poſſibly you may have it before me. Lord Middleton is declared earl of Monmouth by this will; Lord Perth is to be a duke by an old patent; but they ſay lord Middleton will not take his new title. There are ſeveral other lords made, but not yet declared; ſo that the houſe of lords will be well filled at their return. We ſhall ſoon hear, that ſome garters are diſpoſed of. It is a comical ſcene, and I hope it will end ſo. I find M. Pouſſin is a very pleaſant gentleman: I could ſend you many ſtories of him from hence. I am glad he is at laſt puzzled about our fleet. They are very uneaſy about it here, and would fain known what we intend to do with it.

To Mr. ſecretary Vernon.

Paris, Octob. 1. 1701.

Laſt night arrived here a meſſenger from Loo. Mr. Blathwayt acquaints me, that his majeſty, having conſidered the proceedings of this court, does order me to return to England forthwith, without taking leave. I am only to let Monſieur de Torcy know the reaſons, why his majeſty does not think it for his honour, nor ſervice, to continue longer any embaſſador or other miniſter here. I propoſe to ſet out in leſs than ten days, and I do deſire their excellencies the lords juſtices will order a yacht for me at Calais. I cannot but think this reſolution is right, and I am glad it is taken; though, in relation to myſelf, I could have wiſhed there had been no occaſion for it, that ſo I might have left this court in a better manner.

To Mr. Blathwayt.

Paris, Octob. 4. 1701.

Mr. Collins, the meſſenger, arrived here on the 30th paſt with his majeſty's orders; and the next day I received a duplicate of them by the poſt. On the 2d inſtant, I acquainted Monſieur de Torcy with them, in the manner you had directed me, and I have incloſed his anſwer. I have ſome reaſon to think, that the court was a little ſurprized, though they might reaſonably expect ſuch reſentment. You will ſee, that monſieur de Torcy refers me to the conference I had with him before he went to Fontainebleau, of which I have already informed you. I muſt own, that they are much civiler on this occaſion, than I expected they would have been; and I have great obligations to Monſieur de Torcy, who has, on all occaſions, ſhewed himſelf extreme kind to me, and even in this caſe he expreſſes it. He will procure me paſſports for my goods, elſe I ſhould not have known what to do. I intend to ſet out for England by the 10th.

[a] The ſtory is thus related by a writer of their own party, ſuppoſed to be Dr. Davenant, in a piece intitled, 'Tom Double returned out of the country: Or, the true picture of a Modern Whig, ſet forth in a ſecond dialogue between Mr. Whiglove and Mr. Double.' He tells us, p. 48, 49. that Mr. Hammond and Mr. Tredenham had agreed to ſup together that night. About ſeven in the evening Mr. Hammond and one Mr. Awberry, a perſon of good ſubſtance and credit in the city, came to give Dr. Davenant a viſit at Gray's-Inn.

gan now to conſider his illneſs as a preſage, that he had not long to live; and was ſo ſenſible of his declining ſtate, that he told the earl of Portland, 'That he found himſelf ſo weak, that he could not expect to live another ſummer;' but charged him, at the ſame time, 'to ſay nothing of it till he was dead.'

The king at laſt embarked towards the beginning of November, and landed at Margate on the 4th of that month; and the firſt thing, that fell under debate, upon his return, was, whether the parliament ſhould be continued, or diſſolved, and a new one called. Some of the leading men of the former parliament had been ſecretly aſked, how they thought they ſhould proceed, if they ſhould meet again? Of theſe, whilſt ſome anſwered doubtfully, others ſaid poſitively, that they would begin where they had left off, and would inſiſt on their impeachments. The new miniſtry ſtruggled hard againſt a diſſolution, and, when they ſaw the king reſolved on it, ſome of them left his ſervice. This convinced the nation, that the king was not in a double game, which had been confidently given out before, and was too eaſily believed by many. The parliament being firſt prorogued till the 13th of November, a proclamation was publiſhed on the 11th of that month for diſſolving it, and ſummoning another to meet at Weſtminſter on the 30th of December. The heats in elections increaſed with every new ſummons; and this was thought ſo critical a conjuncture, that both ſides exerted their full ſtrength [b]. Moſt of the great counties and the chief cities choſe men, who were zealous for the king and government [c]; but the rotten part of our conſtitution, as an eminent author ſtiles the ſmall boroughs, were in many places wrought on to chuſe bad men. However, upon the whole, it appeared, that a clear majority was in the king's intereſts.

The parliament being met, according to their ſummons, on the 30th of December, the king came to the houſe of peers, and ſent for the commons to whom the lord-keeper ſignified his majeſty's pleaſure, that they ſhould forthwith proceed to the choice of a ſpeaker, and preſent him the next morning. The competition for that office lay between Mr. Robert Harley and ſir Thomas Littleton. The king and council inclined to ſir Thomas; but Mr. Harley was elected Inn. The doctor propoſed to them ſupping at a tavern in Holbourn; but Mr. Hammond anſwered, he was engaged to meet Mr. Tredenham at the other end of the town, and deſired the doctor and Mr. Awberry to be of their company, but Mr. Awberry ſaid he had buſineſs in the city. So they went together without him, and in the way made a viſit, where they ſtaid till near nine of the clock. From thence they went to Mr. Tredenham's lodgings, who had left word he was at the Blue Poſts in the Hay-market; whom accordingly they found there with D. Bernardino, the Spaniſh conſul, whom he had met in the Park, and, being an old acquaintance, had propoſed ſupping with him. In a quarter of an hour ſupper came in: When the meat was actually upon the table, it ſeems monſieur Pouſſin came to that houſe, and inquired for D. Bernardino. The drawer fetched out Bernardino to him, who told monſieur Pouſſin he was at ſupper there with Mr. Tredenham, who had a general acquaintance with monſieur Pouſſin, they having lodged in the ſame houſe together. Upon which D. Bernardino brought monſieur Pouſſin into the room; but, ſeeing two ſtrangers there, he made an apology, and ſat down. They ſupped in a ground-room, the door being all the while open, and two waiters attending; and after three quarters of an hour's ſtay at moſt, as ſoon as ſupper was ended, the company ſeparated.

[b] There was publiſhed upon this occaſion a pamphlet in 4to, intitled, 'The Candidates tried: Or, a certain way how to avoid miſtakes in chuſing members for the enſuing parliament:' The author of which begins with obſerving, 'That there is no perſon in the leaſt acquainted with the preſent poſture of affairs, but muſt ſee, that upon the choice of a good or ill houſe of commons depends the happineſs or miſery of this nation; and therefore it is, that our moſt gracious king has, by diſſolving the laſt parliament, given his people an opportunity of chuſing ſuch perſons, as may inable his majeſty, in conjunction with his allies, to reſtore the balance of Europe. How neceſſary this is to be, I need not, 'ſays he,' mention, ſince nothing can be plainer, than that if Spain and the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies, or Flanders, remain in the power of France, the nation is irrecoverably loſt; and that, if we miſs this opportunity, we cannot in all human probability expect another. And conſequently an ill choice at this juncture is ſuch an error, as can never be retrieved. Therefore it is highly neceſſary to offer ſome marks, whereby perſons of the meaneſt capacities may diſtinguiſh their friends from their enemies; thoſe, that pretend to be ſo, from thoſe, that are really ſo.' He then ſhews, that, as the nation was divided into two parties, known in former reigns by the names of Whigs and Tories, ſo it was plain, that the papiſts, the ſwearing and the non-ſwearing Jacobites, agree in applauding and ſupporting the latter, and in reviling and oppoſing the former. And therefore thoſe, who were not otherwiſe capable of diſcovering the nation's friends from its enemies, could not well be miſtaken, if in all elections they went counter to the Jacobites, and oppoſed the party they eſpouſed. To ſhew that it was reaſonable to act thus, he examines what grounds the Tory party had given the Jacobites to be ſo much in love with them, and by conſequence for the well-wiſhers to the government and the proteſtant religion, not to confide in them. 'Have not theſe,' ſays he, 'good reaſons for their kindneſs, ſince the party, eſpecially their leaders, have all along ſhewn their diſaffection to the preſent eſtabliſhment? How could they declare themſelves fuller for what they call the right line than by oppoſing the abdication, the recognition, not allowing his majeſty to be rightful king, and againſt entering into an aſſociation to preſerve his majeſty and the government, when in moſt imminent danger? They owe them eternal gratitude for oppoſing all ſuch equal and eaſy methods for raiſing money as would have kept us out of debt, on pretence leſt the king, whoſe ambition and delight it was to head armies, might, by the eaſe the people found in paying them, be tempted to perpetuate the war, or elſe the nation might be induced to continue them in time of peace. By which means we run into land-banks and other deficient funds, which deſtroyed credit, and plunged the nation in immenſe debts. The party, not content herewith, were againſt recoining the money, though it is evident, that not doing of it would have brought us into confuſion. Afterwards they not only oppoſed its going by weight till recoined, but obliged the nation to make good all that was clipped, or to be clipped, by ſuch a time, of which none had any advantage but the traders in money, who, of all men, did not deſerve ſuch a favour. Neither was this all, but they were for raiſing the ſilver coin; and when they could not carry that, they fought it out to the laſt for keeping up the price of guineas. What could the Jacobites deſire more, ſince that very thing (had it proved ſucceſsful) would have been of moſt fatal conſequence? It is certain the French king depended very much on this project; for, when he found the nation, notwithſtanding the counter-aſſurances given him by his creatures, had overcome all the difficulties relating to the re-coining of the money, he deſpaired of bringing about his deſigns by a war, but hoped to do it more effectually in a time of peace by the jealouſies, diviſions, and animoſities he could ſet on foot by the help of his party here.' He then proceeds to obſerve, that the Jacobites could not be miſtaken in their men,' when thoſe, that were moſt inſtrumental in the late reigns to carry on their villainous deſigns, are the leading men of that party now; and, the more they were concerned in promoting Popery and ſlavery at home, and abroad in depreſſing of Holland, and exalting of France, the more they are careſſed; as if that, and a violent oppoſition to the preſent conſtitution, joined with an implacable hatred to all its friends, were the qualifications that moſt recommended them to head the party. 'He then expoſes their conduct in endeavouring to ſave ſir John Fenwick, when they were convinced in conſcience, that he was guilty; and, though they had pretended to abandon their former Tory principles, this was only a ſcheme of diſſimulation the better to effect their deſigns, and to ingratiate themſelves with the people. That, with regard to the act of ſucceſſion, 'though they could not have oppoſed it openly, without putting off the maſk, and it muſt have gone down, whether they would or not, having the weight of the nation with it, yet they did what they could to ſhew their diſlike of it, by treating it with an air of contempt and ridicule, and their putting ſir John Bowles in the chair, and conſtantly running out of the houſe as ſoon as he had taken it, was no ſign they intended it any great honour. In a word, their conduct was ſuch, that the lords, though they deſigned ſeveral amendments, durſt not truſt the bill down again, for fear it might occaſion the loſing it, and ſo immediately paſſed it.' He is very full likewiſe in ſhewing how great friends the Tory party, in the two houſes, and thoſe in the miniſtry, had been to France, by their conduct upon the French king's making his grandſon king of Spain, and in many other inſtances.

[c] The city of London and the borough of Southwark delivered to their members remarkable papers of inſtructions. That from the city was as to follows:

'Gentlemen,

'We earneſtly deſire and charge you, our repreſentatives, that in the approaching parliament you heartily purſue the engagements made to his majeſty in the addreſs of this city, and other loyal addreſſes from all parts of the kingdom. To this purpoſe we expect, that, to the utmoſt of your power, and without loſs of time, you endeavour to put his majeſty into a condition to maintain his undoubted right and title to the crown, and to vindicate his and the nation's honour: To enable him in this critical juncture to provide for the ſecurity of his kingdoms; to appear at the head of the proteſtant intereſt; to make good his alliances, and, in conjunction with his allies, ſo to reduce the French king, that it may be no longer in his power to diſturb and oppreſs the reſt of Europe.

'In order to theſe good ends, we deſire you diligently to labour to preſerve an entire good correſpondence between the two houſes of parliament and hinder the purſuing of private piques and animoſities; to take care of our trade, ſupport public credit, make good the deficiencies, and to have ſpecial regard to the royal navy. And ſo God proſper your undertakings.'

That from the borough of Southwark give ſo diſtinct and conciſe a recapitulation of the affairs of Europe, that it is more remarkable than the other.

'Gentlemen,

'It is notorious, that for more than forty years the French king hath affected univerſal monarchy; that he has conſtantly purſued the ſame by all methods of violence, rapine, and injuſtice; and that he has no otherwiſe regarded his oaths, treaties, and religion, than as ſo many ſolemn cheats to catch and inſnare all that have depended on him.

'To inable himſelf to marry the Infanta of Spain, he, by oath, renounced any title to that crown for all the iſſue of that marriage; yet he hath made the invalidity of that renunciation the ground-work of every one of his wars with the king of Spain.

'By the Pyrenean treaty, he ſtipulated with that king to give no aſſiſtance to his enemy the king of Portugal; yet preſently after diſpatched ſo many troops to the aſſiſtance of that prince, as reduced the Spaniſh monarchy to a degree of weakneſs, from which it hath never ſince recovered.

'He lulled the Spaniard aſleep with repeated promiſes of friendſhip; and then, without giving him any time to prepare for his defence, carried his conqueſts over the greateſt part of Flanders, and was prevented only by the triple alliance of England, Holland, and the king of Sweden, from reducing of the remainder of that province.

'To the everlaſting diſhonour of the late king Charles II. he diſengaged that prince from ſo neceſſary an alliance, and preſently after invaded the ſeven United Provinces with all his forces; and could give no better reaſon for a bloody war, which reduced thoſe flouriſhing ſtates almoſt to utter ruin than that he had been ill ſatisfied with their conduct.

'To break a powerful confederacy againſt him, he made the peace of Nimeguen, by which conceſſion was made to him of almoſt all his conqueſts in that war; and immediately after invaded the empire himſelf, to aſſiſt his infidel confederate.

'The peace of Ryſwick gave an end to that war, and a balance to Europe, till the French king, by colour of a will ſurreptitiouſly gained from the late king of Spain, in favour of the duke of Anjou, has poſſeſſed himſelf of the Spaniſh monarchy, contrary to his own renunciation and the Pyrenean treaty. Flanders and Milan he hath inveſted with his own troops, while the duke of Anjou by a majority of fourteen voices. The king opened the parliament with the beſt ſpeech that he, or perhaps any other prince, ever made to his people [d].

My lords and gentlemen,

"I promiſe myſelf you are met together full of that juſt ſenſe of the common danger of Europe, and the reſentment of the late proceedings of the French king, which has been ſo fully and univerſally expreſſed in the loyal and ſeaſonable addreſſes of my people.

"The owning and ſetting up the pretended prince of Wales for king of England, is not only the higheſt indignity offered to me and the nation, but does ſo nearly concern every man, who has a regard for the Proteſtant religion, or the preſent and future quiet and happineſs of his country, that I need not preſs you to lay it ſeriouſly to heart, and to conſider what future effectual means may be uſed, for ſecuring the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, and extinguiſhing the hopes of all pretenders, and their open and ſecret abettors.

"By the French king's placing his grandſon on the throne of Spain, he is in a condition to oppreſs the reſt of Europe, unleſs ſpeedy and effectual meaſures be taken. Under this pretence, he is become the real maſter of the whole Spaniſh monarchy; he has made it to be entirely depending on France, and diſpoſes of it, as of his own dominions, and by that means he has ſurrounded his neighbours in ſuch a manner, that, that though the name of peace may be ſaid to continue, yet they are put to the expence and inconveniencies of war.

"This muſt affect England in the neareſt and moſt ſenſible manner, in reſpect to our trade, which will ſoon become precarious in all the variable branches of it; in reſpect to our peace and ſafety at home, which we cannot hope ſhould long continue; and in reſpect to that part, which England ought to take in the preſervation of the liberty of Europe.

"In order to obviate the general calamity, with which the reſt of Chriſtendom is threatened by this exorbitant power of France, I have concluded ſeveral alliances, according to the encouragement given me by both houſes of parliament, which I will direct ſhall be laid before you, and which, I doubt not, you will enable me to make good.

"There are ſome other treaties ſtill depending, that ſhall be likewiſe communicated to you as ſoon as they are perfected.

"It is fit I ſhould tell you, the eyes of all Europe are upon this parliament; all matters are at a ſtand, till your reſolutions are known; and therefore no time ought to be loſt.

"You have yet an opportunity, by God's bleſſing, to ſecure to you and your poſterity the quiet enjoyment of your religion and liberties, if you are not wanting to yourſelves, but will exert the antient vigour of the Engliſh nation, but I tell you plainly, my opinion is, if you do not lay hold on this occaſion, you have no reaſon to hope for another.

"In order to do your part, it will be neceſſary to get a great ſtrength at ſea, and to provide for the ſecurity of our ſhips in harbour; and alſo that there be ſuch a force at land, as is expected in proportion to the forces of our allies.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I do recommend theſe matters to you with with that concern and earneſtneſs, which their importance requires. At the ſame time I cannot but preſs you to take care of the public credit, which cannot be preſerved but by keeping ſacred that maxim, That they ſhall never be loſers, who truſt to a parliamentary ſecurity.

"It is always with regret, when I do aſk aids of my people; but you will obſerve, that I deſire nothing, which relates to any perſonal expence of mine; I am only preſſing you to do all you can for your own ſafety and honour, at ſo critical and dangerous a time; and am willing, that what is given, ſhould be wholly appropriated to the purpoſes for which it is intended.

"And, ſince I am ſpeaking on this head, I think it proper to put you in mind, that, during the late war, I ordered the accounts to be laid yearly before the parliament, and alſo gave the aſſent to ſeveral bills for taking the pnblic accounts, that my ſubjects might have the ſatisfaction to know, how the money given for the war was applied; and I am willing that matter may be put in any further way of examination, that it may appear, whether there were any miſapplications and miſmanagements; or whether the debt, that remains upon us, has really ariſen from the ſhortneſs of the ſupplies, or the deficiency of the funds.

"I have already told you, how neceſſary diſpatch will be for carrying on that great public buſineſs, whereon our ſafety, and all that is valuable to us depends. I hope, what time can be ſpared will be employed about thoſe other very deſirable things, which I have ſo often recommended from the throne; I mean, the forming ſome good bills for employing the poor, for encouraging trade, and the further ſuppreſſing of vice.

My lords and gentlemen,

"I hope you are come together determined to avoid all manner of diſputes and differences; and reſolved to act with a general and hearty concurrence for promoting the common cauſe, which alone can make this a happy ſeſſion.

"I ſhould think it as great a bleſſing as could befal England, if I could obſerve you as much inclined to lay aſide thoſe unhappy fatal animoſities, which divide and weaken you, as I am diſpoſed to make all my ſubjects ſafe and eaſy as to any, even the higheſt offences committed againſt me.

"Let me conjure you to diſappoint the only hopes of our enemies by your unanimity. I have ſhewn, and will always ſhew, how deſirous I am to be the common father of all my people. Do you, in like manner, lay aſide parties and diviſions. Let there be no other diſtinction heard of amongſt us for the future, but of thoſe who are for the Proteſtant religion, and the preſent eſtabliſhment, and of thoſe, who mean a Popiſh prince, and a French government.

Anjou is forced to govern the reſt of that monarchy, as viceroy to his grandfather, both to obtain his ſupport, and for fear of being excluded from a better kingdom.

'He has exalted himſelf upon this good ſucceſs, and has already named a viceroy for more countries, by giving the title of his majeſty's kingdoms to the pretended prince of Wales. Our condition muſt be very miſerable, if we are to be governed by the diſcretion of a king, who hath deſtroyed the proteſtants of his own kingdom by the ſword, fire, and gallies: We cannot hope to be uſed with greater tenderneſs than his own ſubjects.

'Nevertheleſs, we cannot doubt but his repeated ill ſucceſs in Italy, the vaſt debts of his crown, increaſed by his prodigious expences among his confederate princes, will oblige him to offer a treaty, that he may ſave by a peace, a conſiderable ſhare of the Spaniſh monarchy, rather than loſe the whole by a war. And we had reaſon to be afraid, that the diviſion of the two houſes of parliament, the animoſities of thoſe men, that have oppoſed the Settlement, the Recognition and Aſſociation, and the Great Authority of others, who, in former reigns, had always given countenance for the French invaſions, might oblige his majeſty to hearken to ſuch a peace, as France would pleaſe to give him.

'But we hope, gentlemen, that the diſſolution of the parliament has put an end to the diviſion of the two houſes; and we have that aſſurance of your integrity and moderation, that you will do nothing to revive the ſame diviſion. It is indeed very popular and very juſt to be ſevere with ſuch miniſters, as have betrayed the commonwealth. But, when the lords, ſo conſiderable a part of the legiſlative power, have eſpouſed the innocency of any perſon, we hope you will either give credit to their authority, or defer your reſentments during our common danger. We are aſſured, that you will neither join with the enemies of the king, nor with the advocates of France, to hang upon the wheels of the government.

'We beſeech you, gentlemen, not to be amuſed with the offers of any treaties from the French king; or, for the ſake thereof, to defer any ſupplies, that ſhall be convenient, before he ſhall have given entire ſatisfaction to the emperor for his right to the Spaniſh monarchy, and to his majeſty for the affront put upon him and his people, by giving the title of his kingdoms to the pretended prince of Wales. We hope you will be ready upon all occaſions to addreſs the king, that he will never enter into any treaty with France, which ſhall not effectually ſecure to his people their religion and commerce.

'We beſeech you, gentlemen, that, ſetting aſide all other buſineſs, you will be ſo early and ſo liberal in your ſupplies to his majeſty, to ſupport his great alliances, that France may have no hopes, nor her enemies any fears of the neutrality of England. That other princes, like thoſe of Savoy, Portugal, and Cologne, may not make ſeparate treaties for themſelves with the common enemy of Europe.

'We beſeech you, gentlemen, to be careful of the credit of the government, and to join your votes with ſuch as ſhall be for the moſt ſpeedy and moſt eaſy methods of raiſing money; that the blame of buying every thing for the king at exceſſive prices may not be caſt upon the miniſters, which has been moſt juſtly due to the diſtance or inſufficiency of thoſe funds, which parliament have given.

'Above all, gentlemen, we conjure you to be moſt tender of the perſon of his majeſty; that no indignity may be offered to a prince born for the good of Europe; to diſtinguiſh between one that ſits upon his throne, and ſends generals abroad to make ſlaughters and deſolation among his neighbours, and a king, who has ſo liberally and ſo generouſly expoſed his life for the liberty of his country againſt this common enemy.'

[d] 'The lord Sommers is ſuppoſed to have aſſiſted in framing this ſpeech, which was ſo acceptable to the well-wiſhers of the revolution, and their friends abroad, that it was printed with decorations in Engliſh, Dutch, and French, and hung up in frames in almoſt every houſe in England and Holland, as his Majeſty's laſt legacy to his own and all Proteſtant people.

" I will only add this; if you do in good earneſt deſire to ſee England hold the balance of Europe, and to be indeed at the head of the Proteſtant intereſt, it will appear by your right improving the preſent opportunity."

[1701-2] This wiſe and affectionate ſpeech was extremely grateful to both houſes, and they were very unanimous in their thanks for it. The lords began the new year with expreſſing, 'That they had heard with all imaginable ſatisfaction his majeſty's moſt gracious ſpeech, for which they returned their moſt humble and hearty thanks. And though the ſeveral particulars, which his majeſty was pleaſed to recommend to them, were of the higheſt importance; and they would loſe no time in proceeding to the conſideration of them with great duty to his majeſty; yet they could not defer expreſſing their juſt reſentments of the proceedings of the French king, in owning and ſetting up the pretended prince of Wales for king of England, and other his majeſty's realms and dominions; which they took to be the higheſt indignity, that could be offered to his ſacred majeſty and this kingdom. And they aſſured his majeſty, they were ſo ſenſible thereof, that they were reſolved to aſſiſt his majeſty to the utmoſt of their power in defending his ſacred perſon and government from all attempts whatſoever, that ſhould be made either from his open or ſecret enemies. And, that no enemies to their religion and country might ever hope to proſper in their attempts againſt them, when, to their great unhappineſs, it ſhould pleaſe God to deprive them of his majeſty's protection, they further declared their reſolutions to aſſiſt and defend, to the utmoſt of their power, againſt the pretended prince of Wales, and all other pretenders whatſoever, every perſon and perſons, who had right to ſucceed to the crown of theſe realms, by virtue of theſe two acts of parliament, intitled, 'An act declaring the rights and liberties of the ſubject, and ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown; and, 'An act for the further limitation of the crown, and better ſecuring the rights and liberties of the ſubject.' And they concluded with their earneſt prayers to almighty God, for his majeſty's long and happy reign over them.'

Their lordſhips ordered all ſuch, as were willing, to ſign this addreſs, which was entered into their books. This was without a precedent, and yet it was promoted by thoſe, who as was thought, hoped, by ſo unuſual a practice, to prevent any further proceedings on that head.

To this addreſs his majeſty made this anſwer, " I heartily thank you for your very ſeaſonable addreſs, and for all your kind expreſſions of duty to me in it; and I recommend to you to take into your ſpeedy conſideration the other matters mentioned in my ſpeech, and doubt not but that your reſolutions will be for the honour and ſafety of the kingdom.'

The commons likewiſe, on the 5th of January, 'returned their moſt humble and hearty thanks to his majeſty for his moſt gracious ſpeech, and humbly craved leave to aſſure him, that they would ſupport and defend his lawful and rightful title to the crown of theſe realms againſt the pretended prince of Wales, and all his open and ſecret abettors and adherents, and all his majeſty's enemies whatſoever: And that they would inable him to ſhew his juſt reſentment of the affront and indignity offered to his majeſty and this nation by the French king, in taking upon him to declare the pretended prince of Wales king of England, Scotland, and Ireland: And that they were firmly and unanimouſly reſolved to maintain and ſupport the ſucceſſion to the imperial crown of this realm, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, in the proteſtant line, as the ſame was ſettled by an act, declaring the rights and liberties of the ſubject, and ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown, and further provided for by an act of the laſt parliament, intitled, 'An act for the further limitation of the crown, &c.' And they declared, that, for the better effecting the ſame, they would, to the utmoſt of their power inable his majeſty to make good all thoſe alliances his majeſty had made or ſhould make, purſuant to the addreſſes and advices of his moſt dutiful and loyal commons of the laſt parliament, for the preſerving the liberties of Europe, and reducing the exorbitant power of France.'

To this addreſs the king returned the following anſwer:

Gentlemen,

" I give you hearty thanks for this addreſs, which I look upon as a good omen for the ſeſſion. The unanimity, with which it paſſed, adds greatly to the ſatisfaction I receive from it. So good a ſtep, at your firſt entrance upon buſineſs, cannot but raiſe the hopes of all, who wiſh well to England and the common cauſe. I can deſire no more of you, than to proceed as you have begun; and I depend upon it. For, when I conſider how cheerfully and univerſally you concurred in this addreſs, I cannot doubt but every one of you will ſincerely endeavour to make it effectual in all the parts of it."

The lords having taken into conſideration the dangerous ſtate of Europe, more eſpecially ariſing from the duke of Anjou's poſſeſſing the crown of Spain, which made in effect a conjunction with France, and ſo muſt inevitably overthrow the balance of power, unleſs timely prevented by ſtrong alliances of other ſtates and princes, the 6th of January preſented a ſecond addreſs to the king, wherein they made ſo true and ample a repreſentation of the French king's unjuſt and violent proceedings, that it greatly helped to confirm every one in their juſt abhorrence of them, and their zeal to have him reduced to reaſon [e].

To bring the houſe of commons into more effectual meaſures for eſpouſing and ſupporting the cauſe of a new war, the king commanded Mr. ſecretary Vernon to lay before them the copies of the treaties of the grand alliance, viz. 1. The treaty between himſelf, the king of Denmark, and the States General, June 15, 1701. 2. The ſecret articles of that treaty. 3. The treaty between the emperor, his majeſty, and the States-general, Sept. 7, 1701. 4. A convention between his majeſty and the States-General, Sept. 26th, 1701. 5. The treaty between his majeſty and the States-General, Novemb. 11, 1701. All which were ſo well approved, that the houſe immediately reſolved, that a ſupply be granted to his majeſty; and that whoever ſhould advance or lend to his majeſty's exchequer the ſum of ſix hundred thouſand pounds, for the ſervice of the fleet, ſhould be repaid the ſame with intereſt at ſix per cent. out of the firſt aids to be granted this ſeſſion: And that whoſoever ſhould advance the further ſum of fifty thouſand pounds, for the ſubſiſtence of the guards and garriſons, ſhould be repaid in like manner.

They then took the ſtate of the navy into conſideration, and ordered the commiſſioners of the admiralty to lay before that

[e] This addreſs was as follows:

'We your majeſty's loyal and dutiful ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, are highly ſenſible of what we owe to almighty God for the great deliverance he hath wrought for us by your majeſty. We are highly ſenſible of his mercies in preſerving you hitherto in ſo many public and private dangers, to which your ſacred perſon hath been expoſed; and we hope the ſame providence will carry your majeſty through the great work, which ſeems reſerved for you, the reducing the exorbitant power of France, and maintaining the balance of Europe.

'All true Engliſhmen, ſince the decay of the Spaniſh monarchy, have ever taken it for granted, that the ſecurity of their religion, liberty and property, that their honour, their wealth, and their trade, depend chiefly upon the proper meaſures to be taken from time to time in parliament againſt the growing power of France. But it is their peculiar bleſſing in your majeſty's reign, to have a prince upon the throne, who not only agrees with them in this opinion, but who, in the frequent parliaments aſſembled, is ever reminding them of this their greateſt concern; and who, to compleat their happineſs, is always ready, with the hazard of his perſon, to ſupport his ſubjects and allies, againſt their common enemy.

'And we eſteem it a further good fortune, in the time of public danger, that the French king has taken thoſe meaſures, which will make it impoſſible for him to impoſe any more upon the world by treaties ſo often violated. Neither can he hope any longer to cover his ambitious deſigns, or juſtify his uſurpations under the ſpecious pretences of peace.

'Your majeſty has ſo juſtly repreſented the danger, to which Europe is expoſed by the French king's placing his grandſon on the throne of Spain; your majeſty is ſo juſtly ſenſible, that under that pretence he is become abſolute maſter of the whole Spaniſh monarchy; and we are ſo well apprized of the dangerous conſequence of this bold attempt, that we think it moſt proper to aſſure your majeſty in your own words, that we are under the higheſt impatience, that ſpeedy and effectual meaſures may be taken againſt the undoubted ambition of the French king.

'And as the placing his grandſon upon the throne of Spain is, viſibly to the whole world, the cauſe of all thoſe dangers mentioned in your majeſty's ſpeech, and of the breach of the balance of power of Europe, which the people of England are ſo deeply engaged to preſerve; ſo we humbly conceive the remedy is as apparent as the diſeaſe; and that your majeſty, your ſubjects, and allies, can never be ſafe and ſecure, till the houſe of Auſtria be reſtored to their rights, and the invader of the Spaniſh monarchy brought to reaſon.

'To conclude, ſir, as we humbly addreſſed your majeſty laſt parliament to enter into alliances with the emperor, the States of Holland, and other princes and ſtates, willing to unite againſt the power of France; ſo we take the liberty at this time to aſſure you, we are willing and zealous to lay hold of this opportunity, which the bleſſing of God and your majeſty's care have put into our hands; reſolving to make our utmoſt efforts for our own ſecurity and the ſupport of our allies; deſiring of your majeſty to reſt aſſured, that no time ſhall be loſt, nor any thing wanting on our part, which may anſwer the reaſonable expectations of our friends abroad; not doubting but to ſupport the reputation of the Engliſh name, when engaged under ſo great a prince in the glorious cauſe of maintaining the liberty of Europe.

His majeſty, in anſwer to this addreſs, declared, 'That he was extremely pleaſed to find the juſt ſentiments their lordſhips had of the preſent ſtate of affairs, and their readineſs to do their part in this great conjuncture; and he hoped, that their joint endeavours would be ſucceſsful for reſtoring the balance of Europe, and eſtabliſhing the common ſecurity.

houſe a ſtate of the fleet, and condition of each reſpective ſhip, and place, where they are; with a ſtate of the debt, of the navy, and an eſtimate of what was neceſſary for the extra repairs of it: And, to encourage the people with the hopes of making good all former deficiencies, they ordered an account of the debts of the nation unprovided for, both principal and intereſt, to be laid before them. And further, to juſtify the diſpoſal of public funds, they ordered the ſpeaker to write to two of the truſtees for the forfeited eſtates in Ireland to attend the houſe, and lay before them a full account of their proceedings in execution of that act. But what gave the greateſt vigour to a war abroad and unity at home, was, that on the 9th of January they reſolved unanimouſly, that leave be given to bring in a bill, for ſecuring of his majeſty's perſon, and the ſucceſſion of the crown in the Proteſtant line and extinguiſhing the hopes of the prince of Wales, and all other pretenders, and their open and ſecret abettors. And the next day they further reſolved, that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to take care, that it be an article in the ſeveral treaties of alliance between his majeſty and other potentates, 'That no peace ſhall be made with France, until his majeſty and the nation have reparation for the great indignity offered by the French king, in owning and declaring the pretended prince of Wales king of England, Scotland, and Ireland:' They agreed at the ſame time, 'That the proportion of land-forces to act in conjunction with the forces of the allies, for making good the alliances, be forty thouſand men, and forty thouſand more for ſea ſervice.' Theſe were the numbers the king by the alliances was obliged to furniſh, and all was conſented to in every particular; though ſome angry men ſhewed much rancour againſt the king, and tried to croſs every thing that was propoſed, both as to the quota's of the troops, and as to the ſtrength of the fleet.

The commons began a bill for the attainder of the prince of Wales, to which, though it could not be oppoſed, much leſs ſtopped, many ſhewed a coldneſs, and abſented themſelves on the days, on which it was ordered to be read. It was ſent up to the lords, and paſſed that houſe on the 20th of February, with an addition of an attainder of the queen, who acted as queen regent for him. This was much oppoſed; for no evidence could be brought to prove the allegation; but the fact was ſo notorious, that it paſſed, and the bill was ſent down again to the commons. It was excepted to there as not regular, ſince but one precedent in king Henry VIII's time was brought for it; and in that the commons had added ſome names, by a clauſe in a bill of attainder ſent down to them by the lords; and as this was a ſingle precedent, ſo it ſeemed to be a hard one. For, attainders by bill being the greateſt rigours of the law, the ſtretching of that ought to be avoided. It was therefore thought more proper to attaint her by a bill apart than by a clauſe in another bill, to which the lords agreed, and ſo the bill againſt the pretended prince of Wales paſſed. The lords alſo paſſed a new bill attainting the queen, but that was let ſleep in the houſe of commons.

The matter, that occaſioned the longeſt and warmeſt debates in both houſes, was an act for abjuring the pretended prince of Wales, and for ſwearing to the king, by the title of 'rightful' and 'lawful' king, and his heirs, according to the act of ſettlement. This was begun in the houſe of lords, and the firſt deſign was, that the oath ſhould be voluntary, it being only to be tendered to all perſons, and their ſubſcription, or refuſal to be recorded, without any other penalty. This was vehemently oppoſed by all the tory party, at the head of whom the earl of Nottingham ſet himſelf. Thoſe, who argued againſt it, ſaid, that this government was firſt ſettled with another oath, which was like an original contract, and that it was unjuſt and unreaſonable to offer a new one. There was no need of new oaths, as there was no new ſtrength got by them. Oaths relating to men's opinions had been always looked upon as ſevere impoſitions. A voluntary oath ſeemed to be by its nature unlawful; for we cannot ſwear lawfully, unleſs we are required to do it. To all this it was anſwered, that in antient time the oath of allegiance was ſhort and ſimple, becauſe then it was not thought, that princes had any right other than what was conveyed to them by law. But of late, and indeed very lately, new opinions had been ſtarted of a divine right, with which former times were not acquainted; ſo that it was neceſſary to know, who among us adhered to theſe opinions. The preſent government was begun upon a comprehenſive foot, it being hoped, that all parties might have been brought to concur in ſupporting it. But the effects had not anſwered expectation: Diſtinctions had been made between a king 'de jure' and a king 'de facto;' by which men plainly declared, with whom they believed the right was lodged. This opinion muſt, whenever that right comes to be claimed, oblige thoſe, who hold it, to adhere to ſuch claimants. It ſeemed therefore in ſome ſort neceſſary, that the government ſhould know, on whom it might depend. The diſcrimination made by ſuch a teſt, was to be without compulſion or penalty; no hardſhip was put on any perſon by it. Thoſe, who refuſed to give this ſecurity, would ſee what juſt cauſe of jealouſy they gave, and would thereby be obliged to behave themſelves decently and with due caution. When a government tendered an oath, tho' under no penalty, that was a ſufficient authority for all to take it, who were ſatisfied with the ſubſtance of it. While therefore there was ſo great a power beyond ſea, that eſpouſed ſo openly the pretenſions of this young man, and while there were juſt grounds to ſuſpect, that many at home favoured him, it ſeemed very reaſonable to offer a method, by which it ſhould appear, who obeyed the preſent government from a principle, believing it 'lawful,' and who ſubmitted only to it as a proſperous uſurpation. About twenty lords perſiſted in their oppoſition to this bill, thoſe, who were for it, being thrice that number. But in the houſe of commons, when it appeared how the lords were inclined, they reſolved to bring in a bill that ſhould oblige all perſons to take this abjuration. It was drawn by ſir Charles Hedges. All employments in church and ſtate were to be ſubject to it. Some things were added to the abjuration, ſuch as an obligation to maintain the government in king, lords, and commons, and to maintain the church of England, together with the toleration for diſſenters. Mr. Finch offered an alteration to the clauſe abjuring the prince of Wales, ſo that it imported only an obligation not to aſſiſt him; but, though he preſſed this with unuſual vehemence in a debate, that he reſumed ſeventeen times in one ſeſſion, againſt all rules, he had few to ſecond him in it. The debate, whether the oath ſhould be impoſed or left free, held longer. It was carried but by one vote to impoſe it. The party choſe that, rather than have it left free; for they reckoned, that the taking any oath, which ſtrengthened the government, of their own accord, did not ſuit with their other principles. But, to help the matter with a ſhew of zeal, they made the clauſe, which impoſed it, very extenſive, ſo that it comprehended all clergymen, fellows of colleges, ſchool-maſters, and private tutors. The clauſe of maintaining the government in king, lords, and commons, was rejected with great indignation, ſince the government was only in the king; the lords and commons being indeed a part of the conſtitution, and of the legiſlative body, but not of the government. This was a direct republican notion, and uſed to be condemned as ſuch by the ſame perſons, who now preſſed it. It was further ſaid, that, if it appeared, that our conſtitution was in danger, it might be reaſonable to ſecure it by an act and an oath apart; but ſince the ſingle point, that required this abjuration, was the French king's declaring, that the pretended prince of Wales was king of England, it was not fit to join matters foreign to that in this oath. Upoo the ſame reaſon, the clauſe in favour of the church, and of the toleration were alſo laid aſide. The deſign of this act was to diſcover to all both at home and abroad, how unanimouſly the nation concurred in abjuring the pretended prince of Wales. But here was a clauſe to one part of which (the maintaining the church) the diſſenters could not ſwear; and even the more moderate men of the church, who approved well of the toleration, yet might think it too much to ſwear to maintain it, ſince it was reaſonable to oblige the diſſenters to uſe their liberty modeſtly, by keeping them under the apprehenſion of having it taken away, if it was abuſed by them. One addition was offered to make it equally penal to compaſs or imagine the death of her royal highneſs the princeſs Anne of Denmark, as it is to compaſs or imagine the death of the king's eldeſt ſon and heir, which was admitted without any debate or ſhadow of oppoſition. The tories pretended great zeal for her highneſs, and gave it out, that there was a deſign to ſet her aſide, and to have the houſe of Hanover to ſucceed the king immediately; though it could never be made appear, that any motion of this kind had ever been either made or debated, even in private diſcourſe, by any of the whole whig party. Great endeavours were uſed, and not altogether without effect, to infuſe this jealouſy into the princeſs, and into all about her, not without inſinuations, that the king himſelf was inclined to it. When this clauſe was offered, its being without a precedent gave handle enough to oppoſe it; yet there was not one word ſaid in oppoſition to it in either houſe, all agreeing heartily in it. This ought to have put an end to the ſuſpicion; but ſurmiſes of that kind, when raiſed on deſign, are not ſoon parted with.

The commons, after a long delay, ſent up the bill for abjuring

abjuring the pretended prince of Wales. In the houſe of lords the tories oppoſed it all they poſſibly could; and, as it was a new bill, the debate was entirely open. They firſt moved for a clauſe, excuſing the peers from it. If this had been received, the bill would have been certainly loſt, for the commons would never have yielded to it. When this was rejected, they tried to bring it back to be voluntary. This motion was thought a ſtrange inconſiſtency in thoſe, who had argued againſt even the lawfulneſs of a voluntary oath; but it was viſible, that they intended by it only to loſe or at leaſt to delay the bill. When this was over-ruled by the houſe, not without a mixture of indignation in ſome againſt the movers, they offered next all thoſe clauſes, which had been rejected in the houſe of commons, with ſome other very ſtrange additions, by which they diſcovered both great weakneſs and an inveterate rancour againſt the government; but all the oppoſition ended in a proteſt of ſeveral peers againſt the bill, when it paſſed on the 14th of February [f].

The public intereſt was now ſo viſible, and the concurrent ſenſe of the nation ran ſo vehemently for a war, that even thoſe, who were moſt averſe to it, found it convenient to put on the appearance of zeal for it. The city of London was more united than it had been at any time during this reign; for the two companies that traded to the Eaſt-Indies, ſaw, that their common intereſt required they ſhould come to an agreement; and, though men of ill deſigns did all they could to obſtruct it, yet in concluſion it was happily effected. This made the body of the city, which was formerly much divided between the two companies, fall now into the ſame meaſures. But thoſe, who intended to defeat all this good beginning of the ſeſſion, and to raiſe a new flame, ſet on debates, that muſt have embroiled all again, if they had ſucceeded in their deſigns. They began with complaints of ſome petitions and addreſſes, that had reflected on the proceedings of the laſt houſe of commons, and particularly of the Kentiſh petition [g]. However, it was carried againſt them, that it was the undoubted right of the people of England to petition or addreſs the king, for the calling, ſitting, or diſſolving of parliaments, and for the redreſſing of grievances: and that every ſubject, under any accuſation, either by impeachment or otherwiſe, had a right to be brought to a ſpeedy trial. Not diſcouraged at this, they went on to complain, that the lords had denied them juſtice in the matter of the late impeachments. This bore a long and hot debate in a very full houſe: but it was carried, though by a ſmall majority, that juſtice had not been denied them. After this, the party gave over any farther ſtruggling, and things were carried on with more unanimity.

The houſe had a multiplicity of other buſineſs before them; as the produce of the cuſtoms; the Quaker's bill; the more effectual puniſhing of vagrants; the number, and charge, and condition of the forces to be filled up and raiſed for ſea and land; the affair of the abuſes committed in the king's brew-houſe at St. Catharine's; the apothecaries bill; the care of regulating collections; the examination of ſtories related by William Fuller, the impoſtor; and of a letter ſent to the ſpeaker from one Dr. Stringer, pretending the diſcovery of a plot againſt the government; with other intervening affairs; notwithſtanding which, the houſe proceeded vigorouſly in the more important buſineſs of the nation; for, on the 3d of February, they reſolved, That a ſum not exceeding three hundred and fifty-two thouſand pounds be granted to his majeſty, for the maintaining of guards and garriſons, and for providing for officers upon half-pay. And, to quicken the allies, as well as to ſupport the king, they reſolved at the ſame time, 'That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed ro interpoſe with his allies, that they may increaſe their quota's of land-forces to be put on board the fleet, in proportion to the numbers his majeſty ſhall have on board his fleet.' To which his majeſty anſwered, 'That he would do it.' When they had ſettled the ſums appropriated to the ſeveral uſes of the war, they agreed, on the 7th of February, to another addreſs to the king, 'That he would provide for the half-pay officers in the firſt place, in the recruits and levies to be now made.' To which he anſwered, 'That it was always his intention.'

His majeſty, to encourage the diſpatch of public affairs, came to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent to a bill, which had miſcarried in the laſt parliament, entitled, 'An act for the appointing commiſſioners to take, examine, and determine the debts due to the army, navy, and the tranſport ſervice, and alſo an account of prizes taken during the war.

Before this, the king had thought proper to make ſeveral advancements and removals; Charles, earl of Carliſle, was appointed firſt lord commiſſioner of the treaſury, in the room of the lord Godolphin; and the earl of Radnor was ſworn of the privy-council, as was the earl of Burlington. The earl of Mancheſter was made one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, in the room of ſir Charles Hedges; the earl of Pembroke was declared lord high-admiral, while the duke of Somerſet ſucceeded him as lord-preſident of the privy-council.

The king had likewiſe framed a ſcheme to reduce the exorbitant power of France. He had, before he left Holland, concerted meaſures with the Pruſſian and Dutch generals for the ſiege of Keyſerſwaert, a place, which the elector of Cologne had put into the hands of the French. The elector of Hanover was at the ſame time to fall on and diſarm the princes of Wolfembuttle, who, in the heart of the empire, had raiſed troops with French money, and ſent for a general of that nation to command them. The king of the Romans and prince Lewis of Baden were to beſiege Landau; and the emperor had engaged to ſend a powerful ſupply to prince Eugene, to enable him to attack in form the city of Mantua, which he kept cloſely blocked up, and the conqueſt of which muſt very probably be attended with the total ruin of the French intereſt in Italy. Beſides theſe deſigns, his majeſty was and now laying another, both more glorious in the execution, extenſive in its conſequences, with the prince of d'Armſtadt and the duke of Ormond, and that was, the beſieging Cadiz both by ſea and land; upon the taking of which place, the prince of d'Armſtadt had aſſured the king, that the admiral [f] This proteſt was as follows: 1. We conceive, that no new oath ſhould be impoſed upon the ſubject, foraſmuch as thoſe, eſtabliſhed by an act made in the firſt year of the reign of his majeſty and the late queen Mary, were, together with our rights and liberties, aſcertained in that act under the terms of our ſubmiſſion to his majeſty, which were enacted to ſtand, remain, and be the law of this realm for ever; and which, we conceive, do comprehend and neceſſarily imply all the duty and allegiance of the ſubject to their lawful king.

2. And much leſs ſhould any new oath be impoſed upon the lords, with ſuch a penalty as to loſe their ſeats in parliament, upon their refuſing it; ſuch a penalty being, in ſome meaſure, an intrenchment upon our conſtitution, and expreſsly contrary to the ſtanding order of this houſe made the 30th day of April 1675.

3. And, if ſuch an infringement of the rights of peers might be admitted, yet, in a matter of ſo great importance to all the peers, we conceive, that in juſtice they ſhould all have had notice of this matter, and been eſpecially ſummoned to have attended the houſe upon ſo great an occaſion; which has not been done, though it was moved and humbly deſired on behalf of the abſent lords.

4. And, if any further evidence of the ſubjects fidelity were, at this time, neceſſary to be required, we conceive a new oath is no ſuch evidence, nor any additional ſecurity to the government; becauſe thoſe who have kept the oaths, which they have already taken, ought in juſtice to be eſteemed good ſubjects; and thoſe, who have broken them, will make no ſcruple of taking or breaking any others, that ſhall be required of them. And conſequently this new oath may be of dangerous and pernicious conſequence to the government, by admitting ſuch ill men, who do not fear an oath, into the greateſt truſts, and who, under the ſpecious pretence and protection of this new oath, which is to free them from ſuſpicion, will have greater opportunities of betraying their king and their country.

5. If a new oath were neceſſary, as we conceive it is not, yet the words of this oath are ſo very ambiguous, and have been ſo differently conſtrued by ſeveral lords, who have declared their ſenſe of them, that this may become a ſnare to men's conſciences, or tend to overthrow the obligation of an oath, by allowing men liberty to take it in their own ſenſe; whereas this, as all other oaths, ought to be taken in the ſenſe of the impoſer, which hath not been declared in this caſe, though we earneſtly preſſed it, and though it has been done in other caſes of the like nature.

6. And we conceive, that it neceſſarily follows from hence, that this oath can be no bond of union among thoſe who do take it; nor any true mark of diſtinction between the friends and the enemies of this government; and therefore repugnant to the very nature of a teſt.

[g] In the controverted election at Maidſtone, between Thomas Bliſſe and Thomas Culpepper, eſquires, it was reſolved, 'That the latter had been not only guilty of corrupt, ſcandalous, and indirect practices, in endeavouring to procure himſelf to be elected a burgeſs, but likewiſe, being one of the inſtruments in promoting and preſenting the 'ſcandalous, inſolent, and ſeditious petition, commonly called, the Kentiſh Petition,' to the laſt houſe of commons, was guilty of promoting a ſcandalous, villainous, and groundleſs reflection upon that houſe, by aſperſing the members with receiving French money, or being in the intereſt of France; for which offence he was ordered to be committed to Newgate, and to be proſecuted by his majeſty's attorney-general. The houſe alſo reſolved on the 26th of February, 1. That, agreeable to the opinion of a committee appointed to conſider of the rights, liberties, and privileges of their houſe, to aſſert, that the houſe of commons is not the only repreſentative of the commons of England, tends to the ſubverſion of the rights and privileges of the houſe of commons, and the fundamental conſtitution of the government of this kingdom. 2. That to aſſert, that the houſe of commons have no power of commitment, but of their own members, tends to the ſubverſion of the conſtitution of the houſe of commons. 3. That to print or publiſh any books or libels, reflecting upon the proceedings of the houſe of commons, or any member thereof, for or relating to his ſervice therein, is a high violation of the rights and privileges of the houſe of commons. of of Caſtile, and ſeveral other grandees of Spain, with all their dependents, would declare for the houſe of Auſtria. The firſt three of theſe projects were ſucceſsfully executed, but the other two miſcarried, as will be ſeen in their proper places.

Soon after this ſeſſion was opened, the earl of Rocheſter wrote to the king, and aſked leave to come over; which was ſoon granted him: but, when he ſignified this to the council of Ireland, the whole board joined in a requeſt to him, that he would lay before the king the great grievances under which the whole kingdom lay, by the proceedings of the truſtees for the forfeited eſtates, who ſtretched the authority which the law gave them, in many inſtances, to the oppreſſing of the nation. The earl ſeemed uneaſy at the motion, but promiſed to lay it before the king, which he did at his coming over. Soon after that, petitions were ſent round all the counties of Ireland, and ſigned by many, repreſenting both the hardſhips of the act, and the ſevere methods taken by the truſtees in executing it. It was thought, that all this was ſet on ſecretly by the court, in hope that ſome temper might be found in that matter, ſo that the king's grants might again take place in whole or in part. The houſe of commons was moved to proceed ſeverely againſt the promoters of theſe petitions; yet the complaining of grievances had been ſo often aſſerted to be a right of the ſubject, that this was let fall. But, ſince no perſon appeared to juſtify the facts ſet forth or ſuggeſted in thoſe petitions, they were voted falſe and ſcandalous; and this ſtopped a further progreſs in that method. The heat, with which that act had been carried, was now much qualified; and, the truſtees having adjudged ſo many claims in favour of Iriſh Papiſts, ſhewing too manifeſt a partiality for them, and having now ſat two years, in which they had conſumed all the rents that aroſe out of the confiſcated eſtates, the houſe was applied to for their interpoſition by many petitions relating to that matter. This was the more neceſſary, becauſe, as has been related, when that act was paſſing, they had made a vote againſt receiving any petition relating to it. The thing had now loſt much of the credit and value that was ſet upon it at firſt; and, though the ſame party ſtill oppoſed the receiving any petitions, yet the current was now ſo ſtrong the other way, that they were all received, and in a great many cauſes juſtice was done, yet with a manifeſt partiality in favour of Papiſts; it being a maxim among all, who favoured king James's intereſts, to ſerve Papiſts, eſpecially thoſe whoſe eſtates were confiſcated for adhering to him. One motion was carried, not without difficulty, in favour of thoſe, who had purchaſed under the grantees, and had made great improvements, that they ſhould be admitted to purchaſe, with an abatement of two years value of the eſtates. The earl of Athlone, whoſe caſe was very ſingular, having ſold his grant to men, who had reaſon to think they had purchaſed under a ſecure title, a ſpecial clauſe was offered in their favour; but the party had ſtudied ſo far to inflame the nation againſt the Dutch, that in this the votes were equal, and, the ſpeaker's vote being to turn the matter, he gave it againſt the purchaſers. Many bills were brought in relating to Iriſh forfeitures, which took up the greateſt part of this ſeſſion.

The king being very ſenſible, that the Proteſtant ſucceſſion would not be ſo eaſily ſettled in Scotland, where it might be retarded, on purpoſe for a claim to an independence on the crown of England, and that nothing was more ſeaſonable at this juncture, than an union of the two kingdoms, wrote the following letter to the houſe of commons, being diſabled from coming to the houſe of peers by a fall from his horſe two days before:

William R.

"HIS majeſty, being at preſent hindered by an unhappy accident from coming in perſon to his parliament, is pleaſed to ſignify to the houſe of commons, by meſſage, what he deſigned to have ſpoken to both houſes from the throne. His majeſty, in the firſt year of his reign, did acquaint the parliament, that commiſſioners were authorized in Scotland to treat with ſuch commiſſioners as ſhould be appointed in England, of proper terms for uniting the two kingdoms, and at the ſame time expreſſed his great deſire of ſuch an union. His majeſty is fully ſatisfied, that nothing can more contribute to the preſent and future ſecurity and happineſs of England and Scotland, than a firm and entire union between them; and he cannot but hope, that, upon a due conſideration of our preſent circumſtances, there will be found a general diſpoſition to this union. His majeſty would eſteem it a peculiar felicity, if, during his reign, ſome happy expedient for making both kingdoms one, might take place; and is therefore extremely deſirous, that a treaty for that purpoſe might be ſet on foot; and does, in the moſt earneſt, manner, recommend this affair to the conſideration of the houſe."

The immediate occaſion of this meſſage was a motion, which the earl of Nottingham had made in the houſe of lords, when the act of abjuration was agreed to; who ſaid, that though he had differed from the majority of the houſe in many particulars relating to it, yet he was ſuch a friend to the deſign of the act, that, in order to the ſecuring a proteſtant ſucceſſion, he thought an union of the whole iſland was very neceſſary; and that therefore they ſhould conſider how both kingdoms might be united. But in order to this, and previous to it, he moved, that an addreſs ſhould be made to the king, that he would be pleaſed to diſſolve the parliament now ſitting in Scotland, and to call a new one, ſince the preſent parliament was firſt a convention, and then turned into a parliament, and was continued ever ſince, ſo that the legality of it might be called in queſtion; and it was neceſſary, that ſo important a thing as the union of both kingdoms ſhould be treated in a parliament, againſt the conſtitution of which no exception could lie. This motion was warmly oppoſed; for that nation was then in ſuch a ferment, that the calling a new parliament would have been probably attended with bad conſequence: For which reaſon that project was let fall, and no progreſs made upon the king's meſſage.

The king ſeemed all this winter in a fair way of recovery: he had made the royal appartments in Hampton-Court very noble; and he was ſo much pleaſed with the place, that he went thither once a week, and rode often about the park. But on the 21ſt of February riding from Kenſington, as he was putting his horſe to the gallop, the horſe fell, and he, being then very feeble, fell off, and broke his right collar-bone. Upon this accident, he was carried to Hampton-court, where the bone was ſet by Monſieur Ronjat, ſerjeant-ſurgeon to the king, who, having felt his pulſe, told him, that he was feveriſh, and that any other perſon in his condition would be let blood. The king anſwered, as for that, he had now and then had a head-ach, and ſome ſhivering fits for a fortnight paſt, and had that very morning a pain in his head before he went out a hunting. In the afternoon the king finding himſelf eaſy, contrary to advice, returned to Kenſington, and ſlept almoſt all the way in his coach. He came to Kenſington about nine at night, with his right arm tied up, and, as he entered the great bed-chamber, he ſaw Dr. Bidloo, to whom he ſaid, 'I have got a hurt in my arm; pray come, and ſee it:' And ſoon after added to this effect: 'I was riding in the park at noon, and while I endeavoured to make the horſe change his walking into a gallop, he fell upon his knees. Upon that I meant to raiſe him with the bridle; but he fell forwards on one ſide, and ſo I fell with my right ſhoulder upon the ground. It is a ſtrange thing, for it happened upon a ſmooth level ground. Ronjat ſays, there is a little bone broken, and indeed I feel ſome pain towards my back.' At the ſame time he pointed with his left hand to the ſhoulder-blade, ſaying, 'There, there.' Dr. Bidloo, finding his pulſe in good order, diſſuaded him from bleeding; and, after viewing the affected part, told him, that the right channel-bone was broke obliquely, a little below its juncture with the ſhoulder-blade. Then the king aſked, if it was well ſet? And, the Doctor anſwering No, he ſaid to Ronjat, 'Juſtify yourſelf, Monſieur Ronjat, is it well ſet?' Ronjat replied, 'It was well ſet; but that the jolting of the coach, and the looſening of the bandage, had occaſioned a diſunion.' After the fracture was taken care of, the king went to bed, and ſlept the whole night ſo ſoundly, that the gentlemen, who ſat up with him, ſaid, they did not hear him complain ſo much as once.

The king ſeemed in a fair way of doing well till Sunday, March the 1ſt, a defluxion fell upon his knee, which was a great pain and weakneſs to him, and thought to be a very ill ſymptom. He took it as a warning for the diſpatch of public affairs, and therefore the next morning this meſſage was ſent from the houſe of peers to the commons:

Mr. Speaker,

'The king hath granted a commiſſion under the great ſeal for paſſing the royal aſſent to thoſe bills, which have been agreed to by both houſes of parliament; and, the lords commiſſioned by the king, do deſire, that this houſe would preſently come up with their ſpeaker, to be preſent at the paſſing thereof.' Then the ſpeaker with the houſe went up, and the lord-keeper acquainted both houſes, that his majeſty, by an unhappy accident, had been prevented from coming in perſon, and had granted a commiſſion to ſeveral peers for paſſing the bills therein mentioned; and then the royal aſſent was given by commiſſion to theſe and ſome other bills:

'An act for the attainder of the pretended prince of Wales of high treaſon.'

'An act that the ſolemn affirmation and declaration of the people, called quakers, ſhall be accepted, inſtead of an oath in the uſual form.'

On the 3d of March, the king had a ſhort fit of an ague, which he regarded ſo little, that he ſaid nothing of it; and the next day he ſeemed ſo well recovered of the lameneſs in his knee, that he took ſeveral turns in the gallery at Kenſington; but at length, finding himſelf tired and faint, he ſat down on a couch, and fell aſleep, which probably occaſioned that ſhivering fit, which ſoon after ſeized him, and which turned to a fever, accompanied with vomiting and a looſeneſs. Upon this, the king thought proper to ſend for Sir Thomas Millington, who attended him to the laſt moment; as did alſo Sir Richard Blackmore, Dr. Hutton, Dr. Hannes, Dr. Brown, Dr. Laurence, Sir Theodore Colladon, Dr. Bidloo, and others of that faculty, who adminiſtered ſeveral remedies to him, that gave him great relief. He continued indifferently well till the 5th, when his vomiting and looſeneſs returned ſo violent upon him, that he refuſed to take any ſuſtenance till two o'clock the next morning, when he drank a cup of chocolate, and ſoon after took a ſleeping-draught, which had that good effect, that he reſted for three hours after. In the forenoon he took ſome broth and a cordial, and found himſelf ſomewhat eaſier, though exceſſively weak. His mind was ſo fixed upon the public intereſt, that he immediately ordered another commiſſion for paſſing the malt and abjuration bills, that were ready for his aſſent; and, becauſe he was now ſo weak, that he could not write his own name, a ſtamp was prepared, for his ſigning the commiſſion, which, according to form, muſt be ſigned by the king, in the preſence of the lord-keeper and the clerks of the parliament. They came to the king when his fit began, and ſtaid ſome hours before they were admitted. In the mean while, ſome of the houſe of commons moved for an adjournment, though the lords had ſent to deſire them not to adjourn for ſome time. By this means the party hoped, that the bill of abjuration would be loſt. But, as it was contrary to all rules to adjourn, when ſuch a meſſage was ſent to them by the lords, they waited till the king had ſigned the commiſſion, by which the royal aſſent was given to the abjuration-bill in the laſt day of the king's life [h].

On the ſame day, about five in the morning, the earl of Albemarle, who had been ſent over to Holland to put things in readineſs for an early campaign, arrived at Kenſington, and immediately went to wait upon the king, who, being willing at that time to be retired, bid him go and take ſome reſt, and come to him ſome hours after. The earl attended accordingly, and gave ſo good an account of the poſture of affairs in Holland, that, if matters of that kind could have wrought on the king, it muſt have revived him; but the coldneſs, with which he received it, ſhewed how little hopes were left. Soon after he ſaid, 'Je tire vers ma fin, (I draw towards my end.)'

In the evening an extraordinary council was called, before whom the phyſicians appeared frequently; and at laſt acquainted them by Sir Thomas Millington, that all their hopes, under God, depended upon the uſe of thoſe remedies, which they had already preſcribed, and upon his majeſty's taking ſome little ſuſtenance. Upon this the duke of Devonſhire, and ſeveral other noblemen, deſired Dr. Bidloo to preſs him to take ſomething. Accordingly Dr. Bidloo ſpoke to him in Dutch, and he made anſwer, 'Lift me up, and I will take as much as I can of what is thought proper.' Then he took ſome of Ralegh's cordial, with the julep, and ſoon after ſome hot claret. About the ſame time he thanked Dr. Bidloo for the great care he had taken of him, adding to this effect, 'I know that you and the other learned phyſicians have done all that your art can do for my relief; but, finding all means ineffectual, I ſubmit.' About three o'clock on Sunday morning he called again for Dr. Bidloo, and complained to him, that he had had a bad night, and could not ſleep. Upon that he ſat up, and leaned on him, ſaying, 'I could ſleep in this poſture: Sit nearer me, and hold me ſo for a little time.' In this poſture he ſlept about half an hour, and, when he awaked, ſaid, 'You can bear me up no longer.' Then he was held up by Mr. Freeman on the right ſide, and Mr. Sewell on the left, both of them having pillows in their arms. Soon after the phyſicians gave notice, that they were apprehenſive he had not long to live.

The archbiſhop of Canterbury and the biſhop of Saliſbury attended him from Saturday morning, and did not leave him till he died. The archbiſhop prayed ſome time with him on that day; but he was then ſo weak, that he could ſcarce ſpeak, but gave him his hand, as a ſign, that he firmly believed the truth of the chriſtian religion, and ſaid, he intended to receive the ſacrament. His reaſon and all his ſenſes were entire to the laſt minute. About five on Sunday morning he deſired the ſacrament, and went through the office with great appearance of ſerioufneſs, but could not expreſs himſelf. The lords of the privy-council, with many of the nobility and gentry, attended in the adjoining apartments, and ſeveral of them were called in at times, to whom he ſpoke a little, and then they withdrew. Amidſt all their tears the king did not betray the leaſt concern or fear of death, but laboured to ſpeak with eaſe and chearfulneſs; and particularly when he talked a little to lord Overkirk, he raiſed his voice, whom he thanked for his long and faithful ſervices. He took leave of the duke of Ormond and others, and delivered to the lord Albemarle the keys of his cloſet and ſcrutore, telling him, that 'he knew what to do with them.' After ſeven o'clock, he took Dr. Bidloo by the hand, and, breathing with great difficulty, aſked him, 'If this could laſt long?' The Doctor anſwering No, he aſked again, 'How long?' To which the Doctor replied, 'An hour, or an hour and a half; though you may be ſnatched away in the twinkling of an eye.' After that, while the doctor was feeling his pulſe, the king took him again by the hand, ſaying, 'I do not die yet; hold me faſt.' Having taken a little of the cordial portion, he faintly enquired for the earl of Portland, who immediately came to him, and placed his ear as near as he could to the king's mouth; but, though his lips were ſeen to move, his lordſhip was not able to hear any diſtinct articulate ſound; ſo the king took him by the hand, and carried it to his heart with great tenderneſs. He was often looking up to heaven in many ſhort ejaculations. Between ſeven and eight o'clock, he began to rattle in his throat, when the commendatory prayer was ſaid for him; and, as it ended, he expired in the arms of Mr. Sewell, one of the pages of the back-ſtairs, in the fifty-ſecond year of his age, having reigned thirteen years and one month wanting five days. As ſoon as the breath was out of his body, the lords Lexington and Scarborough, who were then in waiting, ordered Ronjat to take off from the king's left arm a black ribbon, which tied next to his ſkin a gold ring with ſome hair of the late queen Mary, which ſhewed the tender regard he had for her memory.

Two days after the royal corps was opened [i] and embalmed, and having lain for ſome time in ſtate at Kenſington, was interred with all the magnificence, which a private funeral could admit of, on Sunday night, April the 12th, in a vault in Henry VII's chapel in Weſtminſter-Abbey; and in the beginning of May, a will, which was made October 18th, 1695, and depoſited in the hands of monſieur Schuylemberg, was opened at the Hague, whereby it appeared, that he had appointed his couſin, the prince Friſon of Naſſau, eldeſt ſon of prince Caſimir Naſſau, ſtadtholder of Friſeland, his ſole and univerſal heir, and the States General his executors, without mentioning either the king of Pruſſia, the prince of Naſſau Siegen, or the princeſs of Anhalt, who all claimed a right to his ſucceſſion. But, by a codicil annexed to that will, the lordſhip of Breevert, and a legacy of two hundred thouſand guilders were given to the earl of Albemarle.

Thus lived and died king William III. He had a thin and weak body; his hair brown, and his conſtitution delicate. He had a Roman eagle noſe, bright and ſparkling eyes, a large front, and a countenance compoſed to gravity and authority. All his ſenſes were critical and exquiſite. He was always aſthmatical; and, the dregs of the ſmall pox falling on his lungs, he had a conſtant deep cough. His behaviour was ſolemn and ſerious, ſeldom chearful, and but with a few. He ſpoke little and very ſlowly, and moſt commonly with a diſguſting dryneſs, which was his character at all times, except in a day of battle; for then he was all fire, though without paſſion, and was every where, and looked to every thing. He had no great advantage from his education. De Witt's diſcourſes were of great uſe to him; and he being apprehenſive of the obſervation of thoſe, who were looking narrowly into every thing he ſaid or did, had brought himſelf under an habitual caution, that he never could ſhake off, though in another ſcene it proved as hurtful, as it was then neceſſary to his affairs. He ſpoke Dutch, French, Engliſh, and German equally well; and he underſtood the Latin, Spaniſh and Italian, ſo that he was well fitted to command armies compoſed of ſeveral nations. He had a memory, that amazed all about him, for it never failed him. He was an exact obſerver of men and things. His ſtrength lay rather in a true diſcerning and a ſound judgment, than in imagination or invention. His deſigns were always great and good; but it was thought he truſted too much to that, and did not deſcend enough to the humours of his people, to make himſelf and his notions more acceptable to them. This in a government, that has ſo much of freedom in it as ours, was more neceſſary than he was inclined to believe. His reſervedneſs grew on him, ſo that it diſguſted moſt of thoſe, who ſerved him; but he had obſerved the errors of too much talking more than thoſe of too cold a ſilence. He did not like contradiction, nor to have his actions cenſured; but he loved to employ and favour thoſe, who had the arts of complaiſance; yet he did not love flatterers. His genius lay chiefly to war, in which his courage was more admired than his conduct. Great errors were often committed by him, but his heroical courage ſet things right, as it animated thoſe, who were about him. He was too laviſh of money on ſome occaſions both in his buildings and to his favourites; but too ſparing in rewarding ſervices or in encouraging thoſe, who brought intelligence. He was apt to take ill impreſſions of people, and theſe ſtuck long with him; but he never carried them to indecent revenges. He gave too much way to his own humour almoſt in every thing, not excepting that, which related to his own health. He knew all foreign affairs well, and underſtood the ſtate of every court in Europe very particularly. He inſtructed his own miniſters himſelf, but he did not apply enough to affairs at home. He tried how he could govern us by balancing the two parties one againſt another, but he came at laſt to be perſuaded, that the tories were irreconcileable to him; and he was reſolved to try and truſt them no more. He believed the truth of the Chriſtian religion very firmly, and he expreſſed an horror at atheiſm and blaſphemy; and though there was much in both at his court, yet it was always denied to him, and kept out of ſight. He was moſt exemplarily decent and devout in the public exerciſes of the worſhip of God; only on week days he came too ſeldom to them. He was an attentive hearer of ſermons, and was conſtant in his private prayers, and in reading the ſcriptures, and, when he ſpoke of religious matters, which he did not often, it was with a becoming gravity. He was much poſſeſſed with the belief of abſolute decrees, becauſe he did not ſee, how the belief of providence could be maintained upon any other ſuppoſition. His indifference as to the forms of church-government, and his being zealous for toleration, together with his cold behaviour towards the clergy, gave them generally very ill impreſſions of him. In his deportment towards all about him, he ſeemed to make little diſtinction between the good and the bad, and thoſe who ſerved well, or thoſe who ſerved him ill. He loved the Dutch, and was much beloved among them; but the ill returns he met with from the Engliſh nation, their jealouſies of him, and their perverſeneſs towards him, had too much ſoured his mind, and had in a great meaſure alienated him from them, which he did not take care enough to conceal, though he ſaw the ill effects this had upon his buſineſs. He grew in his laſt years too remiſs and careleſs as to all affairs, till the treacheries of France awakened him, and the dreadful conjunction of the French and Spaniſh monarchies gave ſo loud an alarm to all Europe; for the watching over the French court, and the oppoſing of their practices, was the prevailing paſſion of his whole life. Few men had the art of concealing and governing paſſion more than he had, yet few men had ſtronger paſſions, which was ſeldom felt but by inferior ſervants, to whom he uſually made ſuch recompences for any ſudden or indecent vents he might give his anger, that they were glad every time it broke upon them. He was too eaſy to the faults of thoſe about him, when they did not lie in his way, or croſs any of his deſigns; and he was ſo apt to think, that his miniſters might grow inſolent, if they ſhould find, that they had much credit with him, that he ſeemed to have made it a maxim to let them often feel, how little power they had even in ſmall matters. His favourites had a more entire power, but he accuſtomed them only to inform him of things, but to be ſparing in offering advice, except when it was aſked. It was not eaſy to account for the reaſons of the favour, that he ſhewed in the higheſt inſtances to two perſons beyond all others, the earls of Portland and Albemarle, they being in all reſpects men, not only of different, but even of oppoſite characters. Secrecy and fidelity were the only qualities, in which it could be ſaid, that they did in any ſort agree: he appeared to be a perſon raiſed up by God to reſiſt the power of France, and the progreſs of tyranny and perſecution. The ſeries of the five princes of Orange, that was now ended in him, was the nobleſt ſucceſſion of heroes, that we find in any hiſtory; and the thirty years, from the year 1672 to his death, in which he acted ſo great a part, carried in them ſo many amazing ſteps of a glorious and diſtinguiſhing providence, that in the words of David he might be called, 'The man of God's right hand, whom he made ſtrong for himſelf.' After all the abatements, that may be allowed for his errors and faults, he ought ſtill to be reckoned among the greateſt princes, that our hiſtory, or indeed any other can afford.

This is the character of king William, as drawn by biſhop Burnet, who had occaſion to know him well, having (as he ſays himſelf) obſerved him very carefully in a courſe of ſixteen years. To this character ſhall be added the following account of the ſame prince, penned and communicated by a perſon, extremely well verſed in the affairs of thoſe times.

To draw a character, with any tolerable degree of propriety and truth, is far from being an eaſy undertaking. The difficulty encreaſes from a variety of particulars, and many appearances of ſtrong contradictions. This is evidently the caſe of the prince, of whom I ſhall preſume to offer a free and impartial account.

He came into the world, and ſtruggled thro' life with many and perpetual inconveniencies and diſadvantages. The father, dying immediately after his attempt on Amſterdam, produced many misfortunes to the ſon, with regard both to his education and intereſt. Indolence and averſion to buſineſs, which requires confinement, are great misfortunes to a prince; and they are conſequences of not being under the reſtraints proper to form the mind to knowledge. Without attention and careful deliberation, how can any thing be well performed in the great ſcenes of life?

In his long minority, power and the conduct of affairs had been in the hands of the ſure enemies of the Orange family; but under theſe diſadvantages, when he was not above ſixteen or ſeventeen years of age, he gave an inſtance of prudence, caution, and wiſdom, worthy the experience of the oldeſt and ableſt miniſter of ſtate. The fact is ſo very remarkable, that it deſerves a particular relation. De Witt, having taken him under his government and tuition, in order to be maſter of all his actions and motions, removed all his old ſervants, and placed others about him in whom he could confide. One young man, who had conſtantly attended him from a child, and was his valet de chambre, at the earneſt requeſt of the prince, was ſuffered to continue in his ſervice. But De Witt took care, at the ſame time, to engage him in his intereſt. The

1. Upon viewing the body before the diſſection, the following appearances were remarkable. The body in general was much emaciated. Both the legs up to the knees, and a little higher, as alſo the right hand and arm, as far as the elbow, were conſiderably ſwelled. There was likewiſe on the left thigh near the hip, a bladder full of water as big as a ſmall pullet's egg, reſembling a blain.

2. Upon opening the belly, the guts were found of a livid colour, and the blood contained in their veſſels black. The gut, called Ilion, had in ſome placet the marks of a ſlight inflammation. The ſtomach, pancreas, meſentery, liver, gall, bladder, ſpleen, and kidneys, were all ſound, and without fault.

3. In the thorax or cheſt we obſerved, that the right ſide of the lungs adhered to the pleura, and the left much more; from which, upon ſeparation, there iſſued forth a quantity of purulent or frothy ſerum. The upper lobe of the left ſide of the lungs, and the part of the pleura next it, were inflamed to a degree of mortification: And this we look upon as the immediate cauſe of the king's death. From the ventricles of the heart, and the greater blood-veſſels ariſing out of them, were taken ſeveral large, tough, fleſh-like ſubſtances of the kind called Polypus. The heart itſelf was of the ſmaller ſize, but firm and ſtrong.

4. Upon laying bare the right collar bone, we found it had been broken near the ſhoulder and well ſet. Some extravaſated blood was lodged above and below the fracture.

5. The brain was perfectly ſound, and without any ſign of diſtemper.

6. It is very rare to find a body with ſo little blood as was ſeen in this, there being more found in his lungs, than in all the parts beſides put together.

prince

prince had a conſtant, but very ſecret, correſpondence with the Engliſh court, in matters that concerned his own views and intereſt. On the receipt of letters from thence, he uſually put them into his waiſtcoat pocket. The valet, when his highneſs was in bed and aſleep, took out the letters, copied them for the penſionary, and carefully replaced the originals. This continued ſome time, till De Witt, talking with the prince upon his affairs, and warning him againſt intrigues inconſiſtent with their government, and dangerous to his highneſs, let fall expreſſions, from which the prince inferred his having ſeen ſome of his ſecret letters from England. He took not the leaſt notice to any one of what had happened, but, when he went to bed, feigning ſleep, he ſaw the faithleſs operation of his valet, without the leaſt notice or motion. He continued to conceal the diſcovery, but took care, in his ſubſequent letters to England, to write in ſuch a manner, and to receive ſuch anſwers for his waiſtcoat-pocket, for the treacherous uſe of his ſervant, and De Witt's information, as by degrees removed his jealouſies, and kept him ever after in a falſe ſecurity relating to the prince's tranſactions and correſpondencies abroad. When the prince had overcome all his difficulties, and was made ſtadtholder, he coolly let his valet know what great ſervice he had done, while he was intending to betray him. After this confounding explanation, he was immediately diſmiſſed from his ſervice: but the prince notwithſtanding gave him a place for life about an hundred a year at Breda.

When he entered into public life, moſt of his friends and aſſiſtants were men diſtinguiſhed only by noiſe and zeal. Circumſtances as importantly unhappy attended him in England. The marquis of Halifax, the earl of Danby, ſir Edward Seymour, and ſeveral others, had been eminently uſeful in the contrivance and execution of the Revolution, and in fixing the government. Neglects and diſappointments under king James, and great expectations from the new ſettlement, were the chief motives of their behaviour. They could have no ſenſe of civil and religious liberty, nor real concern for its intereſts either at home or abroad, the whole of whoſe lives had been ſpent in bold and conſtant endeavours for its ſubverſion. But though, in the diſtribution of places, they had their full proportion, yet, becauſe all their views were not anſwered, they quickly conceived bitter diſguſts, and infuſed their temper into all their dependents; but continued in place, in order more effectually to diſtreſs and diſturb. Thus they had many opportunities of fatally adviſing in home and foreign affairs. They hated the king, and endeavoured to make him odious for his moderation and good temper in matters of religion; and yet they flattered, and pretended zeal for his honour. They laboured with too much ſucceſs in giving him diſguſts to thoſe, who were his friends both by principle and inclination; and engaged him to confide in, and employ thoſe, whoſe enmities to him were unalterable.

The avarice and rapaciouſneſs of foreign favourites was another very great misfortune. In order to ſilence the clamours of enemies, ſome of the chief of the Tories, particularly Danby, were liberal partakers in the crown-lands. Such proceedings could not fail to be matter of grief and offence to the beſt friends of the government. The king's regards to a favourite lady, not many weeks after the queen's deceaſe, were publiſhed to the world by a moſt profuſe and prodigious grant. This lady's influence and management in general are known; but many particulars have not been repreſented, and many can never be produced to light. She engaged perſons of the firſt rank to enter into buſineſs. She offered the Tories, by way of bargain for her Iriſh grants, to have lord Sommers removed, whoſe diſgrace, as well as that of the earl of Portland, was chiefly owing to her addreſs. Her brother, the earl of Jerſey, was a zealous and known Jacobite, and yet had all ſorts of honour and truſts. A great variety of particulars might be added, but the reflections, which ariſe from what has been mentioned, are ſufficient to our purpoſe.

A military life was moſt agreeable to his genius; but here his diſadvantages and diſtreſſes were perpetual. He came to the reſcue of his country in the loweſt and moſt dejected ſtate. His firſt performances are therefore to be regarded as the moſt glorious particulars of his conduct. His principal ally, the Spaniard, only gave him vain promiſes and aſſurances, for they were every where feeble and unprepared.

After he came to England, in how many ways was he embarraſſed? The unreduced and unſettled ſtate of Ireland gave the enemy great advantages on the continent. The court of Vienna only attended to the war in Turkey; every thing elſe was neglected. The German troops had no exiſtence but in pompous liſts publiſhed before the campaign. The part, which the elector of Bavaria afterwards acted openly, ſeems to give credit to the ſuſpicions which were then entertained. Some traitors belonging to him were diſcovered, but perhaps not the principal. The king, for the ſupport of the wars, had the name and ſound of great ſupplies, but effectual ſervices were very different from theſe appearances. The funds were inſufficient, and the difficulties in raiſing money immediately were inſuperable. When a little more vigour both at home and abroad began to open to us better views, the diſorderly ſtate of the coin defeated all the fair appearances.

The conduct of the treaty of Ryſwick fell into the hands of the incapable or diſaffected. After the peace, the king was on terms of diffidence and diſtruſt with all his capable friends; which the diſcontented, the diſaffected, and the eager for popularity improved into the fatal reduction of the army. When the long-dreaded event of the death of the king of Spain happened, he was found in the hands of thoſe whoſe enmity was immoveable. They treated France with eſteem and reſpect, while his allies endured all the effects of their inſolence and pride.

With regard to his military abilities and ſkill, the world has been greatly divided in their opinion. The Tories, while he was alive, prevailed in the obtaining places for themſelves, by aſſurances of their peculiar regards to regal power; but, after his deceaſe, they took the firſt opportunity of ſtigmatizing him as a warrior; as appeared from their dividing ſo ſtrongly for the word 'retrieved.' His courage, bravery, and reſolution, were unqueſtionable; his conduct, temper, and ſkill, are not ſo generally allowed. Something of this kind will ever be ſuppoſed in a commander, who fails of ſucceſs in almoſt every enterprize. Victory ſcarce ever attended him, except in the paſſage of the Boyne. He expelled the French from moſt of the fortreſſes belonging to the Dutch, but was far from making any effectual oppoſition to their progreſs in the Spaniſh Netherlands; and they acquired, in a few years, towns and territories, which have contributed to their ſtrength and riches, in an amazing and terrible manner.

In his political and civil management, true ſkill and reſolution ſeem to have been much wanting. Perpetual changes of perſons and parties were notorious throughout his reign. Thoſe, who were againſt all engagements, and all aſſurances of the fidelity of his ſubjects, and who, in important ſtruggles, oppoſed the owning him as lawful and rightful king, after ſuch repeated indignities, were preferred to his ſure and moſt ſincere friends. The Convention Parliament, to which he owed his all, was diſſolved; the betrayers of corporations, and the tools of arbitrary power in the two former reigns, were protected and preſerved; while his zealous adherents were delivered up to contempt and diſgrace. In return for this aſtoniſhing preference, the city of London choſe ſuch of the members as were then alive, who had been impoſed on them by king James, who had delivered them from the incumbrance of all their privileges. The new ſenate placed one at their head, who was of a malevolent and corrupt temper, and had been ready and willing to perform for the abdicated monarch, the moſt profligate and deſperate ſervices. With regard to the coin, the king followed the miſchievous and diſtreſſing advice of Seymour, and rejected the ſafe and ſalutary councils of Sommers. Plottings and treaſons of the moſt bloody and barbarous kind were repeated by great numbers of people of all ranks; and yet all poſſible methods were uſed to preſerve from puniſhment the guilty; and the leaders in ſuch managements continued to be taken into his councils and confidence.

An effectual oppoſition to France, ſeemed to employ his moſt ardent wiſhes and endeavours; but meaſures quite oppoſite were purſued. The whole winter after the peace of Ryſwick, he did not once confer either with lord Sommers, or any of thoſe who ſerved with inclination and affection. The earl of Rocheſter, and his adherents, though in the higheſt poſts, after the infamous proceedings of Lewis XIV. with regard to the Spaniſh ſucceſſion, recommended that king's being treated with reſpect in the houſe of lords, and reſented ſome juſt freedoms. The earl of Jerſey, who is ſaid to have often avowed to the king his affection for St. Germain's, was ſent embaſſador to France; and, inſtead of duly obſerving and reſenting the perfidy and indignities of that court, his buſineſs was to cultivate an intereſt with king James.

But at laſt the king was ſenſible of theſe errors, and, juſt before his death, reſolved to bring again into his ſervice the true friends to himſelf, and to the liberty and intereſts of his kingdom.

Pride and neglect were imputed to him by the great commanders, with whom he was concerned in military affairs, who who thought themſelves treated with too great a coldneſs and reſerve. As he had nothing of the eaſy and affable in his manner, this is ſaid to have offended the elector of Bavaria, and to have occaſioned great prejudice to the common cauſe. To his firſt conceptions of what was proper to be done, he adhered in a determined manner; and no counſels, except what were agreeable to theſe, were regarded.

Such in this world are the parts, which enter into the compoſition of the eminent and diſtinguiſhed. However, the great name which we have ſo freely placed in the moſt impartial light, deſerves, on many accounts, to be remembered with gratitude and honour.

He had juſt views of the horrid conſequences of the unreſtrained progreſs of the power of France. With great integrity and vigour, he therefore made it the buſineſs of his life to oppoſe all its miſchievous motions; nor did he faint or grow weary in the glorious and difficult toil. He had an enemy, who was ever well prepared and provided; while his own ſituation was quite different. He was often baffled and diſappointed, and rarely attended with triumphant ſucceſs. However, the preſervation of Europe from abſolute ſubjection, may juſtly be aſcribed to his endeavours. He knew in what a ſcandalous and mercenary manner his two predeceſſors had ſurrendered themſelves to the will and pleaſure of the enemy; nor was he ignorant of the weak and corrupt condition of many other ſtates. But, though thus diſcouraged, the offer of the ſovereignty of the greateſt part of his country could not ſeduce him from the common cauſe. This is ſufficient to ſilence the accuſations of his enormous love of power.

As he proved himſelf the friend of the liberties of Europe, and preſerved its free ſtates from being the oppreſſed provinces of an univerſal monarchy, ſo equally ſincere was his zeal for the religious rights of mankind. He had a juſt abhorrence of popiſh tyranny and uſurpation on conſcience. The bitterneſs and envyings amongſt proteſtants gave him great concern; and he wiſhed for an effectual cure of theſe evils, and contrived the moſt proper meaſures. Uniformity in opinions and practices is not to be compaſſed: therefore mutual forbearance, and reſtraining the ſeveral parties and profeſſions among Chriſtians from injuring one another, ever had his conſtant attention. The religious notions, which education and a habit of thinking had fixed, gave him no averſion to thoſe who oppoſed his ſentiments. In his days, and by his means, the firm and conſiſtent foundations were laid, of what is truly valuable in civil or religious affairs. Before his time, avowing the rights of mankind, in a full and conſiſtent manner, was criminal or diſgraceful: as they had power and opportunity, the ſeveral parties of Chriſtians oppreſſed and injured one another.

An unthinking and ungrateful world is only delighted with hurry and miſchief, and has therefore no ſenſe of it's moſt valuable benefactors. But thoſe, who will reflect and conſider, muſt acknowledge a more real friend to human beings never appeared in this part of the earth. To him we owe the aſſerting and ſecuring our moſt important immunities and privileges. To him the intellectual world is indebted for the full freedom of debating all ſubjects, and of avowing and defending their ſentiments.

The appearances of providence for his ſafety and preſervation were many and very affecting. No life was ever more eminently expoſed in the day of battle, nor did his many diſadvantages abate his ardour: Far from declining, he ſought opportunities. His enemies, not ſatisfied with the ſeveral chances thus offered, by many vile and dark methods, attempted his deſtruction both at home and abroad.

From an immature birth he derived a weak and feeble conſtitution; but a vigorous mind carried him through a perpetual ſucceſſion of cares and labours. Conſidering an accidental hurt befalling a decayed and waſted frame, his days were prolonged beyond all expectation. His laſt work compleated his good deſigns for conveying to us the great and valuable bleſſing of the proteſtant ſucceſſion. Had he been cut off in any of the periods of his glorious ſtruggle for our happineſs and the welfare of Europe, the miſeries and miſchiefs, which muſt naturally have followed, would ſurely have equalled all the ſuggeſtions of the blackeſt and moſt melancholy imagination. But the unthinking part of the world, becauſe wholly delivered, have not been, nor ever will be, duly ſenſible.

Henry IV. of France, and queen Elizabeth, are perpetually produced as inſtances of ſuperior princely merit. How truly king William not only equalled but excelled them, in the really glorious qualities of a great and good governor, might eaſily be made appear. On a careful examination, his difficulties and diſtreſſes will be found greater than theirs; and his faults, and miſmanagements, leſs enormous and more excuſable.

Before the concluſion of this reign, it will be neceſſary briefly to relate ſuch eccleſiaſtical matters, as have been purpoſely omitted, that the narration of the civil affairs might not be interrupted.

And here it may not be improper to premiſe an account of the riſe and progreſs of our religious differences, from the reformation to the time of the revolution.

When Chriſtendom was over-run with the ſuperſtitious and abſurd doctrines and practices of the church of Rome, and ſuch things were eſtabliſhed, as contradicted not only the ſcriptures, but the reaſon, underſtanding, and very ſenſes of men, then it was that ſeveral reformers aroſe in different parts of Europe, and ſeparated from a church ſo overwhelmed with corruption and error. It was laid down as a maxim, that the ſcriptures are the ſole rule of faith, wherein all things neceſſary to ſalvation are ſo plainly revealed, that every man may judge for himſelf, and needs not an infallible guide in matters of religion. Upon this foundation, 'Infallibility, tranſubſtantiation, indulgencies, worſhip of ſaints and angels,' with a numerous train of the like abſurdities, were attacked, and proved to be repugnant to the goſpel. But the misfortune was, that, in the progreſs of the reformation, the principle on which it was grounded was entirely forgot; inſtead of reſtoring Chriſtianity to it's primitive ſtate, as contained in our Saviour's laſt inſtructions to his apoſtles, 'That repentance and remiſſion of ſins ſhould be preached in his name to all nations:' Inſtead of adhering to this plain and rational ſcheme of the goſpel, St. Auſtin's doctrines were made the ſtandard of religion, and ſuch ſyſtems were framed, as were as unintelligible to reaſon, and as difficult to be proved by ſcripture, as the tenets of that church from which the reformers had ſeparated. They were not content with ſaying, that by the ſin of our firſt parents all mankind are ſufferers; that effects of it are tranſmitted to all their poſterity, namely, 'Loſs of paradiſe, labour and toil, ſorrow in conception, ſubjection to ſickneſs, diſeaſes and all the calamities of life;' and finally, to the greateſt of all natural evils, 'death itſelf.' They were not ſatisfied with aſſerting, that man, ſince the fall, is prone to evil, too eaſily led aſtray by the force of example, education, prejudice, and temptation; and that, when the world lay buried in wickedneſs, God ſent his ſon to quicken men to a ſenſe and practice of their duty, by the aſſurance of pardon, for his ſake, of paſt offences upon repentance and amendment of life; by the promiſe of everlaſting happineſs to well-doers, and by the threatening of future puniſhment to all evil-doers, according to their reſpective deſerts. Not content with this, the reformers, copying after St. Auſtin, declared, that Adam was the repeſentative of all mankind, conſequently not only 'the effects,' but alſo 'the guilt,' of his ſin is transferred on all his deſcendants, who are thereby obnoxious both 'to death, and eternal damnation.' That, ſince the fall, how free ſoever 'the will' may be as to civil affairs, it is ſo far enſlaved as to religious matters, that man is totally unable of himſelf to think a good thought, or to do a good action [k]. That God, before the foundations of the world were laid, ſecretly decreed 'to ſave' a certain number of perſons, whom he has unconditionally choſen out of loſt mankind. That, as Adam's ſin is imputed to all his poſterity, ſo the righteouſneſs of Chriſt is imputed to 'the elect,' for whom only he died. That to 'the elect' is given both 'a preventing grace,' that they may have a good thought, and 'an aſſiſting grace,' to inable them to put it in practice. That in this ſtate of grace 'the elect' will certainly perſevere, and cannot finally fall from it. That the reſt of mankind, for want of this 'efficacious and irreſiſtible grace,' remain in a ſtate of curſe and damnation [l].

Such were the doctrines that at firſt more generally prevailed among the reformers, with this difference only, that ſome (thence called Supralapſarians) aſſerted, that God decreed Adam's ſin, and the damnation, as well as ſalvation, of ſuch as ſhould be moſt for his own glory; whilſt others (thence ſtiled Sublapſarians) affirmed, that, Adam having ſinned freely, God decreed to ſave a certain number, and left the [k] As the papiſts held, that men were able not only to perform their duty, but even to do works of ſupererogation, or more than were neceſſary for ſalvation; ſo the reformers ran into the other extreme, and aſſerted, that man of himſelf can do no work acceptable to God.

[l] The Pelagians (ſo called from Pelagius) think there is no need of any other grace but that of pardon, and deny both the preventing and aſſiſting grace. The Semipelagians think, that an aſſiſting grace is neceſſary, but that the firſt turn of the will to God is the effect of a man's own choice.

reſt in their fallen ſtate, without any farther determination about them.

In the progreſs of the reformation, ſome of the doctrines began to be ſoftened. Arminius, divinity-profeſſor at Leyden, and his followers (from him called Arminians, and Remonſtrants or Univerſaliſts) declared, that God decrees not abſolutely any perſon to be ſaved or damned, but conditionally, or according to what he foreſaw they would do: That Chriſt did not die only for a particular number whom God intended to ſave, but for all men; ſo that every one is intitled to the benefit of his death, who rejects not the goſpel-terms of faith and repentance: That grace, or the aſſiſtance given to inable them to do their duty, is not irreſiſtible, but the efficacy of it comes from the freedom of the will, which either may, or may not, co-operate with it as it pleaſes; and conſequently, that the perſeverance of thoſe, to whom ſuch grace is given, is not certain, but they may finally fall away from that ſtate [m].

The two chief branches of the reformation are the Lutherans and Calviniſts, ſo called from their founders Luther and Calvin. The Lutherans, though at firſt they were followers of St. Auſtin, and even denied the freedom of the will, altered their opinion in time, and eagerly came into the Arminian ſcheme of 'conditional decrees [n],' whilſt the Calviniſts cloſely adhered to St. Auſtin's doctrines of 'abſolute and nconditional predeſtination,' as before explained.

Theſe two branches differ alſo in their notions of the Euchariſt. The Lutherans hold, that, 'together with' the bread and wine, the 'real body and blood of Chriſt' is diſtributed. The Calviniſts ſay that, under the bread and wine, the body of Chriſt is 'really, tho' ſpiritually,' received. Here again, if the bible had been adhered to, this ſubject of diſpute had beed avoided; for from the words of the primitive inſtitution, neither a real, nor a ſpiritual, preſence can be inferred. Both parties avow the principle of perſecution [o]; and, on account of their religious differences, ſuch animoſity reigns between them, that they refuſe to hold communication with each other, and, in many places, will not allow a mutual toleration [p]. When the Arminian ſcheme began to ſpread in Holland, and to be favoured by the government as more rational in itſelf, and more intelligible by the people than the Calviniſtical, the Predeſtinarian party, who were moſt prevalent there, grew outrageous at the progreſs of the Arminian doctrines, and called the authors of them devils and plagues, animating the magiſtrates to extirpate and deſtroy them, and utterly refuſing to enter into any treaty of reconciliation. They never ceaſed till they had leave to hold a national ſynod at Dort in 1618, from which all the Arminian divines being expelled, their tenets were condemned, and the Predeſtinarian or Calviniſtical doctrines more firmly eſtabliſhed.

The reformers made great alterations in the diſcipline, as well as in the doctrine, of the church of Rome.

The hierarchy was entirely demoliſhed, and epiſcopacy every where (except in a few 'Lutheran dioceſes') wholly aboliſhed. Biſhops and preſbyters are affirmed to be the ſame in ſcripture, and all ſuperiority of the one over the other being denied, and a parity aſſerted, the eccleſiaſtical government is (by the Calviniſts at leaſt) lodged in the hands of 'Preſbyters, Lay-Elders, and Deacons.'

In Scotland the reformation was alſo ſettled after the Calviniſtical or Geneva-model, both as to doctrine and diſcipline, and epiſcopacy not only rooted out, but declared to be repugnant to the word of God.

In England a middle courſe was ſteered. Though the articles of religion are a plain tranſcript of St. Auſtin's doctrine in the controverted points of 'Original ſin, predeſtination, juſtification by faith alone, efficacy of grace, and good works,' yet are they compoſed with ſuch a latitude and ſuch additional cautions, as that they may be taken in an Arminian as well as Calviniſtical ſenſe. For inſtance, in the article of predeſtination it is not expreſſed, whether God's decree was 'abſolute or conditional;' and therefore, though the authors very probably meant, that the decree was abſolute, yet the remonſtrants may ſubſcribe to it in a conditional ſenſe. However this be, of the thirty-nine articles, the moſt rigid Calviniſt can give his aſſent to all, except three relating to the diſcipline of the church. For though the doctrine of the church of England, as it ſtands in the articles and homilies, agrees with that of the Calviniſts, yet the diſcipline is entirely different. The hierarchy, or church-government by biſhops, prieſts, and deacons, is preſerved in England, and declared to be apoſtolical: The biſhops are held to be of a ſuperior order to the prieſts, and to have the ſole power of ordination. The Engliſh reformers thought proper alſo to retain the popiſh eccleſiaſtical habits or veſtments, the 'ſurplice, hoods, &c.' and alſo ſome of the ceremonies, as the croſs in baptiſm, ring in matrimony, kneeling at the ſacrament, &c. The liturgy or common-prayers were chiefly taken from the offices of the church of Rome, and certain reſponſes were added to engage the attention of the people, who before had no concern in the public devotions which were uttered in an unknown tongue.

It happened in queen Mary's reign, that great numbers of the reformed, upon the reſtoration of property, fled beyond ſea, and were kindly entertained by the proteſtant ſtates in Germany, Switzerland, and Geneva, who allowed them churches for their public worſhip. Among theſe were five biſhops, as many deans, ſome archdeacons, and above fifty eminent preachers and doctors, and of noblemen, merchants, &c. above ſeven hundred. Many of theſe exiles, returning home in queen Elizabeth's reign, brought with them a great liking of the diſcipline and worſhip of the reformed churches abroad, and uſed their utmoſt endeavours to cauſe the church-diſcipline to be reduced to a nearer conformity with the Calviniſtical plan. They alledged, that the ſcriptures are a ſtandard of diſcipline as well as doctrine: That the form of government, appointed by the apoſtles, was, like the 'Jewiſh Sanhedrim,' ariſtocratical, and to be adminiſtered by paſtors, elders, and deacons: That this form was deſigned as a pattern for the churches of all ages, not to be departed from, on account of any cuſtoms of the papacy or practice of the earlier ages, unleſs warranted by the Bible. They objected to the act of ſupremacy, as giving too much power to the crown in matters of religion. They ſaid, that Chriſt and no other was the ſole law-giver and head of the church: That the direction of religious matters was by God's ordinance committed to the church-officers: That the civil magiſtrate might call a council of his clergy, and be there in perſon or by deputy, but not a 'Moderator or Judge:' That it was his province not to make ordinances or determine controverſies, but to ſee the decrees of the clergy executed, and to puniſh the contemners. They declaimed againſt thoſe habits, rites, and ceremonies, which were uſed by papiſts, inſiſting that thoſe things, which were left indifferent by the ſcriptures, ought not to be made neceſſary by any human law, and that ſuch rites as had been abuſed to idolatry, and tended to lead men back to ſuperſtition, were no longer indifferent, but to be rejected as unlawful. They, who were thus for carrying on the reformation farther than the eſtabliſhment, were by their adverſaries termed puritans.

Theſe were told, that, in the affairs of church-government, not only the ſcriptures, but the practice of the church, for the firſt four or five centuries, was to be regarded: That therefore the later corruptions of the papacy, from the time the pope uſurped the title of univerſal biſhop, were only to be rejected, and thoſe things left ſtanding, which could be traced much higher; ſuch as archbiſhops, biſhops, prieſts, and deacons: That every prince had authority to correct all abuſes of doctrine and diſcipline within his own territories, and that things indifferent, ſuch as 'rites, ceremonies, habits, &c.' might be ſettled by the command of the civil

[m] There were ſome that went farther. They denied the certain foreknowledge of future contingencies, and therefore they thought the decrees of God, from all eternity, were only general; that ſuch as believe and obey the goſpel ſhall be ſaved, and that ſuch as live and die in ſin ſhall be damned; but that there were no ſpecial decrees made concerning particular perſons, theſe being only made in time, according to the ſtate in which they are. They thought alſo, that man is by nature ſo free and ſo entire, that he needs no inward grace; ſo they deny a ſpecial predeſtination from all eternity, and do likewiſe deny inward aſſiſtances. Theſe, from Socinus their founder, are called Socinians, and alſo Unitarians, from their aſſerting the ſupremacy of the father, and denying the received doctrine of the Trinity.

[n] When Luther began to form his opinions into a body, he clearly ſaw, that nothing did ſo plainly deſtroy the doctrine of merit and juſtification by works as St. Auſtin's opinions: He found alſo in his works very expreſs authorities againſt moſt of the corruptions of the Roman church; and being of an order that carried his name, and by conſequence accuſtomed to read and reverence his works, it was no wonder if he, without a ſtrict examining of the matter, eſpouſed at firſt all his opinions, though, before he died, he is reported to have changed his mind; for Melancthon, who had been of the ſame opinion, as to the freedom of the will, did retract it, and was not blamed for it by Luther.

[o] Luther allowed of perſecution as far as baniſhment; but Calvin thought it lawful to put heretics to death. Beza publiſhed a treatiſe in favour of perſecution, which was tranſlated into Dutch by Bogerman, preſident of the ſynod of Dort.

[p] It may here be obſerved, that one ſtanding cauſe of their not holding communion with one another, is, that both parties have taken care to inſert their peculiar tenets and doctrines into the offices of their public worſhip. For inſtance, there is ſcarce a Calviniſtical prayer, but what ſuppoſes abſolute predeſtination and election, partial redemption, total inability of man to any thing that is good, efficacy of grace, final perſeverance, or ſome other controverted point, by which means a Lutheran or Arminian cannot join in it, without ſtraining the words to their own ſenſe, which is ſometimes hardly to be done.

magiſtrate, and in ſuch caſes it was the indiſpenſable duty of all ſubjects to obſerve them.

Hence it appears, that both parties agreed in the neceſſity of uniformity of public worſhip, and of calling in the ſword of the civil magiſtrate for the ſupport of their ſeveral ſchemes, but differed about the ſtandard of this ſame uniformity, one party aſſerting, 'It was the queen's ſupremacy and the laws of the land;' the other, 'The decrees of provincial and national ſynods,' allowed and inforced by the magiſtrate. Neither party thought of admitting liberty of conſcience and freedom of profeſſion, which ſeems to be the right of every man, as far as is conſiſtent with the peace of the government.

From this principle of non-toleration both parties in their turns, when they had the civil power in their hands, failed not to oppreſs one another. The puritans were the firſt ſufferers. The controverſy began about the habits, (which had been objected againſt in the reign of Edward VI.) ſeveral refuſing biſhoprics or other preferments, on account of the veſtments and ceremonies, and great numbers being deprived for not uſing them. Queen Elizabeth, jealous of her eccleſiaſtical power, and fond of pomp and ſhew in the externals of religion, was ſo far from granting the leaſt indulgence in theſe matters, that ſhe inſiſted on a ſtrict uniformity as well in diſcipline as doctrine. The puritans, rather than comply, ſubmitted to ſuſpenſions and deprivations, the number of which in her reign amounted to ſeveral thouſands. Penal laws were multiplied and rigorouſly executed. Non-compliance with, or ſpeaking, or acting, againſt the liturgy, was for the third offence perpetual impriſonment, with loſs of preferment to a clergyman, and forfeiture of goods and chattels to a layman. Abſence from church was firſt puniſhed with 12d. a Sunday, afterwards with 20l. a month, and laſtly with impriſonment without bail; and, unleſs a declaration of conformity was made in three months after conviction, with perpetual baniſhment; and, in caſe any returned, they were to ſuffer death without benefit of the clergy. During theſe proceedings, though the puritans in general were unwilling to forſake the eſtabliſhed church, and therefore evaded the force of theſe laws by coming to church, when the prayers were almoſt over, and receiving the ſacrament where it was adminiſtered with ſome latitude; yet others reſolved to ſeparate from it, and to aſſemble, wherever they could, to worſhip God in their own way. The Browniſts (ſo called from Robert Brown their paſtor, educated in Corpus Chriſti college Cambridge) formed the firſt ſeparate congregation; but they were quickly forced to leave the kingdom and retire to Holland, where Mr. Robinſon, paſtor of the church at Leyden, firſt ſtruck out the 'Congregational or independent' form of church-government [q]. Part of this church, tranſplanting themſelves at length into America, laid the foundation of the colony of New-England.

Here was the beginning of the ſeparation, whereby people of the ſame country, of the ſame religion, and of the ſame judgment and doctrine, parted communion, on account of a few habits and ceremonies, which by degrees begot unſpeakable miſchiefs to the nation, and in the end proved the deſtruction of the conſtitution both of church and ſtate. A ſtrong inſtance of the weakneſs, perverſeneſs, and ſuperſtition of mankind! How weak muſt it be to part with a livelihood and embrace poverty, rather than wear a ſurplice or ſquare cap! How perverſe to inforce the uſe of ſuch things againſt conſcience! How ſuperſtitious to believe it of any conſequence to religion, to uſe or diſuſe them! Had theſe external things been left as indifferent in their practice as they are in their nature, there had been probably no ſchiſm in the church, nor civil war in the ſtate. For, though the puritans had many other objections to the eſtabliſhed diſcipline, they would doubtleſs have remained in the church, if the uſe of the habits had been diſpenſed with. But the queen's reſolution, not to indulge them, drove many into an actual ſeparation, which widened the breach. For the controverſy, which had been chiefly confined to the habits and a few ceremonies, began to open into ſeveral conſiderable branches, and particlarly the hierarchy was attacked. The puritans were alſo divided, and a new diſpute aroſe concerning 'The neceſſity of a ſeparation from the eſtabliſhed church.'

Soon after the acceſſion of king James, the canons of the church were eſtabliſhed by the king and convocation. By theſe canons all were declared to be ipſo facto excommunicated, that affirmed, the church of England not to be a true and apoſtolical church, or the liturgy to be corrupt, or the rites and ceremonies to be antichriſtian, or that ſeparated from the church, and pretended that any ſect of miniſters and layperſons, may make rules, orders, and conſtitutions, without the king's authority. Thus the puritans found themſelves in a worſe condition than ever, excommunication (the conſequences of which are terrible) being added to ſuſpenſions and deprivations [r]. Things were in this ſtate, when a great turn happened in the doctrine of the church. The Arminian or remonſtrant tenets (which had been condemned by the ſynod of Dort) began to ſpread in England. They were eſpouſed by the court and the univerſities [s]. The Calviniſtical ſenſe of the articles was diſcouraged, and injunctions were publiſhed againſt preaching upon 'Predeſtination, election, efficacy of grace, &c.' whilſt the Arminians were ſuffered to inculcate their doctrines. As Arminianiſm was firſt embraced by thoſe who were for exalting the prerogative above law, all that adhered to the ſide of liberty, or to the Calviniſtical ſenſe of the articles, though ever ſo good churchmen, were branded by the court with the name of Puritans. Hence the diſtinction of State or Doctrinal-Puritans, and Diſcipline-Puritans or Diſciplinarians. By this means the Puritants acquired great ſtrength, for the bulk of the people and clergy were at once confounded with them. At the head of the Arminians was Laud, and of the Doctrinal Puritans, archbiſhop Abbot.

When king Charles I. came to the crown, the ſtate of the controverſy between the church and the puritans was entirely changed. In the reigns of king James and queen Elizabeth, the puritans were almoſt all for the preſbyterial government, but, from the time that Arminianiſm prevailed in the church, the whole body of Calvaniſts came to be called Doctrinal puritans. There was no mention for any years before the civil wars of the old Book of diſcipline, (framed by the Puritans in queen Elizabeth's reign) but ſeemed to unite in a moderate epiſcopacy [t], and the controverſy ran upon 'The Doctrinal Articles, upon the reduction of epiſcopal power, and upon innovations in the church.' For Laud inſtead of indulging the puritans, widened the breach between them and the church, by introducing many new and pompous ceremonies in the public worſhip. Theſe not only made terms of conformity more difficult, but were inforced both upon the clergy and laity with all the terrors of the High-commiſſion, to the ruin of many families, and the raiſing very great diſturbances in many parts of the kingdom. Upon theſe proceedings great numbers tranſplanted themſelves and families into America, and gave birth to a ſecond colony in New-England, that of Maſſachuſet's bay [u].

[q] In the year 1616, Mr. Jacob, (who, after conferring with Robinſon, embraced his ſentiments of church diſcipline) ſet up the firſt Independent or Congregational church in England. Some time after, ſome of the moſt rigid, being diſſatisfied about the lawfulneſs of infant-baptiſm, choſe Mr. Jeſſe their miniſter, who laid, in 1640, the foundation of the firſt Baptiſt congregation in England. The Browniſts increaſed in ſuch a manner, that in 1592, ſir Walter Raleigh declared in the parliament houſe, that there were no leſs than 20,000 divided into ſeveral congregations, in Norfolk, Eſſex, and about London. They had now at their head, Smith, Jacob, and Ainſworth, the rabbi of the age. Copping and Thacker, two of their miniſters, were condemned and put to death for non-conformity, in 1583. The Browniſts did not differ from the church in any doctrinal points; but were ſo rigid and narrow in points of diſcipline, that they not only maintained the diſcipline of the church of England to be antichriſtian, but renounced communion with all other reformed churches, except ſuch as ſhould be of their model.

[r] In the reign of king James, two perſons were burnt for hereſy; one was Bartholomew Legate, an Arian; he was well verſed in the ſcriptures, and of an unblameable converſation. The king himſelf and ſome biſhops conferred with him, but could not convince him of his errors. After having lain ſome time in Newgate, he was convened before biſhop King in his conſiſtory at St. Paul's, who, with ſome other divines and lawyers, declared him an obdurate heretic, and certified the ſame into chancery by a ſignificat, delivering him up to the ſecular arm. Whereupon the king ſigned a writ de Hæretico comburendo to the ſheriffs of London, who brought him to Smithfield, March 18, 1612, and in the midſt of a vaſt concourſe of people burnt him to death. A pardon was offered at the ſtake, if he would recant, but he refuſed it. The next month Edward Wightman, of Burton upon Trent, was convicted of hereſy by biſhop Neile, and was burnt at Lichfield, April 11. He was charged in the warrant with the hereſies of Arius, Cerinthus, Manichæus, and the Anabaptiſts.—There was another condemned to the fire, but the conſtancy of the other two moved ſuch compaſſion in the ſpectators, that it was thought bettter to let him linger out a miſerable life in Newgate. Fuller, B. X. 63, 64.

[s] The Predeſtinarian controverſy was began in 1595, in queen Elizabeth's reign, by Barret, fellow of Caius college, Cambridge, who preached againſt Calvin's doctrine of predeſtination, &c. for which he was cenſured by the univerſity, and forced to retract in St. Mary's church. He was afterwards ſent to Lambeth, and examined before archbiſhop Whitgift; who enjoined him to confeſs his errors, and not teach the like doctrines for the future; but he choſe rather to quit the univerſity. This gave occaſion for the famous Lambeth-articles, in which the Calviniſtical ſenſe of predeſtination, election, and the other controverted points is ſtrongly aſſerted; and to which the ſcholars in the univerſity were ſtrictly enjoined to conform.

[t] That is, inſtead of a biſhop governing alone a dioceſe of five hundred or a thouſand pariſhes by his chancellor, commiſſaries, officials, and other eccleſiaſtical officers, they were for a biſhop or ſtated-preſident over a diſtrict of ten or twelve pariſhes, who jointly, with the parochial miniſters, ſhould manage affairs of his diſtrict.

[u] It is ſaid, there were eight ſail of ſhips at once, in the ſpring of 1638, in the river of Thames, bound for New-England, and filled with Puritan families, among whom (according to Bates and Dugdale) were Oliver Cromwell, afterwards Protector, John Hampden, Eſq; and Mr. Arthur Haſelrigge, who,

The church was now in the heighth of it's ſplendor, epiſcopacy was declared to be of apoſtolical, and conſequently of divine inſtitution, and the preſbyterial government though challenging the title of 'Chriſt's kingdom and ordinance,' to have no foundation in ſcripture, nor in the practice of the church for fifteen hundred years. The clergy were all obliged, on pain of deprivation, to ſwear that 'They approved the doctrine and diſcipline of the church, and would never conſent to alter the government of it by archbiſhops, biſhops, deans, and archdeacons, &c.' The churches were adorned with paintings, images, altar-pieces, &c. and, inſtead of communion-tables, altars were ſet up, and bowings to them and the ſacramental elements enjoined. The predeſtinarian doctrines were forbid, not only to be preached, but to be printed, and the Arminian ſenſe of the articles was encouraged and propagated.

On the other hand the puritans loudly complained of theſe innovations, and taxed the authors of them with a deſign to introduce popery. The more ſeverely they were uſed, the more they increaſed and continued to do ſo, till the meeting of the long parliament in 1640, when the affairs of religion took a new turn.

This parliament being compoſed chiefly of State and Doctrinal Puritans, one of their reſolutions was, 'To redreſs the grievances of the church.' They began with cenſuring the authors of the late innovations, and voted them down. A ſolemn proteſtation was drawn up for all to ſubſcribe, that 'They would maintain the true reformed religion, expreſſed in the doctrine of the church of England, againſt all popery and popiſh innovation, &c.' The high-commiſſion court and ſtar chamber were aboliſhed. The votes and temporal juriſdiction of the biſhops were taken away; and afterwards, in complaiſance to the Scots, a bill paſſed both houſes for the utter aboliſhing all archbiſhops, biſhops, their chancellors and commiſſaries, deans, chapters, archdeacons, canons, prebends, &c. Thus the diſcipline of the church was voted away, and no other was erected in it's room till ſeveral years after. In this interval, the clergy were permitted to read more or leſs of the liturgy, as they pleaſed, and to govern their pariſhes according to their diſcretion. The veſtments were left indifferent, ſome wearing them, and others, in imitation of the foreign proteſtant churches, making uſe of a cloak. The puritan clergy, being zealous Calviniſts, and having been prohibited for ſome years from preaching againſt the Arminians, now pointed all their artillery againſt them, and inſiſted upon little elſe in their ſermons but 'Predeſtination, juſtification by faith alone, ſalvation by free grace,' and the inability of man to do that which is good. Moral duties were too much neglected, and from a ſtrong averſion to Arminianiſm, theſe divines made way for Antinomianiſm, running from one extreme to the other, till at laſt ſome of them were loſt in the wild mazes of enthuſiaſtic dreams and viſions, and others, from falſe principles, pretended to juſtify the hidden works of diſhoneſty. In the mean while, the Preſbyterians were labouring the eſtabliſhment of their form of church-government as 'the diſcipline of Jeſus Chriſt,' but in vain; for the parliament, inſtead of complying with a petition to that end, voted it ſcandalous. Nor could they ever obtain the power of 'the keys, excommunication, &c. for which they were continually applying to the parliament. It is true, by an ordinance of Auguſt 19, 1645, the preſbyterian church government became the national eſtabliſhment, as far as an ordinance of the parliament could make it; and, by another of Sept. 1, 1646, epiſcopacy was aboliſhed, and the church-lands alienated for payment of the public debts. Notwithſtanding all this, though the hierarchy was deſtroyed, and the beſt, if not all the livings of the kingdom diſtributed among them, the preſbyterians were not ſatisfied. For it muſt be obſerved, that the Preſbyterian government was more narrow than the Epiſcopal, and allowed not a liberty of conſcience, but claimed a civil as well as eccleſiaſtical authority over men's perſons and properties. Conſequently they were ſtill diſcontented, for want of Church-power to cruſh the Sectaries, as they termed all that diſſented from them. Of theſe the independents were the chief, whoſe opinion it was, that every congregation had power to chuſe or ordain their paſtor, and jointly with him to manage their religious concerns without Claſſical or Synodical aſſemblies, and conſequently they were for univerſal toleration. Theſe two points, independency of congregations (from whence they were called Congregationaliſts) and toleration were the conſtant ſubjects of diſpute between them and the preſbyterians, who were profeſſed enemies to both. The preſbyterians inſiſted upon a ſtrict uniformity in worſhip and diſcipline, and bitterly inveighed againſt toleration, which they called the Great Diana of the independents. Not content with having their form of government made the national eſtabliſhment, they were continually ſoliciting the parliament for 'a coercive power,' in order to perſecute all that differed from them. On the other hand the independents, who multiplied daily, and the anabaptiſts (who differed from them in little elſe but infant baptiſm) were as ſtrenuous for toleration and liberty of conſcience, declaring no opinions or ſentiments of religion are cognizable by the magiſtrate any farther than they are inconſiſtent with the peace of the civil government. Little did the preſbyterian divines think, that in leſs than twenty years all their artillery would be turned againſt them: That they ſhould be excluded the eſtabliſhment by an act of epiſcopal uniformity, and reduced to the neceſſity of pleading for that indulgence, which they now denied others. Their thoughts were entirely engroſſed with 'covenant-uniformity and the divine right of their preſbytery,' which, after all, the parliament would never admit in the extent they deſired.

During theſe proceedings, the epiſcopal clergy felt in their turn the effects of non-tolerating principles. By an ordinance of the 23d of Auguſt 1645, the directory was enjoined to be read openly in all churches, under the penalty of forty ſhillings, and whoever ſpoke or acted againſt it was to forfeit from five to fifty pounds. The uſe of the common-prayer-book was forbid, not only in any church or place of public worſhip, but even in any private place or family, under the penalty of five pounds for the firſt offence, ten for the ſecond, and for the third a year's impriſonment. The covenant was impoſed upon them, and whoever refuſed to take it was ejected. Several thouſands of the parochial clergy loſt their livings, after the civil wars were begun; ſome left them, and fled over to the king's party; others were deprived by the committees of the counties, and the reſt for refuſing the covenant. About two hundred maſters and fellows of colleges in Cambridge, beſides inferior ſcholars, were expelled that univerſity; and about nineteen or twenty heads of colleges, beſides fellows, were expelled at Oxford: but nothing ſhews how far the governing preſbyterians in thoſe days would have carried the uſe of their power, if it had been ſupported by the ſword of the civil magiſtrate, than the ordinance againſt blaſphemy and hereſy, which, perhaps, is one of the moſt ſhocking laws to be met with. This ordinance is dated May 2, 1648, and ordains, among other things, that whoever affirms, That there is no God: That God is not omnipreſent, almighty, &c. That the Father is not God, the Son is not God, the Holy Ghoſt is not God, or that theſe three are not one eternal God, or that Chriſt is not God equal to the Father: That the Godhead and Manhood of Chriſt are not diſtinct natures: That the death of Chriſt is not meritorious: That Chriſt is not riſen: That there is no reſurrection or a future judgment: That the ſcriptures are not the word of God, &c. ſhall ſuffer death as in caſe of felony. And that whoever ſays, that all men ſhall be ſaved: That man by nature hath free will to turn to God: That man is bound to believe no more than by his reaſon he can comprehend: That the baptiſm of infants is unlawful, &c. ſhall upon conviction be committed to priſon, till he find ſureties that he will not publiſh or maintain the ſaid error or errors any more. This ordinance was a comprehenſive engine of cruelty, and would have incloſed great numbers, if it had not been laid aſide by the influence of the army, till it was voted to be determined [x]. The preſbyterian government, which, by the former ordinance, had not been abſolutely eſtabliſhed, was at laſt ſettled without limitation of time, by an ordinance of June 21, 1648. This was done without laying any penalty on recuſants, or ſuch as did not come to the ſacrament, or ſubmit to their diſcipline; which was the utmoſt length that preſbytery obtained in the kingdom. And therefore, when afterwards many ſectaries ſprung up, as ſeekers [y], ranters [z], quawho, ſeeing no end to theſe oppreſſions, were determined to ſpend the remainder of their days in America; but by an order of council, dated May 1, 1638, the ſhips were ſtopped, and the paſſengers commanded to be put on ſhore; and to prevent the like for the future, the king prohibited all maſters and owners of ſhips to carry any paſſengers to New-England, without a ſpecial licence from the privy-council. Upon which great numbers went and ſettled in Holland.

[x] In this ordinance, Papiſts, Arminians, Antinomians, Arians, Socinians, Anabaptiſts, Quakers, and the other Sectaries would have been included, if the confuſion of the times had not hindered the Preſbyterians from putting it in execution.

[y] Theſe taught, 'That the ſcriptures were uncertain: That preſent miracles were neceſſary to faith: That our miniſtry is null, and without authority; and our worſhip and ordinances unneceſſary or vain,' the true church, miniſtry, ſcripture, and ordinances being loſt, for which they were 'ſeeking.' The papiſts hatched and actuated this ſect. Some of them were real papiſts, and others infidels.

[z] Theſe made it their buſineſs, as the Seekers, to ſet up the 'light of nature, kers [a], Behmenists [b],) whose doctrines were almost the same, though they differed in name) all declaring against a settled ministry, and for the guidance of the light within; and the Independents (who were equally enemies of the episcopal and presbyterian uniformity) came to be so far masters, as to hold the Presbyterians in a sort of subjection [c], the Presbyterians turned to the thoughts of restoring king Charles II. and joined with the Episcopalians in that affair, upon the king's declaration of liberty to tender consciences, and that no man should be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion, which did not disturb the peace of the kingdom. When the king was restored, some moderate episcopal men thought of an union with the Presbyterians. But the more politic part of them knew, that all their ancient power and revenues would be restored to them, and none suffered to share with them, but such as were entirely of their mind and way. The Presbyterians, who were possessed of most of the great benefices in the church and in the universities, were in hopes of favour, not only from the king's declaration, but upon ten or twelve of their divines being made the king's chaplains in ordinary. By this means they had easy access to his majesty, and, intending to improve it to the common good, waited upon him with the lord Manchester, recommending to his serious consideration the union of his subjects in religious matters, which he had now a most happy juncture for effecting, and begging, that only things necessary might be the terms of union, and that the true exercise of church-discipline might be allowed. The king declared himself highly pleased with their inclinations to agreement, but told them, that this agreement could not be expected to be compassed, but by abating something on both sides, and therefore desired them to offer some proposals about church-government, that being the main difference, and 'to set down the most they could yield to.' Hereupon they declared, They could not pretend to speak for, or oblige others, and therefore what they did must signify but the minds of such as were present. The king told them, It should be so taken. Then they begged, that, at the same time that they offered their concessions, the brethren on the other side might also bring in theirs, containing the utmost they could yield on their side, in order to concord. And the king promised it should be so.

In about three weeks time they agreed to a paper of proposals, in which they offered to allow of the true ancient presidency in the church, with a due mixture of presbytery, and proposed that bishop Usher's reduction of episcopacy should be the ground-work of an accommodation. As to the liturgy, they desired that a new one might be compiled, or the old reformed; and begged that kneeling at the sacrament might not be imposed, and the surplice, cross in baptism, and bowing at the name of Jesus rather than Christ, might be abolished. The ministers waiting on the king with their proposals, he treated them very respectfully, told them he was well pleased that they were for a liturgy, and yielded to the essence of episcopacy, and promised them, that the places, where the old incumbents were dead, should (as they desired) be confirmed to the possessors.

As they expected to meet (according to the king's promise) some divines of the other side, and to see their proposals, it much disappointed them to find none of them appear. After some time of waiting for the compliances of the episcopal divines, they at length received a sharp answer, reflecting on their proposals, in which Usher's reduction was rejected as a heap only of private conceptions, the liturgy was applauded as unexceptionable, but a revisal was agreed to in case the king thought fit; and, as for the ceremonies, not one could be parted with. It is very remarkable, that, when the Puritans in 1641 would have been satisfied with Usher's scheme for the reduction of episcopacy, they could not obtain it from the king and bishops; that afterwards, when the king offered the same scheme at the treaty of the Isle of Wight, the parliament and Puritan divines would not accept it, for fear of breaking with the Scots. And now when the Presbyterian ministers presented it to king Charles II. as a model with which they were satisfied, both the king and bishops rejected it with contempt, and would not suffer it to be debated [d].

Shortly after, instead of the diocesans concession, the ministers were told, that the king would put all that he should grant them into the form of a declaration, and they should see it before it was published. Accordingly on a day appointed it was read by the chancellor before the king, several noblemen, and some divines of both sides. Each party was to speak to what they disliked, and the king to determine how it should be. There were various altercations about prelacy, and re-ordination, and the particulars of the declaration. When the whole was perused, the chancellor drew out another paper, intimating, that the king had also been petitioned by the Independents and Anabaptists for liberty, and therefore he read an additional part to the declaration to this purpose, 'That others also be permitted to meet for religious worship, so be it they do it not to the disturbance of the peace; and that no justice of peace or officer disturb them.' This being designed to secure liberty to the Papists, there was a general silence upon the reading it. The bishops thought it a nice point, and said nothing. The Presbyterians were afraid to speak against it, lest all the sects should look upon them as the causers of their sufferings. But at length Mr. Baxter, fearing their silence might be misinterpreted, said, 'As they humbly thanked his majesty for his declared indulgence to themselves, so they distinguished the tolerable party from the intolerable: for the former, they humbly craved just lenity and favour; but for the latter, ture, under the name of 'Christ in men,' and to dishonour and cry down the church, scriptures, ministry, worship, and ordinances; and called men to hearken to Christ within them. But, withal, they conjoined a cursed doctrine of libertinism, which brought them to abominable filthiness of life. They taught, as the Familists, 'that God regardeth not the actions of the outward man, but of the heart: And to the pure, all things are pure, even things forbidden.' The horrid villanies of this sect soon put an end to it.

[a] The Quakers, who (as Calamy says) were the Ranters reversed, turned from horrid profaneness and blasphemy, to a life of extreme austerity. Their doctrines were mostly the same with the Ranters. They make the light which every man hath within him a sufficient rule; and consequently, the scripture and ministry are set light by. They speak much for the dwelling and working of the spirit in us, but little of justification, pardon of sin, and reconciliation with God through Jesus Christ. They pretend their dependence on the spirit's conduct against set times of prayer, and against sacraments, scriptures, and ministry. They will not have the scripture called the word of God. Their principal zeal lieth in railing at ministers, as hirelings, deceivers, and false prophets, and in refusing to swear before a magistrate, &c. Their chief leader, James Neyler, had his tongue bored through as a blasphemer, by the parliament. Many Franciscan friars and other papists have been proved to be disguised speakers in their assemblies. But afterwards William Penn, their leader, undertook the reforming the sect, and set up a kind of ministry among them.

[b] The opinions of the Behmenists were much like those of the Quakers, they being for the sufficiency of the light of nature, and a dependence on revelations. But they were fewer in number, and of much greater meekness than the rest of the sectaries. They had their name from Jacob Behmen, in whose writings their doctrine is to be seen at large.

[c] The Presbyterians were so rigid in point of uniformity, as that, in the treaty of the isle of Wight, they would not allow the king liberty to have the common-prayer read privately in his family. Upon which the army, whose favourite point was liberty of conscience, was justly incensed against them, and said, if Presbyterian conformity should take place, what must the Independents and sectaries expect, since the king himself was thus used by them? What have we been fighting for, if, after all the hazards we have run to set up Presbytery, we must be banished our country, or driven into corners? Thus the rigid uniformity of the Presbyterians threw the army upon the desperate measures of assuming the sovereign power; bringing the king to justice: setting aside the covenant, and erecting a commonwealth.

[d] Usher's reduction of episcopacy consisted of the four following articles:

I. In every parish the rector, or the incumbent pastor, together with the church-warden and sidesmen, may every week take notice of such as live scandalously in that congregation; who are to receive such several admonitions and reproofs, as the quality of their offence shall deserve; and, if by this means they cannot be reclaimed, they may be presented unto the next monthly synod, and in the mean time be debarred by the pastor from access unto the Lord's table.

II. Whereas by a statute in the 26th of Hen. VIII. (revived in the 1st of queen Elizabeth) suffragans are appointed to be erected in twenty-six several places of this kingdom, the number of them might very well be conformed unto the number of the several rural deaneries, into which every diocese is subdivided; which being done, the suffragan (supplying the place of those, who in the ancient church were called Chorepiscopi) might every month assemble a synod of all the rectors, or incumbent pastors, within the precinct, and according to the major part of their voices conclude all matters that should be brought into debate before them. To this synod the rector and church-wardens might present such impenitent persons, as by admonition and suspension from the sacrament would not be reformed; who, if they would still remain contumacious and incorrigible, the sentence of excommunication might be decreed against them by the synod, and accordingly be executed in the parish where they lived. Hitherto also all things that concerned the parochial ministers might be referred, whether they did touch their doctrine or their conversation: as also the censure of all new opinions, heresies, and schisms, which did arise within that circuit, with liberty of appeal, if need so require, unto the diocesan synod.

III. The diocesan synod might be held once or twice in the year, as it should be thought most convenient; therein all the suffragans, and the rest of the rectors or incumbent pastors, or a certain select number out of every deanery within that diocese might meet; with whose consent, or the major part of them, all things might be concluded by the bishop or superintendent (call him which you will) or in his absence by one of the suffragans, whom he should depute in his stead to be moderator of that assembly. Here all matters of greater moment might be taken into consideration, and the orders of the monthly synods revised, and (if need be) reformed. And, if here also any matter of difficulty could not receive a full determination, it might be referred to the next provincial or national synod.

IV. The provincial synod might consist of all the bishops and suffragans, and such of the clergy as should be elected out of every diocese within the province. The primate of either province might be the moderator of this meeting (or in his room some one of the bishops appointed by him) and all matters be ordered therein by common consent, as in the former assemblies. This synod might be held every third year, and, if the parliament do then sit, both the primates and provincial synods of the land might join together, and make up a national council; wherein all appeals from inferior synods might be received, all their acts examined, and all ecclesiastical constitutions, which concern the state of the church of the whole nation, established.

ſuch as Papiſts and Socinians, they could not make their toleration their requeſt.' To this the king ſaid, 'There were laws ſufficient againſt the Papiſts.' Baxter replied, 'They underſtood the queſtion to be, Whether thoſe laws ſhould be executed or not?' Upon which the matter was dropped. At length the declaration came out ſo amended, as that it was fitted to be an inſtrument of concord and peace, if ſettled by a law; and ſo the diviſion might have been healed, upon the alteration of the liturgy, as the declaration promiſed [c].

But, after all, the declaration had no effect, except only a year's ſuſpenſion of the law that afterwards took place; nor as to church-government were any of the conceſſions put in execution.

However, purſuant to a promiſe in the declaration, that the liturgy ſhould be reviewed, a commiſſion was granted to certain perſons (twelve of a ſide, with nine aſſiſtants to each ſide) to meet for that purpoſe at the Savoy. At the firſt meeting, inſtead of an amicable conference, it was inſiſted upon by the biſhops, that the miniſters ſhould bring all their exceptions at one time, and all their additions at another. Accordingly the exceptions were drawn up, and in ſome time offered to the biſhops; and Baxter alone undertook to frame a 'new liturgy,' which was generally approved by the miniſters.

This liturgy (called the reformed liturgy) being preſented with a petition to the biſhops, they, after ſome delay, ſent the miniſters a paper of reaſonings againſt their exceptions, without any abatements or alterations at all worth the mentioning. An anſwer to which was alſo drawn up. But it is very probable, that neither this anſwer, nor 'the reformed liturgy' were ever read by the biſhops and doctors, who were preſent at the meetings. So that it ſeems, before they knew what was in them, they were reſolved to reject the papers of the miniſters. After many debates, a diſpute was at laſt agreed on, to argue the neceſſity or no neceſſity of altering the liturgy. Three of a party were choſen on each ſide, to manage the diſpute, which was done in writing; and the ſole argument handled was, 'The ſinfulneſs of injoining miniſters to deny the communion to all that dare not kneel.' This diſpute was drawn out to a great length, and ended in exclamations againſt one of the diſputants, for aſſerting, That a thing, not evil in itſelf, may have accidents ſo evil, as may make it a ſin to him that ſhall command it. As if it followed from thence, nothing may be commanded, for fear of thoſe evil accidents, in caſes where the commander cannot be chargeable with any hand in them. Whereas his meaning was, That whenever the commanding or forbidding of a thing indifferent is like to occaſion more hurt than good, and this may be foreſeen, the commanding or forbidding it is a ſin.

Thus ended the diſpute at the Savoy, and all endeavours for reconciliation upon the warrant of the king's commiſſion.

Notwithſtanding theſe diſcouragements, endeavours were uſed to get the king's declaration paſſed into a law, but, when it came to the trial, it was rejected; and ſo the declaration did not only die before it was executed, but all attempts for union were at an end. Nay, a rigorous act was brought in for uniformity, by which all, who did not conform to the liturgy by the 24th of Auguſt, St. Bartholomew's day, in the year 1662, were deprived of all eccleſiaſtical benefices, without leaving a diſcretional power with the king in the execution of it, and without making proviſion for the maintenance of thoſe who ſhould be deprived: A ſeverity neither practiſed by queen Elizabeth, in the enacting her liturgy, nor by the parliament in ejecting the royaliſts, in both which, a fifth part of the benefice was reſerved for their ſubſiſtence. Indeed, while the bill was depending, the miniſters, ſtill interpoſing, as they had opportunity, were poſitively promiſed by ſome in great places, that the king would grant that by indulgence, which had been denied in the way they deſired it; and that care ſhould be taken, that the king ſhould have power reſerved to him, to diſpenſe with the act to ſuch as deſerved well of him at the reſtoration, or whom he pleaſed. But when the act paſſed (by a very few votes) all their great friends left them in the lurch; and when, afterwards, upon encouragement from men in power they drew up a petition for indulgence, they were threatened with incurring a præmunire by ſo bold an attempt, though they had worded it ſo cautiouſly, that it did not extend to the papiſts. During this interval, the preſbyterians were under great perplexities. They had many meetings, and much diſputing about conformity. Reynolds accepted the biſhopric of Norwich, but Calamy and Baxter refuſed the ſees of Lithfield and Hereford. At length, the appointed day came, when about two thouſand miniſters fell under the parliamentary deprivation; whereas, had the terms of the king's declaration been ſtood to, it is affirmed, not above three hundred would have been deprived. This raiſed an outcry over the nation, tho' few of the epiſcopal party were troubled at it, or apprehenſive of the ill effects ſuch a ſeverity was like to have. Here were men much valued, ſome on better grounds, others on worſe, who were now ignominiouſly caſt out, reduced to great poverty, provoked by ſpiteful uſage, and thrown upon thoſe popular practices, that both their principles and circumſtances ſeemed to juſtify, of forming ſeparate congregations, and of diverting men from the public worſhip, and from conſidering their ſucceſſors as the lawful paſtors of thoſe churches in which they had ſerved.

Thus, inſtead of healing the religious differences, it was reſolved to widen them, by making the terms of conformity much ſtricter than before the war [f]. All perſons were obliged to ſubſcribe an unfeigned aſſent and conſent to all and every particular, contained in the book of common prayer: And all, who had not epiſcopal ordination, were made incapable of holding any benefice. Inſtead of Indulgence or Comprehenſion, an act paſſed, declaring any meeting for religious worſhip, at which five were preſent more than the family, to be a Conventicle. And every perſon above ſixteen, that was preſent at it, was to lie three months in priſon, or to pay five pounds for the firſt; ſix months for the ſecond, or twenty pounds; and for the third offence, was to be baniſhed to any plantation except New-England, or pay a hundred pounds. During the plague, ſome nonconformiſts preaching in the empty pulpits, as well as in other places, a ſevere act paſſed in the parliament at Oxford, requiring all ſilenced miniſters to take an oath, declaring it unlawful, on any pretence whatſoever, to take arms againſt the king, or any commiſſioned by him, and that they would not at any time endeavour an alteration in the government of the church or ſtate. Such as refuſed this oath were not to come within five miles of any city or corporation, or of the church where they had ſerved. In 1668, a project of a comprehenſion for the preſbyterians, and of an indulgence for the independents, and the reſt, was prepared by Bridgman and Wilkins, conſiſting chiefly of thoſe things that the king had promiſed by his declaration in 1660; but this was exclaimed againſt by the church-party, and the houſe of commons was then ſo poſſeſſed againſt the nonconformiſts, that, when it was known that a bill was ready to be offered to the houſe for that end, a very extraordinary vote paſſed, that no bill to that purpoſe ſhould be received. After ſtruggling ſeveral years under theſe difficulties, the diſſenters had a little reſpite by the

[c]. This declaration was dated October 25, 1660, wherein the king thus expreſſes himſelf, 'When we were in Holland, we were attended by many grave and learned miniſters from hence, who were looked upon as the moſt able and principal aſſertors of preſbyterian opinions, with whom we had as much conference, as the multitude of affairs, which were then upon us, would permit us to have: And, to our great ſatisfaction and comfort, found them perſons full of affection to us, of zeal for the peace of the church and ſtate, and neither enemies (as they have been given out to be) of epiſcopacy or liturgy; but modeſtly to deſire ſuch alterations in either, as without ſhaking foundations, might beſt allay the preſent diſtempers, which the indiſpoſition of the times, and the tenderneſs of ſome men's conſciences, had contracted. For the better doing whereof, we intended upon our firſt arrival in theſe kingdoms, to call a ſynod of divines: And in the mean time publiſhed in our declaration from Breda a liberty to tender conſciences. We need not profeſs the high eſteem and affection we have for the church of England, as it is eſtabliſhed by law. Nor do we think that reverence in the leaſt degree diminiſhed by our condeſcenſions, not peremptorily to inſiſt upon ſome particulars of ceremony, which, however introduced by the piety, devotion, or order of former times, may not be ſo agreeable to the preſent; but may even leſſen that piety and devotion, for the improvement whereof they might be firſt introduced, and conſequently may be well diſpenſed with. And we have not the leaſt doubt, but the preſent biſhops will think the preſent conceſſions now made by us, to allay the preſent diſtempers, very juſt and reaſonable, and will very chearfully conform themſelves thereunto:' Of theſe conceſſions, this was the ſubſtance: 'The king declared his reſolution to promote the power of godlineſs, to encourage the exerciſes of religion both in public and in private, to take care that the lord's day ſhould be applied to holy exercies, without unneceſſary divertiſements; and that inſufficient, negligent, and ſcandalous miniſters, ſhould not be permitted in the church. That no biſhops ſhould ordain, or exerciſe any part of juriſdiction, which appertains to the cenſures of the church, without the advice and aſſiſtance of the preſbyters, and neither do, nor impoſe any thing, but what was according to the known laws of the land; that chancellors, commiſſaries, and officials, ſhould be excluded from acts of juriſdiction, the power of the paſtors in the ſeveral congregations reſtored, and a liberty granted to all the miniſters to aſſemble monthly, for the exerciſe of the paſtoral perſuaſive power, to the promoting of knowledge and godlineſs in their flocks. That the miniſters ſhould be freed from the ſubſcription required by the canon, and the oath of canonical obedience, and receive ordination, inſtitution, and induction, and exerciſe their function, and enjoy the profits of their livings, without being obliged to it: And that the uſe of the ceremonies ſhould be diſpenſed with, where they were ſcrupled.'

[f] It had at firſt been reſolved, when the biſhops were reſtored to their power and revenues, inſtead of uſing means to bring in the diſſenters, to ſeek the moſt effectual methods for caſting them out, and bringing in a new ſet of men into the church. The king was pleaſed with this deſign, though from a different king's declaration for ſuſpending the execution of all penal laws, both againſt papiſts and non-conformiſts. Great endeavours were uſed by the court to perſuade them to make addreſſes upon it, but few were ſo blind as not to ſee it was chiefly deſigned for the ſake of the papiſts. However, the preſbyterians, with Dr. Manton at their head, came and thanked the king for it, which offended many of their beſt friends. But this indulgence laſted not long; for the houſe of commons, alarmed at this ſtep in favour of popery, voted the king's declaration illegal, and paſſed the teſt-act, by which it was enacted, that no man ſhould bear any office or place, who did not take the oath of allegiance and ſupremacy, and receive the ſacrament, according to the uſage of the church of England. This act, though intended againſt the papiſts, affected alſo the non-conformiſts; however, the friends of the preſbyterians did not oppoſe it, that an effectual ſecurity againſt popery might not be prevented. For this reaſon it was, that, when the deſigns of the court for popery were not fully diſcovered, the ſame houſe of commons, that had paſſed ſuch ſevere acts againſt the diſſenters, voted the bringing in a bill in their favour, which however was, after a ſecond reading, dropped in the committee. Though this bill was not finiſhed, the prudent behaviour of the non-conformiſts on this occaſion did ſo ſoften their adverſaries, that no more votes or bills were offered againſt them. On the contrary, a bill paſſed both houſes for repealing the ſevere act in queen Elizabeth's reign againſt the puritans; but on the day of prorogation, when the king came to paſs the bills, the clerk of the crown, by the king's particular order, took this bill from the table, and it was no more heard of. However, the commons, in the morning before they were prorogued, paſſed two extraordinary votes, That the laws againſt popiſh recuſants, ought not to be executed againſt proteſtant diſſenters, and, That it was the opinion of the houſe, that the laws againſt the diſſenters ought not to be executed. Though this ſhewed the ſenſe of the commons, yet, inſtead of being a kindneſs to the non-conformiſts, it raiſed a ſtorm againſt them, and after the diſſolution of the parliament they were perſecuted afreſh. Orders and directions were ſent from the king and council-board to ſuppreſs all conventicles, and the laws againſt them were rigorouſly executed. Many miniſters were impriſoned, and they and their hearers fined. This perſecution continued all the reſt of the reign of king Charles II; and, when king James aſcended the throne, it was ſtill continued, till the king, to carry on his deſign for the introduction of popery, iſſued out a declaration for liberty of conſcience to all perſons of what perſuaſion ſoever. The church-party, perceiving that popery was advancing with large ſteps, inſtead of any longer exclaiming againſt the diſſenters, thought proper to lay aſide their reſentments, and join them in promoting the revolution. The biſhops declared in their petition to the king, that their refuſal to read his declaration of indulgence, did not proceed from any want of due tenderneſs to diſſenters, in relation to whom they were willing to come to ſuch a temper as ſhould be thought fit, when that matter ſhould be conſidered in parliament and convocation. Accordingly it was hoped, by the moderate of all parties, that our religious differences would, in great meaſure, have ceaſed at the revolution, by the union of ſuch proteſtant diſſenters with the church, as expreſſed an inclination towards it: But the proceedings of the firſt convocation in 1689 (of which a large account has been given) ſoon put an end to theſe hopes. The king was ſo far from obtaining a comprehenſion, that the removal of the ſacramental teſt (originally intended againſt the catholicks) and the admiſſion of all his proteſtant ſubjects into places of truſt, were rejected by the parliament. All that could be done for the diſſenters was the act of indulgence, whereby they were excuſed from all penalties for their not coming to church, and for going to their public meetings. This, indeed, was a valuable privilege, as it put an end to all perſecution in matters of conſcience, and ſecured to them the firſt and chief right of human nature, of following the dictates of conſcience, in the ſervice of God.

The non-juring biſhops and clergy, perſiſting in their refuſal to take the oaths to the government, were depoſed, and their vacant dignities filled up in 1691. Upon this, great conteſts aroſe, and a ſchiſm began to be formed in the church. One ſide aſſerting, that the ſtate could not deprive biſhops of their epiſcopal character, whilſt the others maintained, that princes had power entirely to depoſe them. Theſe conteſts between the two parties in the church were carried on with great warmth, when archbiſhop Sancroft died in 1693. He died in a ſtate of ſeparation from the church; and yet he had not the the courage to own it in any public declaration: For, neither living nor dying, did he publiſh any thing concerning it: His death ought to have put an end to the ſchiſm, that ſome were endeavouring to raiſe upon this pretence, that a parliamentary deprivation was never to be allowed, as contrary to the intrinſic power of the church; and therefore they looked on Sancroft as the archbiſhop ſtill, and reckoned Tillotſon an uſurper; and all that joined with him were counted ſchiſmatics; they were willing to forget, as ſome of them did plainly condemn, the deprivations made in the progreſs of the reformation, more particularly thoſe in the firſt parliament of queen Elizabeth's reign, and the deprivations made by the act of uniformity, in the year 1662: But, from thence, the controverſy was carried up to the fourth century; and a great deal of angry reading was brought out on both ſides, to juſtify or condemn thoſe proceedings. But arguments will never have the better of intereſt and humour: Yet now, even according to their own pretenſions, the ſchiſm ought to have ceaſed; ſince he, on whoſe account it was ſet up, did never aſſert his right; and therefore that might have been more juſtly conſtrued a tacit yielding it.

Whilſt a ſchiſm was thus forming in the church, the diſſenters were no leſs divided about doctrinal matters, and ſuch heats aroſe among them, as juſtly expoſed them to cenſure. Many papers paſſed between the two parties, called Preſbyterian and Congregational, in order to a renunciation of Arminianiſm on one hand, and Antinomianiſm on the other, but to little purpoſe. Some independents were raiſing the old Antinomian tenets, as if men, by believing in Chriſt, were ſo united to him, that his righteouſneſs became theirs, without any other condition, beſides that of their faith: So that, though they acknowledged the obedience to his laws to be neceſſary, they did not call it a condition, but only a conſequence of juſtification. In this, they were oppoſed by moſt of the preſbyterians, who ſeemed to be ſenſible, that this ſtruck at the root of all religion, as it weakened the obligation to a holy life [g]. The preſbyterians had been alſo engaged in diſputes with the anabaptiſts. They complained, that they ſaw too great a giddineſs in their people, and ſeemed ſo ſenſible of this, and ſo deſirous to be brought into the church, that a few inconſiderable conceſſions would very probably have brought the bulk of them into our communion: But the greater part of the clergy were ſo far from any diſpoſition this way, that they ſeemed to be more prejudiced againſt them than ever [h]. The churchmen and diſſenters being thus both engaged at once (though in different ways) neither ſide could much inſult the other.

In 1695 there was a great conteſt in the church about the doctrine of the trinity. It ſeems, the Socinians had got conſiderable ground in England ſince the revolution. Many books were printed againſt the trinity, which were diſperſed by a different view; for he was in another and deeper laid deſign for introducing popery, to which he intended to make the heat of the epiſcopal party ſubſervient. It was thought that a toleration was the only method for ſpreading popery over the nation; and nothing could make a toleration for popery paſs, but the having great bodies of men put out of the church, and put under ſevere laws, which ſhould force them to move for a toleration, and ſhould make it reaſonable to grant it to them; and it was reſolved, that whatever ſhould be granted of that ſort ſhould be ſo comprehenſive as to include the papiſts. Hence the papiſts were inſtructed to oppoſe all propoſitions for a comprehenſion, and animate the church-party to maintain their ground againſt all ſectaries. At the ſame time they ſpoke of toleration, as neceſſary both for the peace of the nation and encouragement of trade. The king being thus reſolved on fixing the terms of conformity to what they had been before the war, without making the leaſt abatement or alteration; it is plain, the Savoy conference, and the other appearances of moderation, were never intended to have any effect. The church-party, out of their old animoſity to the preſbyterians for what they had done during the war, helped to carry on the king's deſigns, till his declaration of univerſal indulgence plainly diſcovered his intentions.

[g]. Mr. Aſgil, a member of parliament, publiſhed a book, grounded on their notions, on which he had grafted a new and wild inference of his own, that, ſince true believers recovered in Chriſt all that they loſt in Adam, and our natural death was the effect of Adam's ſin, he inferred, that believers were rendered immortal by Chriſt, and not liable to death: And that thoſe who believed, with a true and firm faith, could not die. This was a ſtrain beyond all that ever went before him, and, ſince we ſee that all men die, the natural conſequence that reſulted from this was, that there neither are, nor ever were, any true believers.

[h]. The quakers had likewiſe a great breach made among them by one George Keith, a Scotch-man, educated at Aberdeen. He had been thirty-ſix years among them; he was eſteemed the moſt learned man that ever was in that ſect; he was well verſed both in the Oriental tongues, in philoſophy, and mathematics; after he had been above thirty years in high eſteem among them, he was ſent to Penſilvania (a colony ſet up by Penn, where they are very numerous) to have the chief direction of the education of their youth. In thoſe parts, he ſaid, he firſt diſcovered that which had been always either denied to him, or ſo diſguiſed that he did not ſuſpect it; but being far out of reach, and in a place where they were maſters, they ſpoke out their mind plainer; and it appeared to him, that they were deiſts, and that they turned the whole doctrine of the chriſtian religion into allegories; chiefly thoſe, which relate to the death and reſurrection of Chriſt, and the reconciliation of ſinners to God, by virtue of his croſs: He, being a true chriſtian, ſet himſelf with great zeal againſt this, upon which they grew weary of him and ſent him back to England. At his return, he ſet himſelf to read many of their

Thomas Firmin (a noted citizen of London) over the nation, and by him diſtributed freely to all who would accept them. By this means it became a common topic of diſcourſe, to treat all myſteries in religion as the contrivances of prieſts, to bring the world into a blind ſubmiſſion to them. Prieſtcraft grew to be another word in faſhion, and the enemies of religion vented all their notions under the cover of theſe words. But, while theſe pretended much zeal for the government, thoſe, who were at work to undermine it, made great uſe of all this; they raiſed a great outcry againſt Socinianiſm, and gave it out that it was like to over-run all; for archbiſhop Tillotſon, and ſome of the biſhops, had lived in great friendſhip with Firmin, whoſe charitable temper they thought it became them to encourage.

Many divines undertook to write in this controverſy, but they did not all go in the ſame method, nor upon the ſame principles. Dr. Sherlock engaged in the controverſy; he was a clear, a polite, and a ſtrong writer, and had got great credit in the former reign, by his writings againſt thoſe of the church of Rome; but he was apt to aſſume too much to himſelf, and to treat his adverſaries with contempt; this created him many enemies, and made him paſs for an inſolent haughty man; he was at firſt a jacobite, and, while, for not taking the oaths, he was under ſuſpenſion, he wrote againſt the Socinians, in which he took a new method of explaining the trinity; he thought there were three eternal minds, two of theſe iſſuing from the father, but that theſe were one, by reaſon of a mutual conſciouſneſs in the three to each others thoughts: This was looked on plain tritheiſm; but all the party applauded him and his book. Soon after that, an accident of an odd nature happened.

There was a book drawn up by biſhop Overall, fourſcore years ago, concerning government; in which, it's being of a divine inſtitution was very poſitively aſſerted; it was read in convocation, and paſſed by that body, in order to the publiſhing it, in oppoſition to the principles laid down, in that famous book of Parſons the jeſuit, publiſhed under the name of Doleman; king James the firſt did not like a convocation entering into ſuch a theory of politics; ſo he wrote a long letter to Abbot, who was afterwards archbiſhop of Canterbury, but was then in the lower houſe; biſhop Burnet had the original, writ all in his own hand, in his poſſeſſion; by it he deſired, that no further progreſs ſhould be made in that matter, and that this book might not be offered to him for his aſſent: Thus that matter ſlept, but Sancroft had got Overall's own book into his hands; and, in the beginning of this reign, he reſolved to publiſh it, as an authentic declaration, that the church of England had made in this matter; and it was publiſhed, as well as licenſed by him, a very few days before he came under ſuſpenſion, for not taking the oaths: But there was a paragraph or two in it, that they had not conſidered, which was plainly calculated, to juſtify the owning the United Provinces to be a lawful government: For it was there laid down, that, when a change of government was brought to a thorough ſettlement, it was then to be owned and ſubmitted to, as a work of the providence of God; and a part of king James's letter to Abbot related to this. When Sherlock obſerved this, he had ſome conferences with the party, in order to convince them by that, which he ſaid had convinced himſelf. Soon after that he took the oaths, and was made dean of St. Paul's; he publiſhed an account of the grounds he went on, which drew out many virulent books againſt him; after that they purſued him with the clamour of tritheiſm, which was done with much malice, by the very ſame perſons, who had highly magnified the performance, while he was of their party: So powerful is the biaſs of intereſt and paſſion, in the moſt ſpeculative and the moſt important doctrines.

Dr. South, a learned but an ill-natured divine, who had taken the oaths, but with the reſerve of an equivocal ſenſe, which he put on them, attacked Dr. Sherlock's book of the trinity, not without wit and learning, but without any meaſure of chriſtian charity, and without any regard, either to the dignity of the ſubject, or the decencies of his profeſſion. He explained the trinity in the common method, that the deity was one eſſence in three ſubſiſtencies; Sherlock replied, and charged this as Sabellianiſm; and ſome others went into the diſpute, with ſome learning, but with more heat. A fellow of Univerſity college in Oxford, in a public ſermon, preached Dr. Sherlock's notions, and aſſerted, 'That there were three diſtinct minds and ſubſtances in the trinity; and alſo, 'That the three perſons in the trinity are three diſtinct minds or ſpirits, and three individual ſubſtances.' The friends of Dr. South making complaint of theſe words, the heads of the colleges, Nov. 25, 1695, cauſed them to be cenſured by a ſolemn decree in convocation, wherein they were declared to be 'falſe, impious, and heretical,' and all perſons, under their inſtitution or care, were required to affirm no ſuch doctrine, either by preaching or otherwiſe. When Sherlock's book was firſt publiſhed, it met (as was ſaid) with a general applauſe; and Firmin was told, that, if it did not reclaim him from his hereſy, it would riſe up in judgment againſt him. But, when the Oxford decree came abroad, his former abettors entirely deſerted him: And now ſaid, univerſities ſpeak but ſeldom, and by way of authority; but, as they interpoſe but rarely, it is always with certainty. Thus the ſame perſons who had boaſted of his book (not only as orthodox, but) as unanſwerable, now turned about, and as much approved the Oxford decree. Sherlock (who uſed to ſay, 'I am ſure I am right') quickly publiſhed his examination of this decree, wherein he ſays, 'theſe decreeing and hereſy-making heads of colleges have condemned the true catholic faith, the Nicene faith, and the faith of the church of England.' Adding, in the ſame page, 'three divine perſons, who are not three diſtinct minds and ſubſtances, is not greater hereſy than it is non-ſenſe.' As Sherlock wrote againſt the Oxford cenſure with the higheſt ſtrains of contempt, ſo the Socinians triumphed not a little upon all this, and in ſeveral of their books divided their adverſaries into real and nominal trinitarians; Sherlock was put into the firſt claſs; as for the ſecond claſs, they pretended, it had been the doctrine of the weſtern church, ever ſince the fourth Lateran council [i].

The ill effects that were like to follow, on thoſe different explanations, made the biſhops move the king to ſet out the following injunctions for unity in the church, and purity of faith, concerning the trinity, which were to be publiſhed in the ſeveral dioceſes:

'I. That no preacher whatſoever, in his ſermon or lecture, do preſume to deliver any other doctrine concerning the bleſſed trinity, than what is contained in the holy ſcriptures, and is agreeable to the three creeds, and the thirty-nine articles of religion.

'II. That, in the explication of this doctrine, they carefully avoid all new terms, and confine themſelves to ſuch ways of explication, as have been commonly uſed in the church.

'III. That care be taken in this matter, eſpecially to obſerve the fifty-third canon of this church, which forbids public oppoſition, between preachers; and that, above all things, they abſtain from bitter invectives, and ſcurrilous language againſt all perſons whatſoever.

'IV. That the foregoing directions be alſo obſerved by thoſe who write any thing concerning the ſaid doctrine.'

With theſe injunctions, archbiſhop Teniſon alſo ſent forth his circular letters, containing many rules and orders for general obſervation.

This put a ſtop to thoſe debates, as Firmin's death put a ſtop to the ſpreading of Socinian books [k].

their books, and then he diſcovered the myſtery, which was formerly ſo hid from him, that he had not obſerved it: Upon this, he opened a new meeting, and by a printed ſummons he called the whole party, to come and ſee the proof that he had to offer, to convince them of theſe errors: Few quakers came to his meetings, but great multitudes of other people flocked about him: He brought the quakers books with him, and read ſuch paſſages out of them, as convinced his hearers, that he had not charged them falſly: He continued theſe meetings, being ſtill, in outward appearance, a quaker, for ſome years; till having prevailed as far as he ſaw any probability of ſucceſs, he laid aſide their exterior, and was reconciled to the church, and took holy orders.

[i] For the better underſtanding theſe matters, it will be proper briefly to ſtate the Trinitarian, Arian, and Socinian doctrines of the trinity.

The Trinitarians (called by their adverſaries Athanaſians) believe that in the God-head there are three 'co-equal and co-eternal perſons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt, each ſingly God,' and all three as exiſting in in the ſame undivided ſubſtance but one God.

The Arians on the contrary, believe the 'Father only' to be the ſupreme God, and that the Son and Holy Ghoſt derived before all ages, their being from him, and are ſubordinate to him.

The Socinians alſo believe the 'Father alone' to be the ſupreme God, and affirm the Son had no exiſtence before his miraculous conception and birth, and that the 'Holy Ghoſt, or ſpirit of God,' is not a 'real perſon,' but only the 'power, operation, or influence, of the Father.'

From the different manner of explaining the word perſon, the Trinitarians are called nominal or real.

'Nominal Trinitarians' explain the 'three perſons by three modes' (or manners) of ſubſiſtence, or by 'three differences' in the God-head, ſuch were 'Wallis, South, Tillotſon, &c.' This explanation borders upon Sabellianiſm, and differs but little from Socinianiſm. The 'real Trinitarians' believe the 'three perſons' to be three 'intelligent agents,' having each an underſtanding and will; ſuch was Sherlock at the time of this controverſy, and ſuch was the late Dr. Waterland, whoſe explication of the trinity ſeems now to be generally received; namely, there are 'three perſons or intelligent agents' exiſting in one undivided ſubſtance, and as they thus exiſt in the ſame undivided ſubſtance, they are all three but one God.

The Trinitarians charge their adverſaries with aſſerting blaſphemy, and denying the divinity of their Saviour; on the other hand, the Arians and Socinians charge the Trinitarians with denying the ſupremacy of the father, with 'Tritheiſm or having three Gods,' and with aſſerting impoſſibilities, abſurdities, and contradictions.

[k] Firmin died in 1698. He was in great eſteem for promoting many charitable

The diſſenters ſtill continued their doctrinal contentions. An attempt was now made for a re-union among them. There was an offer on one ſide to renounce the Arminian, if the other ſide would renounce the Antinomian tenets; but it did not ſucceed.

Upon all theſe proceedings, ſome angry clergymen, who had not that ſhare of preferment, they thought they deſerved, begun to complain, that no convocation was ſuffered to ſit, to whom the judging, in ſuch points, ſeemed moſt properly to belong: Books were writ on this head; it was ſaid, that the law made in king Henry the eighth's time, that limited the power of that body, ſo that no new canons could be attempted or put in uſe, without the king's licence and conſent, did not diſable them from ſitting: On the contrary, a convocation was held to be a part of the parliament, ſo that it ought always to attend upon it, and to be ready, when adviſed with, to give their opinions chiefly in matters of religion. They had alſo, as theſe men pretended, a right to prepare articles and canons, and to lay them before the king, who might indeed deny his aſſent to them, as he did to bills, that were offered him by both houſes of parliament. This led them to ſtrike at the king's ſupremacy, and to aſſert the intrinſic power of the church, which had been diſowned by this church, ever ſince the time of the reformation: And indeed, the king's ſupremacy was thought to be carried formerly too high, and that by the ſame ſort of men, who were now ſtudying to lay it as low. It ſeemed, that ſome men were for maintaining it, as long as it was in their management, and that it made for them; but reſolved to weaken it all they could, as ſoon as it went out of their hands, and was no more at their diſcretion: Such a turn do men's intereſts and partialities give to their opinions.

This year a proceſs for ſimony againſt biſhop Watſon was brought to a ſentence and concluſion. He was promoted by king James to the biſhopric of St. David's; it was believed that he gave money for his advancement, and that, in order to the reimburſing himſelf, he ſold moſt of the ſpiritual preferments in his gift: By the law and cuſtom of this church, the archbiſhop is the only judge of a biſhop, but, upon ſuch occaſions, he calls for the aſſiſtance of ſome of the biſhops; he called for ſix in this cauſe; it was proved, that the biſhop had collated a nephew of his to a great many of the beſt preferments in his gift, and that, for many years, he had taken the whole profits of theſe to himſelf, keeping his nephew very poor, and obliging him to perform no part of his duty: It was alſo proved, that the biſhop obtained leave to keep a benefice, which he held before his promotion by a Commendam (one of the abuſes, which the popes brought in among us, from which we have not been able hitherto to free our church) he had ſold both the cure, and the profits to a clergyman, for a ſum of money, and had obliged himſelf to reſign it upon demand, that is, as ſoon as the clergyman could, by another ſum, purchaſe the next preſentation of the patron: Theſe things were fully proved. To theſe was added a charge of many oppreſſive fees, which being taken for benefices, that were in his gift, were not only extortion, but a preſumptive ſimony: All theſe he had taken himſelf, without making uſe of a regiſter or actuary; for, as he would not truſt thoſe ſecrets to any other, ſo he ſwallowed up the fees, both of his chancellor and regiſter; he had alſo ordained many perſons, without tendering them the oaths enjoined by law; and yet, in their letters of orders, he had certified under his hand and ſeal, that they had taken thoſe oaths; this was, what the law calls 'crimen falſi,' the certifying that which he knew to be falſe; no exceptions lay to the witneſſes, by whom theſe things were made out, nor did the biſhop bring any proofs, on his ſide, to contradict their evidence; ſome affirmed, that he was a ſober and regular man, and that he ſpoke often of ſimony with ſuch deteſtation, that they could not think him capable of committing it: The biſhop of Rocheſter withdrew from the court, on the day in which ſentence was to be given; he conſented to a ſuſpenſion, but he did not think that a biſhop could be deprived by the archbiſhop: When the court ſat to give judgment, the biſhop reſumed his privilege of peerage, and pleaded it; but he, having waved it in the houſe of lords, and having gone on ſtill ſubmitting to the court, no regard was had to this, ſince a plea to the juriſdiction of the court was to be offered in the firſt inſtance, but could not be kept up to the laſt, and then be made uſe of: The biſhops, that were preſent, agreed to a ſentence of deprivation. He was a very ill man in all reſpects, paſſionate, covetous, and falſe in the blackeſt inſtances, without one good quality to balance his many bad ones. But, as he was advanced by king James, ſo he ſtuck firm to that intereſt; and the party, though aſhamed of him, yet were reſolved to ſupport him with great zeal. He appealed to a court of delegates, and they, about the end of the year confirmed the archbiſhop's ſentence.

Another proſecution followed for ſimony againſt James, biſhop of St. Aſaph, in which, though the preſumptions were very great, yet the evidence was not ſo clear as in the former caſe; the biſhops in Wales give almoſt all the benefices in their dioceſes; ſo this primitive conſtitution, that is ſtill preſerved among them, was ſcandalouſly abuſed by ſome wicked men, who ſet holy things to ſale, and thereby increaſed the prejudices, that are but too eaſily received, both againſt religion and the church.

The king, during the queen's life, left the affairs and promotions in the church wholly in her hands. He found he could not reſiſt importunities, which were not only vexatious to him, but had drawn preferments from him, which he came quickly to ſee were ill beſtowed. Wherefore, as this was an article of government, for which he thought himſelf unqualified, yet was unwilling to commit to his miniſters, he devolved it upon the queen, which ſhe managed with ſtrict and religious prudence [l]. She conſulted chiefly with archbiſhop Tillotſon, whom ſhe favoured, and ſupported in a moſt particular manner. The queen openly declared againſt preferring thoſe who put in for themſelves, and took care to inform herſelf particularly of the merits of ſuch of the clergy, as were not ſo much as known at court, nor uſing any methods to get themſelves recommended. Upon the queen's death, a commiſſion was granted to the two archbiſhops, and four other biſhops, and renewed in 1700, whereby they, or any three of them, were appointed to commend to all biſhoprics, deaneries, or other vacant preferments in the church, ſignifying the ſame to his majeſty, by writing under their hands. And, during the king's abſence beyond ſea, they were impowered, of their own authority, to preſent to all benefices in the gift of the crown, under the value of one hundred and forty pounds a year [m]. It was hoped that this courſe would produce at length a great change in the church, and in the temper of the clergy. This commiſſion gave great offence to the diſcontented part of the clergy, and the new miniſtry often preſſed the king to diſſolve it. Thoſe of the clergy (who began now to be called the High-Church party, and among whom ſome great preferments had at firſt been given, to try if it were poſſible to ſoften them, and win them to be hearty to the government) when they ſaw preferments went in another channel, ſet up a complaint over all England of the want of convocations, that they were not allowed to ſit or act with a free liberty, to conſider of the grievances of the clergy, and of the danger the church was in. This was a new pretenſion, never thought of ſince the reformation. Some books were writ to juſtify it, with great acrimony of ſtile, and a high ſtrain of inſolence, eſpecially 'a letter to a convocation-man,' by Mr. Francis Atterbury. This author (who in the courſe of this hiſtory will often be mentioned) had very good parts, great learning, was an excellent preacher, and had many extraordinary things in him, but was both ambitious and virulent out of meaſure. He had a ſingular talent in aſſerting paradoxes with a great air of aſſurance, ſhewing no ſhame when he was detected in them, though this was done in many inſtances. Nor did he, in ſuch caſes, either confeſs his errors, or pretend to juſtify himſelf, but went on ſtill venting new falſhoods, in ſo barefaced a manner that he ſeemed to outdo the jeſuits themſelves. He thought the government had ſo little ſtrength or credit, that any claim againſt it would be well received. He attacked the ſupremacy of the crown, with relation to eccleſiaſtical matters, which had been hitherto maintained by all our divines with great zeal. But now the hot men of the clergy did ſo ritable deſigns, for looking after the poor of the city, and ſetting them to work; for raiſing great ſums for ſchools and hoſpitals, and indeed, for charities of all ſorts, private and public: he had ſuch credit with the richeſt citizens, that he had the command of great wealth, as oft as there was occaſion for it; and he laid out his own time chiefly, in advancing all ſuch deſigns: theſe things gained him a great reputation; he was called a Socinian, but was really an Arian, which he very freely owned before the revolution; but he gave no public vent to it till after the revolution, when he ſtudied to promote his opinions with much heat.

[l] There is a particular inſtance mentioned by biſhop Burnet, of the queen's care in diſpoſing of biſhoprics. When lord Sidney was lord-lieutenant of Ireland, he was ſo far engaged in the intereſt of a great family in Ireland, that he was too eaſily wrought on, to recommend a branch of it to a vacant ſee. The repreſentation was made with an undue character of the perſon: So the queen granted it. But, when ſhe underſtood, that he lay under a very bad character, ſhe wrote a letter in her own hand to lord Sidney, letting him know what ſhe had heard, and ordered him to call for ſix Iriſh biſhops whom ſhe named to him, and to require them to certify to her their opinion of that perſon: They all agreed, that he laboured under an ill fame; and, till that was examined into, they did not think it proper to promote him; ſo that matter was let fall.

[m] The four biſhops were Sarum, Worceſter, Ely, and Norwich. The laſt commiſſion was dated May 9, 1700.

readily entertain his notions, that in them it appeared, that thoſe who are moſt earneſt in the defence of certain points, when theſe points ſeem to be for them, can very ſuddenly change their minds upon a change of circumſtances [n].

A convocation had been ſummoned with every new parliament; but after the firſt convocation, in 1689, had (as was related) diſcovered their averſion to the ſcheme of comprehenſion, which was to be laid before them, and expreſſed their reſolution to do nothing in it, the king (according to the practice of king Charles II.) had ordered the convocation to be regularly prorogued, and never ſuffered them to ſit. This, by degrees, gave a handle of complaint, as if the clergy were debarred from the rights and liberties of meeting and acting in convocation. But, upon the king's putting the government into the hands of the tories, the new miniſtry, when they undertook to ſerve the king, made it one of their demands, that a convocation ſhould have leave to ſit, which was promiſed; and accordingly a convocation was ſummoned to meet, the 10th of February 1700-1, which was allowed to ſit and act. Mr. Atterbury's book, concerning the rights of a convocation, was reprinted with great corrections and additions; the firſt edition was drawn out of ſome imperfect and diſorderly collections, and he himſelf ſoon ſaw, that notwithſtanding the aſſurance and the virulence with which it was writ, he had made many great miſtakes in it; ſo to prevent a diſcovery from other hands, he corrected his book in many very important matters; yet he left a great deal to thoſe who anſwered him, and did it with ſuch a ſuperiority of argument and of knowledge in theſe matters, that his inſolence in deſpiſing theſe anſwers was as extraordinary, as the party's adhering to him after ſuch manifeſt diſcoveries. Dr. Kennet laid him ſo open, not only in many particulars, but in a thread of ignorance that ran through his whole book, that, if he had not had a meaſure of confidence peculiar to himſelf, he muſt have been much humbled under it. The clergy hoped to recover many loſt privileges by the help of his performances; they fancied they had a right to be a part of the parliament, ſo they looked on him as their champion, and on moſt of the biſhops as the betrayers of the rights of the church: This was encouraged by the new miniſtry; they were diſpleaſed with the biſhops for adhering to the old miniſtry; and they hoped, by the terror of a convocation, to have forced them to apply to them for ſhelter. The jacobites intended to put us all in ſuch a flame, as they hoped would diſorder the government. The things the convocation pretended to were firſt, that they had a right to ſit whenſoever the parliament ſate; ſo that they could not be prorogued, but when the two houſes were prorogued: Next they advanced, that they had no need of licence to enter upon debates, and to prepare matters, though it was confeſſed, that the practice for an hundred years was againſt them; but they thought the convocation lay under no farther reſtraint, than that the parliament was under; and, as they could paſs no act without the royal aſſent, ſo they confeſſed that they could not enact or publiſh a canon without the king's licence. Antiently the clergy granted their own ſubſidies apart; but, ever ſince the reformation, the grant of the convocation was not thought good, till it was ratified in parliament; but, the rule of ſubſidies being ſo high on the clergy, they had ſubmitted to be taxed by the houſe of commons ever ſince the year 1665, though no memorials were left to inform us, how that matter was conſented to ſo generally, that no oppoſition of any ſort was made to it; the giving of money being yielded up, which was the chief buſineſs of convocations, they had after that nothing to do; ſo they ſat only for form's ſake, and were adjourned of courſe; nor did they ever pretend, notwithſtanding all the danger that religion was in during the former reigns, to ſit and act as a ſynod; but now this was demanded as a right, and they complained of their being ſo often prorogued, as a violation of their conſtitution, for which all the biſhops, but more particularly the archbiſhop of Canterbury, was cried out on; they ſaid that he and the biſhops looked ſo much to their own intereſts, that they forgot the intereſts of the church, or rather betrayed them: The greater part of the clergy were in no good temper; they hated the toleration, and were heavily charged with the taxes, which made them very uneaſy; and this diſpoſed them to be ſoon inflamed by thoſe, who were ſeeking out all poſſible methods to diſorder our affairs: They hoped to have engaged them againſt the ſupremacy, and reckoned, that, in the feeble ſtate to which the government was now brought, they might hope either to wreſt it quite from the crown, and then it would fall into the management of the houſe of commons; or, if the king ſhould proceed againſt them according to the ſtatute, and ſue them in a præmunire, this might unite the clergy into ſuch an oppoſition to the government, as would probably throw us into great convulſions: But many aſpiring men among them, had no other deſign, but to force themſelves into preferment, by the oppoſition they made. In the writ that the biſhops had, ſummoning them to parliament, the clauſe, known by the firſt word of it Præmunientes, was ſtill continued: At firſt, by virtue of it, the inferior clergy were required to come to parliament, and to conſent to the aids there given: But, after the archbiſhops had the provincial writ, for a convocation of the province, the other was no more executed, though it was ſtill kept in the writ, and there did not appear the leaſt ſhadow of any uſe that had been made of it, for ſome hundreds of years; yet now ſome biſhops were prevailed on, to execute this clauſe, and to ſummon the clergy by virtue of it [o]. The convocation was opened with ſpeeches, full of ſharp reflections on the biſhops, which they paſſed over, being unwilling to begin a diſpute.

Dr. Hooper, dean of Canterbury, was choſen prolocutor, a man of learning and good conduct hitherto; he was reſerved, crafty and ambitious; his deanery had not ſoftened him, for he thought he deſerved to be raiſed much higher. He was preſented on the 21ſt of February the day appointed, by Dr. Jane dean of Glouceſter, and approved and confirmed in the uſual manner. The conſtant method of adjournment had been this: The archbiſhop ſigned a ſchedule for that purpoſe, by which the upper houſe was immediately adjourned; and the ſchedule, being ſent down to the prolocutor, did alſo adjourn the lower houſe. The clergy perceiving, that by this method the archbiſhop could adjourn them at pleaſure, and either hinder or break off all debates, reſolved to begin at diſputing this point. In the next ſeſſion therefore, February 25, when the archbiſhop's ſchedule was brought down to the lower houſe, which was legally to determine the ſeſſion, in contempt of it they continued ſitting, and proceeded in ſome debates of no moment. After which, the prolocutor intimated an adjournment by conſent of the houſe, to meet again in Henry VII's chapel, inſtead of the adjournment to meet in the Jeruſalem chamber, as by the ſchedule, which expreſsly included the whole body of the convocation, and left no pretence to ſeparate adjournments in either houſe. The archbiſhop, and a far greater part of his ſuffragans, looked on this proceeding of the lower houſe as a declaration of ſetting up a ſeparate intereſt and power, that would break the union of the provincial ſynod, and prevent the good correſpondence of both houſes, and ſo fruſtrate the common methods of doing any buſineſs. In the fourth ſeſſion, Feb. 28, the prolocutor and clergy did not attend the archbiſhop and biſhops in the ſynodical place, the Jeruſalem chamber; which was interpreted to be a ſecond contempt of the authority of the preſident, and the obligation of his inſtrument, the ſcha-

[n] An eminent inſtance of this had appeared in the houſe of peers in the laſt ſeſſion, when Dr. Watſon, the deprived biſhop of St. David's, complained of the archbiſhop of Canterbury: Firſt, for breach of privilege, ſince ſentence was paſſed upon him, though he had in court claimed privilege of parliament, to which no regard had been paid: But, as he had waved his privilege in the houſe of lords, it was carried after a long debate, and by no great majority, that, in that caſe, he could not reſume his privilege. He excepted next to the archbiſhop's juriſdiction, and pretended that he could not judge a biſhop, but in a ſynod of the biſhops of the province, according to the rules of the primitive times: In oppoſition to this, it was ſhewn, that, from the ninth and tenth century downward, both popes and kings had concurred to bring this power ſingly into the hands of the Metropolitans; that this was the conſtant practice in England before the reformation; that by the proviſional clauſe, in the act paſſed in the twenty-fifth of Henry the eighth, that impowered thirty-two perſons to draw a new body of church-laws, all former laws or cuſtoms were to continue in force, till that new body was prepared: So that the power, the metropolitan then was poſſeſſed of, ſtood confirmed by that clauſe: It is true, during the high-commiſſion, all proceedings againſt biſhops were brought before that court, which proceeded in a ſummary way, and againſt whoſe ſentence no appeal lay: But, after that court was taken away, a full declaration was made by an act of parliament, for continuing the power that was lodged with the metropolitan. It was alſo urged, that, if the biſhop had any exception to the archbiſhop's juriſdiction, that ought to have been pleaded in the firſt inſtance, and not reſerved to the concluſion of all: Nor could the archbiſhop erect a new court, or proceed in the trial of a biſhop in any other way, than in that, which was warranted by law or precedent: To all this no anſwer was made, but the buſineſs was kept up, and put off by many delays: It was ſaid, the thing was new, and the houſe was not yet well apprized of it; and the laſt time, in which the debate was taken up in the houſe, it ended in an intimation, that it was hoped the king would not fill that ſee, till the houſe ſhould be better ſatisfied, in the point of the archbiſhop's authority: So the biſhopric was not diſpoſed of for ſome years: And this uncertainty put a great delay to the proceſs of Jones, the other Welſh biſhop, accuſed of the ſame crime. Burnet II. 250.

[o] In the biſhops writs of ſummons to parliament, there is a clauſe ordering them to ſummon to parliament the dean, chapter, archdeacons, and clergy of their reſpective dioceſes. As this clauſe, called the Præmunientes clauſe, was ſometimes omitted in the parliamentary writs, Dr. Hody fixes the conſtant uſage of it from the 28th year of Ed. III. 1353. The biſhops, abbots, and priors, to whom particular writs are directed, are ſummoned 'cum prædictis prælatis, magnatibus, et proceribus de ſupradictis negotiis tractaturi, veſtrumque conſilium impenſuri.' In the firſt writ now extant, in which the inferior clergy were ſummoned, the 23d of Ed. I. they were ſummoned 'ad tractandum, dule proroguing and continuing the whole body of prelates and clergy.

The archbiſhop ſent for the prolocutor, and, with the conſent of his brethren, put theſe two queſtions to him: 1. Whether the lower houſe of convocation did ſit, after they were prorogued by his grace on the 25th inſtant? 2. Whether they did meet this morniug, without attending in this place, to which they were prorogued? Upon ſome diſcourſe the prolocutor ſaid, That the lower houſe was preparing ſomewhat to lay before his grace and the upper houſe, concerning the methods of prorogation, and ſome other things of form. The archbiſhop anſwered, That he and his brethern were ready to receive, whatſoever ſhould be offered by them, and would conſider of it, and do upon it what ſhould appear to them to be juſt and right: But, in the mean time, he and his brethren thought fit to continue the uſual practice. Accordingly, that the phraſe of proroguing 'in hunc locum' might admit of no diſpute, it was in the ſchedule of the day expreſsly ſpecified, 'in hunc locum vulgo vocat' Jeruſalem Chamber:' To which the lower houſe ſubmitted to paſs a 'ſalvo jure;' and at the next ſeſſion, March 6th, the prolocutor, with ſeveral members, attended the archbiſhop and biſhops in the Jeruſalem chamber, according to the laſt ſchedule; and being ſoon diſmiſſed, went to their own houſe, from whence, in a little time, they carried up a report of a committee, appointed to ſearch the convocation books, for directions concerning the prorogations of their houſe. The report was thus:

1. We find that the common uſage of this houſe has been to continue ſitting, till the prolocutor did prorogue or adjourn, or intimate the adjournment or prorogation thereof, either perſonally, or by ſome member of this houſe, thereunto deputed by him: And in both theſe caſes (as we conceive) with the conſent of this houſe. And we alſo find by ſome inſtances, that this houſe did not always prorogue and adjourn to the ſame day with the upper houſe.

2. We find the like common uſage by this houſe to have been, that when, in the upper houſe, the convocation was prorogued or adjourned, by the words 'in hunc locum,' this houſe did meet apart from the ſame, at the ſame particular place where it ſat laſt. And when the convocation was prorogued or adjourned to ſome other general place, viz. St. Paul's, and Lambeth, then alſo this houſe did aſſemble in a ſeparate place, diſtinctly from their lordſhips. And farther, we find no footſteps of evidence to conclude, that it was ever the practice of this houſe to attend their lordſhips before this houſe did meet and ſit, purſuant to their former adjournment. But when this houſe hath firſt met and ſat, it hath been the conſtant practice to attend their lordſhips with buſineſs of their own motion, or when they were called up to their lordſhips by a ſpecial meſſenger.

This paper was ordered by the archbiſhop to be read, though it was intitled, 'A report of the committee,' and did not run in the name of the houſe, as it ſhould have done; and then referred the examination of it to a committee of biſhops. In the mean while, the archbiſhop delivered to the prolocutor the form of an 'humble addreſs to his majeſty,' and propoſed to him the conſent of the lower houſe, which was given without amendment, only they propoſed it might be 'Reformed Churches,' inſtead of 'Reformed Religion:' And with the alteration of that word, it was preſented to his majeſty, on March 10, by the archbiſhop. It contained thanks to his majeſty for his conſtant protection, and favour to the church of England; an acknowledgment of his pious concern for the reformed churches in general, and an aſſurance of their ſtedfaſt fidelity and affection, and readineſs to maintain the ſupremacy as ſettled by law, &c. And they were graciouſly received by the king. He thanked them for their promiſes of maintaining his ſupremacy according to law; beyond which he aſſured them he never would extend it.

During theſe diſputes, that the lower houſe might expreſs a zeal for matters of religion, they reſolved to proceed againſt ſome bad books; they began with one, entitled, Chriſtianity not myſterious, wrote by one Toland, a man of a bold and petulant wit, who paſſed for a Socinian, but was believed to be a man of no religion: they drew ſome propoſitions out of this book, but did it with ſo little judgment, that they paſſed over the worſt that were in it, and fingled out ſome, that how ill ſoever they were meant, yet were capable of a good ſenſe [p]: They brought up the cenſure that they had paſſed on this book, to the biſhops, and deſired them to agree to their reſolutions: this ſtruck ſo directly at the epiſcopal authority, that it ſeemed ſtrange to ſee men, who had ſo long aſſerted the divine right of epiſcopacy, and that preſbyters dum, ordinandum et faciendum nobiſcum, &c.' which is the ſame ſtyle that was uſed in the writs directed at the ſame time to the temporal lords. In the 24th of Ed. I. they are ſummoned 'ad ordinandum de quantitate et modo ſubſidii.' In the writ of the 28th of Ed. I. it is, 'ad faciendum et conſentiendum his quæ tunc de communi conſilio (favente domino) ordinari contigerit.' This form continued to the 20th of Ed. II. and after that to the 10th of Ed. III. The 20th of Ed. II. it begun to be 'ad conſentiendum his quæ tunc, &c. Afterwards to the 5th of Rich. II. it was ſometimes 'ad faciendum et conſentiendum; ſometimes, but more often, 'ad conſentiendum' only. From the laſt parliament of that year down to theſe times, it has all along continued ſo. The clauſe now is always in theſe words: 'Præmonentes decanum et capitulum eccleſiæ veſtræ Cant. ac archidiaconos totumque clerum veſtrum dioceſ. quod iidem decanus et archidiaconi in propriis perſonis ſuis prædictum capitulum per unum, idemque clerus per duos procuratores idoneos, plenam et ſufficientem poteſtatem ab ipſis capitulo & clero diviſim habentes, prædictis die et loco perſonaliter interſint ad conſentiendum his quæ tunc ibidem de communi conſilio dicti regni noſtri divinâ favente clementiâ contigerit ordinari.' From the inferior clergy being thus ſummoned to parliament, a diſpute was now ſet on foot, whether theſe 'parliamentary aſſemblies' were all 'eccleſiaſtical ſynods.' Atterbury aſſerted, a convocation is an attendant upon a parliament of England. The clergy were brought to parliament by præmunientes clauſe. But in proceſs of time by a miſtake in their politics, they were ſeparated from the parliament, and yet ſtill continued to attend it in two provincial aſſemblies or convocations: Which, as they meet for the ſame purpoſe, and had the ſame reaſons of ſtate inſerted into their writs of ſummons as the parliament had, ſo did they keep cloſely to the forms, and manner of ſitting and acting, practiſed in parliament, and they had parliamentary wages and parliamentary privileges, and attended the parliament as one of the Three States of the realm. Theſe parliamentary convocations came in the room of provincial councils, which from the beginning of chriſtianity met twice a year, and needed no leave. He farther aſſerts, the clergy have not only a right to meet and ſit in convocation as often as a new parliament ſits, but a right alſo (when met) of treating and debating about ſuch affairs as lie within their ſphere, and of coming to fit reſolutions about them, without being obliged antecedently to qualify themſelves for ſuch acts and debates by a licence under the broad ſeal of England. Though they cannot make a canon, yet they ſpeak the ſenſe of the whole clergy of the kingdom in matters proper for them to intermeddle in: They may petition, adviſe, addreſs, repreſent, give their judgment where it may be deſired, or their cenſures either of men or books where it may be needful: And ſuggeſt the fitteſt methods of ſecuring the chriſtian faith, and of preventing the revival of old hereſies and errors, and the growth of new ones. He alſo aſſerts, that the Præmunientes in the biſhops writ is not an idle uſeleſs clauſe, inſerted only on a particular occaſion, and continued by accident, but a real and effectual ſummons of the clergy to parliament; ſuch as they heretofore made formal returns to, as often as it went out, and did expreſsly obey: and of this he gives inſtances till the time of Henry VIII: And then undertakes to prove, that the writ to the two archbiſhops to convene the clergy of their provinces, though it does not expreſsly mention a parliament, yet has an immediate reference to it: The original deſign of it's iſſuing out together with the biſhop's writ, being only to ſecure an obedience to the præmunitory clauſe of it, and to make the clergy's parliamentary attendance the more full and certain.

On the contrary, Kennet aſſerts, Dioceſan Synods are more ancient than Provincial. The preſbyters are no authoritative part of Provincial Synods. That Capitular Proctors were ſummoned to our convocations, not for counſel or neceſſary conſent in ſpiritual affairs, but for ſecular poſſeſſions and civil rights, which were often there treated of; and to ſupport the government with the irreaſonable aid and taxes. He diſtinguiſhes between true Eccleſiaſtical Synods, which had no authority in, or dependence on, the parliament, and Parliamentary Aſſemblies of the clergy.

He ſays, that the lower clergy for many ages did not come to provincial ſynods, but for a dutiful attendance on the biſhops, and offered only a ſubmiſſive approbation of their acts: And that their coming to parliamentary aſſemblies, was to give money. And that it was by degrees found expedient that the ſame clergy, as was ſummoned to the national parliament, ſhould at the ſame time be ſummoned to a provincial ſynod or aſſembly, concurrent with that parliament. But this was by another writ, beſides that contained in the biſhop's ſummons, with the clauſe Præmunientes: And even by another writ from the king. And he charges Mr. Atterbury with miſerable confuſion all along, as if he thought every parliamentary meeting of the clergy, to be an eccleſiaſtical ſynod, and every eccleſiaſtical ſynod, to be a parliamentary body of the clergy; than which nothing is more falſe in fact and law. He takes a great deal of pains to rectify the matters of the 'Præmunientes clauſe:' And then ſays, that 'the Engliſh clergy in their own parliamentary convocations, taxed their own body, to the 15 Car. II. 1663; when in a following ſeſſions of parliament in 1664, by meaſures wiſely concerted between the governors of the church, and the leading members of the houſe of commons, the clergy were in ſilence to recede from the cuſtomary right of taxing themſelves apart from the laity: And all their eccleſiaſtical benefices were to be now aſſeſſed, (as their temporal eſtates were before) upon the ſame foot and level with all other Engliſh ſubjects in the bills beginning in the houſe of commons.' And thus departing from their ancient practice of taxing themſelves, the end of the Præmunientes he ſays was loſt. Rectors and vicars being now taxed for their glebe and tythes, by the commons, have a vote in electing members: And therefore have the leſs occaſion to be now repreſented by any members of their own body.

Hody conſiders a convocation either in itſelf, as it is a ſynod, and called by the archbiſhop's mandate, or as it is a part of the parliament, and ſummoned by a royal writ directed to each particular biſhop. He obſerves, they that are ſummoned by the 'Præmunientes clauſe,' have not ſat in parliament for ſome hundreds of years. For ſome ages together, the writ has been ſeldom executed, or if executed, never effectually obeyed; that is, it has not been ſo obeyed, as to be returned into the crown-office, and no one, for ſome ages, has been ſo conſtituted a proxy for any of the inferior clergy, as to be ſent upon that errand. After many remarks upon the 'Præmunientes clauſe,' he concludes, that it was continued in the writs, after it became a conſtant cuſtom for the clergy to meet in a ſeparate body by virtue of the archbiſhop's mandate, that thereby our princes might aſſert their right of calling the clergy (if they pleaſe) to parliament; which the clergy oppoſed, as an invaſion and inroad upon their liberties.

'Poſ. 1. I conclude, That neither God himſelf, nor any of his attributes, are myſterious to us, for want of adequate ideas.

Poſ. 2. No doubt on it, as far as any church allows of myſteries, ſo far it is anti-chriſtian, and may, with a great deal of juſtice, though little honour, claim kindred with the ſcarlet whore.

were only their assistants and counsel (according to the language of all antiquity) now assume to themselves the most important act of church government, the judging in points of doctrine. Hence it appeared, how soon men's interests and passions can run them from one extreme to another. The bishops saw, that their design was only to gain some credit to themselves, by this shew of zeal for the great articles of religion; so they took advice of men learned in the law, how far the act of Submission, in the twenty-fifth of Henry the Eighth, did restrain them in this case [q]. There had been the like complaint made in the convocation 1689, of many ill books then published; and the bishops had then advised both with civilians and common lawyers in this matter: they were answered, that every bishop might proceed in his own court, against the authors or spreaders of ill books, within his diocese: but they did not know of any power the convocation had to do it: it did not so much as appear, that they could summon any to come before them: and when a book was published, with the author's name to it, the condemning it, without hearing the author upon it, seemed contrary to the common rules of justice. It did not seem to be a court at all, and since no appeal lay from it, it certainly could not be a court, in the first instance. When this question was now again put to lawyers, namely, Whether the convocation's giving an opinion concerning a book that is heretical, impious, and immoral, is contrary to law? Some were afraid, and others were unwilling to answer it: but sir Edward Northey, afterwards attorney-general, thought the condemning books was a thing of great consequence; since the doctrine of the church might be altered, by condemning explanations of one sort, and allowing those of another; and since the convocation had no licence from the king, he thought that, by meddling in that matter, they should incur the pains in the statute: so all further debate of this matter was let fall by the bishops [r].

When the bishops had considered the report brought up from the lower house, they drew a copious answer to it, in which all their precedents were examined and answered, and the matter was so clearly stated, and so fully proved, that it was hoped the dispute was at an end. But the lower house, after having sate some time about a reply, instead of going on with it, voted, on the 31st of March 1701, their own right to adjourn themselves, and then sent the prolocutor with a message to the upper house, intimating, that they had considered their reply, which did not give them the satisfaction they desired, and therefore they prayed a free conference upon the subject-matter in debate. Thus they began to affect, in all their proceedings, to follow the methods of the house of commons. The bishops resolved not to comply with this, which was wholly new. They had, upon some occasions, called up the lower house to a conference, in order to the explaining some things to them; but the clergy had never taken upon them to desire a free conference with the bishops before; wherefore they resolved not to admit of it; and the archbishop said to the prolocutor, 'We received your verbal message, and took the same into consideration. And whereas we sent you two questions in writing, to which you answered in writing; and we gave a large and distinct answer to the same in writing, in which there were several quotations referring to matter of fact; we therefore expect an answer in writing to the same, and we shall then take the matter into farther consideration, and desire no time to be lost.' The prolocutor replying, 'That their answer would take up above twenty sheets; his grace took occasion to declare, 'That he did not confine them to length and breadth, but expected their answer in writing.' The lower house resolved not to comply with this, but insisted upon a free conference, a word that had never before appeared in the acts of any former convocation. They would send no other written paper but of reasons for not writing; which were presented on the 5th of April. Three days after a paper was delivered to the prolocutor in answer to their reasons, in which the bishops tell them, 'That their proceedings had been irregular, and without precedent in sundry particulars: that they could not find so much as one instance of any conference desired by the lower house: that they were indeed once called up 'ad Colloquium' in 1689, but that the consequences of it were such as did by no means encourage the doing of the like at this present time: and that their pretending to make a recess, by their own authority, apart from the upper house, and without order from the president, was altogether new, and such a violation of his authority, as could not be complied with, nor suffered, without destroying the fundamental constitution of an English convocation.' After which, the archbishop made a speech, and prorogued the convocation to the 8th of May. The lower house took no notice of the archbishop's adjournment, but continued to sit as a house some time that day, and then adjourned themselves to the next day. This was an affectation of independence unknown to former convocations, and never before attempted by any presbyters in an episcopal church. They did indeed observe the rule of adjourning themselves to the day which the archbishop had appointed in his schedule, but they did it as their own act, and adjourned themselves to intermediate days.

On the 8th of May the archbishop told the prolocutor, that, 'what had been done in the lower house, as a house, since the prorogation, was not only null and without authority, but of very dangerous consequence to the constitution. And that they could not receive from them, either by word of mouth or in writing, any thing done by the said house, as a house in that interval.' At the same time the prolocutor delivered a paper, as the act of the lower house this day, which was an answer to what had been sent them about Toland's book. 'They therein intimate their apprehension of the little need there was to consult lawyers about that book; that the archbishop might easily have obtained a licence; that a bad use would be made of their omitting to express their dislike of so ill a book: And justify their own proceedings, and much complain of grievances they suffered from the upper house.'

A committee of bishops prepared a reply to this paper; signifying 'That they thought it safest, and most for the interest of the church and religion, that in the matter of Toland's book as well as others, they should govern themselves by precedents of former convocations: That his majesty was the properest judge, when to grant a licence, and when not; though considering the treatment which the licence granted to the convocation in 1689 met with, it could not be thought adviseable to desire another, till a better spirit had appeared in those of the lower house than either did then or now: That they would endeavour to procure a law for regulating the press, &c. That the actions of the lower house did not agree with their professions, for that they had risen to higher degrees of disrespect and invasion of the metropolitan and episcopal rights, than ever was attempted by any lower house of convocation before, &c. And that they had hereby given the greatest blow to the church, that had been given it,

'Pof. 4. It evidently follows (i. e. from his observations) that faith is so far from being an implicit assent to any thing above reason, that this notion contradicts the ends of religion, the nature of man, and the goodness and wisdom of God.

'Pof. 5. Having drawn a parallel of the ancient Heathen, and, as he calls them, new-coined Christian mysteries, he says——

'I could draw out a parallel much larger, but here is enough to shew how Christianity became mysterious, and how so divine an institution did, through the craft and ambition of priests and philosophers, derogate into mere Paganism.'

[q] By the act of Submission, the clergy shall not presume to claim, or put into use, any constitutions or canons; nor shall exact, promulge, or execute any such canons or ordinances in their convocations (which always shall be assembled by authority of the king's writ) unless the clergy may have the king's royal assent and licence so to do. The king shall have power to name thirty-two persons, sixteen of the two houses of parliament, and sixteen of the clergy, to revise the old canons, and to abrogate, confirm, or alter them as they please, the king's assent being obtained. Provided, 'that till such revisal and correction of the canons is made, all those which are now received shall remain in force, except such as are contrary to the laws and customs of the realm, or are to the damage or hurt of the king's prerogative.' Upon the proviso of this act, all the proceedings of the commons and other spiritual courts are founded; for the canons not being corrected to this day in the manner here expressed, the old ones are in force, with the exceptions before-mentioned; and this proviso is probably the reason why the canons were not corrected in the following reigns, for now it lies in the breast of the judges to declare, what canons are contrary to the laws or rights of the crown, which is more for the king's prerogative, than to make a collection of ecclesiastical laws, which should be fixed and immoveable. The penalties of this act are imprisonment and fine at the king's will.

[r] The archbishop producing a certain book, entitled, The Balance of Power, &c. in the 40th page of which are these words: Are not a great many of us able to point out to several persons, whom nothing has recommended to places of the highest trust, and often to rich benefices and dignities, but the open enmity which they have almost from their cradles profest to the divinity of Christ? It was agreed that a paper should be fixed over several doors in Westminster-Abbey, intimating that it was desired by the said archbishop and bishops, that the author himself, whoever he was, or any one of the 'great many' to whom he refers, would point out to the particular persons, whom he or they knew to be liable to that charge, that they might be proceeded against in a judicial way; which would be esteemed a great service to the church: otherwise the above-mentioned passage must be looked upon as a public scandal. It was now become usual for the violent party to point out the bishops and divines best affected to the government in church and state, as Socinians, or any other kind of heretics. But no proof was made by Dr. Davenant, or by any one who suggested this scandal to him. All moderate divines were looked upon by some hot men, with an ill eye, as persons who were cold and indifferent in the matters of the church: That which flowed from a gentleness, both of temper and principle, was represented as an inclination to favour dissenters, which passed among many, for a more heinous thing than leaning to popery itself.

These

The lower houſe going on to ſit in intermediate days, Dr. Sherlock, and many of the moſt eminent and learned among them, not only refuſed to ſit with them on thoſe days, but thought it was incumbent on them to proteſt againſt their proceedings; but the lower houſe refuſing to ſuffer this to be entered in their books, they exhibited a complaint in writing to the archbiſhop, and ſubſcribed their names to it.[s] The party ſitting alone in the intermediate days, they entered into ſuch a ſecrecy, that it could not be known what they ſate ſo cloſe upon. The archbiſhop therefore appointed five biſhops to meet a committee of the lower houſe (not exceeding ten) to inſpect the acts of each houſe in this convocation, and report their judgments. But though this had often been done, yet upon this occaſion the lower houſe refuſed to comply with it, or to name a committee. This was ſuch an unprecedented invaſion of the epiſcopal authority, that the upper houſe came to a reſolution to receive nothing from them, till that irregularity was ſet right.

As the lower houſe was highly incenſed againſt the biſhop of Sarum, they cenſured his expoſition of the articles of the church of England, and in imitation of the general impeachments by the houſe of commons, they put their cenſure into three general propoſitions.

I. That it allowed a diverſity of opinions, which the articles are framed to avoid.

II. That it contained many paſſages contrary to the true meaning of the articles, and to other received doctrines of the church.

III. That ſome things in it were of dangerous conſequence to the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, and derogated from the honour of the reformation. Biſhop Burnet begged that the archbiſhop would diſpenſe with the order made againſt further communication with the lower houſe as to this matter. Accordingly the paper againſt the biſhop was brought up and received. But what the particulars were, to which theſe general heads referred, could never be learned; this was a ſecret lodged in confiding hands. For when the archbiſhop moved for the particulars of their charge againſt the book, they would enter into none, unleſs they might at the ſame time offer ſome other matters, which the upper houſe would not admit of [t].

On the 20th of June, the prolocutor appeared in the upper houſe, and the archbiſhop told him (as before) that he could receive no paper but that containing the particularities of the general charge againſt the biſhop of Sarum's expoſition, which at the biſhop's requeſt he was ready to receive. The prolocutor ſaying he had two papers, but could not preſent the one without the other, without the direction of the lower houſe, went back for the opinion of the houſe, but did not return till the convocation was prorogued to Auguſt the 7th, and thence to September the 18th, and ſo on, till the parliament was diſſolved, and the convocation with it.

In theſe proceedings the biſhops were unanimous, except the biſhops of London, Rocheſter, and Exeter: The biſhop of London had been twice diſappointed of his hopes of being advanced to the ſee of Canterbury; ſo for ſeveral years he was engaged with the tory party, and oppoſed the court in every thing, but with little force or authority: The biſhop of Rocheſter had been deeply engaged in the former reigns, and he ſtuck firm to the party, to which, by reaſon of the liberties of his life, he brought no ſort of honour. Theſe biſhops gave no great reputation to the proceedings of the lower houſe, to which they adhered; they likewiſe entered their diſſent to the reſolutions taken in the upper houſe. From the fire raiſed thus in convocation, a great heat was ſpread through the whole clergy of the kingdom; it alienated them from their biſhops, and raiſed factions among them every where [v].

Whilſt in England the diſputes about Schiſm, Socinianiſm, and the rights of convocation were carrying on amongſt thoſe of the eſtabliſhed church, and the conteſts about doctrinal points, divided the diſſenters; other kingdoms were no leſs disjointed in matters of religion. The Quietiſts were increaſing not only in Italy but in France [u]. The perſecution in France began at firſt upon a few Janſeniſts [w], but afterwards turned to the proteſtants, on whom it had been long very heavy and bloody; this put an end to all diſputes in thoſe matters, and a new controverſy aroſe, which was managed with great heat, between Boſſuet the famous biſhop, firſt of Condom and afterwards of Meaux, and La Motte Fenelon, who was in high favour with madam Maintenon, and was by her means made preceptor to the Dauphin's children, and advanced to the arbhbiſhopric of Cambray. Fenelon wrote a treatiſe of ſpiritual maxims, according to the ſubtility of the Myſtics. In this treatiſe, he diſtinguiſhed between that, which was falſly charged upon them, and that which was truly their doctrine: He put the perfection of a ſpiritual life, in the loving of God purely for himſelf, without any regard to ourſelves, even to our own ſalvation: And in our being brought to ſuch a ſtate of indifference, as to have no will nor deſire of our own, but to be ſo perfectly united to the will of God, as to rejoice in the hope of heaven, only becauſe it is the will of God, to bring us thither, without any regard to our own happineſs. Boſſuet wrote ſo ſharply againſt him, that one is tempted to think, a rivalry for favour and preferment had as great a ſhare in it, as zeal for the truth. The matter was ſent to Rome. Fenelon had ſo many authoriſed and canonized writers of his ſide, that many diſtinctions muſt be made uſe of to ſeparate them from him; but the king was much ſet againſt him; he put him from his attendance on the young princeſs, and ſent him to his dioceſe; his diſgrace ſerved to raiſe his character. Madam Maintenon's violent averſion to a man, ſhe ſo lately raiſed, was imputed to his not being ſo tractable as ſhe expected, in perſuading the king to own his marriage with her. But this is only conjecture.

At this time alſo a breach was running through the Lutheran churches. It appeared at firſt openly at Hamburgh, where many were going into ſtricter methods of piety, who from thence were called Pietiſts. There is no difference of opinion between them and the reſt, who are moſt rigid to old forms, and are jealous of all new things, eſpecially of a ſtricter courſe of devotion beyond what they themſelves are inclined to practice. But to return to England.

With the new parliament the king ſummoned a new convocation. Dr. Sherlock preached a Latin ſermon at the opening, and Dr. Woodward (a civilian grown popular by his oppoſition to his dioceſan, to whom he owed his preferments) carried it for prolocutor againſt Dr. Beveridge, archdeacon of Colcheſter. The firſt act of the two houſes was an addreſs to the king, the 22d of January, on occaſion of the French king's proclaming the pretender.

They expreſſed therein the deep reſentment every one of them had, at their firſt hearing of the great indignity which the French king offered to his majeſty and his people, in declaring the pretended prince of Wales to be king of his majeſty's realms and dominions. They renewed their proteſtations of a firm and unſhaken allegiance: And aſſured his majeſty, they would do their utmoſt endeavours, in their

[s] Theſe were, the deans Sherlock, Wichart, Freeman; the archdeacons Bull, Stanley, Jeffery, Trimnel, Bouchier; the proctors, Verney, Evans, Whitefoot, Pooley, Little.

[t] A committee of biſhops being appointed to declare their judgment of the extraordinary proceedings of the lower houſe, upon occaſion of the complaint againſt the biſhop of Sarum, they declared it their opinion, "That the lower houſe had no manner of power, judicially to cenſure any book: That they ought not to have entered upon the examination of a book of any biſhop of this church, without firſt acquainting the preſident and biſhops: That their cenſuring the biſhop of Sarum's book in general terms, without mentioning the particular paſſages on which the cenſure was grounded, was defamatory and ſcandalous: That that biſhop by his excellent 'hiſtory of the reformation,' approved by both houſes of parliament, and other writings, had done great ſervice to the church of England, and deſerved the thanks of their houſe: And, that though private perſons may expound the articles of the church, yet that it could not be proper for the convocation at this time to approve, and much leſs to condemn, ſuch private expoſitions."

[v] Notwithſtanding Atterbury's book had been proved to be falſe in many inſtances, yet we find the following remarkable paſſage concerning it in the hiſtory of this convocation, publiſhed in 1702 in 4to.

When on April the 8th, Dr. Finch returned from the upper houſe to the lower, with an account that no meſſage would be received from them for want of the prolocutor's preſence, the dean of Glouceſter in ſome reſentment took occaſion to ſay, that ſince the upper houſe denied this correſpondence with them, it was now time for the houſe to return their thanks to Mr. Atterbury, for his learned pains in aſſerting and vindicating the rights of convocation. Upon which it was warmly debated, and the form of thanks being propoſed to be changed, from 'learned pains in aſſerting and vindicating,' into his 'endeavours to aſſert and vindicate,' upon a diviſion of the houſe, it was carried, as deſigned, in the affirmative. And then the prolocutor ſaid, 'Mr. Archdeacon of Totneſs, I and this houſe' (no parliamentary phraſe ſays the author of the hiſtory) 'return you our thanks, &c.' Upon which vote a letter was afterwards ſent to Oxford, 'That whereas Mr. Francis Atterbury, late of Chriſt-church, had ſo happily aſſerted the rights and privileges of an Engliſh convocation, as to merit the ſolemn thanks of the lower houſe of it, for his learned pains on that ſubject.——It might be hoped the univerſity would not be leſs forward in taking ſome public notice of ſo great a piece of ſervice to the church. And that the moſt proper and ſeaſonable mark of reſpect to him, would be to confer on him the degree of doctor of divinity by diploma, without doing exerciſe, or paying fees.' Which was accordingly done.

[u] The Quietiſts or Moliniſts (from Molina the jeſuit) oppoſed the doctrine of Grace as explained by St. Auſtin, and were in that point, much the ſame as the Semi-pelagians.

[w] The Janſeniſts (from Janſenius biſhop of Ypres, 1635) explained the doctrine of Grace, according to the notions of St. Auſtin, or the Calviniſtical ſcheme.

reſpective places and ſtations, to maintain his rightful title, and the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, as by law eſtabliſhed, againſt the ſaid pretended prince, and all other his majeſty's open and ſecret enemies, &c. And the king gave them a gracious anſwer.

The faction raiſed in the lower houſe, during the laſt convocation, had ſtill the majority; ſeveral books were writ to ſhew, that by our conſtitution the power of adjourning was wholly in the archbiſhop. The original book of the convocation, that ſate in 1661, being happily found, it ſhewed the practice of that convocation agreed with the biſhops in every particular [x]. But though it was communicated to the lower houſe, it had no effect upon them; for when parties are once formed, and a reſolution is taken upon other conſiderations, no evidence can convince thoſe, who have beforehand reſolved to adhere to their point. Accordingly the diſpute about the power of adjourning was revived, and on the 28th of January a member of the lower houſe moved to change the form of entry in the minutes, which being done, the prolocutor, in his own name, continued and prorogued the houſe, inſtead of intimating, that it was continued and prorogued [y].

This was excepted againſt by ſeveral members, on Feb. 3: But it was carried by a majority, that there ſhould be no alteration, and that the matter ſhould not then be further debated: And when the ſchedule of prorogation came down from the upper houſe, it was laid aſide, while the houſe was proceeding to other buſineſs. A member moved, that the meſſage delivered to the prolocutor might be communicated to the houſe, which he thought they had a right to inſiſt on; the majority oppoſed him, and they went on to appoint a committee of grievances. And then the prolocutor adjourned as by the authority of the houſe, and the diſſenting members proteſted by word of mouth; and before the next meeting put their verbal proteſtation into writing. On February 9, a motion was made, that that proteſtation might be admitted and entered as a ſtanding evidence of their aſſerting the juſt rights and authority of the preſident. This was oppoſed by a majority. But Dr. Beveridge propoſed a queſtion, 'Whether upon ſuppoſition that the houſe may ſit upon ſynodical buſineſs, after the coming down of the ſchedule, till they think their buſineſs over, the houſe would agree that the ſchedule ſhould be then executed, and the houſe prorogued to the day and hour there ſpecified, by virtue of the ſaid ſchedule, and in obedience to the authority whereby the whole convocation was prorogued:' To evade anſwering this queſtion, it was at laſt agreed, that a committee ſhould be appointed to conſider of ſuch an expedient about the prorogation of the lower houſe, as might tend to the compoſing of diſputes: And eight were fixed on one ſide, viz. Dr. Hooper, Dr. Jane, Dr. Aldrich, Dr. Atterbury, Dr. Binckes, Mr. Needham, Mr. Moor, and Dr. Wynne: And eight on the other ſide, viz. Dr. Beveridge, Dr. Haley, Dr. Willis, Dr. Kennet, Dr. Trimnel, Dr. Prideaux, Dr. Green, and Mr. Lloyd. And this committee meeting, Feb. 10, agreed, 'That no forms of prorogation ſhould be uſed by the prolocutor hereafter, that were not uſed before the laſt convocation: That the forms uſed by the prolocutor in the convocations of 1586, and 1588, ſhould hereafter be uſed by the prolocutor in the order they lie in the books, beginning with the firſt till they are gone through: And that they ſhould be pronounced by the prolocutor, when the houſe agreed that their buſineſs was over.' After this, ſome boaſted of the advantage gained on the ſide of the lower houſe, and that the archbiſhop's friends had given up his cauſe, and excluded the ſchedule from any concern in the adjournment. This was ſo induſtriouſly ſpread, that the eight members of the committee drew up a declaration of their ſenſe, in which they ſignified, among other things, that they refuſed an alteration that was offered on the third article of the agreement forementioned, viz. 'That the form ſhould not be pronounced by the prolocutor, till the houſe agreed that their buſineſs was over:' This they refuſed, becauſe, though they might generally preſume upon the archbiſhop's conſent for their ſitting to diſpatch all proper buſineſs; yet they could not agree to any thing that ſhould preclude his right to prorogue them immediately, if he found it expedient: And that they uſed the words 'pronounced by the prolocutor,' to prevent the putting any queſtion to the houſe about 'adjourning themſelves;' and that the prorogation might be always to the time and place appointed by the ſchedule.

On Feb. 12, the prolocutor being indiſpoſed, appointed the dean of Chriſt Church to act as his deputy: And a deputy ſo appointed, had been accepted, had application been duly made to the preſident to approve and confirm him. But no ſuch application being made, the archbiſhop ſent for the clergy, and prorogued the convocation to the 14th, telling them, that an incident had happened of great moment, which he and his brethren muſt take time to conſider of.

On February 13. Dr. Woodward the prolocutor died in his lodgings at Weſtminſter, in very unhappy circumſtances. The archbiſhop on the 14th told the inferior clergy he was much ſurprized at the news of it, and adjourned them to the 19th. The prolocutor before his laſt ſickneſs, had complained much of his biſhop, my lord of Sarum, on account of his breach of privilege in his treatment of him. The caſe was thus: The biſhop viſiting his clergy, the clergy paid their attendance: But the dean of Sarum declined appearing as rector of Peuſy, without making a reaſonable excuſe; nay, rather aggravated his abſence with contempt. The biſhop ordered a citation in the uſual method. When the time of privilege afterwards commenced, he ordered his chancellor to put a ſtet upon the cauſe, and there was no farther proceeding. Upon this a formal complaint was, on February 9, preſented to the upper houſe, in which this was repreſented, not only as an unlawful moleſtation of a member of the lower houſe, but an injury offered to the whole body of the convocation, in the perſon of the prolocutor. The archbiſhop and biſhops anſwered, that the proceedings referred to were begun when there was no privilege, and that upon the opening of the preſent convocation, a ſtet was put upon the cauſe, nor was there any citation of proceſs decreed ſince.

The proſecution of this complaint (which is ſaid to have been carried on with great partiality and prejudice) ceaſing upon the prolocutor's death, and there being no buſineſs depending but the clergy's pretenſions of exemption from the ſynodical authority of the upper houſe, the archbiſhop, on the 19th of February, diſmiſſed the clergy with a ſpeech: In which, taking occaſion from their complaint of the biſhop of Sarum, he tells them, 'He hopes for the future, they would not be ſurprized into complaints, but would ſtay till they were aſſured they were well grounded both in right and fact. He adds, that the choice of a new prolocutor would not now be ſo ſeaſonable, for that many members were abſent, attending their reſpective cures; and that a war was breaking out, which would turn men's thoughts another way: And that therefore he intended a prorogation. He tells them, their heats had given great offence, even to thoſe that underſtand not the nature of the controverſy, but were concerned that there ſhould be any differences, among ſuch as were, by profeſſion, the miniſters of the goſpel of peace.' The prorogation was to the 5th of March. After the archbiſhop's ſpeech, with which ſome were well ſatisfied, others diſcovered their great diſcontent. They met again in Henry VII's chapel two days after, and reſolving themſelves into a ſort of aſſembly, choſe a moderator or chairman. And when the day came to which both houſes had been prorogued, they came up as a houſe, without a prolocutor, to the chamber adjoining to the Jeruſalem Chamber, and there meeting the biſhop of Lincoln, who, as the archbiſhop's commiſſary had now prorogued the convocation to a farther day, begged him to carry a meſſage to the archbiſhop, of their deſire to proceed to the choice of a prolocutor. The biſhop offered, in order to prevent miſtakes, to receive their meſſage in writing. Upon which they began to expreſs themſelves to this effect: 'It is the unanimous deſire of the lower houſe, &c.' One preſent immediately interpoſed, and ſaid, that they were not a houſe, and that many members did not aſſent to ſuch a meſſage; and therefore, at moſt, it could with truth run only in the name of 'ſeveral members of the lower houſe.' This raiſed a new clamour; and thoſe who aſſumed the name of a houſe, eſpecially Dr. Finch, fell ſeverely on the member, who thus openly diſſented, as a betrayer of their rights and liberties.

The king's death, which happened a day or two after, ſhould have put an end to theſe diſputes, but inſtead of that, occaſioned another queſtion, whether the convocation did expire with the king? The archbiſhop and biſhops were ſenſible, that the convocation, being aſſembled by the archbiſhop's mandate in obedience to the king's writ, could no longer ſubſiſt, than while the royal writ remained in force, ſince in the late act for empowering the parliament to ſit after the king's death, no proviſion was made to continue the convocation.

[x] It muſt be obſerved, that the acts of the convocations were recorded in the archbiſhops regiſters, till the death of archbiſhop Morton, in 1500. The laſt convocation extant in the archbiſhops regiſters, was held 1488; and, is the laſt of thoſe whoſe acts are entire, except the convocation of 1640, publiſhed in Nalſon's collections. After Morton's time, the acts of convocations were recorded not in the great regiſters, but in diſtinct volumes: All which periſhed in the fire of 1666.

[y] Inſtead of the uſual form, 'prolocutor intimavit hanc convocationem eſſe continuatam, &c.' they entered in their minutes the phraſe of, 'dominus prolocutor continuavit et prorogavit quoad hanc domum.

convocation. But that part of the lower houſe, who had aſſumed new claims, were taught (as hath been obſerved) to call themſelves a parliamentary body, and at leaſt to attend upon a parliament by virtue of the præmunientes clauſe, which they had lately got executed in ſeveral dioceſes. And therefore they inſiſted, that they were ſuch a part of the parliament, as could not be ſeparated from it; and conſequently if they were no longer a provincial ſynod, they were however a part of the national clergy ſummoned by the præmunientes clauſe to meet in parliament. And, indeed, had their parliamentary notions been true, this had been a juſt inference from them. But when they came to conſult the learned in the law, they ſoon found, that the act for continuing the parliament did by no means include the convocation, which, being called by a different writ, had a different conſtitution, and muſt determine with the king's death. When they were under this diſappointment, they ſollicited ſome friends in the houſe of lords to bring in an extraordinary clauſe to declare the convocation to be ſtill in being. This was moved by the earl of Rocheſter, but the attorney-general declaring it was againſt the queen's eccleſiaſtical ſupremacy, it was let fall, and they were forced to acquieſce in the diſſolution.

Upon the queen's acceſſion to the crown, all theſe angry men, that had raiſed this flame in the church, as they treated the memory of the late king with much indecent contempt, ſo they ſeemed very confident, that for the future, all preferments ſhould be diſtributed among them (the queen having ſuperſeded the commiſſion for eccleſiaſtical preferments) and they thought they were full of merit, and were as full of hopes.

The END of the REIGN of WILLIAM III.

THE

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

BOOK XXVI.

SECT. I.

From the Acceſſion of Queen ANNE, to the Treaty of the HAGUE in 1709.

29. ANNE.

[1701-2.] UPON the death of king William, the crown, purſuant to the act of ſucceſſion, devolved to the princeſs Anne of Denmark, daughter of king James II. by the lady Anne Hyde [a]. This princeſs was born at St, James's on the 6th of February 1664-5. She was ſent to France in 1699, which much alarmed the people, on a ſurmiſe, that ſhe was gone thither to be bred a catholic; the bigotry and ſuperſtition of her father, who had found means to pervert her mother, being well known. But their fears ceaſed, when it was found ſhe was ſent there on account of her health only, ſhe having at that time a defluxion in her eyes, which the change of air, and the methods there uſed, ſoon removed; and ſhe returned to England much improved in her conſtitution and perſon. Dr. Henry Compton, dean of the chapel, and afterwards biſhop of London, had the care of her education.

The duke of York, two years after the death of his firſt wife, married, in 1673, Mary of Eſté, the duke of Modena's daughter, a rigid papiſt [b], by which means, all hopes of a proteſtant male-heir being loſt, a greater value was raiſed in the people for the princeſſes Mary and Anne, from the general expectation of having the ſucceſſion continued to them, whom, with joy, they ſaw educated in the proteſtant religion.

Upon the marriage of the princeſs Mary to the prince of Orange, her father was very preſſing with the king his brother, to leave him the diſpoſal of his other daughter the princeſs Anne; but the king thought it more adviſeable to hearken to the importunities of his parliament, and marry her alſo to a proteſtant prince. In the year 1681, the prince of Hanover (afterwards king George I. of England) came over to make his addreſſes to her: But he was ſcarce got hither, when he received orders from his father not to proceed in that deſign; for he had agreed a match for him with his brother the duke of Zell's daughter, which at that time, was more advantageous to the family. Two years after prince George of Denmark, ſecond ſon of Frederick III. and younger brother of Chriſtian V. kings of Denmark, came into England, in order to marry the princeſs Anne. Accordingly, eleven days after his arrival, they were ſolemnly married by the biſhop of London, in the chapel royal at St. James's on the 28th of July 1683. This marriage, at firſt, did by no means pleaſe the nation: For it was known that the propoſition came from France, and therefore it was apprehended, that the Engliſh and French courts reckoned, they were ſure he would change his religion. But theſe apprehenſions were, by experience, found to be entirely groundleſs. He had now lived, in all reſpects, the happieſt with his princeſs that was poſſible, except in one point. For, though there was a child born almoſt every year for many years, yet they all died: So that the moſt fruitful marriage of the age was fatally blaſted as to the effect of it [c].

Upon the princeſs's marriage, the lady Churchill (afterwards ducheſs of Marlborough) was, at the princeſs's earneſt requeſt to her father, made one of the ladies of her bedchamber, and was at length diſtinguiſhed by ſo high a place in her favour, as perhaps no perſon ever arrived at a higher with queen or princeſs. She had an aſcendant over the princeſs in every thing: She was a woman of little knowledge, but of a clear apprehenſion, and a true judgment; a warm and hearty friend, violent and ſudden in her reſolutions, and impetuous in her way of ſpeaking. She was thought proud and inſolent on her favour, though ſhe uſed none of the common arts of a court to maintain it: For ſhe did not beſet the princeſs, nor flatter her. She ſtaid much at home, and looked carefully after the education of her children. The beginning of the princeſs's kindneſs for her had a much earlier date than her entrance into her ſervice. They had uſed to be together, when children, and the princeſs even then expreſsed

[a] She was daughter of the earl of Clarendon. The king, when duke of York, was contracted to her at Breda, November 24, 1659, and privately married to her at Worceſter-houſe, September 5, 1660, in the night by Dr. Joſeph Crowcher the duke's chaplain. Her father ſolemnly proteſted, that he knew nothing of the matter, till it broke out in 1662. The duke thought to have ſhaken her from claiming her marriage by great promiſes and as great threatnings. But ſhe, being a woman of a high ſpirit, ſaid, ſhe was his wife, and would have it known that ſhe was ſo, let him uſe her afterwards as he pleaſed. King Charles II. ordered ſome biſhops and judges to peruſe the proofs ſhe had to produce, and they reporting the marriage was good, the king, not being then willing to break with the earl of Clarendon, told his brother he muſt live with her whom he had made his wife. The ducheſs of York was a very extraordinary woman. She had great knowledge and a lively ſenſe of things. She ſoon underſtood what belonged to a princeſs, and took ſtate on her rather too much. She writ well, and had begun the duke's life, of which ſhe ſhewed Dr. Burnet a volume. It was all drawn from the duke's journal; and he intended to have employed Burnet in carrying it on. She was bred to great ſtrictneſs in religion, and practiſed ſecret confeſſion. Morley was her confeſſor. She began at twelve years old, and continued under his direction, till, upon her father's diſgrace, he was put from the court. She was generous and friendly, but was too ſevere an enemy. It was ſuppoſed ſhe had been prevailed upon to change her religion, for a paper was publiſhed by Maimburgh after her death, giving an account of the grounds of her converſion, which paper the duke of York ſhewed Burnet all writ with her own hand, but would not let him copy it, though he gave him leave to read it twice. After a long decay of health ſhe died in 1672, very little beloved or lamented. Her haughtineſs had raiſed her many enemies, and her friends, becauſe of the change of her religion, reckoned her death rather a bleſſing than a loſs at that time. She bore the duke of York four ſons and four daughters, Charles of York, duke of Cambridge, born the 22d of October, 1660, who died at ſeven months old; James of York, called alſo duke of Cambridge, born the 12th of July 1663, who died in 1667; Charles of York, duke of Kendal, third ſon, born the 4th of July, 1666, and who died in May, 1667; Edgar of York, duke of Cambridge, the fourth ſon, was born the 14th of September, 1667, and died the 8th of June, 1672. The four daughters were, 1. Mary of York, born the 13th of April, 1662, a princeſs of great beauty and eminent virtue, who was married to William Henry of Naſſau, prince of Orange, afterwards king William III. and died on the 28th of December, 1694. 2. Anne of York, ſecond daughter, born at St. James's on the 6th of February, 1664-5. Henrietta of York, third daughter, born at Whitehall the 13th of January, 1668, and deceaſed at ten months old; and Katherine of York, fourth daughter, who was born the 9th of February, 1670, and died the 5th of December, 1671.

[b] The new ducheſs of York was brought over by the earl of Peterborough (who had married her by proxy) in the winter of 1673. She was then very young, about ſixteen, but of a full growth. She was a graceful perſon, with a good ſhare of beauty, and ſo much wit and cunning, that, during all king Charles's reign, ſhe behaved herſelf in ſo obliging a manner, and ſeemed ſo innocent and good, that ſhe gained upon all that came near her, and poſſeſſed them with ſuch impreſſions of her, that it was long before her behaviour, after ſhe was queen, could make them change their thoughts of her. So artificially did this young Italian carry herſelf, that ſhe deceived even the eldeſt and moſt jealous perſons, both in the court and the country. Only ſometimes a ſatyrical temper broke out too much, which was imputed to youth and wit not enough practiſed to the world. She avoided the appearances of a zealot, or a meddler in buſineſs, and gave herſelf up to innocent cheerfulneſs, and was univerſally eſteemed and loved as long as ſhe was ducheſs. Burnet I, 368.

[c] Their children, beſides ſeveral miſcarriages were as follow:

The firſt was a daughter, of whom her royal highneſs was delivered on the 12th of May. 1614; and being dead, was privately interred. 2. Lady Mary, ſecond daughter, born at Whitehall the 2d of June, 1685, who died in a particular fondneſs for her. This inclination encreaſed with their years; and the princeſs always diſtinguiſhed her by the pleaſure ſhe took in her converſation and confidence. Hence it was, that upon her marriage, ſhe was ſo deſirous to have her near her perſon [d].

After her father king James's acceſſion to the throne, the princeſs, during his whole reign, kept her court as private as ſhe could, conſiſtent with her ſtation. When the king's deſigns were diſcovered, and popiſh counſels began to prevail, attempts were made to draw the princeſs into them. The king indeed uſed no harſhneſs with her; he only diſcovered his wiſhes, by putting into her hands ſome books and papers, which he hoped might induce her to a change of religion [e]. Lord Tyrconnel alſo took ſome pains with his ſiſter-in-law, the lady Churchill, to engage her, if poſſible, to make uſe, for the ſame end, of that great favour he knew ſhe enjoyed with the princeſs; but all theſe endeavours proved fruitleſs, and the prince and princeſs of Denmark remained firm to their religion.

Though the queen, after ſhe had declared herſelf with child, declined giving the princeſs of Denmark any ſatisfaction in that matter, yet it does not appear that ſhe thought it an impoſture; nor did ſhe, in her letter to the queen, when ſhe left the court, give the leaſt hint of ſuch a ſuſpicion. Upon the landing of the prince of Orange, in 1688, the king went down to Saliſbury to his army, and the prince of Denmark with him: but the news quickly came from thence, that the prince of Denmark had deſerted the king and joined the prince of Orange, and that the king was returning to London. The princeſs was ſo ſtruck with the apprehenſions of the king's diſpleaſure, that ſhe told the lady Churchill, ſhe could not bear the thoughts of it, and declared, rather than ſee her father, ſhe would jump out of the window. The biſhop of London (who, in that critical time, abſconded) was then lodged ſecretly in Suffolk-Street. The princeſs immediately ſent the lady Churchill (who knew where he was) to concert meaſures with the biſhop, how ſhe ſhould withdraw from the court. It was agreed, that he ſhould come about midnight in a hackney-coach near the Cockpit, in order to convey the princeſs to ſome place where ſhe might be private and ſafe.

The princeſs went to bed at the uſual time to prevent ſuſpicion. Lady Churchill came to her ſoon after; and, with her, and lady Fitzharding, and one ſervant, the princeſs, by the back-ſtairs which went down from her cloſet, walked to the coach, where they found the biſhop and the earl of Dorſet. They conducted them that night to the biſhop's houſe in the city, and the next day to the lord Dorſet's at Copt-Hall, from whence they went to Nottingham, where the country gathered about the princeſs, and forming themſelves into a little army, choſe to be commanded by the biſhop of London, which he too eaſily accepted; but the princeſs did not think herſelf ſafe, till ſhe was ſurrounded by the prince of Orange's friends.

Quickly after this the king fled into France, and, the throne being declared vacant, was preſently filled with the prince and princeſs of Orange. The parliament thought proper to ſettle the crown on king William for life, and the princeſs of Denmark gave her conſent to it. The lady Churchill at firſt took a great deal of pains (which ſhe believed the king and queen never forgot) to perſuade her againſt it; but, finding all the principal men, except the Jacobites, were for king William, and Dr. Tillotſon (whom ſhe conſulted) having convinced her of the expediency of the ſettlement propoſed, ſhe adviſed the princeſs to acquieſce in it, and carried Dr. Tillotſon to her to ſecond her advice. Upon what the doctor ſaid to her, the princeſs took care that no diſturbance ſhould be made by her pretended friends the Jacobites, who had preſſed her earneſtly to form an oppoſition.

Not long after the advancement of king William to the throne, the miſunderſtanding between not only the king, but alſo the queen and the princeſs of Denmark, broke out, of which a large account has been given. Though, after queen Mary's death, there was (as has been ſaid) a reconciliation, yet it went not much farther than what civility and decency required; and ſuch a coldneſs had continued between the king and the princeſs, that ſhe was not made acquainted with public affairs, or encouraged to recommend any to poſts of truſt and advantage: neither had the miniſtry orders to inform her how matters went, or to oblige thoſe about her. Only the earl of Marlborough, after ſome years of diſgrace, had been taken again into favour; and nothing had contented him better, than the command he had the former year of the troops which were ſent to the aſſiſtance of the States. As he afterwards became the greateſt general of the age, it will be proper to give a brief account of his riſe and character.

John Churchill, earl (afterwards duke) of Marlborough, was ſecond ſon of ſir Winſton Churchill of Wotton Baſſet in Wiltſhire, by Elizabeth, daughter of ſir John Drake of Aſhe, in the pariſh of Muſbury in Devonſhire [f]. He was born at Aſhe the 24th of June, 1650. He was brought in February, 1686. 3. Lady Anne Sophia, third daughter, born at Windſor the 12th of May, 1686, died the February following. 4. William, firſt ſon, born at the royal palace at Hampton-Court the 24th of July, 1689, was, at his baptiſm, declared by king William duke of Glouceſter, who died July 24th, 1700. 5. The lady Mary, a fourth daughter, was born at St. James's in the month of October, 1690, but died ſoon after ſhe was baptized. 4. George, another ſon, was born at Sion-houſe, the 17th day of April, 1692, but died as ſoon as born.

[d] Sarah Jennings, daughter and coheireſs (with her ſiſter the counteſs of Tyrconnel) of Richard Jennings, of Sandridge in Hertfordſhire, eſq. by his wife Frances, daughter and heireſs of ſir Gifford Thornhurſt, of Agnes-Court in Kent, baronet, was born on the 29th of May, 1660, the day of king Charles's reſtoration, and in 1681 married to John Churchill (then a colonel of dragoons, and afterwards duke of Marlborough). She was at that time in great favour with the princeſs Anne, of which ſhe herſelf gives the following account:

The beginning of the princeſs's kindneſs for me had a much earlier date than my entrance into her ſervice. My promotion to this honour was wholly owing to impreſſions ſhe had before received to my advantage; we had uſed to play together, when ſhe was a child, and ſhe even then expreſſed a particular fondneſs for me. This inclination increaſed with our years. I was often at court, and the princeſs always diſtinguiſhed me by the pleaſure ſhe took to honour me, preferably to others, with her converſation and confidence. In all her parties for amuſement, I was ſure, by her choice, to be one; and ſo deſirous ſhe became of having me always near her, that, upon her marriage with the prince of Denmark in 1683, it was, at her own earneſt requeſt to her father, I was made one of the ladies of her bed-chamber.

What conduced to render me the more agreeable to her in this ſtation was, doubtleſs, the diſlike ſhe had conceived to moſt of the other perſons about her, and particularly to her firſt lady of the bed-chamber, the counteſs of Clarendon; a lady, whoſe diſcourſe and manner (though the princeſs thought they agreed very well together) could not poſſibly recommend her to ſo young a miſtreſs: for ſhe looked like a mad woman, and talked like a ſcholar. Indeed her highneſs's court was throughout ſo oddly compoſed, that I think it would be making myſelf no great compliment, if I ſhould ſay, her chuſing to ſpend more of her time with me, than with any of her other ſervants, did no diſcredit to her taſte. Be that as it will, it is certain ſhe at length diſtinguiſhed me by ſo high a place in her favour, as perhaps no perſon ever arrived at a higher with queen or princeſs. And, if from hence I may draw any glory, it is, that I both obtained and held this place without the aſſiſtance of flattery; a charm, which in truth her inclination for me, together with my unwearied application to ſerve and amuſe her, rendered needleſs; but which had it been otherwiſe, my temper and turn of mind would never have ſuffered me to employ.

Young as I was, when I firſt became this high favourite, I laid it down for a maxim, that flattery was falſehood to my truſt, and ingratitude to my greateſt friend; and that I did not deſerve ſo much favour, if I could not venture the loſs of it by ſpeaking the truth, and by preferring the real intereſt of my miſtreſs before the pleaſing her fancy, or the ſacrificing to her paſſion. From this rule I never ſwerved. And, though my temper and my notions in moſt things were widely different from thoſe of the princeſs, yet, during a long courſe of years, ſhe was ſo far from being diſpleaſed with me for openly ſpeaking my ſentiments, that ſhe ſometimes profeſſed a deſire, and even added her command, that it ſhould be always continued, promiſing never to be offended at it, but to love me the better for my frankneſs.

Favour with a princeſs upon theſe terms engaged me to her in the manner that it ought; I mean, by a ſentiment which I chuſe to call Honour, rather than Gratitude or Duty, becauſe, while it implies all the juſtice and affection of theſe, it ſeems to expreſs a more diſintereſted principle of action. For I can truly affirm, that I never conſidered myſelf on any occaſion where her intereſt or glory was concerned, nor had I any idea of a miſery which I would not have ſooner incurred, than the inward ſhame of being conſcious of a failure in this reſpect. The facts themſelves, which I am going to relate, will in a great degree evince the truth of what I ſay; and that the princeſs was perfectly perſuaded of it, is, I think, ſufficiently manifeſt both from her letters to me, and from that unreſerved intimacy of friendſhip, in which we for many years lived together.

Kings and princes, for the moſt part, imagine they have a dignity peculiar to their birth and ſtation, which ought to raiſe them above all connexion of friendſhip with an inferior. Their paſſion is to be admired and feared, to have ſubjects awfully obedient, and ſervants blindly obſequious to their pleaſure. Friendſhip is an offenſive word, it imports a kind of equality between the parties; it ſuggeſts nothing to the mind of crowns or thrones, high titles or immenſe revenues, fountains of honour or fountains of riches; prerogatives which the poſſeſſors would have always uppermoſt in the thoughts of thoſe who are permitted to approach them.

The princeſs had a different taſte. A friend was what ſhe had moſt coveted; and for the ſake of friendſhip (a relation which ſhe did not diſdain to have with me) ſhe was fond even of that equality which ſhe thought belonged to it. She grew uneaſy to be treated by me with the form and ceremony due to her rank; nor could ſhe bear from me the ſound of words which implied in them diſtance and ſuperiority. It was this turn of mind, which made her one day propoſe to me, that, whenever I ſhould happen to be abſent from her, we might in all our letters write ourſelves by feigned names, ſuch as would import nothing of diſtinction of rank between us. Morley and Freeman were the names her fancy hit upon; and ſhe left me to chuſe by which of them I would be called. My frank open temper naturally led me to pitch upon Freeman, and ſo the princeſs took the other; and from this time Mrs. Morley and Mrs. Freeman began to converſe as equals, made ſo by affection and friendſhip. 'Conduct of the ducheſs of Marlborough,' p. 9, &c.

[e] The ducheſs of Marlborough obſerves here, that, had the princeſs had any inclination to change her religion, the chaplains about her were ſuch divines as could have ſaid but little in defence of their own religion, or to ſecure her againſt the pretences of popery, recommended to her by a father and a king, 'Conduct of the ducheſs of Marlborough, p. 15.'

[f] His original is traced up to Roger de Courcill, a younger branch of the illuſtrious houſe of Leon in France, who attending William the conqueror into England, received as a reward for his ſervices a conſiderable eſtate in land;

young to court, and made a page of honour to the duke of York, who, upon his diſcovering a martial inclination, procured him, at the age of ſixteen, an enſign's commiſſion in the guards. He went firſt to Tangier, and afterwards to France with the ſix thouſand Engliſh forces ſent to the aſſiſtance of the French king, under the command of the duke of Monmouth, who gave him a captain's commiſſion in his own regiment. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in Alſatia under the marſhals de Turenne and de Lorge, and particularly at the ſiege of Maeſtricht the next year in the ſight of the French monarch, who did him the honour to thank him for his ſervices, at the head of his army, with an aſſurance of his recommendation to the king of Great-Britain. Upon his return to England, the fame of his bravery, and his ſiſter's favour, raiſed him to be a lieutenant-colonel, gentleman of the bed-chamber, and maſter of the robes to the duke of York, whom he attended in his baniſhment to the Netherlands, and in his receſs to Scotland. In 1681, he married Mrs. Sarah Jennings, then in great favour with the princeſs Anne, the duke of York's ſecond daughter, of whom an account has been given. Upon the Duke's return from Scotland, colonel Churchill was created baron Churchill of Aymouth in Scotland, the 21ſt of December, 1682, and captain of the third troop of guards. When the duke of York came to the crown, the lord Churchill was made lieutenant-general, and one of the gentlemen of the bed-chamber, and ſent embaſſador to France, to notify that prince's acceſſion to the throne. On the 14th of May 1685, he was created a peer of England, by the title of baron Churchill, of Sandridge in Hertfordſhire. Upon the inſurrection in the Weſt, in favour of the duke of Monmouth, he commanded the firſt forces that were ſent againſt him, and, by his conduct, greatly contributed to the victory at Sedgmore. But, afterwards finding king James entirely bent upon introducing popery and arbitrary power, he thought himſelf freed from any ties of former obligations, and joined with the other lords to invite the prince of Orange to come over to their aſſiſtance. Upon his leaving king James, he was declared lieutenant-general by the prince of Orange, who, as ſoon as he aſcended the throne, made him gentleman of his bed-chamber, and, on the 9th of April, 1689, created him earl of Marlborough. The new earl commanded the Engliſh forces that ſerved the ſame year in Flanders under prince Waldeck, and, in 1690, he reduced the towns of Cork and Kinſale with incredible expedition. The next year he made the campaign under king William in Flanders; but (as hath been largely related) he was ſoon after ſuddenly removed from all his employments, nor was he reſtored to favour till the year 1698, when he was appointed governor to the duke of Glouceſter, and ſerved as one of the lords juſtices three ſeveral times during the abſence of the king, by whom he was at laſt declared commander in chief of the Engliſh forces in Holland, and embaſſador extraordinary and plenipotentiary for the negotiations at the Hague, in which employments he was continued by queen Anne.

He was a man of a noble and graceful appearance, bred up in the court with no literature; but he had a ſolid and clear underſtanding, with a conſtant preſence of mind. He knew the arts of living in a court beyond any man in it. He careſſed all people with a ſoft and obliging deportment, and was always ready to do good offices. He had no fortune to ſet out with, which put him upon all the methods of acquiring one. And that went ſo far into him, that he did not ſhake it off, when he was in a much higher elevation: Nor were his expences ſuited enough to his poſts. But, when allowances are made for that, it muſt be acknowledged, that he was one of the greateſt men the age has produced. He was in high favour with king James, and therefore he has been ſeverely cenſured, as guilty both of ingratitude and treachery to a very kind and liberal maſter [g]. But it may be remembered in his behalf, that he never diſcovered any of that king's ſecrets, nor did he ever puſh him on to any violent proceedings; ſo that he was in no contrivance to ruin or betray him. On the contrary, whenever he ſpoke to him about his affairs, which was but ſeldom, becauſe he could not fall in with his notions, he always ſuggeſted moderate counſels. The earl of Galway told biſhop Burnet, that, when he came over to Holland with the firſt compliments upon king James's acceſſion to the crown, he ſaid then to him, that, if king James was ever prevailed with to alter our religion, he would ſerve him no longer, but withdraw from him. So early was this reſolution fixed in him. And therefore, when he afterwards ſaw how king James was determined, he could not be contented to ſee all ruined by him. He was alſo very doubtful as to the pretended birth. For theſe reaſons he reſolved, when the prince of Orange came over, to leave king James, but to betray no poſt, nor do any thing more than the withdrawing himſelf with ſuch officers, as he could truſt with ſuch a ſecret. This he did with great regret, at a time when it was evidently with hazard to himſelf, it not being then poſſible to foreſee that king James would ſo ſhamefully deſert the kingdom; and when he might have been all that an ambitious man could have hoped for, by aſſiſting that king to ſettle popery in England [h].

The princeſs of Denmark was in this ſituation above deſcribed, when king William's death put an end to it, and placed her on the throne. She was entered on the thirty-eighth year of her age, and from her infancy had imbibed ſtrong prejudices againſt the whigs. She had been taught to look upon them all, not only as republicans, but as enemies to the church of England. This averſion to the whole party had been confirmed by the uſage ſhe had met with from her ſiſter and king William, which was now to be all charged to the account of the Whigs. And prince George, who had alſo been ill treated (as he thought) in the late reign, threw into the ſcale his reſentment. On the other hand, the tories had the advantage, not only of the queen's early prepoſſeſſion in their favour, but of their having aſſiſted her in the affair of her revenue. It was indeed evident, that they had done this, more in oppoſition to the king, than from any real reſpect to her. But ſtill they had ſerved her; and the winter before the king died, they had, in proſpect of his death, paid her more than uſual attendance. Hence it is, that, as ſoon as ſhe was ſeated in the throne, the tories (whom ſhe uſually called by the agreeable name of the church-party) became the diſtinguiſhed objects of her favour, as will preſently be ſeen.

Upon the king's death, the privy-council came in a body to wait on the new queen. She received them with a well-conſidered ſpeech, expreſſed in theſe terms:

My lords,

"I AM extremely ſenſible of the general misfortune to theſe kingdoms, in the unſpeakable loſs of the king, and the great weight and burden it brings in particular on myſelf; which nothing could encourage me to undergo, but the

was grandfather to ſir Bartholomew de Courcill, by corruption called Curricheſ, and to Churchill, who held the caſtle of Briſtol for king Stephen; and whoſe deſcendant, Otho de Churchill, was the founder of a ſpreading family in Devonſhire, Somerſetſhire, and Wiltſhire. Of this laſt county, and of the town of Wotton Baſſet, was Winſton Churchill, eſq; who, having had a liberal education at St. John's college, Oxon, aſſerted, and ſuffered for the cauſe of king Charles I. but upon the reſtoration was choſen member of parliament for Weymouth, admitted fellow of the royal ſociety, ſoon after knighted, and appointed commiſſioner of the claims in Ireland, where he began to retrieve his broken fortune; and afterwards, by the favour of the duke of York, made one of the clerks comptrollers of the green-cloth to the king. By his wife Elizabeth, ſir Winſton had ſeven ſons and four daughters. I. Winſton, who died young. II. John, late duke of Marlborough. III. George, born at Aſhe February 20, 1653. He was bred to the ſea-ſervice, and was above twenty years gentleman of the bed-chamber to prince George of Denmark. He was member for St. Albans in every parliament from 1685 to his death in 1710, except the laſt when he ſerved for Plymouth. He commanded a ſquadron in 1689, and behaved with great bravery in the battle of La Hogue in 1692, being then commander of the St. Andrew, a ſecond rate. He was made one of the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty in 1699, where he continued till 1702, when the earl of Pembroke was made high-admiral. Queen Anne made him admiral of the Blue and one of the council to prince George, as lord high-admiral. He was afterwards admiral of the white, and commander in chief during the indiſpoſition of Sir George Rooke. Upon the death of prince George, his commiſſion ending, he retired from buſineſs by reaſon of an ill ſtate of health. He died unmarried, May 8, 1710, and lies buried in the South-iſle of Weſtminſter-abbey. IV. Charles, born at Aſhe, 1656; at the age of thirteen he was made page of honour to Chriſtian king of Denmark, and at ſixteen, gentleman of the bed-chamber to prince George. He was made major-general of foot, and governor of Kinſale in Ireland, and was eſteemed one of the beſt commanders of foot in Europe, of which he was made general in chief, and governor of the tower by queen Anne. He had a great ſhare in the battle of Blenheim; after which he was governor of Bruſſels, colonel of the Coldſtream regiment of guards, and governor of Guernſey. He married in 1702, the daughter and heireſs of James Goulde, Eſq, of Dorcheſter, and died Decemb. 29, 1714, in the 58th year of his age. V. Montjoy died young; as did, VI. Jaſper. VII. Theobald, bred at Queen's-college Oxford. He took orders, and died unmarried, Dec. 3, 1685. The daughters were, I. Arabella, born at Aſhe, 1652. She was maid of honour to the ducheſs of York, and afterwards favourite miſtreſs to king James II, by whom ſhe had two ſons, James Fitz-James duke of Berwick, and Henry Fitz-James, commonly called the Grand-Prior; and two daughters, Henrietta, born 1670, and, in 1683, married to Sir Henry Waldegrave, created 1686 lord Waldegrave of Chelton, whoſe ſon James lord Waldegrave, born 1684, was created an earl 1729. The other daughter was a nun. Arabella's three ſiſters, Dorothy, Mary, and Barbara, died in their infancy. Arabella was married afterwards to colonel Charles Godfrey, and by him had two daughters; Charlotta, wife of Hugh Boſcawen, lord viſcount Falmouth; and Elizabeth, wife of Edward Dunch, Eſq.

[g] It is ſaid, that, when afterwards a ſcheme was forming by king James's friends in England for his reſtoration, and a liſt was offered to him of thoſe that were to be pardoned, the king, upon ſeeing lord Churchill's name in the liſt, declared he would never forgive him, and in being preſſed upon that head, inſiſted that he would not pardon him, unleſs he merited it by ſome ſignal ſervice. Such was king James's reſentment for his being deſerted by a perſon, whom he thought ſo much obliged to him for the many favours he had heaped upon him.

[h] A late hiſtorian, in his hiſtory of queen Anne, gives him the following character: The earl of Marlborough was, by nature, deſigned for a Favourite;

great concern I have for the preſervation of our religion, and laws and liberties of my country. All theſe being as dear to me, as they can be to any perſon whatſoever, you may depend upon it, that no pains nor diligence ſhall ever be wanting on my part, to preſerve and ſupport them; to maintain the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, and the government in church and ſtate as it is by law eſtabliſhed. I think it proper, upon this occaſion of my firſt ſpeaking to you, to declare my own opinion of the importance of carrying on all the preparations we are making to oppoſe the great power of France; and I ſhall loſe no time in giving our allies all aſſurances, that nothing ſhall be wanting on my part, to purſue the true intereſt of England, together with theirs, for the ſupport of the common cauſe. In order to theſe ends, I ſhall always be ready to aſk the advice of my council, and of both houſes of parliament, and deſirous to countenance and employ all thoſe, who ſhall heartily concur and join with me, in ſupporting and maintaining the preſent eſtabliſhment and conſtitution againſt all enemies and oppoſers whatſoever."

The queen pronounced this, as ſhe did all her other ſpeeches, with great weight and authority, and with a ſoftneſs of voice, and ſweetneſs in the pronunciation, that added much life to all ſhe ſpoke; and theſe, her firſt expreſſions, were heard with great and juſt acknowledgements. After this declaration, ſhe cauſed all the lords, and others of the late king's privy-council, to take the oaths to her in the ſame quality, and ordered a proclamation to be publiſhed immediately, ſignifying her pleaſure, that all perſons being in office of authority or government, at the deceaſe of the late king, ſhould ſo continue till further directions.

As, by the act made five years before, the parliament, notwithſtanding the king's death, was now continued to ſit; both houſes met the ſame day, and unanimouſly voted to addreſs the queen to condole with her on this ſad occaſion, and to congratulate her happy acceſſion to the throne. Then the lords in a conference acquainted the commons, that orders were given for proclaiming her majeſty that afternoon; which was accordingly done with the uſual ſolemnity, and the loud acclamations of the people: Though it is remarkable, that this day afforded a viſible mixture of ſorrow and joy; many being apprehenſive, that the death of king William, at ſo critical a juncture, might be attended with conſequences fatal to Europe in general, and to the proteſtant ſucceſſion of theſe kingdoms in particular.

The next day, purſuant to their vote, the lords in a body attended the queen with an addreſs, "moſt heartily congratulating her majeſty's acceſſion to the throne, aſſuring her of their zealous and firm reſolution to ſupport her undoubted right and title, and the ſucceſſion of the proteſtant line, againſt all her enemies whatſoever; being ſenſible their great loſs was no otherwiſe to be repaired to themſelves and their confederates, but by a moſt ſincere and vigorous adherence to her majeſty and her allies, in the proſecution of thoſe meaſures, already entered into, to reduce the exorbitant power of France: And humbly deſiring, that, for the encouragement of her majeſty's allies, no time might be loſt in communicating to them her majeſty's reſolutions of adhering firmly to the alliances already made, which they ſhould never be wanting, to the utmoſt of their power, to enable her majeſty to maintain." The queen told them, "ſhe received theſe aſſurances with great ſatisfaction, and that her endeavours ſhould always be ſincere to promote the true intereſt of England, and to ſupport their common cauſe."

The ſame day in the evening the commons, with their ſpeaker, attended her majeſty with an addreſs to the ſame purpoſe: "They unanimouſly aſſured her, that they would to the utmoſt aſſiſt and ſupport her majeſty on that throne, where God had placed her, againſt the pretended prince of Wales and all her enemies. And ſince nothing could conduce more to the honour and ſafety of her majeſty and her kingdoms, than maintaining inviolably ſuch alliances as had been, or ſhould be made, for preſerving the liberties of Europe, and reducing the exorbitant power of France; they aſſured her, that they were firmly reſolved to inable her to proſecute that glorious deſign. And, that all her ſubjects might reſt in a full aſſurance of happineſs under her majeſty's reign, they would maintain the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, according to the limitations in the ſeveral acts of ſettlement, and effectually provide for and make good the 'public credit' of the nation." The queen returned them "her hearty thanks for the kind aſſurances they gave her, which could not be more agreeably confirmed to her, than by their giving diſpatch in all their preparations for the public ſervice, and the ſupport of the allies." And this good harmony between the queen and her parliament, together with the reſolution of the commons about 'public credit,' immediately raiſed the national funds above their former value, which upon king William's death had fallen above fifteen per cent. The queen not only anſwered the addreſſes of both houſes in this favourable manner, but moreover ſhe received all that came to her ſo graciouſly, that they went from her highly ſatisfied with her goodneſs and her obliging deportment; for ſhe hearkened with attention to every thing that was ſaid to her.

Two days after the queen went to the houſe of peers with the uſual ſolemnity, and addreſſed herſelf to both houſes in the following ſpeech:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I Cannot too much lament my own unhappineſs in ſucceeding ſo immediately after the loſs of a king, who was the great ſupport, not only of theſe kingdoms, but of all Europe. And I am extremely ſenſible of the weight and difficulty it brings upon me.

"But the true concern I have for our religion, for the laws and liberties of England, for the maintaining the ſucceſſion to the crown in the proteſtant line, and the government in church and ſtate, as by law eſtabliſhed, encourages me in this great undertaking, which I promiſe myſelf will be ſucceſsful, by the bleſſing of God, and the continuance of that fidelity and affection, of which you have given me ſo full aſſurance.

"The preſent conjuncture of affairs requires the greateſt application and diſpatch; and I am very glad to find in your ſeveral addreſſes ſo unanimous a concurrence in the ſame opinion with me, that too much cannot be done for the encouragement of our allies, to reduce the exorbitant power of France.

"I cannot but think it very neceſſary upon this occaſion to deſire you to conſider of proper methods towards obtaining of an union between England and Scotland, which has been ſo lately recommended to you, as a matter, that very nearly concerns the peace and ſecurity of both kingdoms.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I need not put you in mind, that the revenue for defraying the expences of the civil government is expired.

rite; by fortune and perſonal merit raiſed to be a General; and, by his own obſervation, and long experience of court-intrigues, made a ſtateſman: His perſon was lofty and well made; his features manly, yet beautiful; his look gracious and open; his mein great; his parts quick; his memory faithful and exact; his penetration deep; his judgment ſolid; his courage undaunted: He was conſummate in all the acts of a courtier, ſupple, affable, ſedate; reſerved, both with friends and enemies; ſober, averſe to luxury; and though, in a voluptuous court, he indulged himſelf in ſome liberties of life, yet he ſtill preſerved a good reputation with all men. He was ambitious, but free from haughtineſs and oſtentation. His aſcent was ſo gradual, and ſo long foreſeen, that it appeared rather a growth than a flight; and therefore was the leſs envied, as it ſeemed the more merited. As a ſoldier, he ever was a man of nice honour, punctual, vigilant, indefatigable: Before he was advanced to the degree of a general, he had a courage of the moſt keen temper, not without ſome appetite of danger; and in the moſt perilous encounters he had about him an extraordinary chearfulneſs. When raiſed to the command of an army, he expoſed his perſon, as far as neceſſity required, with the ſame unconcernment as he did before: And in a day of battle, gave his orders with all the clearneſs and compoſedneſs imaginable; leading on his troops without the leaſt hurry or perturbation, and rallying thoſe that where diſordered without ſharp or ſower reproofs, which rather damp than animate the ſoldier's courage. He was an excellent diſcerner and purſuer of advantage upon his enemy; but preſerved humanity even amidſt the horrors of the field, endeavouring to reſtrain the ſlaughter which uſually attends victory, in which he took no greater delight, than to ſpare the lives of the conquered. He was a ſtrict obſerver of his word and promiſe; and he gained the affections of the ſoldiers by his good-nature, and of the officers by his affability. As a ſtateſman, he managed variety of buſineſs, either ſingle, or in concert with the prime miniſter, with great dexterity, eaſe, and ſufficiency. In council he never was ſupercilious or aſſuming, but could bear contradiction without paſſion, and by cool argumentation bring others over to his own opinion. No man had ever fewer idle words; and, though he was not maſter of oratory, yet in debates of importance he always expreſſed himſelf very pertinently; and, by his temper and reſervedneſs in diſcourſe, he ſtill maintained his reputation of a wiſe man. He had a particular talent of inſinuating himſelf, and gaining upon the minds of thoſe he dealt with; ſo that no general ever commanded troops of different nations with more eaſe, nor was any politician more ſucceſsful in the moſt weighty and arduous negotiations; which will appear the more ſurprizing, becauſe liberality was not the brighteſt virtue that entered the compoſition of this excellent character. To ſum it up, king William ſaid of this great man, that he had the cooleſt head and the warmeſt heart he ever knew; which, from ſo good a judge, might ſeem the greateſt elogy: Were it not, that, in another reſpect, what was moſt true of the earl of Marlborough, could not be ſaid of any other general, either ancient or modern, 'That he never ſate before a town, which he did not take; nor ever fought a battle, which he did not win.'

The

" I rely entirely upon your affections for the ſupplying it in ſuch a manner, as ſhall be moſt ſuitable for the honour and dignity of the crown.

My lords and gentlemen,

" It ſhall be my conſtant endeavour to make you the beſt return for that duty and affection you have expreſſed to me, by a careful and diligent adminiſtration for the good of all my ſubjects. And, as I know ' my own heart to be entirely Engliſh,' I can very ſincerely aſſure you, there is not any thing you can expect or deſire from me, which I ſhall not be ready to do, for the happineſs and proſperity of England; and you ſhall always find ' me a ſtrict and religious obſerver of my word."

There were two paſſages in this ſpeech, which were thought not ſo well conſidered; particularly that expreſſion, that ' her heart was entirely Engliſh,' which was looked on as a reflection on the late king, and occaſioned much diſcourſe, and not a little diſcontent. The other paſſage was, that they ' ſhould always find her a ſtrict and religious obſerver of her word,' there having been an expreſſion of the ſame kind in her father's firſt ſpeech, how little ſoever it was afterwards remembered by him.

The commons, the next day, returned their thanks for the queen's ſpeech, by ſuch members of their houſe, as were of the privy-council; and, the day following, the lords attended her with an addreſs, importing, " That they could not ſufficiently expreſs the great ſatisfaction they received from her moſt gracious ſpeech, truſting to God it would have the ſame effect at home as abroad, equally reviving the hearts of her allies and ſubjects; uniting all people, and encouraging their utmoſt endeavours in the common cauſe. That the ſincere concern her majeſty had ſhewed for our religion, the government in church and ſtate, and the ſucceſſion to the crown in the proteſtant line; the hazards ſhe had expoſed herſelf to, in concert with his late glorious majeſty, for maintaining our laws and liberties, as well as her moſt gracious aſſurances at this time, gave her ſubjects ſuch a confidence in her promiſes, ſuch a dutiful affection to her perſon, ſuch a zeal for her ſervice, as would oblige them to make the utmoſt efforts to ſupport her majeſty under the weight and difficulties of the preſent conjuncture. The concern, ' added their lordſhips,' your majeſty expreſſes for your allies, is a farther obligation laid upon us, who are ſenſible their preſervation is neceſſary to our own, and who are as deſirous as ever to ſupport the character of the crown of England, in inabling your majeſty to maintain the balance of Europe. We cannot make ſuitable returns to your majeſty for your moſt gracious promiſes of a careful and diligent adminiſtration for the public good, which we think ourſelves ſufficiently ſecured of by ſo ſolemn an engagement under your ſacred word. Your majeſty hath been pleaſed to aſſure us of all we could wiſh, and recommend to us what we ought to deſire. And we doubt not your pious intentions will procure a bleſſing from heaven. And your majeſty may be aſſured, that reſolutions, ſo becoming a queen of England, cannot but make the deepeſt impreſſion upon all hearts, that are true to the intereſt of their country." To this the queen was pleaſed to anſwer, " That it was a great ſatisfaction to her to find, that what ſhe had ſaid had their lordſhips concurrence and approbation; and ſhe was willing to repeat to them, that ſhe ſhould always hold very exactly to the aſſurances ſhe had given them."

The addreſs of condolence and congratulation of the biſhops and clergy of London having the ſame day been preſented to the queen by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the biſhop of London being indiſpoſed, her majeſty made anſwer, " That ſhe was very well pleaſed with the marks of their good-will, and they might be ſure ſhe ſhould always have a particular care of the church." The diſſenters in and about London preſented alſo an addreſs, which was the more remarkable, becauſe all the non-conformiſts (except the quakers) joined in it. The queen, in her anſwer, " aſſured them of her protection, and that ſhe ſhould do nothing to forfeit her intereſt in their affections." Which words were afterwards remembered, when the royal aſſent was given to the Schiſm and Occaſional bills. The city of London, and all the counties, cities, and even the ſubaltern bodies of cities, came up with addreſſes. In theſe, a very great diverſity of ſtile was obſerved; ſome mentioned the late king in terms full of reſpect and gratitude; others named him very coldly; ſome took no notice of him, nor of his death, and ſimply congratulated her acceſſion to the crown; and ſome inſinuated reflections on his memory, as if the queen had been ill uſed by him. Her majeſty received all civilly; to moſt ſhe ſaid nothing, to others ſhe expreſſed herſelf in general words, and ſome things were given out in her name, which ſhe diſowned.

The conſternation at the Hague for king William's death was exceeding great. Upon the firſt news of it, the States-general and thoſe of Holland aſſembled immediately: They looked upon one another as men amazed: They embraced each other, and promiſed to hold together, and adhere to the intereſts of their country: They ſate up moſt part of the night, and ſent out all orders that were neceſſary, upon ſo extraordinary an emergency, and diſpatched letters to the provinces and to the cities of Holland, to acquaint them with the news, and to exhort to union, and a perſeverance in the alliances and concerted deſigns. The Imperial, Pruſſian, and Daniſh miniſters ſent alſo expreſſes to their reſpective court on this occaſion, and went all to the Engliſh envoy's. Count Goez encouraged them, by aſſuring them, this accident would not cauſe the leaſt alteration in the reſolutions of the emperor, and that he had juſt received the important news from Vienna, that the king of the Romans would in perſon make the campaign on the Rhine. As the expreſs from England had brought the queen's ſpeech to her privy-council, it was agreed by theſe miniſters, that it ſhould be tranſlated into French and Dutch, in order to revive the drooping ſpirits of the people, which had a very good effect. The next day, the States-general met early in the morning, and again in the evening. The States of Holland being likewiſe aſſembled, penſionary Fagel made them a moving, but withal an encouraging ſpeech. He imparted to them a letter he had received from the earl of Marlborough in the queen's name, with very expreſs aſſurances of union, aſſiſtance, and vigour. Upon this, the States of Holland went in a body to the aſſembly of the States-General, where, having condoled their irreparable loſs, they repreſented, " That, in this dangerous conjuncture, nothing could prove more effectual for their preſervation, than a perfect unity, mutual confidence, and a vigorous reſolution for the defence of their country, and by adhering firmly to thoſe meaſures already entered into, and ſuch as ſhould be judged farther expedient for the good of the common cauſe; declaring withal, that they were ready to perform their part, and rather to ſacrifice all their blood and treaſure, than to ſee their ſtate, their liberty, and their religion deſtroyed." This repreſentation was highly applauded by the States General, who returned thanks to the States of Holland for their zealous reſolutions in that perilous conjuncture: and aſſured them of their hearty concurrence for the ſafety and welfare of the State, and ſtrenuouſly carrying on the common cauſe; and they ordered letters to be ſent to the other provinces, to invite them to give them the ſame aſſurances. The city of Amſterdam, to ſignalize themſelves more particularly on that occaſion, ſignified to the States-General, that they would not only conſent to ſuch reſolutions as ſhould be thought neceſſary at that time, but would advance money to thoſe provinces, which could not ſo readily furniſh out their quota's that ſhould be granted. The States-General, ſoon after, publiſhed their reſolutions at large in print, to the ſame effect, and concluded, ' That they were reſolved religiouſly to maintain their treaties and alliances, entered into with their confederates; ſtedfaſtly to purſue the contents thereof; vigorouſly and cordially to put them in execution; to perſevere in the meaſures already taken, and agree to ſuch other meaſures as ſhould be thought convenient; and that notice ſhould be given of this their true meaning and intention to all their allies and confederates.'

For a farther encouragement to the States, the next poſt brought a letter in French from queen Anne, which ſhe had writ purſuant to her declaration in council, and the lords deſire in their firſt addreſs. The letter was ſent to Mr. Stanhope with new credentials as envoy extraordinary from England, both which, as he was then ill of the gout, he immediately delivered by the hands of his ſecretary to the preſident of the week [1].

Theſe aſſurances from the queen, and the good diſpoſition

[1] The queen's letter was as follows.

High and Mighty Lords, our dear Friends, Allies, and Confederates,

" It is not without a ſenſible grief, that we find ourſelves obliged to acquaint you with the afflicting news of the death of the moſt high and moſt mighty prince, William III. king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, our moſt dear brother of glorious memory. He was ſeized on Wedneſday laſt with a fever, which ſo much encreaſed the following days, that, notwithſtanding all the remedies that were made uſe of, he expired at eight of the clock on Sunday morning. This is certainly a very great loſs to all Europe, and in particular to your State, whoſe intereſt he always maintained with of both houſes of parliament expreſſed in their addreſſes (which were alſo come over) were a great comfort to the States in the loſs of their ſtadtholder; but what revived them moſt, was the arrival of the earl of Marlborough, with the character of embaſſador extraordinary and plenipotentiary. The queen, five days after her acceſſion, had made him and the duke of Bedford knights of the garter; and the next day, having declared the earl captain-general of her forces both at home and abroad, ſhe ſent him into Holland, to give the States full aſſurances of her maintaining the alliances that had been concluded by the late king, and of doing every thing that the common concerns of Europe required. This the embaſſador delivered, in a ſpeech to the States, which was printed and diſperſed for the ſatisfaction of the people[k]. Dyckvelt, the preſident of the week, anſwered this ſpeech in the name of the States, 'Expreſſing their great affliction for the death of the late king; their congratulation of her majeſty's acceſſion to the throne; their hearty thanks for the aſſurance of her friendſhip, and their own reſolution readily to concur with her majeſty in a vigorous proſecution of the common intereſt.' To which he added 'That his excellency's perſon would be highly acceptable to them, not only for the queen's choice of him, and for the ſake of king William, who firſt inveſted him with that character, but for his own merit.' It was obſerved, that, when the preſident mentioned the late king, the tears ran down his cheeks.

The news of king William's death was received in France with ſuch joy, that the court and people could hardly contain themſelves, without breaking out into the moſt furious tranſports; as was done at Rome to ſuch a degree of extravagance, that cardinal Grimani, the imperial miniſter, complained of it to the pope as an affront to his maſter the emperor, who was the deceaſed king's friend, ally, and confederate. But little notice was taken of it. They were ſo afraid in France that the news would not prove true, that the perſon who brought it firſt to Calais, was ſeized by the governor's order, and kept in priſon till it was confirmed. However, the French king finding that the death of king William would not have that effect, either in England or Holland, as he had promiſed himſelf, immediately ſent inſtructions to the ſieur de Barré (who was left at the Hague by count d'Avaux as ſecretary to the embaſſy) to renew negociations with the States, in hopes of ſeparating them from their allies. To give the more weight to what he ſhould propoſe, credentials were ſent to Barré, to take upon him the character of reſident. Theſe credentials were produced by Barré, the day before the earl of Marlborough had his public audience; and it was ſoon perceived, that this new character was given him for the ſake of a memorial, which was preſented at the ſame time. This memorial highly reflected, as well on the late king, as on the paſt conduct of the Dutch, inſinuating, that, as now they would recover their liberty, and be no longer under reſtraint, they would conſult their own intereſt, and look upon a good intelligence with France as the firmeſt ſupport of their republic. The reſident himſelf printed his memorial, in a belief, that the States, under their conſternation for the death of their ſtadtholder, would recede from the reſolutions they had before taken, and that the people would be influenced by it. He alſo vainly hoped it would have retarded the earl of Marlborough's audience. The firſt thing the States did, was to communicate the memorial to count de Goez the emperor's envoy. The earl of Marlborough and the penſionary (with whom the earl had daily conferred ever ſince his arrival) perſuaded him to preſent a memorial to the States upon that of reſident Barré, and to publiſh the ſame, which was accordingly done. Among other remarks on Barré, Goez takes notice of 'that reproachful flattery, that their lordſhips were now more maſters of themſelves, than they were fourteen days ago; which is contrary to the opinion, that all men have of their great wiſdom, and is no way conſiſtent with the univerſal grief over all the provinces, for the fatal alterations which the French memorial points at.' The States likewiſe, after examining Barré's memorial, publiſhed an anſwer to it, wherein they expreſſed their reſentment at his inſinuations, and their veneration for the memory of their late friend and ſupporter, in theſe terms: 'That they are very much ſurprized to ſee, that this whole memorial ſeems founded upon this: That they are now more at liberty to take ſuch reſolutions as they think expedient than formerly. Doubtleſs, this has reference to the death of his majeſty the late king of Great Britain, of immortal memory. But herein the ſaid ſieur reſident has extremely deceived himſelf, for want of underſtanding the conſtitution of their government. That he ought to know, that their high and mighty lordſhips have heretofore had as much liberty as at preſent, to debate and to take all ſuch reſolutions as they judged neceſſary and uſeful for the good and preſervation of their State. It is true, they cannot enough deplore their misfortune, to ſee themſelves deprived of the direction and conduct of a prince, whoſe wiſdom, moderation, and valour will be famed as long as the world endures. A prince, whoſe heroic actions, and whoſe merits from this republic, will never be forgot: and, in a word, whoſe death is lamented in this country by all perſons whatſoever, from the meaneſt to the higheſt. That the councils of his ſaid majeſty have never had any other aim both in deed and in word, than the preſervation of their liberty and religion, and their high and mighty lordſhips being entirely convinced of this truth, as having found the benefit thereof; they are reſolved to follow the ſame principles, and not to depart from the alliances contracted during the life of his ſaid majeſty; but to perſiſt in the meaſures taken purſuant to thoſe alliances; and, in ſhort, to make uſe at all times of the means God hath put into their hands for maintaining the liberty of Europe.'

[1702.] The earl of Marlborough's ſtay in Holland, though it was but a few days, was to very good purpoſe. He had confirmed the Dutch in their former reſolutions, and ſettled ſeveral important affairs with the States, particularly for the opening the campaign, for the ſiege of Keyſerſwert, (which by his advice was firſt to be undertaken) and the attack of Cadiz. He had agreed with the States and the imperial miniſter, that war ſhould be proclamed againſt France the ſame day † at Vienna, with ſo much valour, prudence, zeal, and conduct. And as it has pleaſed God, that we ſhould ſucceed him in the throne of theſe kingdoms, we ſhall alſo ſucceed him in the ſame inclination to preſerve a conſtant union and amity with you, and maintain all the alliances that have been made with your State, by our ſaid dear brother, and other our predeceſſors; and likewiſe to concur with you in all the meaſures that ſhall be neceſſary for the preſervation of the common liberty of Europe, and for reducing the power of France within due bounds. This we deſire you to be fully aſſured of, and that we ſhall always look upon the intereſts of England, and thoſe of your State, to be inſeparable, and united by ſuch ties as cannot be broke, without the greateſt prejudice to both nations. We pray God to keep you, high and mighty lords, in his holy protection.'

Given at our court at St. James's, March 10, 1702, in the firſt year of our reign.

[k] The ſpeech tranſlated from the French was as follows:

High and Mighty Lords,

"It having pleaſed the Divine Providence to take to himſelf his majeſty king William of glorious memory, to the great loſs of his kingdoms, the State of your high and mighty lordſhips, and of all Europe; the queen, my miſtreſs, who by the ſame Divine Providence ſucceeds to the throne of her anceſtors, as your lordſhips have been informed by her majeſty's letter, hath commanded me to declare to your lordſhips, that it is her ſincere deſire and inclination to preſerve with you the ſame union, friendſhip, and ſtrict correſpondence, as hath ſubſiſted during the courſe of the preceding reign, as being perſuaded, that nothing in this world can be more conducive to the ſafety and welfare of both nations, whoſe intereſts are the ſame. Her majeſty hath alſo ordered me to acquaint your high and mighty lordſhips, that ſhe is reſolved to contribute all that lies in her power towards the promoting and increaſing this union, friendſhip, and correſpondence, and to make that a conſtant maxim of her government.

'Her majeſty hath further commanded me to aſſure your high and mighty lordſhips, that ſhe will not only exactly and faithfully obſerve and execute the treaties and alliances made between the kings her predeceſſors and your high and mighty lordſhips, but that ſhe is likewiſe ready to renew and confirm them; as alſo to concur with you in all meaſures, which have been taken by the late king of glorious memory, in purſuance of theſe alliances.

"Her majeſty is likewiſe diſpoſed to enter into ſuch other ſtricter alliances and engagements, which ſhall moſt conduce to the intereſts of both nations, to the preſervation of the liberty of Europe, and to the reducing within juſt bounds the exorbitant power of France.

"In the mean time, her majeſty is ready from this moment, and without delay, to concur with your high and mighty lordſhips, and the other allies, to this end, with all her forces, as well by ſea as land.

"And her majeſty, to ſhew her zeal the more, has been pleaſed to authorize me to concert with your high and mighty lordſhips the neceſſary operations.

"Theſe motives obliged her majeſty to order me to depart with all ſpeed, to come and give your high and mighty lordſhips all poſſible aſſurances, without having any regard to the uſual formalities.

"And I deem it a very great happineſs, that her majeſty has done me the honour to employ me in this commiſſion, ſince it gives me the opportunity of expreſſing to your high and mighty lordſhips the zeal I have for your ſervice." Lamberti, Vol. I. 88.

† [May 15, N. S.] It muſt be obſerved, that, from the year 1700, the difference between old and new ſtile is eleven days; ſo May 15th N. S. was May 4th O. S. which was the day the war was to be proclaimed in the three places here mentioned. Of all the inſtances of an obſtinate attachment to antient errors, our adherence to Old Stile is one of the moſt remarkable. For, though this computation is known not only to be erroneous, but to become more ſo conſtantly every day, yet we ſtill perſiſt in the error, and call 'the eleventh' day of the month 'the firſt.' This every one knows was occaſioned by making the ſolar year to conſiſt of three hundred and ſixty-five days and ſix hours, which is about eleven minutes too much. Theſe eleven minutes in every hundred and thirty-two years grow to be a day, and conſequently, from the time of the council of Nice, in the year 325, are now become eleven days and a half. The fathers of that council, finding the vernal equinox to be then on the 21ſt of March, imagined it would always be ſo; though, for the reaſon above, it now falls on the 10th of that month. So likewiſe they ſuppoſed, that, after a revolution of nineteen years, the new and full moons would return exactly

London, and the Hague. During his ſtay, the States had entered into ſuch a confidence with the earl of Marlborough, that he departed as well ſatisfied with them, as they were with him. He embarked on the 3d of April, and on the 8th arrived in England.

Mean while, the houſe of commons were purſuing the affairs recommended to their conſideration from the throne. The queen, in her firſt ſpeech, had put them in mind of the expiration of the civil liſt revenue. Accordingly, a bill paſſed both houſes, to continue to her for life the ſame revenue that was payable to the king, though many ſeemed to apprehend, that ſo great a revenue might be applied to uſes, not ſo profitable to the public, in a reign that was to be frugal, and probably would not be ſubject to great accidents. When the queen, on the 30th of March, came to the houſe of peers, to give the royal aſſent to this bill, ſhe made a ſpeech to both houſes "Returning thanks to the commons, in particular, for continuing to her the ſame revenue they had granted to the late king; 'and aſſuring them,' That while her ſubjects remained under the burden of ſuch great taxes, ſhe would ſtreighten herſelf in her own expences, rather than not contribute all ſhe could to their eaſe and relief, with a juſt regard to the ſupport of the honour and dignity of the crown: 'And that, though the revenue might fall very ſhort of what it had formerly produced, ſhe would give directions, that one hundred thouſand pounds be applied to the public ſervice in this year, out of the revenue they had ſo unanimouſly given her."

This politic generoſity was received with great applauſe, and particular notice was taken of it in all the addreſſes that came up afterwards.

At the ſame time, the queen paſſed a bill for receiving and examining the public accounts; and in her ſpeech, ſhe expreſſed a particular approbation of that bill: A commiſſion to the ſame effect had been kept up, for ſix or ſeven years, during the former reign, but it had been let fall for ſome years; ſince the commiſſioners had never been able to make any diſcovery whatſoever, and ſo had put the public to a conſiderable charge, without reaping any ſort of fruit from it. Whether this flowed from the weakneſs or corruption of the commiſſioners, or from the integrity or cunning of thoſe, who dealt in the public money, cannot be determined. The party, that had oppoſed the late king, had made this the chief ſubject of their complaints all the nation over, that the public was robbed, and that private men lived high, and yet raiſed large eſtates out of the public treaſure: This had a great effect over England; for all people naturally hearken to complaints of this kind, and very eaſily believe them: It was alſo ſaid, to excuſe the fruitleſneſs of the former commiſſions, that no diſcoveries could be made, under a miniſtry, that would ſurely favour their under-workmen, though they were known to be guilty. One viſible cauſe of men's raiſing great eſtates, who were concerned in the adminiſtration, was this, that for ſome years the parliament laid the taxes upon very remote funds; ſo that, beſides the diſtance of the term of payment, for which intereſt was allowed, the danger the government itſelf ſeemed to be often in (upon the continuance of which, the continuance and aſſignment of theſe funds was grounded) made that ſome tallies were ſold at a great diſcount, even of the one half, to thoſe who would employ their money that way, by which great advantages were made. The gain, that was made, by robbing the coin, in which many goldſmiths were believed to be deeply concerned, contributed not a little to the raiſing thoſe vaſt eſtates, to which ſome had grown, as ſuddenly as unaccountably. All theſe complaints were eaſily raiſed, and long kept up, on deſign to caſt the heavier load on the former miniſtry: This made that miniſtry, who were ſenſible of the miſchief the clamour did them, and of their own innocence, promote the bill with much zeal, and put the ſtrongeſt clauſes in it, that could be contrived to make it effectual. The commiſſioners named in the bill were the hotteſt men in the houſe, who had raiſed as well as kept up the clamour with the greateſt earneſtneſs. One clauſe put in the act was not very acceptable to the commiſſioners; for they were rendered incapable of all employments, during the commiſſion: The act carried a retroſpect quite back to the revolution: It was given out, that great diſcoveries would be made by them, and the art and induſtry, with which this was ſpead over England, had a great effect in the elections to the ſucceeding parliament.

On the 24th of March, the ſpeaker and members preſent took the abjuration-oath, directed in the act made this ſeſſion, 'for the further ſecurity of her majeſty's perſon, and the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, and for extinguiſhing the hopes of the pretended prince of Wales,' according to the alterations lately agreed to by the houſe. Before the king's death, it had been generally thought, that ſome in both houſes, and many more over the nation, would refuſe that oath, ſince they had oppoſed it ſo vehemently; and ſome indeed went out of town when the day came, in which the houſes reſolved to try all their members. But they ſoon came to other reſolutions, and with them almoſt the whole party came and took the oath, and profeſſed great zeal for the queen, and an entire ſatisfaction in her title. Some ſuſpected this was treachery, on deſign to get the government into their hands, that ſo they might deliver it up, or at leaſt that they might carry a parliament ſo to their mind, that the act might be repealed; and they might think, that then the oath would fall with it. Diſtinctions were ſet about among them, which heightened theſe ſuſpicions; for, though in the oath they declared, that the pretended prince of Wales had not any right whatſoever to the crown, yet in a paper, which biſhop Burnet ſaw, and which was handed about amongſt them, it was ſaid that 'right' was a term of law, which had only relation to 'legal rights,' but not to a 'divine right,' or to 'birthright;' ſo ſince that right was condemned by law, they, by abjuring it, did not renounce the 'divine right,' that he had by his birth. They alſo ſuppoſed, that this abjuration could only bind, during the preſent ſtate of things, but not in caſe of another revolution, or of a conqueſt. But this was too dark an affair to be inquired after, or ſeen into, in the ſituation, in which matters then were.

The queen being ſettled in the throne, began to think of forming her miniſtry, wherein ſhe plainly diſcovered her partiality to the tories, in favour of whom ſhe had been all along prepoſſeſſed, as thinking them better affected to the church than the whigs. In vain did the counteſs of Marlborough, who was appointed groom of the ſtole, and keeper of the privy purſe[1], uſe her endeavours to moderate her zeal for the tories, and engage her to a better opinion of the oppoſite party. Her influence over the queen, how great ſoever in other reſpects, was in this caſe but of little effect; and the lords Marlborough and Godolphin themſelves would not have had ſo great a ſhare of her favour and confidence, if they had not been reckoned in the number of tories. The truth is, both theſe lords had been educated in the perſuaſion, that the tory party were the beſt friends to the conſtitution both of church and ſtate; nor were they perfectly undeceived, but by experience.

Dr. John Sharp, archbiſhop of York, was pitched upon by the queen herſelf to preach the ſermon at her coronation (which was performed on St. George's day, April 23, with the uſual magnificence,) and to be her chief counſellor in church-matters. The late king had ſent a meſſage to the earl of Rocheſter, ſome weeks before his death, to let him know, that he had put an end to his commiſſion of lord lieutenant of Ireland; but that was not executed in form; ſo the commiſſion ſtill ſubſiſted in his perſon, and he was now declared lord lieutenant of Ireland. The lord Godolphin was, on the 6th of May, declared lord high-treaſurer. This was very uneaſy to himſelf, for he reſiſted the motion long; but the earl of Marlborough, whoſe eldeſt daughter was married to that lord's eldeſt ſon, preſſed it in ſo poſitive a manner, that he ſaid he could not go beyond ſea to command the armies, unleſs the treaſury was put into his hands, for then he was ſure, that remittances would be punctually made to him. The earl was declared captain-general; and the prince of Denmark, on the 17th of April, had the title of generaliſſimo of all the queen's forces by ſea and land; and it was to the ſame point of time; but this they do not by about an hour and a half, which has alſo occaſioned an error of about four days and a half between the 'natural and eccleſiaſtical moons.' For the Nicene council ſettled 'the moveable Feaſts,' by fixing Eaſter-Day (on which the reſt depend) on the Sunday after the firſt full moon that ſhall happen next after the 21ſt of March; and, for finding that full moon, framed a rule, which, depending on the truth of the nineteen years cycle, makes the eccleſiaſtical moons now to over-run, about four days and a half, the natural ones, as ſet down in the almanacks. Thus, in civil affairs, the ſtate ſuffers the error of eleven days in reckoning the day of the month, whilſt the church perſiſts in fixing her 'moveable Feaſts,' by an imaginary, inſtead of a 'a real full moon,' contrary to the intention of the Nicene council, who framed the rule on ſuppoſition that the natural and eccleſiaſtical moons would always happen together, as they did in their time, and would always have done, had it not been for the error of an hour and a half every nineteen years, which the fathers did not foreſee. Hence all aſſemblies, civil or eccleſiaſtical, ſhould learn not to eſtabliſh, for future generations, any rule of practice, or article of belief, without this or the like proviſo; namely, "Provided, that, if the ſaid rule or ſaid article ſhall hereafter prove erroneous or repugnant to the truth and reaſon of things, then the ſaid rule or article ſhall be, 'ipſo facto,' void, any ſtatute, decree, or canon, to the contrary, notwithſtanding."

[1] The ladies of the bed-chamber were, the ducheſſes of Ormond and Queenſbury; the counteſſes of Scarborough, Burlington and Abington; the marchioneſs of Huntingdon; the ladies Hyde, Spencer, Fretcheville, Charlotte Beverwert, and Harriot Godolphin; and the ducheſs of Hamilton.

It

for ſome time given out, that he intended to go beyond ſea, to command the armies of the alliance; but this report ſoon fell, it being ſaid, that the Dutch were not willing to truſt their armies to the command of a prince, who might think it below him to be limited by their inſtructions, or to be bound to obey their orders. The late king had diſſolved the commiſſion for executing the office of lord high-admiral, and had committed that great truſt to the earl of Pembroke. The ſecrets of that board had been ſo ill kept, and there was ſuch a faction in it, that the king reſolved to veſt it in a ſingle perſon. The earl of Pembroke was not eaſily brought to ſubmit to it; he ſaw it would draw a heavy load upon him, and, was ſenſible, that, by his ignorance of the ſea affairs, he might fall into errors. To avoid which, he made uſe of good officers to aſſiſt him, and, reſolving to command the fleet in perſon, took great pains to put things in ſuch order, that it might be ſoon ready. A land-army was deſigned to go with the fleet, to the command of which the duke of Ormond had been named. But, upon new meaſures, the earl of Pembroke was firſt ordered not to go to ſea in perſon, and ſoon after diſmiſſed from his poſt, with the offer of a great penſion, which he generouſly refuſed, though the ſtate of his affairs and family ſeemed to require it. Prince George, on the 21ſt of May, was made lord high-admiral, and appointed ſir George Rooke, ſir David Mitchel, George Churchill, admiral of the blue ſquadron, and Richard Hill, eſq. to be his council; though the legality of ſuch a council was much queſtioned, as it was a new court, which could not be authorized to act but by an act of parliament; yet, out of reſpect to the queen, no public queſtion was made of it, and the objection to it never went beyond a ſecret murmur. On the 14th of April, the duke of Devonſhire was appointed lord ſteward, the earl of Jerſey lord chamberlain, the earl of Bradford treaſurer, and Peregrine Bertie vice-chamberlain, and ſir Edward Seymour comptroller of the houſhold, who, three days after, was likewiſe ſworn of the privy-council; and the earl of Abingdon, viſcount Weymouth, lord Dartmouth, Muſgrave, Grenvil, How, Gower, Harcourt, with ſeveral others who had, during the laſt reign, expreſſed the moſt violent and unrelenting averſion to the whole adminiſtration, were now brought to the council-board, whilſt the names of the lord Sommers and Halifax, and of ſeveral others firmly attached to the revolution-principles, were left out of the liſt. The privy ſeal, to the admiration of all men, was given to the marquis of Normanby[m], and to ſir John Leviſon Gower the chancellorſhip of the duchy of Lancaſter. On the 2d of May, the earl of Nottingham and ſir Charles Hedges were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate, in the room of the earl of Mancheſter and Mr. Vernon, the latter of whom was however made one of the tellers of the Exchequer. The tories would truſt none but the earl of Nottingham, and he would ſerve with none but ſir Charles Hedges; and the maxim laid down at court was, to put the direction of affairs in the hands of that party, who promiſed to carry on the war, and to maintain the alliances. If they failed in this, it was ſaid, the queen would put her affairs into other hands, which at that time few could believe[n].

The queen continued all the judges in their poſts, except Mr. juſtice Turton and Mr. baron Hatſell; and moſt of the lord-lieutenants of counties; nor did ſhe make any change in the foreign miniſters. It was generally believed, that the earl of Rocheſter and his party were for ſevere methods, and for a more entire change quite through all ſubaltern employments; but the lords Godolphin and the earl of Marlborough were for more moderate proceedings; ſo that, though no whigs were put into any poſts, yet many were kept in thoſe, which they had enjoyed during the former reign.

But, though the principal preferments were thus given to perſons of the ſame party, there ſoon appeared a diviſion among them, occaſioned by a rivalſhip between the earls of Rocheſter and Marlborough, in which notwithanding the near relation of the former to her majeſty, the latter ſoon gained the aſcendant. It having been moved in council, on the 2d of May, to declare war againſt France and Spain, the earl of Rocheſter and ſome other members repreſented the inconveniences, that might attend ſuch a ſtep, urging, that it was ſafer for the Engliſh to act only as auxiliaries. But the earl of Marlborough maintained, on the contrary, that it not only became the honour of the crown and nation to make good the late king's engagements, but that France could never be reduced within due bounds, unleſs the Engliſh entered as principals in the quarrel. This opinion being ſupported by the dukes of Somerſet and Devonſhire, the earl of Pembroke, and ſome others, the majority of the council declared for it, and the queen ordered a declaration of war to be drawn up. However, the queen being willing to have the advice of her commons upon this important affair, ſir Edward Seymour, by her command, laid before them, the ſame day, a convention between her majeſty, the emperor, and the States-General, about declaring war againſt France and Spain; after the reading of which, the commons unanimouſly reſolved to addreſs the queen, "To return her thanks for her communicating to them her intentions of declaring war, in conjunction with her allies, againſt the French king and his grandſon; and to aſſure her, that they would, to the utmoſt, aſſiſt and ſupport her in carrying it on."

Upon this occaſion a motion was made for an addreſs, "That no perſon be an officer in England or Ireland in her majeſty's new raiſed forces, but ſuch as were born in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the dominions thereto belonging, or of Engliſh parents, unleſs they were before in half-pay." This motion tending to exclude the French proteſtant officers (though naturalized) who had ſerved in the late war, colonel Mordaunt ſtrenuouſly oppoſed it, urging, "That he had ſome French officers in his regiment, upon whoſe fidelity and courage he entirely depended, and who kept their companies in as good order, and as compleat as any native." The marquis of Huntington ſpoke likewiſe in behalf of the French refugees, urging, "What a reflection it would be on the Engliſh nation, to abandon people, who, upon ſo many occaſions, had ventured their lives for its ſafety and defence." Another member deſired thoſe, who had made the motion, to explain themſelves; 'for ſaid he, if thereby we mean to exclude all foreigners, what will become, not only of duke Schomberg, on whoſe father this houſe has thought fit to beſtow a gratuity of one hundred thouſand pounds, for his eminent ſervices in the revolution, but alſo of his royal highneſs prince George of Denmark, whom the queen hath lately declared generaliſſimo? So that, the queſtion being put upon the motion, it was carried in the negative.

Two days after, May the 4th, the declaration of war againſt France and Spain was ſolemnly proclaimed[o] before the gate of St. James's palace, and other uſual places, as it was the ſame day by the emperor and the States-General[p].

[m] It is ſaid, that the marquis (when earl of Mulgrave) made his addreſſes to the queen (then princeſs Anne) ſome years before her marriage with the prince of Denmark; and, though his addreſſes were checked as ſoon as diſcovered, yet ſhe always retained a great regard for him.

[n] The earl of Marlborough himſelf acquainted biſhop Burnet with this circumſtance.

[o] The declaration was in theſe terms:

Anne R.

"Whereas it hath pleaſed Almighty God to call us to the government of theſe realms, at a time, when our late dear brother William III, of glorious memory, had, in purſuance of the repeated advices of the parliament of this kingdom, entered into ſolemn treaties of alliance with the emperor of Germany, the States-General of the United Provinces, and other princes and potentates, for preſerving the liberty and balance of Europe, and for reducing the exorbitant power of France; which treaties are grounded upon the unjuſt uſurpations and encroachments of the Fench king, who had taken, and ſtill keeps poſſeſſion of a great part of the Spaniſh dominions, exerciſing an abſolute authority over all that monarchy, having ſeized Milan and the Spaniſh Low-Countries by his armies, and made himſelf maſter of Cadiz, of the entrance into the Mediterranean, and of the ports in the Spaniſh Weſt-Indies by his fleets; every where deſigning to invade the liberties of Europe, and obſtruct the freedom of navigation and commerce. And it being provided by the third and fourth articles of the forementioned alliance, that if, in the ſpace of two months (which are ſome time ſince expired) the injuries complained of were not remedied, the parties concerned ſhould mutually aſſiſt each other with their whole ſtrength: And whereas, inſtead of giving the ſatisfaction that ought juſtly to be expected, the French king has not only proceeded to farther violence, but has added thereunto a great affront and indignity to us and our kingdoms, in taking upon him to declare the pretended prince of Wales king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and has alſo influenced Spain to concur in the ſame affront and indignity, as well as in his other oppreſſions: We find ourſelves obliged, for maintaining the public faith, for vindicating the honour of our crown, and for preventing the miſchiefs which all Europe is threatened with, to declare, and we do hereby accordingly declare war againſt France and Spain; and placing our entire confidence in the help of Almighty God, and ſo juſt and neceſſary an undertaking, we will (in conjunction with our allies) vigorouſly proſecute the ſame by ſea and land, being aſſured of the ready concurrence and aſſiſtance of our ſubjects, in a cauſe they have ſo openly and heartily eſpouſed. And we do hereby will and require our lord high-admiral of England, our general of our forces, our lieutenants of our ſeveral counties, governors of our forts and garriſons, and all other officers and ſoldiers under them by ſea and land, to do and execute all acts of hoſtility in the proſecution of this war againſt France and Spain, their vaſſals, and ſubjects, and to oppoſe their attempts; willing and requiring all our ſubjects to take notice of the ſame, whom we henceforth ſtrictly forbid to hold any correſpondence or communication with France or Spain, or their ſubjects. But, becauſe there are remaining in our kingdoms many of the ſubjects of France and Spain, we do declare our royal intention to be, that all the ſubjects of France and Spain, who ſhall demean themſelves dutifully towards us, ſhall be ſafe in their perſons and eſtates."

Given at our court at St. James's, the fourth day of May, 1702, in the firſt year of our reign.

[p] The emperor's declaration was as follows:

"We Leopold, by the grace of God, elected emperor of the Romans in Germany, ever auguſt king of Hungary, Bohemia, Dalmatia, Croatia, Sclavonia, archduke of Auſtria, duke of Burgundy, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola,

The French court was not a little ſurprized at theſe three declarations of war; and, immediately upon the receiving of them, the marquis de Torcy went into a great hall, where the king was walking, and read them over to him. He did not expreſs ſo much uneaſineſs at the complaint of the emperor, but made a great many reflections upon that of the queen, which ſo particularly reſpected the indignity done to the Engliſh nation, by acknowledging the pretended prince of Wales king of Great Britain. But what moſt exaſperated him, was the declaration of the States-General. For, as ſoon as the marquis de Torcy had done reading it, the king took it, and in a tranſport of anger threw it upon the table, ſaying, niola, and Wirtemberg, earl of Tyrol, &c. do make known, that although ſince the concluſion of a general peace, not many years ago at Ryſwick in Holland, the crown of France hath, as well by refuſing for a long time to reſtore the fortreſs of Briſac, as by the injuries and damages done to the houſe of Monbeliard, together with other violations, made it abundantly evident, that they did not intend to obſerve this ſolemn treaty better than any of the former: However, being in hopes, that we might paſs the remainder of our troubleſome reign in peace, and after having ſuffered ſo many vexations to maintain the holy Roman empire, and our kingdoms, and hereditary dominions in the enjoyment of the preſent peace, and for the future prevent the effuſion of ſo much innocent Chriſtian blood; we have choſen rather patiently to endure their inſults, and to endeavour to find out means of amicably compoſing the differences, than to enter in a freſh quarrel upon that account, and thereupon begin a deſtructive war. But whereas, immediately after the death of Charles the ſecond, king of Spain and duke of Auſtria, under the colour of a will, ſuppoſed to have been made by that prince (which however is really null and of no validity) and notwithſtanding all the marriage-contracts, renunciations, ceſſions, treaties of peace, and former oaths, the king of France has made himſelf maſter of all the kingdoms and countries of his ſaid majeſty, among which there are ſome, that did belong to our archducal houſe, before they came under the power of the crown of Spain, beſides thoſe, that are feudatory and dependent on the empire, and has by intruſion put his grandſon, the duke of Anjou, into the ſame; and moreover taken by force the dukedom of Mantua, and other fiefs of the empire, although they never belonged to the monarchy of Spain, and has alſo cauſed a great number of troops to enter into the dioceſe of Cologne and Liege, hath ſeized and put garriſons into all their towns and ſtrong places, hath added new fortifications to them, and every where erected magazines, and, contrary to our lawful ordinances, and the execution thereof, according to the laws of the empire, committed to the princes of the circles, hath ſupported by force of arms, and ſtrengthened the elector of Cologne in his diſobedience; and on the other ſide hath cauſed the faithful ſubjects of the empire to be impriſoned, and particularly the baron de Mean, dion of Liege, and hath ſeized and carried away ſeveral others from off the lands of the empire, and hath attacked, in an hoſtile manner, and ill-treated the princes of the circles, who, according to their duty, endeavoured to put in execution our lawful imperial mandates. And furthermore his grandſon, the duke of Anjou, hath taken to himſelf the titles, that belong to none but our archducal houſe, and hath cauſed himſelf to be called the duke of Auſtria, count of Habſborough, and of Tyrol. We look upon it as a thing inexcuſable any longer to paſs by in ſilence ſuch hoſtilities, infractions, and violences, committed both againſt our archducal houſe and our high imperial dignity: On the contrary we find ourſelves obliged, in conſequence and by virtue of the laws of nature and of nations, and of the holy Roman empire and particularly in conſequence of the capitulation we ſwore to at the time we were elected emperor, and of our imperial, archducal, and patrimonial dignity, to hinder them with all our force and power (ſince the endeavours of other potentates have had as little ſucceſs with the ſaid crown of France, as the offers we have made of coming to an amicable agreement) and that ſo much the more, inaſmuch as it is a matter unqueſtionable, that the ſaid will, which at preſent ſerves for a colour of the ſaid hoſtilities of France, was contrived by ſome bribed Spaniſh counſellors, according to the directions of the French king; and that it was offered to his late catholic majeſty, when he was ſunk to ſuch a weakneſs of body and mind, as not to be able to read or underſtand, much leſs to weigh and examine, as was neceſſary, the large contents of the ſaid will. And moreover, as it is altogether contrary to the intention of the ſaid late king, which he had ſo often ſignified to us; and as the ſaid will is full of falſities, and of incomprehenſible and contradictory matters; and laſtly, as it gives as little ſatisfaction to our juſt demand, as the king of France could receive from it, not to mention, that as yet it hath not been duly executed by them, but hath already been broken in many points, and more particularly, foraſmuch as it is evident, that the ſaid arbitrary enterprizes, as well by himſelf, as in the name of his grandſon, as the pretended lord of the circle of Burgundy, and conſequently a declared enemy to us and the empire, do tend to the overthrow and deſtruction of the imperial dignity, the authority, and rights, which were intruſted to us by a lawful election.

"Supported therefore by the juſtice of our cauſe, and truſting in the aſſiſtance of Almighty God, we declare and publiſh by theſe preſents, that we hold for our enemies the French king and the duke of Anjou, with their ſubjects and adherents; and that, to prevent the public violence and injury, which are done by them unto us, the empire, and the loyal ſtates of the empire, and to defend our imperial and other rights, we are obliged to take up arms, and to cauſe our troops to march againſt our ſaid enemies. We command by theſe preſents the faithful ſubjects of us and the empire, by the duty wherein they ſtand engaged to us and the empire, and under pain of deprivation of life and goods, and we ſeriouſly injoin them by theſe preſents, that none of them do engage in the ſervice of the ſaid crown of France, of the duke of Anjou, or of his adherents; and that none of them do undertake in the leaſt to do any ſervice, or give them any aſſiſtance, or to maintain with them, directly or indirectly, any commerce, partnerſhip, or correſpondence, but that from this moment they do wholly break off and abſtain from the ſame, and do aſſiſt us with all their power, to purſue and attack our ſaid enemies, and thoſe which belong to them. We have alſo this entire confidence in the electors, princes, and ſtates of the empire, that they will all in general, and every one in his own particular, from this time forward, at ſuch times as we ſhall conſult with them, according to the exigence of affairs, concerning what may be fit to be done in a matter that does not reſpect us alone, but likewiſe relates to the welfare and ſecurity of the other principal members of the empire in particular, and conſequently that of the whole Roman empire, will aid and aſſiſt us in our lawful and juſt undertaking, with their faithful and wiſe advice, and with the ſincere, and unanimous, and firm conjunction of all the force, which God and the empire has given them, to free themſelves and other injured ſtates from oppreſſion: That they will contribute towards removing all thoſe calamities, and that they will not ſuffer themſelves to be drawn away in any wiſe; let every one therefore regulate himſelf, and take care accordingly."

In witneſs whereof we have cauſed theſe preſents to be ſealed with our imperial ſeal. Lamberti, vol. II.

The Manifeſto of the States-General, containing the reaſons of the proclaiming war againſt France and Spain, was in theſe terms.

"The States-General of the United-Netherlands, to all, to whom theſe preſents ſhall come, greeting. Know ye, that the king of France having, for a long time ſince, caſt his eyes upon theſe provinces, to ſeize upon the ſame, if poſſible, or entirely to deſtroy or ruin them, has, in order to compaſs his deſign, twice attacked this republic; viz. in the year 1672 and 1688, by a moſt unjuſt and violent war, though we had done our utmoſt to avoid the ſame, and preſerve the continuation of peace and tranquility. That nothing is more evidently known, than that, if that king had ſucceeded in his deſign, and poſſeſſed himſelf of theſe provinces, he would have hereby made his way to univerſal monarchy. And, if he had but only weakened them, and forced them to ſit ſtill, and ſeparate themſelves from their allies, it is no leſs notorious, that he might have attained his aim, by ſubduing other princes and powers; whereby this republic had been in a manifeſt danger of being reduced, as well as other ſtates, and loſing her liberty and religion, which are the two precious advantages, for which the ſubjects of this ſtate have formerly ſuffered ſo many cruel perſecutions, and which they could never fully and entirely enjoy, till they had frankly and heartily ſacrificed their fortunes and blood, with every thing elſe that was dear to them, and maintained a war of eighty years ſtanding againſt the then powerful kings of Spain.

"That, notwithſtanding, it hath pleaſed God to puniſh theſe provinces by the two laſt wars, becauſe of their ſins, yet he hath not permitted, that the French king ſhould put in execution his ambitious deſigns; but on the contrary, has ſo favoured the arms of the republic and their allies, that they obtained in the year 1678 and 1697, a general peace; whereby France was obliged to reſtore large provinces, lordſhips, and important places to the emperor, the empire, and the king of Spain, which ſhe had poſſeſſed, partly by craft and artifice, under the ſpecious name of re-union, and other pretences, againſt the treaty of Nimeguen.

"That, the treaty of peace of Ryſwick, and that of commerce, being ſo ſolemnly concluded in the year 1697, we had all the reaſon in the world to flatter ourſelves, that the ſame would be 'bonâ fide' executed in all its points. But we have found, on the contrary, by experience, that they did not deſign on the part of France, to obſerve them, but only to induce us and our allies to lay down our arms, diſband our forces, and ſeparate us one from another, in order to weaken us; and, in particular, to enervate and ruin our ſubjects in ruining their commerce, that they might the more eaſily obtain the aim here abovementioned. This is ſo notorious, that the treaties aforeſaid of peace and commerce were hardly ratified, but they began manifeſtly to incroach upon the trade of theſe provinces (which is the ſinew of this ſtate) by their openly refuſing to grant us the Tariff promiſed unto us by the treaty aforeſaid, putting thereby the ſubjects and merchants of this republic to innumerable troubles upon that account: Which obliged us, after a long, tedious, and expenſive negotiation, to accept a Tariff (though diſadvantageous to us) contrary to the tenor of the ſaid treaty, in order to prevent a greater miſchief.

"That, notwithſtanding it was ſtipulated by the fifth article of the ſaid treaty of commerce, that ſuch of our ſubjects, who ſhall ſettle in France for carrying on their trades, ſhall be free and exempted from the duties and tax laid upon foreigners; yet exceſſive duties have been laid upon them, and we have been forced to ſee and bear the ſame.

"That, in the mean while, the king of France omitted nothing to perſuade us, by all imaginable proteſtations, that he had no other deſign than the preſervation of the peace, and the removing of all obſtacles, that might interrupt the ſame. And, whereas the weak conſtitution of the king of Spain could not promiſe a long life, and that his death was like to cauſe great wars and differences, this occaſioned a treaty, whereby on one ſide, it was provided, that the French king ſhould not have that exorbitant power, which otherwiſe he would have had by the acceſſion or union of the Spaniſh monarchy to his crown, and by theſe means prevented the ill conſequences all Europe was afraid of; and, on the other hand, ſatisfaction was given to others, who claimed the ſaid ſucceſſion, in order to preſerve the general peace.

"That, upon this foundation, the king of France having concluded, on the third and twenty-fifth day of March, 1700, a ſolemn treaty with the king of England and this ſtate, we were in hopes to preſerve the general peace. But that treaty was no ſooner concluded and ratified, but it moſt evidently appeared, that it was not the intention of the French king to ſtand by it and obſerve it, but on the contrary, that they uſed all manner of artifices in the court of Spain, not only to render the emperor odious to the Spaniards, but alſo to oblige the king to diſpoſe of his ſucceſſion by a teſtament in favour of France.

"That, the king of Spain having ſome time after departed this life, they produced a teſtament, whereby the duke of Anjou, grandſon to the king of France, was declared heir of all the kingdoms and dominions of the deceaſed king.

"That, the ſaid will being made public, the French king did immediately give proofs of his ſecret intentions of making uſe of all imaginable means to gratify his vaſt ambition: And in order thereunto, (without any reſpect or regard to a treaty ſo ſolemnly and newly concluded, and the repeated proteſtations he had made never to depart from it) he accepted of the ſaid will, breaking and violating the treaty aforeſaid, without giving any previous communication of his intentions to thoſe, with whom he made it; notifying the ſame without any diſguiſe to the republic, and alledging for the principal motive thereof, that the ſpirit and ſenſe of the ſaid treaty, and not the letter, were only to be regarded; and explaining that ſpirit and ſenſe in his own way, as he thought fit, not omitting at the ſame time to threaten us, and repreſenting the dangers and misfortunes, which we might expect, if we did not conform ourſelves to that ſpirit. Which proceeding is a breach of faith as uncommon and unheard of, as ever was, and a dangerous inſtance, which tends for the future to undermine and ruin the faith of all the public treaties.

"That, by virtue of the teſtament aforeſaid, that king did not content himſelf to cauſe the duke of Anjou to be proclaimed king of Spain, but he poſſeſſed himſelf in his name of all the kingdoms and dominions of the Spaniſh monarchy, without any regard to the pretenſions of the emperor, which were ſo fully owned in the treaty aforeſaid, that they were not only laid as the foundation of the ſaid treaty, but alſo ſo far acknowledged for juſt and lawful on all ſides, that the greateſt part of the Spaniſh monarchy was yielded to the archduke of Auſtria.

That

"That meſſieurs the Dutch merchants (meaning the States-General) ſhould one day repent of their boldneſs in declaring war againſt ſo great a monarch." But he did not publiſh his declaration of war till the 3d of July q.

On the 5th of May, the commons reſolved to preſent an addreſs to her majeſty, "returning the thanks of their houſe for her great zeal for the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, expreſſed in her late order in council, directing the princeſs Sophia to be prayed for:" As the right, that recommended that princeſs, was in her own blood, ſhe was deſigned by her Chriſtian name, and not by her title. It came to be known, that this had been oppoſed in council by the marquis of Normanby, but was promoted by the lord Godolphin. The lords returned their thanks to the queen upon the ſame account, as alſo "for laying before them the convention made with the emperor and the States-General, in order to a concurrent declaration of war."

As the queen, in her firſt ſpeech to the parliament, had renewed the motion made by the late king, for the union of England and Scotland, a bill was brought in for that purpoſe. Many of thoſe, who ſeemed now to have the greateſt ſhare of her favour and confidence, oppoſed this bill with much heat, and not without indecent reflections on the Scotch nation; yet it was carried by a great majority, that the queen ſhould be empowered to name commiſſioners for treating of an union. It was ſo viſibly the intereſt of England, and of the preſent government, to ſhut that back-door againſt the practices of France, and the attempts of the pretended prince of Wales, that the oppoſition to this firſt ſtep towards an union, and the indecent ſcorn with which Seymour and others treated the Scots, were clear indications, that the poſts they were brought into had not changed their tempers; but that, inſtead of healing matters, they intended to irritate them farther by reproachful ſpeeches; the bill

"That the ſaid king being unwilling to ſtop there, cauſed his own troops to take poſſeſſion of the Spaniſh Netherlands, notwithſtanding our own were in garriſon therein, by the permiſſion and conſent of the late king of Spain, for the defence and ſecurity of the ſaid country, and with a deal of difficulty was at laſt perſuaded to let our ſaid troops return home, after they were very much weakened. That by theſe means the republic was at once deprived of her rampart and barrier, for which we had already maintained two bloody wars, and which the king of France himſelf had aſſigned in the conditions of the peace concluded in the year 1678, and contrary to what was particularly ſtipulated in the treaty of partition and inſiſted upon on the part of the republic, viz. That the ſaid Spaniſh Netherlands ſhould belong to the archduke of Auſtria.

"That the ſaid king of France immediately began to govern arbitrarily the kingdoms and dominions of Spain, under the name of his grandſon, as well in civil as in military affairs, and has ſo united thoſe ſtates to his own, as if the ſame were but one and the ſame kingdom and government; which can never more evidently appear, than in the caſe of the Spaniſh Netherlands, the barrier of this ſtate, where it appears (as indeed they write it from Spain) that the ſaid provinces have been abſolutely yielded and made over to the king of France; and that he exerciſes an abſolute authority over them, both in civil and military affairs, as likewiſe in matters of finances.

"That the French king having carried his exorbitant power to the degree, which the Chriſtian world had ſo long apprehended, and laid ſuitable foundations for obtaining the univerſal monarchy, he did not delay long to put theſe projects in execution, ſending a formidable army into Italy, to make himſelf entirely maſter thereof, having already ſent a great number of troops into the Spaniſh Netherlands to fright us, and oblige us, if poſſible, to a ſeparate treaty without our allies.

"That theſe artifices, (though never ſo well concerted) falling ſhort of the deſired effect, the French king made uſe of all other imaginable ways to compel us thereunto by force, and to that end ſeized the city and citadel of Liege, without the conſent and knowledge of the emperor and the empire, and cauſed the dean of the ſaid chapter to be by violence ſeized and carried away into the Spaniſh dominions, that he might not oppoſe his deſign, and in order to ſtrike a terror into the ſaid chapter.

"That, not being ſatisfied with having thus ſeized upon Liege, and in order to ſtreighten us more and more, he poſſeſſed himſelf, contrary to the will of the chapter of Cologne, of the moſt conſiderable places of that archbiſhopric, and particularly of the fortreſſes of Bonn, Keyſerſwaert, and Rhimbergen (his deſign upon the city of Cologne having happily miſcarried by their good conduct) to put himſelf in a condition to invade this republic, as he had done in the year 1672. And, that nothing might be wanting to make himſelf ſure of it, and in order to block us up on all ſides, he cauſed a conſiderable number of troops to be raiſed at his own charges in the county of Wolfembuttle, that they might invade on that ſide, ſending, at the ſame time, all ſorts of ammunition and artillery to the Rhine, through foreign countries, the better to invade theſe provinces.

"That the ſaid king, not being ſatisfied with having ſtreightened us in that manner by land, proceeded further; and by poſſeſſing himſelf (in the name of the king of Spain) of all the harbours in Spain, Naples, Sicily, and other iſlands in the Mediterranean, as alſo the Spaniſh Netherlands and the Indies, he made himſelf entire maſter of the commerce of Europe, and obtained the power to exclude us and all other nations from it. And laſtly, that we might have no room or place left to us for trade, he endeavoured to perſuade the king of Portugal to forbid us his harbours, and ſent, at the ſame time, a ſquadron into the Weſt-Indies, on purpoſe to ſeize the ſilver fleet, in which our ſubjects, and thoſe of other princes and potentates are ſo conſiderably concerned.

"That, affairs being in that intricate and dangerous condition, we, as the neareſt and moſt expoſed to the fire, having, in the firſt place, invoked God Almighty to our aſſiſtance, thought it neceſſary to put ourſelves in a poſture of defence, and ſo arm ourſelves, as well as we could, by ſea and land, againſt that exorbitant power, and the dangers we were threatened with; and, at the ſame time, to deſire of our neighbours and allies the ſuccours they had promiſed us by treaties, in caſe we were moleſted and diſturbed: which they having granted us with the ſame readineſs as we deſired, we put ourſelves in that condition, that, refuſing to hearken to any private treaty with France, we had time to confederate ourſelves with his Imperial majeſty, the king of England, the king of Pruſſia, and other princes and potentates, for the common defence of our and their reſpective dominions, the preſervation of the liberty of Europe, and for recovering the general peace and tranquillity.

"That, every one beginning to open their eyes, and to think of their natural defence, the emperor ſent a conſiderable army into Italy, to oppoſe the French king.

"That his Imperial majeſty, having thought fit to diſlodge the French out of the electorate of Cologne, and uſed all imaginable ways for it, did, togeth- with the directors of the circles concerned therein, deſire our aſſiſtance, which we (conformable to our engagements, our own defence, and the ſtrict alliance we were entered into) could not refuſe; but, on the contrary, thought it neceſſary, that our forces there and elſewhere ſhould act as auxiliaries by way of diverſion.

"That theſe proceedings of the French have, to our great ſorrow, kindled a war in ſeveral parts of the world, which is actually begun, and carried on with a great deal of violence.

"That, as we had not given the leaſt pretence thereunto, but, on the contrary, made our utmoſt efforts for the preſervation of the general peace, we were very glad to ſee a miniſter, that the French king had ſent into theſe parts, and neglected nothing to engage him to make ſome propoſals for maintaining the peace. But, ſeeing we could not ſucceed therein, we made ourſelves ſome demands, which we thought neceſſary for recovering a general tranquillity and our private ſecurity; but there has been no manner of anſwer, nor the leaſt offer made thereupon.

"That indeed ſome outward proteſtations of peace have been made on that ſide, but as, at the ſame time, they continued their warlike preparations, to ſeize the lands of their neighbours, and to confederate themſelves with ſeveral princes and potentates; they have clearly manifeſted, that their proteſtations would come to nothing, unleſs we were reſolved to treat ſeparately from our allies; and this they have ſtill more evidently diſcovered, by recalling ſucceſſively two miniſters.

"Finally, the king has upon that foot cauſed his reſident to declare unto us in a memorial, that his armies were in a condition to act againſt us, if we came to no reſolution about the things contained therein.

"And, as there is nothing more evidently known, than that the deſigns of the preſent king of Spain againſt the liberty of our ſtate and commerce are the ſame as thoſe of the king of France; nay, as all the world muſt be convinced by the whole directions and management of affairs, that the king of France and the preſent king of Spain are one and the ſame in effect; and that the king of Spain can do, nor will do nothing, but what the king of France pleaſes, and will have him to do; even that the kingdoms of France and Spain are united into one: it follows from thence, that whatever the king of France has done againſt us and our allies, in the name of the king of Spain, muſt be taken and underſtood to be made by the king of Spain himſelf, or at leaſt by both of them. That by theſe means the king of France (above what has been already ſaid) has made uſe of the Spaniſh troops in the name of the king of Spain to carry on his deſign againſt us. That in that name he has erected a fort within the reach of the cannon of a fortreſs belonging to the States, contrary to the treaty concluded with the king of Spain in the year 1648, and contrary to the laws of nations and thoſe of war.

"That the king of Spain has not only ſuffered thoſe proceedings of the king his grandfather, but abſolutely approved the ſame, and the actual ſeizing the whole monarchy of Spain, and in particular of the Spaniſh Netherlands, that neceſſary barrier for our State.

"That all divine and human laws dictating to us, that, being thus ſtraitned, blocked up on all ſides, and actually attacked by the kings of France and Spain, and threatened by them with ſo many dangers, we may, and are bound to make uſe againſt them of all the means God and nature have put into our hands for our defence, for protecting our ſubjects, and for preſerving their religion and liberty; and to that end to take up arms againſt the ſaid kings of France and Spain, who have together conſpired our ruin and deſtruction, and declare war againſt them, as we do by theſe preſents, truſting, that God Almighty will bleſs the juſtice of our cauſe, and the means we ſhall make uſe of; deſiring, that all kings, princes, and republics, and ſtates, who love their own preſervation and liberty, together with that of Europe, that they will regard this our Declaration, as an effect of an urgent and preſſing neceſſity for defending ourſelves, and protecting our ſubjects, and conſequently all Europe: and that they will (in conjunction with us) oppoſe the ill deſigns of the kings of France and Spain, and their exorbitant power, whereby they intend to make themſelves maſters of all Chriſtendom, and to that end to give us aid and aſſiſtance.

"Laſtly, we command and require all our ſubjects and inhabitants of theſe provinces, commanders, officers, ſoldiers, and others, of what quality ſoever they be, to own and regard the ſaid kings of France and Spain as enemies of this State; to invade their country, and fall upon their ſubjects and vaſſals both by ſea and land; to repel their violence, and do every thing elſe they are obliged to do for the defence of our country, and the damage of our enemies.

"And, that no body may pretend to be ignorant thereof, we require and command the lords ſtates, counſellors, deputy-ſtates of theſe reſpective provinces, and all other officers and magiſtrates of this country, to cauſe theſe preſents to be proclaimed, publiſhed, and poſted up, on the 15th day of this inſtant, in all the places where publications of this nature are uſually made; commanding likewiſe, that the ſame be publiſhed and affixed in the uſual places of the diſtrict of the generality."

q It was in the following terms:

By the King,

"Although the treaty concluded at Ryſwick at a time, when the king, by the ſuperiority of his forces, was in a condition to have given laws to the neighbouring princes, that were jealous of his power, was a certain proof of the ſincere deſire that his majeſty had always to give peace to his ſubjects, and to reſtore peace to Europe: his majeſty nevertheleſs finds, that the emperor, without any lawful right to the Spaniſh monarchy, hath put himſelf in a condition by the augmentation of his troops, by treaties and alliwent through both houſes, notwithſtanding the rough treatment it met with at firſt, and on the 6th of May received the royal aſſent [r].

The entire harmony between the queen and both houſes of parliament, greatly diſappointed the diſaffected, who expected nothing but confuſion upon the late king's death, and who, to ſhew their joy at an accident, that had cauſed a general concern in moſt parts of Europe, vilified the deceaſed king with libels, verſes, and healths, ſo very indecent and ſcandalous, that, inſtead of wit, they ſerved only to demonſtrate their implacable malice [s]. Not content with theſe inſults, they endeavoured to blaſt the king's memory, and to render his friends obnoxious, by charging upon him a deſign of excluding the princeſs Anne from the ſucceſſion. For he had no ſooner expired, than a report was ſpread, 'That ſome papers were found in his ſtrong box, whereby it appeared, that he had laid a ſcheme to get the elector of Hanover declared his immediate ſucceſſor: That, in order to effect this, the troops of Hanover and Zell were to file off towards the ſea-coaſt of Holland: That, ſoon after the king's return from thence, a pretended inſurrection was to be raiſed either in Scotland or Ireland, to give the king a colourable pretence for inviting over the Hanoverian troops, with their prince to command them; and that ſeveral peers, privy to this deſign, were to be made lord-lieutenants of counties, in order to influence the elections for members of a new parliament. This, many of thoſe, who were now in poſts, had talked of in ſo public a manner, that it appeared they intended to poſſeſs the whole nation with a belief of it; hoping thereby, to alienate the people from thoſe who had been in the late king's confidence, and diſgrace all the whigs, in order to the carrying all elections of parliament for men of their own party. And indeed, the report had gained ſo far upon the belief of ſome people, that the city of Norwich, in their addreſs to the queen, printed in the Gazette on the 30th of April, "congratulated her majeſty's moſt happy and peaceable acceſſion to the throne, notwithſtanding all the 'malicious deſigns' and 'contrivances' uſed to 'defeat' her majeſty of her undoubted right."

The dukes of Somerſet and Devonſhire, and the earls of Marlborough, Jerſey, and Albemarle, had been ordered by the queen to viſit the late king's papers, and bring her ſuch of them, as related to the alliances, or other affairs of the crown. Several peers, who retained a great veneration for the late king, perceiving the deſign which was driven at by thoſe falſe reports, made a motion in the houſe of lords [t], that an enquiry ſhould be made into the truth of that report, and of all other ſtories of that kind, that ſo, if there was any truth in them, ſuch, as had been concerned in thoſe wicked deſigns, might be puniſhed; and if they were found to be falſe, that thoſe, who ſpead them about, might be chaſtiſed. Upon this, the houſe deſired that thoſe lords, who had viſited the late king's papers, would let them know, if they had met with any among them, relating to the queen's ſucceſſion, or to the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover. Four of them were then in the houſe, only the earl of Marlborough was ill that day; ſo the four who were preſent ſaid, they had found nothing, that did in any ſort relate to that matter; and this was confirmed by the earl of Marlborough to ſome peers, who were ſent by the houſe, to aſk him the ſame queſtion. Upon which the houſe came to a reſolution, "That the lords, who were appointed by her majeſty to inſpect the late king's papers, having ſeverally declared, that they did not ſee or find amongſt them any paper, in the leaſt tending to the prejudice of her majeſty, or her ſucceſſion to the crown, or which might give any ground or colour for ſuch a report, the ſaid report was groundleſs, falſe, villainous, and ſcandalous, to the diſhonour of the late king's memory, and highly tended to the diſſervice of her majeſty." And they ordered, "That the matter of fact aforeſaid, and the reſolution of the houſe thereupon, be laid before her majeſty by the duke of Bolton, the earl Marſhal, the earls of Radnor, Stamford, and Scarborough, and the lord Ferrers; and that they do humbly deſire her majeſty to order Mr. Attorney-general to proſecute, with the utmoſt ſeverity of the law, the authors or publiſhers of ſuch ſcandalous reports." The lords named in this order having waited on the queen on the 5th of May, her majeſty told them, "That ſhe was very ready to do any thing of that kind, and would give directions to Mr. Attorney-General effectually to proſecute the authors and publiſhers of ſuch falſe reports."

Some books had been publiſhed, particularly by Dr. Drake and Dr. Davenant, charging the late miniſtry and the whole whig party with the like deſigns of excluding the queen: Theſe books were cenſured, and the authors of them were ordered to be proſecuted; though both the marquis of Normanby, and the earl of Nottingham, did all they could to excuſe thoſe writers [u]. When the falſehood of thoſe calumances with ſeveral princes, and particularly with England and the States-General of the United Provinces, to trouble the repoſe of Europe by a new war, as unjuſt as it is ill grounded. They have begun hoſtilities on all ſides, againſt and contrary to the treaties ſo ſolemnly ſworn to. All Europe is witneſs of his majeſty's moderation, he hath ſeen places attacked, advantageous poſts ſeized, convoys ſtopped, and priſoners taken, before any declaration of war, and at a time when his majeſty was endeavouring by his embaſſadors and envoys to preſerve the peace. All theſe ſteps being ſo contrary to ſincere dealing and their own intereſts; and the manifeſtoes and declarations of war of the emperor, England, and the States-General having been publiſhed, his majeſty finds himſelf under an indiſpenſible neceſſity (in order to preſerve his own, and the king his grandſon's dominions) to arm on his ſide, and to make his levies ſufficient to oppoſe the undertakings of the common enemies. And, for that end, his majeſty is reſolved to employ all his forces by ſea and land, and (by the help of the divine protection, which he implores on the juſtice of his cauſe) to declare war againſt the emperor, England, and the States-General of the United-Provinces, and the princes their allies. His majeſty orders and commands all his ſubjects, vaſſals, and ſervants, to cruize upon the ſubjects of the emperor, England, and Holland, and on the ſubjects of their allies; and ſtrictly forbids his ſubjects to have henceforth any communication, commerce, or intelligence with them on pain of death. And therefore his majeſty hath revoked, and by theſe preſents revokes all permiſſions, paſs-ports, ſafe-guards, and ſafe-conducts, which may have been granted by him, his lieutenant-generals, and other his officers, contrary to theſe preſents; and hath declared, and does declare them to be void, and of none effect and force, forbidding all perſons whatſoever to have any regard unto them. His majeſty orders and commands the admiral, marſhals of France, governors and lieutenant-generals for his majeſty in his provinces and armies, mareſchals de camp, colonels, camp-maſters, captains, chiefs, and leaders of his majeſty's ſoldiers, both horſe and foot, French and ſtrangers, and all his other officers, to whom it may pertain, what is herein contained, to cauſe and execute, each in his office, within their towns and juriſdictions. For ſuch is his majeſty's will and pleaſure, that theſe preſents be publiſhed in all the maritime and other towns, and in all the ports, havens, and other places of the kingdom and lands under his obedience, where need ſhall be, to the end that none may pretend ignorance."

LOUIS.

[r] At the ſame time the queen gave her aſſent to an act for laying a duty upon land. To another for encouragement of the Greenland trade; and to a third, for making good the deficiencies, and the public credit.

[s] They not only drank a health 'to Sorrel,' meaning the horſe that fell with the king, but alſo 'to the little gentleman in velvet,' meaning the mole which it ſeems had heaved up, where the horſe's foot ſlipped in, and occaſioned the fall. As the horſe had belonged to ſir John Fenwick, it was inſinuated as a judgment upon the king in the following epigram, which they made on the occaſion:

Illuſtris Sonipes, certè digniſſime Cœlo,
Cui Leo, cui Taurus, cui daret Urſa Locum;
Quæ te fœlicem fœlicia Prata tulere?
Ubera quæ fœlix præbuit alma Parens?
Hibernis Patriam veniſti ulturus ab oris;
Aut Glenco, aut Stirps te Fœniciana dedit.
Sis fœlix quicumque precor, memorande, nec unquam
Jam ſellæ dorſum, frœna nec ora premant.
Humani Generis Vindex, moriente Tyranno,
Hanc Libertatem, quam dabis, ipſe tene.

[t] The motion was made by the earl of Carliſle, and ſeconded by the lords Wharton, Hallifax, and others.

[u] The particulars of this affair were as follow;

On the 4th of May, a complaint was made to the houſe of peers of a paſſage in the preface to a book, intitled, 'The Hiſtory of the laſt Parliament begun at Weſtminſter, the tenth day of February, 1700;' which though it did not directly reflect on the late king's memory, yet manifeſtly tended to caſt an indelible odium upon his friends, being couched in theſe words: "And perhaps there was a thing in proſpect of deeper reach than all theſe, which was, that, ſhould it have pleaſed God to have ſnatched from us the king on a ſudden, by chance of war, or other fatal accident, during the tumult of arms abroad, and the civil diſorders they had raiſed among us at home, and a numerous, corrupt, licentious party throughout the nation, from which the houſe of commons was ſometimes not free, they might entertain hopes from the advantage of being at the helm, and the aſſiſtance of their rabble, to have put in practice their own ſchemes, and have given us a new model of government of their own projection, and ſo to have procured to themſelves a laſting impunity, and to have mounted their own beaſt, the rabble, and driven the ſober part of the nation, like cattle, before them. That this is no groundleſs conjecture will readily appear to any conſidering perſon, from the treatment her royal highneſs the princeſs of Denmark, the heir apparent to the crown, met all along from them and all their party. They were not contented to ſhew her a conſtant neglect and ſlight themſelves, but their whole party were inſtructed to treat her, not only with diſreſpect, but ſpight. They were buſy to traduce her with falſe and ſcandalous aſperſions; and ſo far they carried the affront, as to make her at one time almoſt the common ſubject of the tittle tattle of almoſt every coffee-houſe and drawing-room, which they promoted with as much zeal, application, and venom, as if 'a bill of excluſion' had then been on the anvil, and theſe were the introductory ceremonies." After reading this paſſage, the lords ordered the bookſeller for whom the book was printed, to attend the houſe on the next Saturday; but, before that day came, Dr. James Drake, the phyſician, having owned himſelf to be author of the book in queſtion, he was on the 9th of May examined by the lord-keeper, who aſked him what he had to ſay concerning the ſaid book? The doctor anſwered, "That he thought he had juſt reaſon to write what he had writ, he having heard her highneſs talked of diſreſpectfully in every coffee-houſe:" And then he withdrew. After ſome debate, he was called in again, and the lord-keeper told him, that the houſe was not ſatisfied with what he had ſaid, but thought he trifled, and required him to acquaint the houſe with the grounds of his writing the paragraph hies was apparent, then it was given out, with an unuſual confidence, that no ſuch report had ever been ſpread; though the contrary was evident, and the thing was boldly aſſerted in thoſe books. And therefore a peculiar meaſure of aſſurance was neceſſary to face down a thing, which they had taken ſuch pains to infuſe into the minds of the credulous vulgar all England over.

The earl of Nottingham, to divert this enquiry, moved, that another might be made into thoſe books, in which the murder of king Charles the Firſt was juſtified; though the provocation, given to ſome of theſe, was, by a ſermon preached by Dr. Binks before the convocation, on the 30th of January, in which he drew a parallel between king Charles's ſufferings and thoſe of our Saviour: And, in ſome very indecent expreſſions, gave the preference to the former[w].

The war being now declared, both houſes joined in an addreſs to the queen, wherein they repreſented, "That nothing would more contribute to the effectual carrying it on, and reducing her enemies to the greateſt ſtreights, than an entire prohibition of all correſpondence with France and Spain on the part of the allies; and therefore they humbly adviſed her majeſty to engage the emperor, the States-General, and her other allies, to join with her majeſty in prohibiting all intercourſe between the ſubjects of her majeſty and her allies, and the ſubjects of France and Spain; and alſo to concert ſuch methods with the States-General, as might moſt effectually ſecure the trade of her ſubjects and her allies." This addreſs her majeſty readily promiſed to comply with, adding, "That ſhe was too much concerned for the public welfare, to omit any neceſſary precautions for the protection of the trade."

On the other hand, the lords having made ſome amendments to 'a bill' from the commons, 'for the encouragement of privateers,' to which the commons refuſed their concurrence; their lordſhips, in an addreſs, repreſented to the queen, "That the ſea preparations of her majeſty's enemies being ſuch as ſeemed not to be intended for encountering and fighting her royal navy, but rather for making a pyratical war, to the interruption of commerce, it was, in their opinion, highly requiſite for the public ſervice, that her majeſty would give all poſſible encouragement to her ſubjects to arm and ſet out private men of war. And whereas, by the ſixth article of the treaty concluded at the Hague between his late majeſty, the emperor, and the States-General, her majeſty was at liberty to take and ſeize lands and cities belonging to the Spaniſh dominions in the Indies, and retain the ſame as her own; their lordſhips adviſed her majeſty to grant commiſſions or charters to all perſons, bodies politic or corporate, who ſhould make ſuch acquiſitions in the Indies, ſubject to ſuch terms and conditions as her majeſty ſhould judge moſt expedient for the good of her kingdom." To which the queen anſwered, "That ſhe would take all the care in it ſhe could." But, in the courſe of the war, this advice was greatly neglected.

The buſineſs of the ſeſſion being all done, the queen went in ſtate to the houſe of peers, and, having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral public and private bills[x], diſmiſſed both houſes with the following ſpeech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I CANNOT conclude this ſeſſion, without repeating my hearty thanks to you all for your great care of the public, and the many marks you have given me of your duty and affection to me.

graph abovementioned. He anſwered, "That he found it mentioned in divers anonymous pamphlets publiſhed at that time, and hoped it was no hurt to anſwer thoſe pamphlets; and deſired time to recollect what theſe pamphlets were;" and then withdrew. After ſome time he was called in again, and aſked whether he could charge any perſon in the kingdom with the matters aſſerted by him in that paragraph? And whether he had heard any perſons ſay, that they could charge any perſons whatſoever with the matters contained in that paragraph? To theſe queſtions he anſwered, 'He did not know of any ſuch perſon;' and being further aſked, if he had any grounds beſides the pamphlets, and what the pamphlets were? He ſaid, "He had no other grounds beſides the ſeveral pamphlets following, viz. 'The two Legion Letters, the black Liſt, Jura Populi Anglicani, and Toland's Reaſons for inviting over the princeſs of Hanover." Laſtly, he was aſked, Whether in any one of theſe pamphlets there was any thing ſaid about ſetting aſide the preſent queen? To which the doctor having anſwered, 'He did not remember there was;' and, being withdrawn, the lords took the ſaid paragraph into conſideration, and reſolved, "That there were in it ſeveral expreſſions, which were groundleſs, falſe, and ſcandalous, tending to create jealouſies in her majeſty of her people, and to cauſe great miſunderſtandings, fears, and diſputes among the queen's ſubjects, and to diſturb the peace and quiet of the kingdom:" Ordering at the ſame time, "That her majeſty's attorney-general ſhould forthwith effectually proſecute Dr. Drake for having writ the ſaid paragraph."

Three days after, May 12, the lords took into conſideration two paragraphs of a book, intitled, 'Tom Double returned out of the country:' Or, 'The true picture of a modern Whig, ſet forth in a ſecond Dialogue between Mr. Whiglove and Mr. Double,' ſuppoſed to be written by Dr. Davenant; which in the 89th and 90th pages contained the following expreſſions:

Whiglove. "I find we have miſcarried in one great deſign: The train would not take; we were hot upon it juſt before the parliament met: All the whig coffee-houſes rung, how neceſſary it was to break into the 'Acts of Settlement,' and to 'exclude'—Double. "Mum, Whiglove, talk no more upon that ſubject, I beſeech you. Freſh orders are iſſued out, and, ſince we are not ſtrong enough to make it go, and that, on the contrary, it has alarmed and provoked all ſorts of men, we are now directed to ſay, that never any ſuch thing was intended by our party, though, God knows, it was the diſcourſe of all our clubs. Under the roſe this was one of thoſe embryo's, that proved abortive upon the 30th of December laſt; but, though it be not ſeaſonable to ſtir in it now, never fear our abandoning a wicked deſign: We never quite lay aſide any miſchief. However, ſince it has really opened the eyes of a great many, and weakened our intereſt among ſeveral of our own ſide, whom we cannot work up to be guilty of ſo much injuſtice, let us take all occaſions of declaring, that we will not violate any of the acts upon any account whatſoever; which we may the more ſafely do, becauſe you know it is our principle, not to think that we are bound by any proteſtations we make, either in private or in public; and it is one of the great advantages we have over the reſt of our fellow-ſubjects, that we can fetter the conſciences of others, while our own are at perfect liberty." The lords, after ſome debate, paſſed the ſame cenſure upon this book, as they had upon part of the preface of Dr. Drake's hiſtory. Pr. H. L. II. 37, &c.

[w] On the 16th of May, a pamphlet intitled, 'Animadverſions upon the two laſt 30th of January ſermons; one preached to the honourable houſe of commons, the other to the houſe of convocation: In a letter;' after reading and examining ſeveral paragraphs and paſſages of which, it was reſolved by their lordſhips, That the ſaid pamphlet was, 'a malicious, villainous libel, containing very many reflections on king Charles I. of ever bleſſed memory, and tending to the ſubverſion of monarchy,' and thereupon ordered it to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. Then their lordſhips took into conſideration a printed ſermon preached on the 30th of January, 1701, in king Henry VII's chapel, before the reverend clergy of the lower houſe of convocation, by William Binckes, D. D. proctor for the dioceſe of Lichfield and Coventry, wherein the preacher ſeemed to make the ſin of the Jews, in crucifying our Saviour, much leſs than that of the Engliſh rebels, in putting to death king Charles I. "As, ſays he, to the near reſemblance between the parties concerned, as well the actors as the ſufferers, comparing thoſe in the text with thoſe of the day. And here one would imagine, the latter were reſolved to take St. Paul's expreſſion in the moſt literal ſenſe the words will bear, 'and crucify to themſelves the Lord afreſh, and in the neareſt likeneſs that could be, put him to an open ſhame.' If, with reſpect to the dignity of the perſon, to have been King of the Jews, was what ought to have ſecured our Saviour from violence; here is alſo one, not only born to a crown, but actually poſſeſſed of it. He was not only called king by ſome, and at the ſame time derided by others for being ſo called, but he was acknowledged by all to be a king: he was not juſt dreſſed up for an hour or two in purple robes, and ſaluted with a Hail King, but the uſual ornaments of majeſty were his cuſtomary apparel; his ſubjects owned him to be their king; and yet they brought him before a tribunal, they judged him, they condemned him; and, that they might not be wanting in any thing to ſet him at naught, they ſpit upon him, and treated him with the utmoſt contempt. Our Saviour's declaring, that 'his kingdom was not of this world,' might look like a ſort of renunciation of his temporal ſovereignty, for the preſent deſiring only to reign in the hearts of men. But here was nothing in this caſe before us: here was indiſputable right of ſovereignty, both by the laws of God and man: he was the reigning prince, and the Lord's anointed; and yet, in deſpite of all law, both human and divine, he was by direct force of arms, and the moſt daring methods of a flagrant rebellion and violence, deprived at once of his imperial crown and life.——The fact of this day was ſuch a vying with the firſt arch-rebel, the apoſtate angel, Lucifer; it was ſuch a going beyond the old ſerpent in his own way of inſolence and pride, that it was no wonder, if he began to raiſe his head, and ſet up his dominion in this world, when, thus warmed and enlivened by a fiery zeal in ſome, and rage in others, to the degree of drunkenneſs, thirſting after, and ſatiating themſelves in royal blood; and, in which reſpect only, heated to the degree of phrenzy and madneſs, the plea in my text may ſeem to have ſome hold of them, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.'"

After ſome debate the lords reſolved, "That in the ſaid ſermon there are ſeveral expreſſions, that give juſt ſcandal and offence to all Chriſtian people." Then, it being moved to order that ſermon to be burnt, it was carried in the negative, but at the ſame time it was ordered, that the above-mentioned reſolution ſhould be communicated to the biſhop of Lichfield and Coventry, Dr. Binckes's ordinary, whom they left to cenſure him, according to the rules of eccleſiaſtical courts.

Complaint was likewiſe made to the lords, of two paſſages in a pamphlet, intitled, 'Reaſons for addreſſing his majeſty to invite into England their Highneſſes the Electreſs Dowager and the Electoral Prince of Hanover; and for attainting and abjuring the pretended Prince of Wales, and all others pretending any claim, right, or title from the late King James and Queen Mary,' wherein it was aſſerted, "That it appears from hiſtory, that all free people have ſet aſide the children of tyrants for reaſons of eternal and univerſal force, as inheriting the principles and deſigns of their parents, bearing an affection to their friends, and owing a revenge to their enemies; as more likely to graſp at a greater power than even their parents, the better to ſecure themſelves from their diſgrace, and being under extraordinary obligations to theſe foreign potentates who protected or reſtored them: and that, whether the abjuration be penal or voluntary, it ſhould be tendered to all manner of perſons, not excepting the king's majeſty, or the princeſs of Denmark: for all the ſecurities we give to them, ſaid the author, they owe their ſecurity to us; not that I doubt either of them, but they both of them very well know, what ſtories and ſurmiſes our enemies have been actually ſpreading to amuſe and intimidate the people: they have whiſpered horrible things of blind and clandeſtine bargains. But Cæſar's wife ought to be unſuſpected as well as innocent." After examination of this pamphlet, the lords reſolved, "That there were in it aſſertions and inſinuations ſcandalous and dangerous, tending to alienate the affections of the ſubjects of this kingdom from her majeſty, and to diſturb the peace and quiet of the kingdom."

[x] Among theſe bills were,

1. An act to oblige the Jews to maintain and provide for their proteſtant children. By which if any Jewiſh parent, in order to the compelling his proteſtant child to change his religion, ſhall refuſe to allow ſuch child a fitting maintenance ſuitable to the ability of the parent, and the age and education of

" And I muſt thank you, Gentlemen of the houſe of commons in particular, both for the ſupplies you have given to ſupport me in this neceſſary war, and the proviſions you have made for the debts contracted in the former. Your great juſtice, in making good thoſe deficiencies, will be a laſting honour and credit to the nation. I wiſh the difficulties they have brought upon us may be a warning to prevent ſuch inconveniencies for the future.

" I muſt recommend to you all, in your ſeveral counties, the preſervation of the public peace, and a due execution of the laws. I ſhall always wiſh, that no differences of opinion among thoſe, that are equally affected to my ſervice, may be the occaſion of heats and animoſities among themſelves. I ſhall be very careful to preſerve and maintain the act of Toleration, and to ſet the minds of all my people at quiet. My own principles muſt always keep me entirely firm to the intereſt and religion of the Church of England, and will incline me to countenance thoſe, who have the trueſt zeal to ſupport it."

Then the lord-keeper, by her majeſty's command, prorogued the parliament to the 7th of July following.

The naval preparations in England and Holland were now carried on with all poſſible ſpeed; and, as they raiſed the ſpirits of the confederates, ſo they gave no ſmall alarms to France, Spain, and even Portugal; the deſign of the expedition having been kept ſo ſecret, that it was uncertain which of thoſe three kingdoms was moſt threatened. France, having ſent a ſtrong ſquadron of men of war into the Weſt-Indies, both to attack the Engliſh plantations, and to bring home the Spaniſh galleons, had no ſufficient number of ſhips left to defend her own coaſts, much leſs to protect thoſe of Spain, whoſe king, in the beginning of the ſpring, was gone into Italy, both to appeaſe the tumults in the kingdom of Naples, and to ſhare with the duke of Vendoſme the expected honour of forcing prince Eugene to repaſs the mountains of Tirol.

And though the king of Portugal gave fair words to the Imperial miniſters, and to Mr. Methuen, the Engliſh envoy, yet he began to be apprehenſive, that the allies, having a formidable power at ſea, would uſe more prevailing means than a negociation to make him break his engagements with France. On the 30th of May, ſir George Rooke, admiral of the Engliſh fleet, having hoiſted the union flag on board the Royal Sovereign, came to Spithead, with ſir Cloudeſly Shovel, on board the Queen, and the great ſhips that lay at the Nore: and at the ſame time, rear-admiral Fairborne arrived there from Ireland with a ſquadron of men of war, having on board four regiments of foot, that were to be part of the land-forces, to be commanded by the duke of Ormond, who, on the firſt of June, arrived at Portſmouth, accompanied by ſir Henry Bellaſis, who was to ſerve under him, and by admiral Churchill; and, the next day, prince George likewiſe ſet out for that ſea-port.

The ſame day, the queen went from St. James's to Windſor, having appointed Simon Harcourt, eſq. to be her ſolliciter-general, and conferred the honour of knighthood both upon him and on Edward Northey, eſq. the attorney-general. The day before, out of a juſt regard to the law of nations, the queen, by proclamation, ordered all ſhips, ſtopped before the declaration of war, to be diſcharged, and cauſed another proclamation to be publiſhed 'for the encouragement of her ſhips of war and privateers.' And at the ſame time her majeſty renewed the commiſſion for the management of the cuſtoms; and upon her return from Windſor, appointed the lord-lieutenants, the commiſſioners of trade, for prizes, ſtamp, and ſalt-duties, and generals of her land-forces; gave audience to ſeveral foreign miniſters, and diſpoſed of many places and employments; and, among the reſt, the earl of Marlborough was made maſter of the ordnance, the honourable John Granville, lieutenant-general, William Bridges, maſter ſurveyor, Chriſtopher Muſgrave, clerk of the ſame, and Edward Southwell was appointed ſecretary of ſtate in Ireland, on the reſignation of his father ſir Robert Southwell.

The affairs of Scotland began now to be a little embroiled. By an act made ſoon after the revolution, it was provided, that all princes, ſucceeding to the crown, ſhould take the coronation-oath before they entered upon their regal dignity; but no direction was given concerning thoſe who ſhould tender it, or the manner in which it ſhould be taken; ſo that, this being left undetermined, the queen had called together all the late king's miniſters for that kingdom, and in the preſence of about twelve of them, ſhe took the coronation-oath [y]. But thoſe, who were diſpoſed to cenſure every thing, ſaid, that this ought not to be done, except in the preſence of ſome deputed for that purpoſe, either by the parliament, or at leaſt by the privy-council of that kingdom.

At the time of king William's deceaſe, the government there was lodged in the hands of perſons entirely of 'revolution' principles; for the earl of Marchmont was lord-chancellor; the earl of Melvil lord preſident of the council; the duke of Queenſberry lord privy-ſeal; the earls of Seafield and Hyndford ſecretaries of ſtate; the earl of Selkirk lord regiſter; Adam Cockburn of Orminſton treaſurer-depute; ſir John Maxwell of Polock juſtice-clerk; ſir James Stuart advocate; and all the lords of the treaſury, except the lord Montgomery, were of the ſame principles. But though the 'anti-revolutioners,' were, in effect, as much enemies to the queen's right to the crown, as to that of king William; yet they were greatly elated at her acceſſion, and flattered themſelves with a better title to her favour, on account of their zeal for Epiſcopacy, than the 'Revolutioners' could pretend to, becauſe moſt part of the latter were for Preſbytery, and the reſt ſo indifferent for Epicopacy, that they did not think it ought to come in competition with the peace of the nation. The firſt ſtruggle between theſe two parties was about the parliament, the ſitting of which, in the ſummer, was abſolutely neceſſary, by reaſon that the funds allotted to ſupport the army were near expired on king William's demiſe. Upon the diſcovery of the aſſaſſination-plot, an act had paſſed in Scotland for continuing the parliament, that ſhould be then in being ſix months after the death of the king, with two ſpecial clauſes in it. The firſt was, that it ſhould meet twenty days after the death of the king. But the queen did, by ſeveral adjournments, continue the parliament almoſt three months after the king's death, before it was opened. Some ſaid, that the parliament was by this diſſolved, ſince it did not meet upon the day limited by the act to continue it. But there was another proviſo in the act, that ſecured to the crown the full preogative of adjourning or diſſolving it within that time. Yet, in oppoſition to this, it was acknowledged, that, as to all ſubſequent days of meeting, the prerogative was entire; but the day that was limited, that is, the twenty-firſt after the king's death, ſeemed to be fixed for the firſt opening of the ſeſſion. The ſecond clauſe was a limitation of the power of the parliament, during their ſitting, that it ſhould not extend to the repealing of laws: They were impowered only to maintain the proteſtant religion, and the public peace of the country. It was therefore ſaid, that the queen was peaceably obeyed, and the country now in full quiet; ſo that there was no need of aſſembling the parliament. The end of the law being attained, it was ſaid, the law fell of itſelf, and therefore it was neceſſary to call a new parliament; of the child, upon complaint it ſhall be lawful for the lord chancellor to make ſuch order for the maintenance of ſuch proteſtant child as he ſhall think fit.

2. An act for continuing the impriſonment of Counter and other conſpirators againſt king William.

3. An act for the relief of proteſtant purchaſers of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland.

4. An act for enlarging the time for taking the oath of abjuration, in which was this clauſe:

" That if any perſon or perſons, at any time after the firſt day of March, 1702, ſhall endeavour to deprive or hinder any perſon, who ſhall be the next in ſucceſſion to the crown for the time being, according to the limitations in the act, intitled, 'An Act for declaring the rights and liberties of the ſubject, and ſettling the Succeſſion of the Crown;' and according to one other Act, intitled, 'An Act for the further limitation of the Crown, and better ſecuring the rights and liberties of the ſubject,' from ſucceeding after the deceaſe of her majeſty to the imperial crown of this realm, and the dominions and territories thereunto belonging, according to the limitations in the before-mentioned acts; that is to ſay, ſuch iſſue of her majeſty's body, as ſhall from time to time be next in ſucceſſion to the crown, if it ſhall pleaſe God Almighty to bleſs her majeſty with iſſue; and, during the time her majeſty ſhall have no iſſue, the princeſs Sophia, electreſs and ducheſs dowager of Hanover, and, after the deceaſe of the ſaid princeſs Sophia, the next in ſucceſſion to the crown for the time being, according to the limitation of the ſaid acts; and the ſame, maliciouſly, adviſedly, and directly, ſhall attempt by any overt-act or deed; every ſuch offence ſhall be adjudged high-treaſon, and the offender or offenders therein, their aſſeſſors, procurers, and comforters, knowing the ſaid offence to be done, being thereof convicted or attainted, according to the laws and ſtatutes of this realm, ſhall be deemed and adjudged traytors, and ſhall ſuffer pains of death, and all loſſes and forfeitures as in caſes of high-treaſon.

[y] Of this the queen ſent an account in a letter to the privy-council of Scotland, as ſoon as ſhe was proclaimed, acquainting them, " That it having pleaſed Almighty God to call out of this life her royal and moſt dearly beloved brother king William, whereby the undoubted right to the imperial crown of the kingdom of Scotland, conform to the act of ſettlement, was devolved upon her: And having (according to the petition of right and grievances) taken and ſigned the coronation-oath, in preſence of ſeveral of her privy-council; ſhe thought fit to authorize them to continue to meet, and act as her privy-council of that her ancient kingdom, until ſhe ſhould ſend them a new commiſſion for that effect. Moreover, her majeſty authorized and required them to publiſh an encloſed proclamation, ordaining all officers of ſtate, counſellors, magiſtrates, and all other officers, civil and military, to act in all things, conform to the commiſſions and inſtructions they had from his late majeſty, until new commiſſions could be prepared and ſent down. And her majeſty on this occaſion, at her firſt acceſſion to the crown, gave them, and all her good people, full aſſurance of her firm reſolution, during the whole courſe of her reign, to protect them in their religion, laws, and liberties, and in the eſtabliſhed government of the church."

for the old one, if aſſembled, could have no authority, but to ſee to the preſervation of religion, and the peace of the country; their power being limited to theſe two heads by the act that authorized their ſitting. In oppoſition to this, it was urged, that the act, which gave them authority to ſit as a parliament for ſix months, gave them the full authority of a parliament: That the directing them, to take care of ſome more important matters, did not hinder their meddling with other matters, ſince no parliament can limit a ſubſequent one. It was likewiſe ſaid, that, ſince the queen was now engaged in a war, the public peace could not be ſecured without ſuch a force, and ſuch taxes to maintain it, as the preſent ſtate of affairs required. The duke of Queenſberry, and his party were for continuing the parliament. But the duke of Hamilton, and the others, who had oppoſed that duke in the laſt parliament, complained highly of this way of proceeding. They ſaid, that they could not acknowledge this to be a legal parliament, nor ſubmit to it, but muſt proteſt againſt it.

This was ominous; a reign was to be begun with a parliament liable to a diſpute; and from ſuch a breach it was eaſy to foreſee a train of miſchief likely to follow. The duke of Hamilton, the marquis of Tweedale, the earl of Mareſchal, the earl of Rothes, and a great many of the nobility and gentry went up to London, and repreſented to the queen, and thoſe in favour with her, their exceptions to all that was intended to be done. Every thing, which they ſaid, was heard calmly; but the queen was a ſtranger to their laws, and could not take it upon her to judge of them; and therefore it was determined by the advice of the privy-council of that kingdom. The lords, who came up to oppoſe the duke of Queenſberry, continued to preſs for a new parliament, in which they promiſed to give the queen all that ſhe could aſk of them, and to conſent to an act of indemnity for all that was paſſed in the former reign. But it was thought, that the nation was in too great a ferment to venture upon that; and ſome more time was neceſſary to prepare matters, as well as men's minds, before a new parliament ſhould be ſummoned. Both parties returned to Scotland, and, both being ſenſible, that the preſbyterian intereſt would with its weight turn that ſcale, into which it ſhould fall, great pains were taken by both ſides to gain that party. On the one hand, they were made to apprehend what a madneſs it would be for them to provoke the queen in the beginning of her reign, who might be enough diſpoſed to entertain prejudices againſt them; which would be much heightened, if in a point, in which conſcience could not be pretended, they ſhould engage in a faction againſt her, eſpecially when they could not ſay, that any cauſe of jealouſy was given; but, on the contrary, the queen had, in all her public letters, promiſed to maintain preſbytery; and, though that had given great offence in the late king's time, when thoſe public letters were printed, yet now this paſſed without cenſure. The other party was as buſy to inflame them. They told them the queen was certainly in her heart againſt them: All thoſe, who were now in her confidence, and particularly the earls of Rocheſter and Nottingham, were enemies to the preſbyterian government. Good words were now given them, in order to ſeparate them from a national intereſt, knowing well, that, if they went off from that, and ſo loſt the hearts of the nation, they would loſe that in which their chief ſtrength lay: The party, that now governed, as ſoon as they ſhould have carried the preſent point by their help, and rendered them odious by their concurrence in it, would ſtrengthen themſelves at court by entering into the epiſcopal intereſt, and trying to introduce epiſcopacy into Scotland; which would ſoon be brought about, if the preſbyterians ſhould once loſe their popularity. Thoſe were the methods and reaſonings that were uſed on both ſides.

The parliament met at Edinburgh, according to the queen's laſt adjournment, on the 9th of June, the duke of Queenſberry being appointed high-commiſſioner. At the opening of it, duke Hamilton demanded to be heard; and, though deſired by the lord chancellor to ſit ſtill, till the queen's commiſſion was read, and the houſe conſtituted, yet he perſiſted, and ſaid, both in his own name, and in behalf of the other members, who adhered to him, "That they were all heartily glad at her majeſty's happy acceſſion to the throne of that kingdom, not merely on the account that it was her undoubted right by deſcent, but likewiſe becauſe of the many perſonal virtues and royal qualities her majeſty was endowed with, which gave them grounds to hope, that they ſhould enjoy, under her auſpicious reign, all the bleſſings, that could attend a nation, which had a gracious and loving ſovereign united with a dutiful and obedient people. That they were reſolved to ſacrifice their lives and fortunes in defence of her majeſty's right againſt all her enemies whatſoever, and had all the deference and reſpect for her majeſty's government and authority, that was due from loyal ſubjects to their rightful and lawful ſovereigns. But, that at the ſame time, that they acknowledged their ſubmiſſion to her majeſty's authority, they thought themſelves bound in duty, by virtue of the obedience they owe to the ſtanding laws of the nation, and becauſe of the regard they ought to have for the rights and liberties of their fellow-ſubjects, to declare their opinion as to the legality of this meeting, That they did not think themſelves warranted by law to ſit and act any longer as a parliament; and that, by ſo doing, they ſhould incur the hazard of loſing their lives and fortunes, if their proceedings ſhould come to be queſtioned by ſubſequent parliaments." He then read a paper, which contained the reaſons of their diſſenting from the proceedings of the other members, who thought themſelves impowered to ſit and act as a parliament, and was as follows: "Foraſmuch as, by the fundamental laws and conſtitution of this kingdom, all parliaments do diſſolve by the death of the king or queen, except in ſo far as innovated by the 17th act of the 6th ſeſſion of king William's parliament laſt in being, at his deceaſe to meet and act what ſhould be needful for the defence of the true proteſtant religion, as now by law eſtabliſhed, and maintaining the ſucceſſion to the crown, as ſettled by the claim of right, and for preſerving and ſecuring the peace and ſafety of the kingdom; and, ſeeing that the ſaid ends are fully ſatisfied by her majeſty's ſucceſſion to the throne, whereby the religion and peace of the kingdom are ſecured, we conceive ourſelves not now warranted by the law to meet, ſit, or act, and therefore do diſſent from any thing, that ſhall be done or acted." Then the duke and ſeventy-nine of the members, having taken inſtruments, withdrew out of the houſe, and left the others, who were an hundred and twelve, to ſit and act by themſelves; and, as they all paſſed from the parliament-houſe to the Croſs-Keys-Tavern near the Croſs, they were applauded by the loud acclamations of an infinite number of people of all ranks and degrees.

Notwithſtanding the ſeceſſion of ſo many members, the duke of Queenſberry's commiſſion to be high-commiſſioner was read, as was alſo the queen's letter to the parliament, dated May 15th, declaring, in the firſt place, the reaſon of this meeting, and her majeſty's 'firm reſolution to maintain and protect her ſubjects in the full poſſeſſion of their religion, laws, and liberties, and of the preſbyterian government of the church.' Then acquainting them with "the juſt cauſes of declaring war againſt the French king, and earneſtly recommending to them, both the providing competent ſupplies for maintaining ſuch a number of forces, as might be neceſſary for diſappointing the enemy's deſigns, and preſerving the preſent happy ſettlement: And the conſideration of an Union between the two kingdoms of England and Scotland, which was recommended by them to the late king." The ſeveral points of this letter were inforced by the ſpeeches of the duke of Queenſberry, and of the earl of Marchmont; and, the parliament being met again on the 11th of June, they proceeded to appoint committees for ſecurity of the kingdom, for controverted elections, for drawing up an anſwer to her majeſty's letter, and for reviſing the minutes. Then overtures were read for the following acts, viz. 'An act recognizing her majeſty's royal authority[z]: An act for adjourning the Court of Judicature, called the Seſſion: An act, declaring this preſent meeting of parliament to be a lawful and free meeting of parliament, and diſcharging any perſon to diſown, quarrel, or impugn the dignity and authority thereof, under the penalty of high-treaſon: And an act for ſecuring the true proteſtant religion and preſbyterian church government:' Which were read the firſt time, and the next day paſſed, and touched with the ſcepter. Six days after the parliament's anſwer to the queen's letter was read and approved, being conformable to all her majeſty's deſires, and aſſuring her, that the 'groundleſs ſeceſſion of ſome of their members ſhould increaſe and ſtrengthen their care and zeal for her majeſty's ſervice.'

On the other hand, the diſſenting members, of whom duke Humilton was the chief, having prepared an addreſs to [z] In this act, beſides the oath of allegiance, was this of aſſurance:

'I A. B. do, in the ſincerity of my heart, aſſert, acknowledge, and declare, that her majeſty queen Anne is the only lawful, undoubted ſovereign of this realm, as well de Jure, that is, of right, as de Facto, that is, in the poſſeſſion and exerciſe of the government. And therefore I do ſincerely and faithfully promiſe and engage, that I will with heart and hand, maintain and defend her majeſty's title and government, againſt the pretended prince of Wales, and his adherents, and all other enemies, who, either by open or ſecret attempts, ſhall diſturb or diſquiet her majeſty in the poſſeſſion and exerciſe thereof.

the queen, to juſtify their proceedings, and ſent up the ſame by the lord Blantire, the queen poſitively refuſed to receive it, though ſhe was pleaſed to allow his lordſhip's acceſs to her. Having well weighed this affair, ſhe reſolved to adhere to the parliament convened by her authority, and in a letter to them, dated at St. James's, June 17, and read to the houſe on the 23d, 'reſolved to own and maintain this preſent ſeſſion of parliament, and the dignity and authority of the ſame, and of her high-commiſſioner, againſt all oppoſers.' In the mean time, the parliament proceeded, and, on the 9th of June, 'an act for a ſupply of ten months ceſs upon all land-rents' received the royal aſſent; but, when the tax came afterwards to be levied, near one half of the Scots nation refuſed to pay the ſame; ſo that, in many places, the government was obliged to uſe forcible methods to raiſe it. It is alſo remarkable, that ſome days before ſir Alexander Bruce was expelled the houſe, on account of a ſpeech made on the 11th of June, wherein, among other things, he affirmed, that "Preſbytery was inconſiſtent with monarchy; that it maintained a conſtant oppoſition to the rightful ſovereign; and, like vice and hypocriſy, and the other peſts of mankind, it ſpread and flouriſhed moſt in turbulent times of anarchy and rebellion; and that he did not wonder, that their predeceſſors, in cold blood, and taught by woeful experience, preferred order and decency, in the houſe of God, to the pride and infallibility of a pope in every pariſh." And, the dean and faculty of advocates having paſſed a vote among themſelves in favour of the proteſtation and addreſs of the diſſenting members, declaring, that they 'were founded upon, and in the terms of the laws of this kingdom,' they were upon that account, charged and proſecuted by the lord advocate before the parliament, where, after long debates upon the matter, they were ſeverely reprimanded; but the nation was inraged to ſee that ſociety attacked, for declaring their opinion in a point of law, relating to the foundation and conſtitution of parliament, and conſequently the liberty and right of the ſubject.

On the 25th of June, the royal aſſent was given to 'an act, for enabling her majeſty to appoint commiſſioners for an union between the two kingdoms;' though ſome members diſſented from it, becauſe they could not get a clauſe inſerted in it about the preſbyterian church-government.

The ſucceſſion to the crown having been ſettled in England by two acts of parliament on the houſe of Hanover, after her majeſty and her iſſue, in the proteſtant line, and nothing of this nature having been done in Scotland, the earl of Marchmont thought it proper to propoſe it at this time, and, contrary to the advice of his friends, and even the commands of the high-commiſſioner, preſented 'an act for abjuring the pretended prince of Wales.' But, though ſuch as continued in the houſe were unanimous enough in other points, yet they could not agree in this[a]; and, the party, who oppoſed the ſettling of the ſucceſſion at this time (which they alledged would be an obſtacle rather than an encouragement to the deſigned union) attempting to admit the diſſenting members into the houſe to their aſſiſtance, the high-commiſſioner, fearing the ill conſequences of this procedure, thought fit, on the 30th of June, to adjourn the parliament to the 18th of Auguſt, having returned them thanks for their chearfulneſs and unanimity in their proceedings. And, as ſoon as the parliament was adjourned, the leading men of the different parties haſtened to London, to make their ſeveral repreſentations of things to the queen and her miniſters.

The queen, purſuant to the power given her by acts of parliament of both kingdoms, appointed commiſſioners for treating about an union between England and Scotland[b]. The commiſſioners met, for the firſt time, on the 22d of October, at the Cock pit, where, after reading both commiſſions, lord-keeper Wright made a ſhort ſpeech on the occaſion of their meeting, and was anſwered by the duke of Queenſberry.

As there was not a quorum of the Scots commiſſioners arrived in town, their meeting was adjourned by a letter from the queen to the 10th of November; but, about the 20th of the ſame month, they met again; and, notwithſtanding ſome previous objections made by the lord-keeper to the validity of the Scots commiſſion, they fully adjuſted the preliminaries, of which this was one of the moſt conſiderable, "That nothing agreed on amongſt themſelves ſhould be binding, except it be ratified by her majeſty, and the reſpective parliaments of both nations; and that, except all the heads propoſed for the treaty were agreed to, no particular thing agreed on ſhould be binding." The lord-keeper then propoſed on the part of the Engliſh, "That the two kingdoms ſhould be inſeparably united into one monarchy under her majeſty and her heirs and ſucceſſors, and under the ſame limitations, according to the acts of ſettlement." And the duke of Queenſberry propoſed on the part of the Scots, "That both nations ſhould be united in one monarchy, and one parliament, with a mutual communication of trade and privileges." The propoſal of the Engliſh was readily agreed to; and the queen, to quicken matters, came, on the 14th of December, and made a ſpeech to them. The Scots commiſſioners had given in ſix propoſals, on which ſome conſiderations, as a ſubject-matter of debate, were delivered by the Engliſh commiſſioners[c]. But, when the Scots commiſ-

[a] Mr. Lockhart, in his memoirs, page 16, tells us, "That it may be thought ſtrange, that this act did not paſs currently in ſuch a ſtrangely made up meeting, and when ſuch eminently famous and zealous revolutioners were at the helm of affairs, and acted without any to controul them. And I preſume the reaſons were: Firſt, the commiſſioners had no inſtructions concerning it. Secondly, The uncertainty how affairs would go in England. The queen was but newly come to the crown, and not well fixed in the throne; and they foreſaw they might expect little thanks, if ſhe afterwards ſhould favour the intereſt of the diſtreſſed royal family. And I have reaſon to believe, that the queen and her Engliſh miniſtry were then inclined to keep the ſucceſſion in Scotland open, as a check and aweband upon the whigs and family of Hanover. And, laſtly (as they pretended afterwards in England) that parliament's title to act was controverted, and had ſo little authority in the nation, as it was not fit to venture upon it, there being reaſon to believe few would have complied with it, and every body almoſt been highly diſguſted. For theſe and the like reaſons, it is poſſible, I ſay, the commiſſioners and other courtiers reſolved to wave entering upon the matter."

Dr. Davenant was appointed ſecretary to the Engliſh commiſſioners, and Robert Pringle to the Scots. Hiſt. of Europe, VII. 457.

[c] The ſubſtance of the ſix propoſals given in by the Scots commiſſioners was as follows: 1. That there ſhould be a free trade betwixt the two kingdoms without diſtinction. 2. That both ſhould be liable to an equal impoſition for export and import; and that a book of rates ſhould be adjuſted for both. 3. That the ſubjects and ſhipping of both kingdoms have an equal freedom as to the plantation trade, and be under the ſame regulation. 4. That the act of navigation, and all others in both kingdoms, inconſiſtent with the ſaid propoſals, be repealed. 5. That neither of the kingdoms be burthened with the debts contracted by the other before the union; and that the equality of impoſition in the ſecond propoſal be underſtood with an exception of the impoſitions laid on and appropriated by the parliament of England for payment of their debts; or, if an equality of impoſition on trade be thought neceſſary, that there be allowed to Scotland an equivalent. 6. That the former propoſals were made without prejudice to the companies or manufactures of either kingdom, which are referred to the further conſideration and progreſs of this treaty. The conſiderations on theſe propoſals delivered by the Engliſh commiſſioners were theſe: As to the firſt article, the lord commiſſioners for England agreed, That there ſhould be "a free trade for the native commodities of the growth, product, and manufacture of both, with an exception as to wool and ſheep-fells, and with equal duties on home conſumptions reſpectively; and that the maſters, mariners, and goods of Scotland be under the ſame penalties as thoſe of England." To the ſecond they deſired there might be added, "That the ſame impoſition and prohibition ſhould be the ſame in both as to the import and export." To the third their lordſhips ſaid, "That the plantation trade was the property of England, and of ſuch conſequence as not to be communicated, till the other particulars, which ſhould be thought neceſſary to the union, were adjuſted; and that in this article there ſhould be proviſion made, that Scotſmen be liable to be preſſed in time of war for her majeſty's ſervice." To the fourth they agreed, "That the act of navigation be accommodated to the union." To the fifth, they thought it contradicted what was agreed in the ſecond, and ſaid, "There was no duty on trade, except ſome of the funds of the civil government, but what was appropriated to pay private debts, and though thoſe debts were contracted by a long war, entered into more particularly for the preſervation of England and the dominions thereto belonging; yet Scotland had taſted the benefit of that war by the oppoſition made to the growth and power of France; and that Scotland would be abundantly compenſated for that burden by a compleat union, which could not be eſtabliſhed with equality, unleſs there were the ſame duty in both kingdoms on foreign and home conſumption: But how the money ariſing from thence in Scotland ſhould be applied, or what equivalent ſhould be allowed the Scots for it, might be ſettled, when their lordſhips came to propoſe what proportion Scotland ſhould bear of the public burden for the ſupport of the government in peace and war. For the ſixth propoſal, they deſired it might be further explained." Hiſt. of Europe, vii. 461.

Keiſerſtzet:

ſioners gave in their propoſals for preſerving the rights and privileges of their company trading to Africa and the Indies, ſuch difficulties aroſe, as put a ſtop to all farther progreſs, and nothing more was done upon this commiſſion, which was annulled by the new Scotiſh parliament called by the queen, as will hereafter be ſeen.

Ireland was now put under lords juſtices, named by the earl of Rocheſter. The earl of Mount-Alexander, major-general Erle, and Thomas Knightly, were appointed lords juſtices, in the room of the archbiſhop of Dublin and the earl of Drogheda, whom the lord Rocheſter had left in the government of that kingdom. Mean time, the truſtees for the forfeited eſtates continued ſtill in their former authority.

While affairs were in this ſituation at home, the firſt ſtep that was made beyond ſea, was by the houſe of Hanover. It had been concerted with the late king before his ſickneſs, and was ſet on foot the week he died. The deſign was well laid, and the execution managed with great ſecrecy. The old duke of Zell, and his nephew the elector of Brunſwick, marched in perſon with an army, that was rather inferior in ſtrength to that of the duke of Wolfembuttle. They entered their country, while their troops were diſperſed in their quarters. They ſurprized ſome regiments of horſe, and inveſted both Wolfembuttle and Brunſwick at once, and cut off all communication between them. Having them at this diſadvantage, they required them to concur in the common councils of the empire; to furniſh their quota for its defence, and to keep up no more troops than were conſiſtent with the ſafety of their neighbours. For it was well known, that the greateſt part of their men were ſubſiſted with French pay, and that they had engaged themſelves to declare for France, as ſoon as it ſhould be required. Duke Rodolph, the elder brother, was a learned and pious prince; but, as he was never married, ſo he had transferred the government to the care of his brother duke Anthony, who was of a temper very different from his brother's. He could not bear the advancement of the houſe of Hanover, and therefore, in oppoſition to them, entered into the intereſts of France. But, being thus ſurprized, he went away in diſcontent, and his brother broke through all thoſe meaſures, in which he had involved himſelf. In conjunction with duke Anthony, the duke of Saxe-Gotha had entered into the ſame engagements with France, but was now forced to fall into the common intereſts of the empire.

Thus all the north of Germany was united, and ready to declare againſt France: only the war of Poland was ſo near them, that they were obliged to continue armed, and ſee the iſſue of that war. The king of Sweden was engaged in it, with ſuch a determined oppoſition to king Auguſtus, that there was no hope of treating a peace, though it was endeavoured both by England and the States-General. His Swediſh majeſty ſeemed to have accuſtomed himſelf to fatigue and danger; ſo that he grew to love both; and though the Muſcovites had fallen upon the frontiers of Sweden, where they had gained ſome advantages, yet even that could not divert him from carrying on the war in Poland. A dyet was ſummoned in that kingdom, but it broke up in confuſion, without coming to any concluſion; only they ſent embaſſadors to the king of Sweden to treat of a peace. The king of Pruſſia was very apprehenſive of the conſequences of this war, which was now in the neighbourhood of Pruſſia; and the king of Sweden threatened to invade Saxony with the troops that he had in Pomerania, which could not be done but through his territories. The king of Sweden delayed giving audience to the embaſſadors of Poland, and marched on to Warſaw; upon which the king of Poland retired to Cracow, and ſummoned thoſe palatines, who adhered to him, to attend him. When the king of Sweden came to Warſaw, he ſent to the cardinal primate to ſummon a dyet for chuſing a new king; which was going further than the reſentments of the Poles yet carried them. But the progreſs of this affair will appear in its proper place.

All Germany was now united, except the two brothers of Bavaria. The court of Vienna entered into ſeveral negociations with the elector of Bavaria, but without any effect; for that elector ſeemed only to hearken to their propoſitions that he might make the better terms with France. The elector of Cologne put Liege, and all the places he had on the Rhine, into the hands of the French, except Bonne; which, it was ſaid, he kept with the view of being able to make peace with the emperor, by putting that in his poſſeſſion, though he was prevailed on afterwards to deliver that likewiſe to the French. In this conduct the elector acted againſt the advice of all his council; and, as the dean of Liege was making ſome oppoſition to him, he was ſeized on, and carried away priſoner in a barbarous manner. The elector, to excuſe his admitting the French into his country, pretended, that he only deſired the aſſiſtance of ſome of the troops of the circle of Burgundy, to ſecure his dominions; for, as France was not aſhamed of the ſlighteſt pretences, ſo ſhe taught her allies to make excuſes unbecoming the dignity of princes.

Thus the confederates ſeemed to begin the war againſt France under many and great diſadvantages: beſides, that the electors of Bavaria and Cologne had declared for France, and the elector of Saxony king of Poland, on account of his war with Sweden, was hindered from ſending his full proportion of troops, a prince of the houſe of Bourbon was now on the throne of Spain (which had formerly acted in concert with England and Holland) a French army had over-run the ſtate of Milan; and, to this army, the duke of Savoy (engaged to France by the double marriage of his two daughters) had joined his forces. The emperor had ſent his veteran troops under the command of prince Engene, to keep the French at bay in Italy; and all the Spaniſh towns on the frontiers of Holland were garriſoned by French ſoldiers. But notwithſtanding all theſe viſible diſadvantages, by the wiſe and ſteady councils of England, the prudent management of the public treaſury, the juſt meaſures concerted by the earl of Marlborough with foreign powers, the bravery and reſolution of the confederate troops, and the experience and good conduct of their commanders, it was ſoon concluded by all, who were judges of ſuch matters, that the allies would, in the end, prove an over-match for France.

Negociations were ſtill carried on in ſeveral courts. Mr. Methuen was ſent to try the court of Portugal; and he quickly returned with full aſſurances of a neutrality and a freedom of trade in the ports of that kingdom; and, as inſinuations were given of a diſpoſition to go further upon a better proſpect and better terms, he was immediately ſent back to urge that matter as far as it would go. The pope pretended he would keep the neutrality of a common father, but his partiality to the French appeared on many occaſions; yet the court of Vienna had that veneration for the holy ſee, that they contented themſelves with expoſtulating, without carrying their reſentments farther. The Venetians and the Great Duke followed the example ſet them by the pope, though the Venetians did not eſcape ſo well, for their country ſuffered on both hands.

The firſt ſtep of the war was to be made in the name of the elector Palatine in the ſiege of Keyſerſwaert [d], which had been put into the hands of the French by the elector of Cologne, and which, whilſt in their hands, expoſed both the circle of Weſtphalia and the dominions of the States; for their places on the Whall, being in no good condition, lay open to the excurſions of that garriſon. The trenches had been opened before this town on the 18th of April; and the care of the ſiege committed to the prince of Naſſau Saarbrugh (declared the emperor's marſhal de camp) under whom the Dutch ſerved as auxiliaries to the emperor, the States not having declared war againſt France. Another army of the Dutch was formed under the earl of Athlone, and lay in the duchy of Cleve to cover the ſiege; and a third commanded by general Cohorn broke into Flanders, forced and demoliſhed the lines between the two forts of St. Donat and Iſabella, which the enemy had been many months raiſing with great labour and expence, and laid the greateſt part of the Chatellanie of Bruges under contribution. However, after theſe ſucceſſes, upon the approach of the marquis de Bedmar and the count de la Motte with the French troops under their command, which were ſuperior in number to him, Cohorn was forced to retire under the walls of Sluys; but, to prevent the enemy's taking fort Donat, he firſt laid the country under water, and forced the Spaniards to retire towards Ghent.

Marſhal de Boufflers, having drawn his troops together, and laid up great magazines in Ruremond and Venlo, paſſed the Maeſe with his whole army, and, the duke of Burgundy coming poſt from Paris to command it, the States were apprehenſive, that ſo great a prince would, at his firſt appearance, [d] Keiſerſwaert is a town below Duſſeldorp, on the Rhine, mean, but well fortified; and did belong to the elector of Cologne. It has a broad ditch, very regular fortifications, and high walls faced with brick: as alſo the counterſcarp, which was in a very good condition. It is ſeated on the north of the Rhine, ſix German miles between Cologne to the north-weſt, and the ſame diſtance from Gulick (or Juliers) to the north. The French poſſeſſed themſelves of it for cardinal Furſtemburgh in 1688, but the late elector of Brandenburgh retook it in the year 1689, and delivered it to the elector of Cologne, who in 1701 received a French garriſon into it, which continued there till it was taken by the army of the allies. It is now ſubject to the duke of Neuburg.

Father

undertake ſomething worthy of himſelf, and, believing the deſign might be upon Maeſtricht, threw twelve thouſand men into that place.

The ſending away ſo large a detachment, the auxiliary troops from Germany not coming ſo ſoon as expected, and contrary winds having ſtopped a great part of our army, were the occaſions that the earl of Athlone was not ſtrong enough to enter into action with the marſhal de Boufflers. He encamped therefore at Clarenbeck, between Nimeguen and Cleve, to watch his motions; and while Boufflers lay at Zanſen near Cleve, the earl, having detached major-general Dampre with a thouſand horſe towards the enemy, he happened to meet a party of about ſix hundred French horſe, whom he attacked and totally defeated, killing two hundred on the ſpot, and taking as many priſoners, with the loſs only of about thirty troopers and dragoons.

The ſiege of Keyſerſwaert went on but ſlowly. The trenches had been opened on the 18th of April with little loſs; and on the 20th, the beſiegers did great execution by the bombs which they threw into the town. But the enemy made a vigorous ſally, with deſign to ruin the works of the beſiegers. The Dutch repulſed them twice with great bravery; but, not being ſuccoured in time, and being inferior to the enemy, they were forced to quit their poſt, and make a retreating fight, till at length, the cavalry, deſigned for their relief, coming up, the enemy were, in their turn, conſtrained to retire with great precipitation. On the 21ſt and 22d the enemy made two ſallies more, but with much the ſame ſucceſs, and in the latter were purſued to the counterſcarp, leaving a great number of dead and wounded men upon the ſpot; and at the ſame time the brigadier, who commanded them, was taken priſoner. On the 23d, in the morning, twelve hundred Pruſſians attacked an iſland in the Rhine about ſix hundred paces broad, a little below the town, in which two hundred French were poſted, who had built ſeveral works and fortifications, and had two ſeveral batteries there. Upon the approach of our men, they fired very briſkly; but the prince of Anhault Deſſau, who commanded, managed the affair with that prudence and valour, that the French, after a whole day's reſiſtance, being ſummoned to yield, or run the hazard of being put to the ſword, mutinied againſt their officers, and, throwing down their arms, ſurrendered at diſcretion. The commander in chief was ſo enraged at this, that he laid violent hands upon himſelf; and the reſt of the officers, attempting to make their eſcape in a little boat, were all killed, except a captain and a lieutenant. The next day, April 24, the beſiegers carried their trenches within two hundred paces of the town, and had four batteries continually firing, with which they had made conſiderable breaches in the rampart, ſo that they intended to make an attack upon the counterſcarp; for which purpoſe a good number of faſcines and wool-packs were prepared, it being thought, that by thoſe proceedings the town would ſoon ſurrender. However, the confederates were very much miſtaken in their calculation; for, though they propoſed at firſt to be maſters of that place in three weeks, they found it held out near two months, and had like to have proved a bad beginning of a new war. For count Tallard, having poſted himſelf with his flying camp on the other ſide of the Rhine, fired from thence with ſo much ſucceſs, that the beſiegers, notwithſtanding their entrenchments, were very much incommoded, and had, beſides, the mortification to ſee the beſieged ſuccoured from that camp with troops, ammunition, and all neceſſary refreſhment, which, with the exceſſive rains that ſwelled the Rhine, to the great prejudice of the aſſailants, occaſioned the length of the ſiege. However, all this while, the beſiegers cannonaded the town, and battered the outward fortifications with forty-eight great guns, and thirty mortars; ſo that it was almoſt reduced to aſhes, when they reſolved to make a general attack on the counterſcarp and ravelin. This they executed with unparalleled bravery. The conflict was obſtinate and bloody, for nothing was to be ſeen for two hours but flame and ſmoke: but at length the beſieged were conſtrained to give ground, and leave the beſiegers maſters both of the ravelin and the counterſcarp, upon which they immediately lodged themſelves. The prince of Naſſau Saarburgh performed prodigies of valour, giving his orders with great contempt of the danger and admirable preſence of mind; and all the other officers and ſoldiers behaved themſelves in this action beyond expectation. This advantage, however, coſt the confederates very dear[e]; for they had ſix hundred and eighty men killed, and one thouſand nine hundred and two wounded in the action; but it likewiſe ſo much weakened the garriſon, that they were forced to capitulate, and obtained honourable terms. The fortifications were razed according to agreement.

Upon the taking of the counterſcarp, count Tallard, finding that he could be of no farther ſervice to the beſieged, joined the grand army under the command of the duke of Burgundy, which, by the calling in of all their other detachments, and particularly of the French king's houſhold-troops, became greatly ſuperior to that of the confederates under the earl of Athlone; and they were ſo ſenſible of it, that they reſolved to put in execution, without delay, the following deſign, of which they had for ſome time before boaſted.

On the 10th of June, N. S. the marſhal de Boufflers decamped from Zanſen, and directed his march, without ſound of trumpet or beat of drum, through the plains of Goch towards Mooker-Hyde cloſe by Nimeguen, with a view to get between the confederate army and that city, and ſo to cut them off from their proviſions, ammunition, and forage. Upon this the earl of Athlone, having early information of the enemy's motion, and diſcovering their deſign, called a council of general officers, wherein it was unanimouſly reſolved, that the confederates ſhould begin their march that evening. The baggage was accordingly ſent to Nimeguen, and, after ſeveral marches and regulations, the earl about break of day received particular intelligence of the ſtrength of the enemy, and cauſed the cavalry to be drawn up in order of battle to cover the march of the infantry. About eleven in the morning, the French horſe advanced in great numbers, with the houſhold-troops at the head, and preſſed upon the earl, who behaved himſelf with great reſolution. However, as the confederate ſquadrons were wheeling, the French troops puſhed them upon the foot, and put two or three battalions into confuſion; but, by the conduct of the general officers, the enemy was ſoon repulſed. On the other ſide there happened an encounter between ſome of the ſquadrons of the French king's houſhold, ſome Daniſh ſquadrons, and ſome of the earl of Athlone's carabineers, who ſo remarkably diſtinguiſhed themſelves upon this occaſion, that the French were repulſed, though with conſiderable loſs on both ſides. By this time, the confederates were got under the cannon of Nimeguen, which, ſoon after, began to play upon the enemy, and the burghers ſignalized themſelves on this occaſion in an extraordinary manner, for, though they had not a gunner in the town, they managed their artillery with great ſucceſs. The Engliſh, who had the honour to cloſe the retreat, maintained their poſt in excellent order, being aſſiſted by the prince of Wirtemberg, who put a ſtop to the houſhold-troops, which were advanced very near them, and preparing to charge them towards the end of their march. Twenty battalions of foot were poſted in the outworks of Nimeguen, and the whole army was under arms all that night, as was the enemy likewiſe. The next morning, a great body of French horſe and foot advanced towards the allies, as if they intended to attack them; but this they did only to cover the march of their own army, which filed off towards Cleve, venting their rage at their diſappointment upon the defenceleſs country, which they rifled and laid waſte, deſtroying the park of Cleve, and all the delicious walks and avenues of that charming place. Thus was marſhal Boufflers diſappointed in his deſign upon Nimeguen, which, if taken, muſt have been followed with very fatal conſequences, for the French would have penetrated into the very heart of the United-Provinces: It was but indifferently provided for an attack, and the ſcheme was well laid againſt it, and wanted but little of being punctually executed, the enemy miſſing but half an hour of arriving in the outworks before the confederates. The earl of Athlone's conduct on this occaſion raiſed his credit, as much as it ſunk marſhal Boufflers, who, though he had a ſuperior army, animated by the preſence of ſo great a prince as the duke of Burgundy, was able to do nothing, but was unſucceſsful in every thing that he deſigned: and his parties, that at any time were engaged with thoſe of the earl, were defeated in almoſt every action.

The unſucceſsful attempt upon Nimeguen, and the reduction of Keyſerſwaert, were not the only mortifications, which the French ſuffered; for their army in Germany being but weak, and drawing together but ſlowly under the command of marſhal de Catinat, the Germans had an opportunity of laying ſiege to Landau[f]. This ſtrong and important place was inveſted on the 16th of June, N. S. by prince Lewis of Baden, who ſpent the reſt of the month in raiſing batteries, and making his approaches; and, on the 27th of July, the king of the Romans arrived in the confederate camp, in order to have the honour of taking the city: His train was ſo large, and his equipage ſo ſplendid that the expence of it put all the emperor's affairs in great diſorder; the moſt neceſſary things being neglected, while a needleſs piece of pomp conſumed ſo great a part of their treaſure. The ſiege was ſtopped for ſome weeks for want of ammunition; but at laſt the citadel was taken by ſtorm on the 9th of September, and, on the 12th the city ſurrendered.

This was the ſtate of the campaign, before the earl of Marlborough left England, from whence he ſet out on the 12th of May, and upon his arrival at the Hague, having the character of embaſſador as well as captain-general, he had ſeveral conferences with the States, in which he gave them all poſſible aſſurances of the queen's affection and reſolution to ſupport them in all emergencies. The earl of Athlone was ſet on by the Dutch generals, to inſiſt on his quality of Velt-marſhal, and to have the command with the earl of Marlborough by turns. But, though he was now in high reputation by his late conduct, the States obliged him to yield this point to the earl of Marlborough, whom they declared generaliſſimo of all their forces, and ſent orders to all their generals and other officers to obey him. The earl, on his part, made ſo modeſt and becoming a uſe of the power put into his hands, as ſoon gained him the hearts of all the general officers under him; and, to the earl of Athlone in particular, he behaved in ſo obliging a manner, that the command ſeemed to be equal between them.

All things being now regulated with the deputies of the States, the earl left the Hague on the 30th of June, N. S. and went to Breda; from whence he ſent what detachments could be ſpared from that place and other garriſons, to the camp at Nimeguen. He followed thither himſelf on the 2d of July, where, the next day, the earl of Athlone, lieutenant-general Dopff, and the other general officers, made him a viſit; and, at an interview with them, he gave the neceſſary orders for drawing the army together. Nineteen battalions of the troops, which had been employed at the ſiege of Keyſerſwaert; the troops of Heſſe and Lunenburgh; the Engliſh forces from Breda under major-general Lumley, and other troops, having joined the army, a camp was formed at Duckemberg and Budweick, conſiſting of ſeventy-ſix battalions of foot, and one hundred and twenty ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, amounting together to about ſixty thouſand men, with ſixty-two cannon, eight mortars and hawbitz, and four and twenty pontoons. Thither the earl went likewiſe, and, on the 8th, called a council of war of all the general officers, to concert the further operations of the campaign.

The earl of Athlone was always inclined to be cautious and ſure, but withal feeble counſels; but the earl of Marlborough, when the army was thus brought together, finding his force ſuperior to the duke of Burgundy, on the 16th paſſed the Maeſe, and encamped at Over-Aſſelt near Grave, within two leagues and a half of the enemy, who had intrenched themſelves between Goch and Gennep. On the 26th, the confederate army repaſſed the Maeſe below the Grave; and, on the 28th, encamped at Geldorp, upon which motion the French paſſed the ſame river about Venlo. Two days after, the allies removed from Geldorp to Gravenbroeck, where finding a French garriſon in the caſtle, ſeated in a moraſs, and ſurrounded by a double ditch and good paliſadoes, a detachment, under the command of lord Cutts, briſkly attacked it, and, with the aſſiſtance of four cannon and two hawbitz, after a ſhort reſiſtance obliged the garriſon, conſiſting of a captain and an hundred men, to ſurrender at diſcretion. The ſame day, the Britiſh artillery arrived in the camp from Holland, under convoy of two Engliſh regiments of horſe, and two of foot, which had left England, in the beginning of June. On the 2d of Auguſt, N. S. they advanced to Petit-Brugel, following the French, who retreated as they advanced, ſo cloſe, that they were obliged to abandon the Spaniſh Guelderland, which was left to the diſcretion of the confederates. The earl of Marlborough was for venturing upon a deciſive action, for which end the whole army was ordered to their arms the next morning early. But the Dutch were afraid to put things to ſuch an hazard, and would not conſent to it. Penſionary Fagel, and thoſe who had the adminiſtration of affairs at the Hague, proceeded with the more caution, becauſe, upon the late king's death, thoſe, who had always oppoſed him, began to form parties in ſeveral of their towns, and were deſigning a change of government; ſo that any public misfortune, in their conduct, would have given great advantages to thoſe, who lay upon the watch for them. The penſionary was more particularly aimed at; and that made him more careful of running any riſque. Thoſe, who pretended to be judges, thought, that if the earl of Marlborough's advice had been followed, matters might have been brought to a happy deciſion; and the rather, as it appeared, that the French army was not above half got to their camp, greatly fatigued by an almoſt continual march of two days and two nights, and in the greateſt conſternation. But, as the earl was prudent in his conduct of the army, ſo was he careful not to take too much upon himſelf.

The duke of Burgundy finding himſelf obliged to retreat, as the confederate army advanced, thought this was not ſuitable to his dignity; and therefore left marſhal Boufflers to command, ending his firſt campaign very ingloriouſly; and it appears, that the French king was diſſatisfied with the conduct of the marſhal, for he never after repoſed any confidence in him.

The Dutch, who were ſo lately in the deepeſt conſternation upon the retreat of their army under the caſtle of Nimeguen, before the earl of Marlborough's arrival, had now the pleaſure to ſee the French fly in their turn; and thus were the United Provinces preſerved by the earl's prudence and vigilance, whilſt the duke of Burgundy, who came to the army to be taught how to fight, learned nothing but how to avoid an engagement.

The earl of Marlborough went on, taking ſeveral places, which made little or no reſiſtance; and finding at length, that the French were not to be brought to an engagement on equal terms, and the deputies of the States-General, who followed the army, having repreſented to him, that it was much more for the advantage of Holland to diſpoſſeſs the enemy of the places they held in the Spaniſh Guelderland, whereby the free navigation of the Maeſe was interrupted, and the important town of Maeſtricht in a manner blocked up, he therefore diſpoſed all things for the ſiege of Venlo. In the mean time, General Schultz was ordered to reduce the town and caſtle of Wertz, which capitulated after a ſhort reſiſtance.

On the 7th of September, the trenches were opened on both ſides the Maeſe, and the town of Venlo ſurrendered on the 25th of the ſame month, after fort St. Michael had been ſtormed and taken by the Engliſh under the command of the lord Cutts, who with ſeveral officers of the ſame nation, particularly the young earl of Huntington[g], ſhewed an incredible bravery on that hazardous occaſion.

The earl proceeded with the army under his command to ſit down before Ruremond, the ſecond city of Guelders, ſtanding upon the Maeſe, at the confluence of that river and the Roer; which, after a very vigorous ſiege, beat a parly on the 6th of October, and the next day ſurrendered upon articles. The ſame time Stevenſwaert, a notified place ſeated on the Maeſe, about five miles from Ruremond to the ſouth, capitulated likewiſe. Upon the ſucceſſes of the confederates, marſhal Boufflers thought it high time to provide for the ſecurity of Liege[h], which he juſtly apprehended to be in no ſmall danger. Being accompanied therefore with the duke of Mayne, and taking with him ſome engineers, he went to view the fortifications of the citadel, and, after that, the [f] Landau is a little but ſtrong city of Germany in the Lower Alſatia, upon the confines of the Palatinate of the Rhine; once imperial, but yielded to the French by the treaty of Munſter. This town was the great magazine, where the French, after they had plundered moſt of the towns of the Palatinate in 1688, laid up the booty, all which was burnt by an accidental fire in May 1689. It was now taken from the French by the Germans, but they retook it in 1703, as will be ſeen in the hiſtory of the next campaign. In 1704, the imperialiſts reduced it again after the battle of Blenheim. It ſtands on the Queich, eight miles ſouth of Neuſtadt, and ſixteen ſouth-weſt of Spires.

[g] The young earl ſhewed, upon this and many other occaſions, an extraordinary heat of courage. He called to the ſoldiers who had got over the paliſadoes to help him over, promiſing them all the money he had about him; which promiſe he generouſly performed, and led them on with much bravery and ſucceſs. Burnet II. 325.

[h] Liege is a very conſiderable city, ſituated in a pleaſant valley, environed with hills, the river entering it in two branches, accompanied with leſſer ſtreams, which make many delightful iſlands. On the brow of a hill which hangs over it, ſtands the citadel (or caſtle) of great ſtrength, built to command the town; without which, it would be but of ſmall conſequence. Here is a famous univerſity, endowed with large eccleſiaſtical revenues. There are alſo eight collegiate and thirty-two parochial Churches. It was taken this year by the confederates, and inveſted in 1705, by the French; who broke up the ſiege, and retired behind their lines, upon the news of the duke of Marlborough's ſpeedy return with his army from the Moſelle. It was reſtored to the elector of Cologne in 1714.

moſt conſiderable poſts between that city and Maeſtricht, as if he intended to incamp there; but, finding it impracticable by the approach of the confederates, who were marching towards Liege, he retreated to Tongeren with great precipitation, and went towards Brabant, to defend ſuch places, as at that time were not intended to be attacked.

When the confederate army came before Liege, they found the ſuburbs of St. Walburgh ſet on fire by the French garriſon, who were retired, part into the citadel, and part into the Chartreuſe, after which the city was delivered up to the beſiegers, by a treaty between the earl of Marlborough, the deputies of the States-General, and commiſſioners from the chapter and magiſtracy. Six days after, the trenches were opened againſt the great citadel, which was taken by ſtorm, notwithſtanding de Violaine, the governor, five days before upon a ſummons to ſurrender, ſent the earl of Marlborough word, "That it would be time enough to think of that ſix weeks hence." The aſſailants having exerted an amazing courage in this attack, and put moſt of the garriſon to the ſword, gained a conſiderable booty, beſides honour; for, in the caſh of treaſure alone, there were three hundred thouſand florins in gold and ſilver, and notes for one million two hundred thouſand florins upon ſubſtantial merchants at Liege, which were all accepted and turned into ready money [i]. This victory was ſoon after compleated by the ſurrender of the Chartreuſe, the garriſon of which place, having capitulated, were conducted to Antwerp.

Thus ended the campaign with great ſucceſs, many places having been taken with little reſiſtance, and an inconſiderable loſs either of time or of men. The earl of Marlborough's conduct gained him the hearts of the army, and the States-General were highly ſatisfied with every thing he did; and the earl of Athlone did him the juſtice to own, that he had differed in opinion from him in every thing that was done, and that therefore the honour of their ſucceſs was entirely owing to him.

Upon the breaking up of the army in November, an accident happened that had like to have loſt all the advantages and honour gained in this glorious campaign. The earl of Marlborough, the day the army ſeparated, went to Maeſtricht; and he thought the eaſieſt and quickeſt, as well as ſafeſt, way of returning to the Hague, was by ſome of thoſe great boats that paſs on the Maeſe. He had twenty-five ſoldiers, commanded by a lieutenant, in the boat with him to ſerve as a guard. The next morning he came to Ruremond, where he joined monſieur Cohorn; and, having dined with the prince of Holſtein-Beck, governor of that place, they continued their voyage together, having ſixty men in a larger boat, which was to be before them. There were likewiſe fifty horſe ordered to ride along the banks of the river. About ſeven that evening they came to Venlo, where the party of horſe being relieved by a like number out of that garriſon, they purſued their way down the river. The great boat, in which general Cohorn was, out-ſailed the other, and the troopers on ſhore miſtook their way in the night. The French had yet the town of Guelders in their hands, which was indeed the only place they had left in Spaniſh Guelderland. A party of five and thirty men from thence was lurking on the banks of the river near three leagues below Venlo, waiting for an adventure; and, the company being all aſleep, they ſeized by ſurprize, between eleven and twelve at night, the rope by which the boat was drawn, and hauled it on ſhore. They immediately made a diſcharge of their ſmall arms, and threw ſeveral grenadoes into the boat, by which ſome of the ſoldiers were wounded.

This done, they entered and ſeized the boat, with all who were in it, before they could get in any order to make oppoſition. With the earl were monſieur Opdam, one of the Dutch generals, and monſieur Gueldermalſen, one of the deputies of the States. They did not know the earl, but they knew the other two, who both had paſſes, according to a civility uſually practiſed by the generals on both ſides. The earl of Marlborough's brother had one, but, his ill ſtate of health having made him leave the campaign, it remained in the hands of his ſecretary, and now was made uſe of by the earl. The date indeed was out; but the preſence of mind, with which he produced it, and their hurry in the night, prevented that from being conſidered. They therefore only rifled the boat, ſearched the trunks and baggage, emptied them of what plate and things of value they found, and took preſents from thoſe, whom they believed to be protected by their paſſes; and then, after having ſtopped them ſeveral hours, and taken the earl's guard of foot priſoners, they let them go. The governor of Venlo, having notice that the earl was taken, but not being informed of the circumſtances which followed, preſumed that he was carried priſoner to Guelders, and therefore marched out immediately with his whole garriſon to inveſt that place. The news of it, likewiſe coming to the Hague in the ſame imperfect manner, put the States under no ſmall conſternation. They immediately aſſembled, and reſolved to ſend orders to all their forces to march immediately to Guelders, to threaten the garriſon with the utmoſt extremities, unleſs they ſhould deliver the priſoners, and never leave the place, till either they had taken it, or the generals were ſet free. But, before theſe orders could be diſpatched, the earl of Marlborough came to the Hague, where he was received with inexpreſſible joy, not only by the States, but by all the inhabitants, for he was beloved there to a high degree. He was complimented upon his eſcape by penſionary Heinſius, in the name of the States.

The neceſſity of the French king's affairs had forced him, before the loſs of Landau, to grant the elector of Bavaria all his demands; but he had not agreed to what the elector aſked, till that city was given for loſt; and then, ſeeing that the prince of Baden might over-run all the Hondruck, and carry his winter-quarters into the neighbourhood of France, it was neceſſary to gain this elector on any terms. If this agreement had been made ſooner, probably, the ſiege of Landau, how far ſoever it was advanced, muſt have been raiſed. The elector made his declaration in favour of France, when he poſſeſſed himſelf of Ulm, a rich free town of the empire, in the circle of Swabia. It was taken, on the 8th of September, by a ſtratagem, that however ſucceſsful it proved to the elector, was fatal to him, who conducted it; for he was killed by an accident, after he was poſſeſſed of the town [k].

The dyet of the empire was ſo incenſed at the treachery of the elector of Bavaria in ſeizing Ulm, that, after a warm debate, it was reſolved by a plurality of voices, to declare war againſt the French king and the duke of Anjou; and a memorial was ordered to be drawn up, requeſting his imperial majeſty to proceed againſt the elector, according to the conſtitutions of the empire. The miniſters of the electors of Bavaria and Cologne were forbid to appear any more in the general dyet; notwithſtanding which, the elector of Bavaria proteſted againſt theſe proceedings, and particularly againſt the declaration of war, alledging, "That an offenſive war, like this, ought to be reſolved on by common conſent, and not by plurality of voices." To which it was anſwered, "That the king of France had attacked the empire, by invading, not only in his own name, but in the name of the duke of Anjou, his grandſon, ſeveral fiefs of the empire in Italy, the archbiſhopric of Cologne, and the dioceſe of Liege; as alſo by diſturbing the trade of the Rhine, and committing ſeveral other hoſtilities, which rendered this war defenſive, and not offenſive, on the ſide of the empire." But no regard was had to his proteſt; and the empire's declaration of war was publiſhed and notified to the cardinal of Lamberg, the emperor's commiſſioner, on the 30th of September, N. S. by the elector of Mentz, in the name of the dyet of Ratiſbon.

The taking of Ulm had given ſo great an alarm to the neighbouring circles and princes, that they called away their troops from the prince of Baden to their own defence; by which means his army was much diminiſhed; but, with the troops, that were left him, he ſtudied to cut off the communication between Straſburgh and Ulm. After the taking of Ulm, the French made themſelves maſters of the little town of Newburg, on the Rhine, and in the circle of Swabia. This gave great uneaſineſs to prince Lewis of Baden, who made a motion with part of his army, to retake it, and to cover Briſac; but he was ſo much weakened by the detachments, that had been ſent to Swabia, in order to hinder the conjunction of the Bavarians and French, that he had not above eight thouſand men in his camp near Fridlinguen. The enemy, having intelligence of this, thought there could not be a more ſeaſonable opportunity to attack him; for which purpoſe, the French, who were divided in two bodies

[i] 'Tis ſaid an Engliſh grenadier got a thouſand Louis d'ors in a bag for his ſhare. The extraordinary bravery of the hereditary prince of Heſſe Caſſel deſerves the higheſt encomium; who went volunteer to the attack at the head of the grenadiers, and, mounting the breach the very firſt, took the colours from a French officer. Mr. Wentworth (brother to the lord Raby) who likewiſe went volunteer in the ſaid attack, was killed. Monſieur de Violaine (governor of the citadel) and the duke of Charoſt, were taken priſoners upon the breach, and brought to the earl of Marlborough's quarters.

[k] This project was executed by monſieur Peckman lieutenant colonel of the elector's guards. Ulm is a ſtrong and populous city in the circle of Swabia, free and imperial, adorned with many ſtately edifices; particularly with a cathedral extolled beyond any in Germany. It ſtands on the Danube and Iller, thirty-eight miles weſt of Augſburg.

(one commanded by the marquis de Villars, and the other by count de Guiſcard) paſſed the Rhine with the infantry, which, the next day were followed by the cavalry. The prince of Baden, upon this, decamped from Fridlinguen, for fear of being incloſed by the two bodies of the French; and, whilſt he was upon the march, count Merci, who brought up the rear with four hundred horſe, ſent him word, that Villars was advancing towards him with thirty battalions and forty ſquadrons, in order of battle. Hereupon the prince cauſed his army to face about, which being not above fifteen hundred paces from the enemy, both ſides made a halt, and the prince began the engagement by cannonading the French. The Imperialiſts, being then attacked, puſhed the enemy with great vigour; and, coming down into the plain, charged ſo briſkly the right wing of the French army, that there was ſcarce ever ſeen a more obſtinate and bloody battle, which continued for near two hours. But, the Imperialiſts being much weaker than the French, and the count de Guiſcard coming up with ſuccours, the ſecond line of the Imperial cavalry was, on a ſudden, put into ſuch diſorder, that all the horſe quitted the field in great confuſion. The prince now thought it high time to make the beſt retreat he could with his infantry; but they, contrary to his expectation, fell in with the French foot with ſuch undaunted bravery, that they broke their ranks, and drove them from their ground into a wood adjoining, through which they purſued them almoſt to Hunningen. The French horſe all this while ſtood ſtill, and ſeemed to be only ſpectators of the defeat of their infantry; but, obſerving their foot to be entirely routed, they likewiſe made their retreat.

The prince having thus obtained the victory, continued about five hours in the field of battle, and then directed his march towards Stauffen. Notwithſtanding theſe diſadvantages of the enemy, the French king ordered Te Deum to be ſung, as if his troops had been victorious[1]; and, to ſupport the reputation of it, aſſerted, they took Fridlinguen the next day, and, upon this occaſion, raiſed the marquis de Villars to the dignity of marſhal of France. But, prince Lewis of Baden being willing to let all the world know the contrary, and that this action had no ways diſconcerted his meaſures, he made three detachments from his army, one towards the Black Foreſt, to block up the paſſage into Bavaria; another, to attack Newburg; and a third, to reinforce the prince of Saxe Meiningen, who was obſerving the motions of count Tallard and the marquis de Lomaria. But, before this, he aſſembled all his troops, and being reinforced by general Thungen with fifteen hundred men, he formed ſo conſiderable an army, that he deſired nothing more than a ſecond engagement with Villars; and for that purpoſe advanced with his army, intending to attack him; but the marſhal not thinking fit to wait his approach, repaſſed the Rhine, and ſo was diſappointed by this action of joining the elector of Bavaria.

The latter end of October, count Tallard and the marquis de Lomaria, with a body of eighteen thouſand men, made themſelves maſters of Treves; and, then advancing towards Traerbach, they took that place after a very ſtout reſiſtance. On the other ſide, the hereditary prince of Heſſe Caſſel, marching from the grand army at Liege with nine thouſand Heſſians, and finding that the French had poſſeſſed themſelves of Zinch, Lintz, Briſac, and Andernach, retook thoſe places. The garriſon of Zinch ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war; thoſe of Briſac quitted the place upon the prince's approach; but Andernach, being defended by a garriſon of four hundred men, a good wall, rampart, and mole, made a longer reſiſtance. However, the Heſſians having raiſed a battery, and poſſeſſed themſelves in the night of an advantageous poſt near one of the gates, in order to ſtorm the place the next morning, the enemy beat a parley, and the prince gave them leave to march out with their arms and baggage, but refuſed them the honour of any articles. He then marched away with two thouſand men to attack Lintz, but the French immediately quitted the place, and retired to Bonne.

In Italy, the duke of Vendoſme began with the relief of Mantua, which was reduced to great extremities by the long blockade which prince Eugene had kept about it, who had ſo fortified the Oglio, that the duke, apprehending the difficulty of forcing his poſts, marched through the Venetian territories, notwithſtanding the proteſtations of the republic againſt it, and came to Goito with a great convoy for Mantua. Prince Eugene drew his army all along the Mantuan Foſſa, down to Borgofortes. He was forced to abandon a great many places; but, apprehending that Berſello might be beſieged, and conſidering the importance of that place, he put a ſtrong garriſon into it. He complained much, that the court of Vienna ſeemed to forget him, and did not ſend him the reinforcements they had promiſed. And it was thought, that his enemies at that court, under colour of ſupporting the king of the Romans in his firſt campaign, were willing to neglect every thing that related to him; by which means the beſt army that the emperor ever had, was left to moulder away to nothing.

King Philip of Spain took a very extraordinary reſolution of going over to Italy, to poſſeſs himſelf of the kingdom of Naples, and to put an end to the war in Lombardy. He

[1] Father Daniel affirms, that marſhal Villars defeated the Imperial army in this battle; and that the latter left three thouſand dead upon the place; and that nine hundred were taken priſoners, beſides eleven pieces of cannon, thirty-five ſtandards, four pair of kettle-drums, and five hundred waggons laden with ammunition; whereas the French loſt only one thouſand or eleven hundred men. The marquis de Feuquieres's account of this battle is as follows: "The action, ſays he, at Fridlinguen has been dignified with the name of a battle, though it was properly no more than a great engagement of foot and horſe, ſince both thoſe bodies fought ſeparately. The particulars are theſe: Marſhal de Villars, having been detached with a body of troops from the king's main army in Alſatia to defend a work raiſed for the ſecurity of the bridge of Hunningen, which the enemy ſeemed diſpoſed to attack, formed his camp on this ſide of Hunningen, and near enough to protect the outworks, and with a view to improve the enemy's decampment to the beſt advantage in his power, ſhould that incident happen. The enemy's forces were encamped in a plain, that extended between the Rhine and a mountain oppoſite to the work that covered the bridge. Their left was near the territory of Baſil, and their right was ſtretched out towards the village of Fridlinguen, in the front of which was a large redoubt built ſince the war began, to ſecure the country againſt the excurſions of the garriſon of Hunningen. In this diſpoſition of our troops and thoſe of the enemy, M. de Villars was attentive to the manner in which the latter would decamp, when they ſhould be preparing for their winter-quarters. The enemy neglected the neceſſary precautions, when they decamped, through a perſuaſion, that they might form that motion, without any apprehenſions of being purſued in their retreat; and that they ſhould ſoon be at a ſecure diſtance from an army, which muſt paſs the Rhine on a ſingle bridge, in order to be vigilant enough to incommode their rear-guard. They likewiſe propoſed to march their foot on the riſing ground behind their camp, and the horſe were to advance on their right, and paſs through the defile of Fridlinguen, which was fronted by the redoubt abovementioned. When the enemy began to form their motion in the view of M. de Villars, this general gave orders for his army to paſs the Rhine; which they accordingly did with all poſſible expedition; after which he divided them in the ſame manner as he had ſeen the enemy's forces diſpoſed when they began their retreat. The foot marched under the command of M. Deſbordes to the eminence, on which the enemy's foot were in motion; and, as theſe did not wheel about to oppoſe our forces, who aſcended the riſing ground with great difficulty, they ſoon beheld their rear-guard approached by our foot, who marched with ſuch immoderate vivacity, that they were obliged to halt till they could recover breath. Had the enemy advanced to our battalions, while they were thus incapable of defending themſelves, they, in all probability, would have been victorious. But M. de Villars, who had entertained juſt apprehenſions of this inconvenience, marched thither in perſon, and gave the foot ſufficient time to form themſelves in order. The two bodies, however, did not charge in a line: our foot advanced very near thoſe of the enemy in their retreat, but could not bring them to engage in front: and therefore it cannot be ſaid, that they were defeated. The engagement between the horſe was much more deciſive, partly through the neglect of the officer who commanded the enemy's troops, and partly through the prudence and capacity of M. de Magnac, who commanded the king's forces in this action. As the conduct of this general officer appears to me to have been very judicious and well concerted on this occaſion, I ſhall be as exact as poſſible in relating the particulars. I have already declared, that the plain, where the enemy had encamped, extended to the village of Fridlinguen, the avenue to which formed a conſiderable defile fronted by a redoubt, where the enemy had planted cannon, and poſted a body of foot. The general officer, who commanded the enemy's horſe, imagined, when he began his march, that his troops would have ſufficient time to paſs the defile, before they could be overtaken by ours, who at that time had not compleated their paſſage over the Rhine. But he was deceived in his expectation by the vigour of our march, which was ſo extraordinary, that the enemy was obliged to recall thoſe of their troops who had entered the defile, and to form themſelves in order of battle, to receive our horſe, who were advancing to charge them. This body of the enemy's horſe might have been diſpoſed in ſuch a manner, as to have had their right covered by the redoubt, and their left might have been ſupported by an incloſed country, that was impracticable for the horſe, who were at the bottom of the eminence, on which the enemy's foot purſued their march. The enemy by this diſpoſition might have formed three or four lines of battle, and have ſuſtained the charge of our horſe, whoſe left would have been expoſed to the fire of the foot and cannon of the redoubt, before they could be capable of engaging. M. de Magnac, by a motion peculiar to the genius of an experienced officer, effectually diſconcerted the diſpoſition, into which the enemy might have formed themſelves, and made them loſe all the advantages that would have reſulted from it. When the troops were on the point of action, he diſcovered a ſeeming fear to engage, and cauſed the firſt line to file off behind the ſecond, as if he intended to retreat with the greateſt precaution. The enemy, elated at their ſuperior force, were perſuaded that this motion of M. de Magnac proceeded from his fear to begin an engagement with an army, whom he only intended to incommode in their retreat, when he found their front engaged in the defile; and upon this preſumption they loſt the advantage of their diſpoſition. Our general then advanced, and at the ſame time formed an opening, to give his troops an opportunity of doubling the firſt and ſecond line. This motion could not be accompliſhed without conſiderable danger ſo near an enemy, who diſcovered ſuch impatience to engage. But M. de Magnac very judiciouſly improved this warmth of theirs to his own advantage. The moment the enemy had diſconcerted their order of battle, and, by extending their right loſt the advantage of being protected by the fire from the redoubt, he charged them ſo opportunely, that he puſhed their firſt line upon the others that were not entirely formed, and drove them into the defile in the utmoſt confuſion, without any apprehenſions of the fire from the redoubt, which could not then be directed againſt us, becauſe it would have been equally fatal to their own troops who were intermixed with ours."

arrived at Naples in April, and was received there with outward ſplendor, but made little progreſs in quieting the minds of that turbulent kingdom. Neither did he obtain the inveſtiture of it from the pope, though his holineſs had ſent to him a cardinal legate with a high compliment. This the Germans thought was too much, while the French conſidered it as not enough; however, upon it the emperor's embaſſador left Rome. King Philip was conducted from Naples to Final by the French fleet, that had carried him from Barcelona to Naples. As he was going to command the duke of Vendoſme's army, he was met by the duke of Savoy, of whom there was ſome jealouſy, that having married his two daughters ſo greatly, he begannow to diſcern his own diſtinct intereſt, which called upon him to hinder the French from being maſters of the Milaneſe. King Philip wrote to the duke of Vendoſme not to fight prince Eugene, till he could join him. He ſeemed jealous, leſt that prince ſhould be driven out of Italy, before he could come to ſhare in the honour of it; yet, when he came, he could do nothing, though the prince was miſerably abandoned by the court of Vienna. Count Mansfield, preſident of the council of war, was much ſuſpected of being corrupted by the court of France. The ſupplies promiſed were not ſent to Italy: The apprehenſions they were under of the elector of Bavaria's declaring, ſome time before he did it, gave a colour to thoſe who were jealous of prince Eugene's glory, to detain the recruits and troops that had been promiſed him, for the emperor's own defence. But, though he was thus forſaken, the prince managed the force he had with great ſkill and conduct; and when he ſaw that Luzzara, a caſtle near the Po, in the duchy of Guaſtalla, was in danger, he marched with twenty-five thouſand men againſt the French and Spaniſh army, which conſiſted of about forty thouſand, commanded by king Philip and the duke of Vendoſme. He gave the ſignal of battle about five in the evening, on the 15th of Auguſt, and then the artillery began to play upon the enemy. About half an hour after, the right wing of the Imperialiſts charged the left of the French, and attacked them in their poſt, which extended itſelf along the banks of the Po; but without ſucceſs; for the prince of Commerci, who was extremely beloved, being killed on the ſpot, ſtruck the troops commanded by him with ſuch a conſternation, that three battalions and as many ſquadrons were put into diſorder by the enemy's ſmall ſhot, and the furious onſet of the cavalry, which charged the flank of the Imperial horſe. But this confuſion was ſoon over; for the battalions and ſquadrons, that gave ground, rallied again; and, ſeveral regiments advancing to their relief, they charged the enemy ſo vigorouſly, that they were driven to their poſt. And though the French king's gens d'armes made a very ſtout reſiſtance, and rallied four times in their retreat; yet they were chaced above a thouſand paces, from one intrenchment to another. The left wing fought with as great reſolution and intrepidity as the right; for general Guido de Staremberg, who commanded the infantry began the attack with the grenadiers; and, though the enemy endeavoured to penetrate their flank with their carabineers, the Imperialiſts ſtood their charge with ſuch extraordinary courage and firmneſs, and afterwards fell upon them with ſo much bravery, that they could no longer ſtand it, but were forced to retreat. Sometimes they rallied by favour of the ground, and the ſuperiority of their numbers; but being repulſed three or four times, they were quite driven out of their poſts; and night put an end to the engagement. All the Imperial officers and troops acquitted themſelves of their duty to admiration. The French pretended to the honour of the action from the conſequence of it, having, the next day, made themſelves maſters of Luzzara, and in the remaining part of the campaign diſlodged the Germans from ſeveral ſmall poſts [m]. But it muſt be owned by the impartial, that the Imperialiſts gained the advantage of the day, having driven the enemy above a thouſand paces from the field of battle, and actually encamped upon it. They likewiſe made themſelves maſters of their ammunition and proviſion, a great number of their tents, and of all their pioneering inſtruments. Beſides, the enemy's loſs was not computed to be leſs than eight thouſand men; whereas, the number of the Imperialiſts was not more than two thouſand ſix hundred and ſeventy-two killed and wounded. The event of this action alſo put the French to ſuch a ſtop, that all they could do, after this, was only to take a few inconſiderable places; while prince Eugene ſtill kept his poſts; and king Philip at the end of ſo inglorious a campaign, returned into Spain, where the grandees were extremely diſguſted to ſee themſelves ſo much deſpiſed, and their affairs wholly conducted by French councils.

The French tried this ſummer by all poſſible means to engage the Turks in a new war with the emperor; and it was believed, that the Grand Vizir was entirely gained, though the Mufti, and all who had any credit in that court, were againſt it. But, the Grand vizir being ſtrangled, the deſign was prevented.

The court of France was engaged likewiſe in another intrigue in Poland, where they made uſe of the cardinal primate to keep that kingdom ſtill embroiled. The king of Sweden marched on to Cracow, which was much cenſured as a deſperate attempt, ſince a defeat there muſt have deſtroyed him and his army entirely, being ſo far from home. He attacked the king of Poland, and gave him ſuch an overthrow, that, though the army eſcaped, he made himſelf maſter both of their camp and artillery. He poſſeſſed himſelf of Cracow, where he ſtayed ſome months, till he had raiſed all the money they could produce; and, though the Muſcovites with the Lithuanians deſtroyed Livonia, and broke into Sweden, yet that could not draw him back. The Duke of Holſtein, who had married his eldeſt ſiſter, was thought to have been gained by the French to puſh on this young king to proſecute the war with ſuch an unrelenting fury, in which he might have a deſign for himſelf, ſince the king of Sweden's venturing his own perſon ſo freely might make way for his ducheſs to ſucceed to the crown. But that duke was killed in the battle of Liſſaw near Cracow. There was ſome hopes of peace this winter; but the two kings of Poland and Sweden were ſo exaſperated againſt each other, that it ſeemed impoſſible to compoſe that animoſity. This was very unacceptable to the allies, for both kings were well inclined to ſupport the confederacy, and to engage in the war againſt France, if their own diſputes could have been adjuſted.

[m] Father Daniel tells us, that prince Eugene claimed the victory without any other reaſon, than that his army was not put to flight; and that he had five or ſix thouſand killed or wounded; whereas, on the French ſide, there were only between two and three thouſand killed or wounded. He obſerves likewiſe, that ſcarce any but the foot were engaged, by reaſon of the diſpoſition of the ground. The marquis de Feuquieres gives the following account of this battle: 'After the action at the Croſtolo, the king's army marched to Luzzara, and the bridges which the enemy had on the Po, with an intention to cut off all their communication with Mirandola and the Modeneſe. As they had ſeveral rivers and artificial canals to paſs, they began their march with all proper precaution, and in as many columns as they could poſſibly form. A body of horſe was ordered to advance before the army, to give intelligence of what they diſcovered. We had not received any information that prince Eugene was in motion; and we believed him to be then in Seraglio, as he was when we approached him from Mantua. But this prince had paſſed the Po with the greateſt part of his army, and was then poſted between this river and the Zero, and ſo well covered by the dike of Zero, that we had no ſuſpicion of his being ſo near us with his army, becauſe, when our march was almoſt compleated, the officer who commanded the body of horſe that advanced before the army, had not the curioſity to aſcend this dike of Zero, behind which the emperor's whole army was drawn up. This negligence was too great in ſuch a conjuncture, and ſhould ſerve as a warning for the prevention of the like inconvenience. When the king's forces, who continued their march, and conſequently were ſtill in columns, were preparing to enter their camp at Luzzara, they immediately beheld themſelves under the fire of the enemy's foot, who had been regularly drawn up below the reverſe of the dike, and only waited to aſcend it, in order to fire. We were obliged therefore, upon our arrival at our camp, to form ourſelves in order of battle, and engage the enemy. Several hedges roſe between the front of the army and the dike, ſo that it was impoſſible for the lines to charge in front. The enemy, however, attempted, in ſeveral places, to advance up to our battalions, but without any ſucceſs. The horſe to our right had an open country before them, and they had ſome encounters, though with very little effect, becauſe the enemy ſaw, that the attack in front would not be ſo ſucceſsful as they could wiſh, and that the horſe of our right, who, in their march, had advanced a little too far beyond the columns of foot, had at that time recovered their ground, and formed a line to the right of the foot. This battle therefore was fought without any apparent advantage on either ſide. Our army, however, encamped within cannon-ſhot of the enemy, without perceiving them, becauſe they were poſted behind the dike, and we entrenched our camp with an intention to make ourſelves maſters of Luzzara and Guaſtalla, which lay in the rear of our left; and we accordingly took thoſe places, and conſequently decided the advantage in our favour, ſince the the enemy continued for ſeveral days in their poſt, without making any attempt to preſerve Guaſtalla. This project was framed by prince Eugene, and would have been compleat in all its parts, had the execution proved as fortunate as the plan was judicious. And indeed the king's army was preſerved in this conjuncture by a circumſtance, that was purely accidental, and which it was impoſſible for prince Eugene to foreſee. This circumſtance was of ſuch importance to our troops, that it merits a particular relation: The emperor's troops, as I have already obſerved, lay concealed behind the dike of Zero, and prince Eugene, who had not been diſcovered by the body of horſe that marched before the reſt of our forces, becauſe they halted at the front of the camp, without extending their view any farther, was now very near our army, who had not any ſuſpicion of our ſituation. The prince therefore concluded, that our troops, upon their arrival at their poſt, would lay down their arms, and form their camp, and that the horſe would afterwards march out to forage, while the foot would be providing for their refreſhment; and, that if he improved this favourable opportunity, by advancing to the foot of our camp, he ſhould be able to ſeize all our arms, and a conſiderable number of our horſes, upon which the entire deſtruction of our army would have been inevitable. This project was conducted to the very point of execution, and prince Eugene was only waiting for the happy moment, when he was diſcovered by a mere effect of chance, time enough for our eſcape from the danger, and before the foot had diſperſed themſelves to provide for their accommodation. The accident, to which we owed our preſervation, was this: The dike of Zero is not extended in a direct line, for, as it forms the canal, that flows from the Po above Seraglio to another part of the ſame river at Rovero, it was neceſſary to make it correſpond with the level of the land; and it was carried on ſo near the front of our camp, that one of our adjutants thought it the moſt commodious poſt for a party of ſoldiers, who were to form the out-guard of the camp. This officer, therefore, as he was advancing with his guard, in order to ſtation them, had the curioſity to aſcend the dike, and to take a view of the country beyond it; and then ſaw all the enemy's foot lying with their faces to the oppoſite declivity of the dike, with the horſe in the rear ranged in order of battle. This diſcovery alarmed our camp through the line, and they immediately caught up their arms to oppoſe the enemy, who, as I intimated before, were ſeparated from them by a tract of land covered with hedges, which obliged them to defile. But this diſcovery did not prevent them from advancing to us, in hopes of diſordering our line in ſo many different parts, that we ſhould be in no condition to render their deſign ineffectual. But they were defeated in their expectations, as I obſerved before, and were incapable of making up to any part of the front of our camp.'

Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting on the continent, the confederate fleet was not idle. It conſiſted of fifty ſhips of the line, thirty Engliſh and twenty Dutch; the Engliſh commanded by ſir George Rooke, having under him vice-admiral Hopſon, and the rear-admirals Fairborne and Graydon; the Dutch under the command of lieutenant-admiral Allemond, admiral Callemburgh, the vice-admirals Vandergoes and Pieterſon, and rear-admiral Waſſenaer, with about fourteen thouſand land forces on board the tranſports, nine thouſand ſix hundred and ſixty-three Engliſh, and three thouſand nine hundred and twenty-four Dutch: the Engliſh commanded by ſir Henry Bellaſis, lieutenant-general; ſir Charles O Hara and lord Portmore, majors-general; and the colonels Seymour, Hamilton, and Matthews, brigadiers: and the Dutch by major-general Sparre and brigadier baron Palandt: the duke of Ormond had the ſupreme command of the whole. Sir George Rooke ſpoke ſo coldly of the deſign which he went upon, before he ſailed, that thoſe who converſed with him, were apt to infer that he intended to do the enemy as little harm as poſſible. On the 19th of June the fleet weighed from Spithead, and came to an anchor at St. Helen's, in order to ſail with the next fair wind. Three days after, the rear-admirals Fairborne and Graydon, were detached from thence with ſixteen men of war and two fire-ſhips, Engliſh, and a ſquadron of the Dutch, in all thirty ſail, upon a ſecret expedition; and, on the 23d, the prince of Heſſe d'Armſtadt ſailed in the Adventure frigate for Liſbon. Advice had been ſent over from Holland of a fleet that ſailed from France under Monſieur du Caſſe, and was ordered to call in at the Groyne. Sir John Munden was recommended by ſir George Rooke to be ſent againſt this fleet, and, though he came up with them with a ſuperior force, yet he did not hinder the French from getting into the Groyne, nor fight them there.

Upon his return therefore to St. Helen's, where he arrived on the 25th of June, a court-martial, of which ſir Cloudeſly Shovel was preſident, was appointed to try him. He was acquitted, ſome excuſing themſelves for their lenity to him, by alledging, that, if they had condemned him, the puniſhment was death; whereas they thought his errors flowed from a want of ſenſe; ſo that it would have been hard to condemn him for a defect of that, which nature had not given him. But this acquittal raiſed ſuch a public clamour, that the queen ordered him to be broke.

Sir George Rooke, to divert the deſign, which he himſelf was to go upon, wrote from St. Helen's, that the Dutch fleet was victualled only to the middle of September; ſo that no great deſign could be undertaken, when ſo large a part of the fleet was ſo ill provided. When the Dutch admiral heard of this, he ſent to their embaſſador to complain to the queen of this miſinformation, for he was victualled to the middle of December. On the 1ſt of July, the confederate fleet ſet ſail from St. Helen's, ſteering their courſe for Cadiz; but they were for ſome time ſtopped by contrary winds, accidents, and pretences, many of which were thought to be ſtrained and ſought for; however, at laſt, on the 12th of Auguſt, they came to anchor in the bay of Cadiz, about two leagues from that city. Sir George Rooke had laid no diſpoſition beforehand how to proceed upon his coming thither, and ſome days were loſt on pretence of ſeeking for intelligence. It is certain, that our court had falſe accounts of the ſtate of the place, with regard both to the garriſon and the fortifications; the garriſon being much ſtronger, and the fortifications in a much better condition, than had been repreſented. The French men of war, and the gallies, that lay in the bay, retired within the puntals. In the firſt ſurprize, it had been eaſy to have followed them, and to have taken or burnt them, which ſir Stafford Fairborne offered to execute; but ſir George Rooke and the reſt of his creatures did not approve of it [n]. Some days were loſt before a council of war was called. In the mean while, the duke of Ormond ſent ſome engineers and pilots to ſound the ſouth-ſide of Cadiz near the iſland of St. Pedro; but, while this was doing, the officers, by the taking of ſome boats, came to know, that the inhabitants of Cadiz had ſent over the beſt of their goods and other effects to Port St. Mary's, an open village over-againſt it, on the continent of Spain; ſo that there was good plunder to be had eaſily, whereas the landing on the iſle of Cadiz was like to prove dangerous, and, as ſome made them believe, impracticable. In the council of war, in which their inſtructions were read, it was propoſed to conſider, how they ſhould put them in execution. General O'Hara made a long ſpeech againſt landing; ſhewing, how deſperate an attempt it would prove, and how different they found the ſtate of the place from the repreſentations made of it in England. The greater number agreed with him, and all that the duke of Ormond could ſay to the contrary was of no effect. Sir George ſeemed to be of the ſame mind with the duke, but all his dependants were of another opinion; ſo that this was thought a piece of craft in him. In concluſion, the council of war came to a reſolution not to make a deſcent on the iſland of Cadiz; but, before they broke up, thoſe, whom the duke had ſent to ſound the landing-places on the ſouth-ſide, came and told them, that, as they might land ſafely, ſo the ſhips might ride ſecurely on that ſide. Yet they had no regard to this, but adhered to their former reſolution, nor were there any orders given for bombarding the town. The ſea was for the moſt part very high, while they lay there; but it was ſo calm for one day, that the engineers believed they could have done much miſchief, but they had no orders for it; and indeed it appeared very evidently, that they intended to do nothing but plunder Port St. Mary's; a deſign, which was directly contrary to the advice of Mr. Methuen, the Engliſh envoy in Portugal, who, in a letter to the duke of Ormond from Liſbon of the 1ſt of Auguſt, told him, "That the point of the greateſt importance was to inſinuate to the Spaniards, and ſhew by his proceedings, that he came not as an enemy to Spain, but only to free them from France, and give them aſſiſtance to eſtabliſh themſelves under the government of the houſe of Auſtria." However, the land-forces, being ſet aſhore in the Bay of Bulls, made themſelves maſters of Rota, Fort St. Katharine, and Port St. Mary, which they found deſerted, but full of riches, which were immediately plundered; ſome of the general officers ſetting a very ill example to all the reſt, eſpecially O'Hara and Bellaſis. The duke of Ormond tried to hinder this, but did not exert his authority; for, if he had made ſome examples at firſt, he might have prevented the miſchief, that was done. But, the whole army running ſo violently on the ſpoil, he either was not able, or, through a gentleneſs of temper, not willing to proceed to extremities. He had publiſhed a manifeſto, according to his inſtructions, by which the Spaniards were invited to ſubmit to the emperor; and he offered his protection to all, that came in to him. But the plundering of St. Mary's was thought an ill commentary on that text. After ſome days of unſucceſsful attempts on the forts of that ſide, particularly Matagorda, it appeared, that nothing could be done; and, proviſions now growing ſcarce, and the ſea officers repreſenting the danger of ſtaying any longer in thoſe ſeas, the duke of Ormond, though not without great reluctance, conſented to the re-embarking of the land-forces. Some of the ſhips crews were ſo employed in bringing off and beſtowing the plunder, that they took not the neceſſary care to furniſh themſelves with freſh water. Sir George Rooke, without proſecuting his other inſtructions, in caſe the deſign on Cadiz failed, gave orders only for a ſquadron to ſail to the Weſt-Indies, with ſome land-forces, and, though he had a fleet of victuallers, that had proviſions to the middle of December, he ordered them to ſail home; by which means the men of war were ſo ſcantily furniſhed, that they were ſoon forced to be put on ſhort allowance. Nor did he ſend advice-boats, either to the ports of Algarve or to Liſbon, to ſee what orders or advices might be lying there for him, but ſailed in a direct courſe for England [o].

Some time before this, the news of the arrival of the [n] Fairborne propoſed the ordering a ſquadron of ſhips, before the fleet came in ſight of Cadiz, to puſh through the entrance of the harbour, without coming to an anchor at all, which he offered to undertake. Had this advice been followed, they might, in the firſt ſurprize of the Spaniards, have deſtroyed at leaſt their ſhipping, if not taken the place; but, it being not thought adviſeable to make ſuch an attempt, the Spaniards had not only the leiſure, while the fleet lay in view, of ſinking veſſels in the very entrance of the harbour, whereby the paſſage was rendered impracticable, but to put themſelves into a much better condition of defending the city itſelf, than they would otherwiſe have been. Burchet, p. 622.

[o] Thus ended (ſays biſhop Burnet) the expedition againſt Cadiz, which was ill projected, and worſe executed. The duke of Ormond told him, he had not half the ammunition that was neceſſary for the taking Cadiz, if the Spaniards had defended themſelves well: Though, he believed, they would

French ſquadron, under monſieur Chateau-Renault, with the Spaniſh galleons, in the harbour of Vigo, being brought to England, orders were immediately diſpatched to ſir George Rooke, to attempt the taking or deſtroying of them; and ſir Cloudeſly Shovel was ordered upon the ſame deſign, with another ſquadron of men of war. But, before theſe orders could reach the grand fleet, ſir George Rooke, in his return towards England, having, on the 22d of September, ſent the Eagle, Sterling-Caſtle, and Pembroke, to water in Lagos-Bay, Mr. Beauvoir, the chaplain of the Pembroke, went aſhore in the town of Lagos, and, meeting with a gentleman in the ſtreet, whom, by ſeveral circumſtances, he judged to be no Portugueſe, he accoſted him in French; which the other, who proved to be the French conſul, returning in a very obliging manner, invited him to his houſe. Mr. Beauvoir, extremely willing to embrace this offer, continued there two nights, during which the conſul, in their ſeveral converſations, could not forbear to boaſt of his maſter's ſtrength at ſea, and at laſt gave ſome hints of the arrival of the galleons on that coaſt. On the 24th, Mr. Beauvoir being ready to embark, and underſtanding, that a gentleman was arrived in that town bound for the fleet, with letters to the prince of Heſſe and Mr. Methuen (who were gone from the fleet to Liſbon ſome time before) he invited him to go aboard the Pembroke, without taking the leaſt notice of their departure. The gentleman having gladly accepted this invitation, and told him, juſt as they were leaving the ſhore, that monſieur Chateau-Renault was arrived at Vigo with thirty men of war, and twenty-two galleons, and that he was ſent by the imperial miniſter to the grand fleet, they went together on board the Pembroke, where captain Hardy, her commander, being informed, as well by Mr. Beauvoir of what he had gathered from the French conſul, as by the other gentleman concerning what he knew of the matter, he ſet ſail the next morning in queſt of the grand fleet, which at laſt he met with on the 6th of October. Having imparted his intelligence to the Engliſh admiral, ſir George communicated the ſame to the Dutch; and it was reſolved to attempt the deſtroying of the French and Spaniſh ſhips at Vigo[p]. Accordingly, the fleet came to an anchor, on the 11th, againſt that place, almoſt unperceived by the enemy, by reaſon of the hazy weather; and, finding that the French and Spaniſh ſhips were carried up beyond a narrow ſtreight, defended by a caſtle, beſides a ſtrong boom about it, made with maſts, cables, and chains, it was reſolved in a council of war: That, ſince the whole fleet could not ſafely go up to the place, where the enemy's ſhips lay, a detachment of fifteen Engliſh and ten Dutch men of war, with all the fire-ſhips, frigates, and bomb-veſſels, ſhould go upon that ſervice, with all the flag-officers aboard them, whilſt part of the land-forces were to make a deſcent, and to attack the fort on the ſouth ſide of Rodondela, a ſmall fiſhing-town [q].

Purſuant to this reſolution, the duke of Ormond, having, on the 12th of October, landed two thouſand five hundred men two leagues from Vigo on the ſouth-ſide of the river, without the leaſt oppoſition, he ordered the grenadiers to advance to the fort at the entrance of the harbour; which they did with ſuch chearfulneſs and reſolution, that, having made themſelves maſters of a platform of thirty-eight pieces of cannon, they purſued the French to the very gates of the caſtle or ſtone-tower, and attacked them ſo vigorouſly, that monſieur Sorel, their commander, deſpairing of holding the place, attempted to fight his way through the Engliſh ſword in hand. But no ſooner had they opened the gate, than the grenadiers ruſhing in made themſelves maſters of the caſtle, and took three hundred French ſeamen and fifty Spaniards priſoners. Whilſt theſe things were tranſacting aſhore, the ſquadron deſigned for this expedition advanced briſkly towards the boom, and, after a little ſtop by a calm, vice-admiral Hopſon in the Torbay broke, amidſt the enemy's fire, through the boom, where he received ſeveral broadſides from the Bourbon and l'Eſperance[r], two French men of war placed within the boom. The reſt of vice-admiral Hopſon's diviſion, and that of the Dutch vice-admiral Vandergoes, bearing at the ſame time time upon the bottom, were becalmed, and conſequently ſtruck, ſo that they were forced to cut their way through it, except their admiral, who hit the ſame paſſage, by which vice-admiral Hopſon had entered before. Hopſon, in the mean time, being boarded by a fire-ſhip, was in great danger of being burnt, had not the fireſhip been blown up too ſoon; notwithſtanding which, he received conſiderable damage in his rigging, and many of his men, during the firſt conſternation, threw themſelves overboard, in hopes to ſave themſelves, but were moſt of them drowned, whilſt the reſt behaved ſo well as to preſerve the ſhip. The French admiral ſeeing the boom cut in pieces, the platform and caſtle in the enemy's hands, the Bourbon taken, and the whole confederate ſquadron ready to fall in among them, ordered his own ſhip to be ſet on fire; and his example being followed by all the reſt, afforded a moſt dreadful ſpectacle to the Spaniards as well as to the French. Whilſt they were thus buſied in the deſtruction of their own fleet, the Engliſh were as careful in preſerving it, not without ſome ſucceſs; ſeveral, as well of the men of war as of the galleons, being taken, four by the Engliſh, and five by the Dutch; but the reſt were burnt, with nine French men of war[s]. What made this victory the more conſiderable was its being gained with inconſiderable loſs, there not being above forty men killed and ten wounded of the landmen in this action, and very few of the ſeamen, except thoſe, that were drowned of vice-admiral Hopſon's ſhip. As to the cargo aboard this fleet, which was computed at twenty millions of pieces of eight in gold and ſilver, beſides merchandizes, about fourteen millions of it were taken out before by the enemy; the reſt was either taken by the Engliſh or Dutch, or left in the galleons, that were ſunk or burnt. The goods were valued at twenty millions of pieces of eight more, of which one fourth part only was ſaved by the enemy, near two fourths deſtroyed, and the reſt taken by the confederates, beſides a great quantity of plate, and other rich commodities, concealed for the uſe of private perſons in the galleons, and a great deal of other plate belonging to the French officers found at Rodondela, of which the duke of Ormond took poſſeſſion the next morning, and in which other plunder was found. The French ſeamen and ſoldiers eſcaped, for the Engliſh, having would not have made any great reſiſtance, if he had landed on his firſt arrival, and not given them time to recover from the diſorder into which the firſt ſurprize had put them. Burnet, vol. II. 333.

[p] Biſhop Burnet obſerves (vol. II. 332.) ſir George Rooke, upon receiving the intelligence, was ſaid to ſteer his courſe towards Vigo very unwillingly, but, finding it true, reſolved to force his way in.

[q] The Engliſh ſhips were the Mary, Grafton, Torbay, Kent, Monmouth, Berwick, Eſſex, Swiftſure, Ranelagh, Somerſet, Bedford, Cambridge, Northumberland, Oxford, Pembroke; the Aſſociation and Barfleur were to batter the forts on each ſide. The admirals removed the flags from the great ſhips into third rates, the firſt and ſecond rates being too big to go in: Sir George Rooke went out of the Royal Sovereign into the Somerſet; admiral Hopſon out of the Prince George into the Torbay; admiral Fairborne out of St. George into the Eſſex: and admiral Graydon out of the Triumph into the Northumberland.

Six galleons were taken by the Engliſh, and five by the Dutch, who ſunk ſix.

no horſe, could not purſue them. The Spaniards appeared at ſome diſtance in a great body, but they did not offer to enter into any action with the duke of Ormond: And it appeared, that the reſentments of that proud nation, which was now governed by French councils, were ſo high, that they would not put themſelves in any danger, or to any trouble, even to ſave their own fleet, when it was in ſuch hands.

After this great ſucceſs, it came under conſultation, whether it was not adviſeable to leave a good ſquadron of ſhips with the land-forces to winter at Vigo, ſince the neighbourhood of Portugal could ſupply them with proviſions and all other neceſſaries, and this might encourage that king to declare himſelf, when there was ſuch a force and fleet lying ſo near him; and it might likewiſe encourage ſuch Spaniards, as favoured the emperor, to declare themſelves when they ſaw a ſafe place of retreat, and a force to protect them. Upon theſe conſiderations the duke of Ormond offered to ſtay, if Sir George Rooke would have conſented; but he excuſed it, alledging, that he had ſent home the victuallers with the ſtores, and therefore could not ſpare what was neceſſary for ſuch as ſhould ſtay there. And indeed he had ſo ordered the matter, that he could not ſtay long enough to try, whether they could raiſe and ſearch the men of war and galleons, that were ſunk; and he was obliged to make all poſſible haſte home, for, if the wind had turned to the eaſt, which was uſual in that ſeaſon, a great part of the ſhips crews muſt have periſhed with hunger.

On the 16th of October, Sir Cloudeſly Shovel having joined the confederate fleet with twenty-nine ſail, the land-forces re-embarked the next day; and, on the 19th, Sir George Rooke and vice-admiral Hopſon, with ten men of war ſet ſail for England, leaving Sir Cloudeſly Shovel with the reſt near Vigo, to deſtroy the enemies ſhips that were ran aſhore; which being effected, he alſo ſteered his courſe for England, where the fleet arrived (after being ſeparated by a ſtorm at the entrance of the channel) on the 17th of November. Ten days before, Sir George Rooke with his ſquadron came into the Downs, and the ſame day, at four in the afternoon, the duke of Ormond landed at Deal, and, having given the neceſſary orders for the landing and quartering the forces, went that night to Canterbury, and arrived at London the next day, being received with great marks of favour by the queen, and with the loud acclamations of the people: the ſucceſs at Vigo having ſilenced the clamours about the miſcarriages before Cadiz. The queen gave likewiſe a noble gratuity to the lord Shannon and captain Thomas Hardy, who were ſent expreſs by the general and admiral with the firſt account of their proſperous attempt; and the captain, beſides a preſent of a thouſand guineas, had the honour of knighthood. On the other hand, Sir Henry Bellaſis and Sir Charles O Hara were, by her majeſty's orders, put under arreſt, for having, by their example, promoted and encouraged the plundering of Port St. Mary's; but, upon the report of the generals appointed to examine into that matter, Bellaſis only was found guilty, and diſmiſſed from her majeſty's ſervice; and Sir Charles O Hara was cleared, and his ſuſpenſion taken off. A proclamation was alſo iſſued out, ſome time before, for 'diſcovery and recovery of all ſuch goods, plate, and other effects, as contrary to her majeſty's and the duke of Ormond's expreſs commands, were plundered and embezzled at Port St. Mary's, and from the galleons taken at Vigo, and put on board her majeſty's men of war and other veſſels.' But this proclamation had little or no effect, ſo that the public was not much inriched by this extraordinary capture, though the loſs, which the enemy ſuſtained by it, was a vaſt one: and to complete the ruin of the Spaniſh merchants, their king ſeized on the plate, which was taken out of the ſhips upon their firſt arrival at Vigo.

Thus ended the campaign very happily for the allies, and moſt glorioufly for the queen: whoſe firſt year being ſuch a continued courſe of ſucceſs, gave a hopeful preſage of what might be hereafter expected.

The parliament of England was in courſe to determine ſix months after the death of the late king, but before that time expired, the queen thought fit to exert her royal prerogative, and to iſſue out a proclamation, on the 2d of July, for diſſolving this preſent parliament, and declaring the ſpeedy calling another to be holden at Weſtminſter, the 20th of Auguſt next; but afterwards prorogued to the 8th of October, and at laſt, to the 23d of that month. Her majeſty did not openly interpoſe in the elections, though her inclination to the tories plainly appearing, all people took it for granted, that ſhe wiſhed they might be the majority. This wrought on the inconſtancy and ſervility, that is natural to multitudes; and the conceit, which had been infuſed and propagated with much induſtry, that the whigs had charged the nation with great taxes, of which a large ſhare had been devoured by themſelves, had ſo far turned the tide, that the tories in the houſe of commons, were, at leaſt, double the number of the whigs.

On the 6th of July, the count de Platens, envoy extraordinary from the elector of Hanover and Zell, had his public audience, both of the queen, and the prince; and, about the ſame time, ſhe made ſome promotions in the army, and diſpoſed of ſeveral places and preferments. Among others, the earl of Ranelagh was made receiver and paymaſter-general of her majeſty's forces; William Blathwayte, eſq. ſecretary of war; and the lord Walden commiſſary-general of the muſters; the duke of Somerſet was made maſter of the horſe, in the room of the earl of Pembroke, who was appointed lord preſident of the council; the lord Wharton's patent of warden and chief juſtice in Eyre of all the foreſts on this ſide the Trent was revoked; the duke of Newcaſtle was made warden of the foreſt of Sherwood in the county of Nottingham. And, upon the 19th of July, the queen in council made 'an order againſt the ſelling of offices and places in the houſhold and family.'

Prince George of Denmark, being very much indiſpoſed this ſummer with his uſual aſthma, was adviſed by his phyſicians to go to the Bath, where the queen reſolved to attend him. They ſet out, the 26th of Auguſt, from Windſor, and lay the firſt night at Oxford. The queen was next day preſent in convocation, when the univerſity-orator congratulated her arrival among them; and many of the nobility and perſons of quality were made doctors of law. From the convocation the queen went to the theatre, where ſhe was entertained with a concert of muſic, and the rehearſal of ſeveral pieces of poetry; and alterwards, with a ſplendid banquet by the univerſity. Having accepted the uſual preſents of 'a bible, a common-prayer-book, and a pair of gloves,' the queen and prince took coach for Cirenceſter, where they lay that night, and the next day reached the Bath. They were met by the high-ſheriff and gentlemen on the borders of the county of Somerſet; and, within half a mile of the city, by two hundred maidens, richly dreſſed, and carrying bows and arrows like Amazons; and at the weſt gate of the city, by the mayor and corporation in their formalities, who attended them to the abbey houſe, which was prepared for their reception. The queen likewiſe, on the 3d of September, viſited the city of Briſtol, upon an invitation from the magiſtrates; and, on the 25th of that month, gave a private audience at Bath to the Baron de Widman, envoy extraordinary from the elector of Bavaria; and, on the 8th, left that place, and returned to Windſor on the 10th, and to St. James's on the 15th, where they received the compliments of the lord-mayor and aldermen of London, upon their ſafe return.

On Wedneſday, the 20th of October, the new parliament met, and, the commons having choſen Robert Harley, eſq. their ſpeaker, the queen made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My lords and gentlemen,

"IT is with great ſatisfaction I meet this parliament, which I have ſummoned to aſſiſt me, in carrying on the juſt and neceſſary war, in which we are engaged. I have called you together as early as was conſiſtent with your convenience in coming out of your ſeveral counties; and I aſſure myſelf of ſuch evidences of your affections to me, and your zeal for our common cauſe, as will not only give ſpirit and forwardneſs to our own preparations, but ſuch example and encouragement to our allies, as, by God's bleſſing cannot fail of a good effect, for the advantage of the whole confederacy.

"I have met with ſo many expreſſions of joy and ſatisfaction in all the counties through which I have lately had occaſion to paſs, that I cannot but look upon them as true meaſures of the duty and affection of the reſt of my ſubjects.

Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

"I muſt deſire you to grant me ſuch ſupplies as will enable me to comply both with our particular treaties and engagements already made, and ſuch others as may be neceſſary for the encouragement of our allies, and the proſecuting the the war where it ſhall moſt ſenſibly affect our enemies, and be moſt effectual for diſappointing the boundleſs ambition of France.

" And, that my ſubjects may the more chearfully bear the neceſſary taxes, I deſire you to inſpect the accounts of the public receipts and payments; and, if there have been any abuſes or miſmanagements, I hope you will detect them, that the offenders may be puniſhed, and others be deterred by ſuch-like examples from the like practices. I muſt obſerve to you, with ſome concern, that the funds, given by the laſt parliament, have, in ſome meaſure, fallen ſhort of the ſums propoſed to be raiſed by them; and, though I have already paid and applied to the public ſervice the hundred thouſand pounds, which I promiſed to the laſt parliament, yet it has not ſupplied that deficiency.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

" I cannot without much trouble, take notice to you of the diſappointment we have had at Cadiz. I have not yet had a particular account of that enterprize, nor of all the difficulties our forces may have met with there. But I have had ſuch a repreſentation of diſorders and abuſes committed at Port St. Mary's, as hath obliged me to give directions for the ſtricteſt examination of that matter.

" I am earneſtly deſirous, for all our ſakes, that this may prove a ſhort ſeſſion. However, I hope you will find time to conſider of ſome better and more effectual method to prevent the exportation of wool, and to improve that manufacture, which is of ſo great conſequence to the whole kingdom. On my part, nothing ſhall be omitted for its encouragement.

" I am firmly perſuaded, that the love and good affection of my ſubjects is the ſureſt pledge of their duty and obedience; and the trueſt and juſteſt ſupport of the throne. And as I am reſolved to defend and maintain the church as by law eſtabliſhed, and to protect you in the full enjoyment of all your rights and liberties; ſo I rely upon your care of me. My intereſts and yours are inſeparable; and my endeavours ſhall never be wanting to make you all ſafe and happy."

The lords returned the uſual addreſs of thanks, congratulating the glorious ſucceſs of her arms, and thoſe of her allies, under the command of the earl of Marlborough; but the commons, who were met full of prejudice againſt the memory of king William, and of reſentment againſt thoſe employed by him, ſhewed the firſt inſtance of this diſpoſition in their addreſs to the queen, which was as follows:

Moſt Gracious Sovereign,

" WE your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons in parliament aſſembled, do beg leave to lay before your majeſty our moſt humble and hearty thanks for your moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne; which gives us ſuch inſtances of your majeſty's tender concern for your people, and of your entire confidence in their affections, as muſt engage them to make your majeſty the utmoſt returns of duty and gratitude.

" It is great condeſcenſion in your majeſty to take notice in ſo public a manner of the expreſſions of joy and ſatisfaction, with which your majeſty was received in all the counties, through which you had occaſion lately to paſs. All your ſubjects have already received ſo many benefits under the influence of your majeſty's happy government, that your majeſty muſt have met with the like in any other part of your dominions that you had honoured with your royal preſence.

" The late diſappointment at Cadiz does the more affect us, becauſe it gives your majeſty ſo much trouble. But this misfortune cannot make us forget, that the protection and ſecurity of our trade, the vigorous ſupport of your majeſty's allies, and the wonderful progreſs of your majeſty's arms under the conduct of the earl of Marlborough, have ſignally RETRIEVED the ancient honour and glory of the Engliſh nation.

" After your majeſty's repeated aſſurances, we neither doubt of the full enjoyment of all our rights and liberties, nor of your majeſty's defending and maintaining the church as by law eſtabliſhed. Your majeſty has been always a moſt illuſtrious ornament to this church, and have been expoſed to great hazards for it. And therefore we promiſe ourſelves, that, in your majeſty's reign, we ſhall ſee it perfectly reſtored to its due rights and privileges, and ſecured in the ſame to poſterity; which is only to be done by diveſting thoſe men of the power who have ſhewn that they want not the will to deſtroy it.

" The proſpect of theſe bleſſings, and your majeſty's deſire to have the accounts of the public receipts and payments inſpected, and to have any abuſes and miſmanagements thereof puniſhed, will very much endear your majeſty to your people, and encourage us moſt chearfully to aſſiſt your majeſty with thoſe ſupplies that may effectually enable your majeſty to make good ſuch alliances as ſhall be neceſſary to proſecute the war, where it ſhall moſt ſenſibly affect your enemies, and thereby diſappoint the boundleſs ambition of France.

" Your majeſty may ſafely rely upon the care of your faithful commons. The value you are pleaſed to ſet upon the love and affection of your ſubjects is the higheſt obligation that can be laid on them, to give your majeſty pledges thereof in their duty and obedience. They are and ſhall always be ſenſible, that your majeſty's intereſts and theirs are inſeparable; and, as they gratefully acknowledge your majeſty's great deſigns to make them ſafe and happy, ſo their prayers and ſincereſt endeavours ſhall never be wanting to make your majeſty's reign more proſperous and more glorious than any of your majeſty's royal predeceſſors."

The word 'Retrieved' in this addreſs, implying that the honour of the nation had been loſt, occaſioned a warm debate. All, who had a juſt regard for king William, inſiſted upon the word 'Maintained' inſtead of it, alledging, that 'Retrieved' was a reflection on the late king's memory, who, inſtead of loſing, had carried the honour of the nation farther than had been done in any reign before his: that to him they owed their preſervation, their ſafety, and even the queen's being on the throne. That he had deſigned and formed that great confederacy, at the head of which her majeſty was now ſet. In oppoſition to this it was urged, that, during his reign, things had been conducted by ſtrangers, and truſted to them; and that a vaſt treaſure had been ſpent in unprofitable campaigns in Flanders. The Partition treaty, and every thing elſe, with which his reign could be loaded, was brought into the account; and the keeping of the word 'Retrieved' in the addreſs was carried by a majority of one hundred and eighty voices againſt eighty; all who had any favour at court, or hoped for any, voting for it[t].

The ſtrength of the Tory party in the houſe of commons appeared not only from this, but alſo from all the controverted elections being determined in their favour, with ſuch an open partiality, that it ſhewed the party to be reſolved upon every thing that might ſerve their ends. Of this there were two remarkable inſtances. The one was the borough of Hindon near Saliſbury; in which, upon a complaint of bribery, the proof was ſo full and clear, that they ordered a bill to diſfranchize the town for that bribery; and yet, becauſe the bribes were given by a man of their party, they would not paſs a vote on him as guilty of it; ſo that a borough was voted to loſe its right of electing, becauſe many in it were guilty of a corruption, in which no man appeared to be an actor. The other was of more importance. Mr. John How ſtood for knight of the ſhire for Glouceſterſhire, and had drawn a party in that county to join with him in an addreſs to the queen, in which reflections were made on the danger and ill uſage which her majeſty had gone through in the former reign. This addreſs was received by the queen in ſo particular a manner, that it looked like owning the contents thereof to be true; but ſhe made ſuch an excuſe for this, when the offence it gave was laid before her, that probably ſhe was not acquainted with the matter of the addreſs when ſhe ſo received it. Upon this great oppoſition was made to Mr. How's election; and, when it came to the poll, it appeared, that he had loſt it. The ſheriff was then moved for a ſcrutiny, to examine, whether all thoſe, who had ſworn, [t] Mr. Walſh, at that time knight of the ſhire for Worceſterſhire (called by Dryden the greateſt critic of the age) compoſed on this occaſion, the following verſes, in a poem called the Golden age, in alluſion to Virgil's fourth Eclogue:

Now all our factions, all our fears ſhall ceaſe,
And tories rule the promis'd land in peace;
Malice ſhall die, and noxious poiſon fail;
Harley ſhall ceaſe to trick, and Seymour ceaſe to rail.
The lambs ſhall with the lions walk unhurt,
And Halifax with How meet civilly at court.
Viceroys, like Providence, with diſtant care,
Shall govern kingdoms, where they ne'er appear.
Pacific admirals, to ſave the fleet,
Shall fly from conqueſt, and ſhall conqueſt meet.
Commanders ſhall be prais'd at WILLIAM's coſt,
And honour be RETRIEV'D before 'tis loſt.

The

that they were freeholders of forty ſhillings a year, had ſworn true. By the act of parliament the matter was referred to the parties oath, and their ſwearing falſely was declared perjury; therefore ſuch, as had ſworn falſely, were liable to a proſecution: But by all laws an oath is looked upon as an end of controverſy, till he, who ſwore, is convicted of perjury; and the ſheriff being an officer named by the court, if he had a power to review the poll, this put the election of counties wholly in the power of the crown. Yet upon this occaſion the heat of a party prevailed ſo far, that they voted Mr. How duly elected.

The houſe of commons very unanimouſly, and with great diſpatch, agreed to all the demands of the court, and voted all the ſupplies that were neceſſary for carrying on the war [u]. On the lord-mayor's day, the queen dined at Guildhall, and conferred the honour of knighthood on ſeveral perſons [w]. The next day, the lord Shannon brought the news of the ſucceſs at Vigo; and, four days after, the queen acquainted the commons, that having appointed the 12th of November for a day of thankſgiving, for the ſignal ſucceſs of her arms under the earl of Marlborough and the duke of Ormond, and of her fleet under ſir George Rooke, ſhe intended to go to St. Paul's church, and had given orders for providing convenient places in the church for the members of that houſe, as well as for the houſe of lords. At the day appointed, the queen went in great ſtate to St. Paul's attended by both houſes of parliament. The duke of Ormond, happening to be the ſtaff-officer in waiting, rid in one of the queen's coaches, with the duke of Somerſet, and received the loud acclamations of an infinite number of ſpectators, with which he ſeemed pleaſed; and from that day may be dated the great popularity which he afterwards acquired, and which, in the end, proved fatal to him. The next day, the houſe of lords returned him thanks for his ſervices performed at Vigo; and, at the ſame time, reſolved to addreſs the queen, to order the duke of Ormond and ſir George Rooke to lay before them an account of their proceedings, which was done. The commons alſo voted thanks to the duke and ſir George, and admiral Hopſon was knighted, and a penſion of five hundred pounds a year was ſettled on him by the queen, with a reverſion of three hundred pounds a year for his wife.

At the beginning of the ſeſſions, ſir John Packington had exhibited a complaint againſt the biſhop of Worceſter and his ſon Mr. Lloyd, for endeavouring to prevent his election. When this complaint was conſidered by the houſe of commons, and the evidence heard, it was unanimouſly reſolved, "That it appeared to the houſe, that the proceedings of William lord biſhop of Worceſter, his ſon, and his agents, in order to the hindering the election of a member of the county of Worceſter, had been malicious, unchriſtian, and arbitrary, in high violation of the liberties and privileges of the commons of England: That an addreſs be preſented to her majeſty, to remove the biſhop from being lord Almoner;" and they ordered the attorney-general to proſecute Mr. Lloyd, the biſhop's ſon, for his offences, after his privilege as a member of the lower-houſe of convocation was expired.

The lords, alarmed at theſe proceedings of the commons, againſt a member of their houſe, agreed upon the following addreſs to the queen, "That it was the undoubted right of every lord of parliament, and of every ſubject of England, to have an opportunity of making his defence, before he ſuffers any ſort of puniſhment; and therefore humbly deſired her majeſty, that ſhe would be pleaſed not to remove the lord biſhop of Worceſter from the place of lord Almoner, nor to ſhew any mark of her diſpleaſure towards him, till he be found guilty of ſome crime by due courſe of law." This addreſs being preſented to the queen, ſhe returned anſwer, "That ſhe agreed, that every peer and lord of parliament, and indeed every other perſon, ought to have an opportunity of being heard to any matters objected againſt him, before he be puniſhed. That ſhe had not received any complaint of the biſhop of Worceſter, but ſhe looked upon it as her undoubted right to continue or diſplace any ſervant attending upon her own perſon, when ſhe ſhould think it proper." The lords, upon this anſwer, reſolved the ſame day unanimouſly, "That no lord of their houſe ought to ſuffer any ſort of puniſhment by any proceedings of the houſe of commons, otherwiſe than according to the known and ancient rules and methods of parliament." But, however, ſir Edward Seymour having attended the queen with the reſolutions and addreſs of the commons for the removal of the biſhop, ſhe anſwered, "That ſhe was very ſorry, that there was occaſion for that addreſs againſt the biſhop of Worceſter; and that ſhe would order, that he ſhould no longer continue to ſupply the place of her Almoner." Thus that prelate fell a ſacrifice to the reſentment of the oppoſite party.

On the contrary, ſir George Rooke, who was in great eſteem with the tory-party, was ſworn of the privy-council.

The duke of Ormond, upon his firſt arrival from the expedition to Cadiz, had complained very openly of ſir George's conduct, and ſeemed reſolved to carry the matter to a public accuſation. But the court found the party, that prevailed in the houſe of commons, determined to juſtify him; ſo that, to comply with this, he was not only made a privy-councillor, but much pains were taken with the duke to ſuppreſs his reſentments. But, though he was in a great meaſure ſoftened, yet he had made his complaints to ſo many lords, that they moved the houſe to examine both his inſtructions and the journals relating to that expedition; and accordingly a committee was appointed for that purpoſe, who ſate long upon the enquiry, and examined all the admirals and land-officers, as well as Rooke himſelf, upon the whole progreſs of that affair. But Rooke was ſo well ſupported by the court and by his party in the houſe of commons, that he ſeemed to deſpiſe all that the lords could do. It appeared to ſome, who were very intelligent in naval affairs, from all his motions during the expedition, that he intended to do nothing but amuſe and make a ſhew; and they concluded, from the protection that the miniſtry gave him, that they likewiſe intended no other. He took much pains to ſhew, how improper a deſign the deſcent upon Cadiz was, and how fatal the attempt muſt have proved; and in doing this he arraigned his inſtructions, and the deſign, upon which he was ſent, with great boldneſs, and ſhewed little regard to the miniſters, who took more pains to bring him off than to juſtify themſelves. The lords of the committee prepared a report, which was ſevere upon Rooke, and laid it before the houſe; but ſo ſtrong a party was made to oppoſe every thing that reflected on him, that, though every particular in the report was well proved, yet it was rejected, and a vote was carried in his favour, wherein it was declared, "That ſir George Rooke had done his duty, purſuant to the councils of war, like a brave officer, to the honour of the Britiſh nation." The great poſt of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, which was now given to the duke of Ormond, had ſo far prevailed with him, that, though the enquiry was ſet on foot by his means, and upon his ſuggeſtions, yet he came not to the houſe, when it was brought to a concluſion. So that Rooke, being but faintly puſhed by him, and moſt zealouſly ſupported by his party, was juſtified by a vote, though univerſally condemned by more impartial judges. The behaviour of the miniſtry in this matter heightened the jealouſies, with which many were poſſeſſed; for it was inferred, that they were not in earneſt in this whole expedition to Cadiz, ſince, the conduct being ſo contrary to the inſtructions, their juſtifying the one was plainly condemning the other.

On the 21ſt of November, Mr. ſecretary Hedges delivered to the commons a meſſage ſigned by the queen, importing, "That her majeſty conſidering, that there was but a very ſmall proviſion made for the prince her huſband, if he ſhould ſurvive her; and that ſhe was reſtrained from increaſing the ſame by the late act of parliament for ſettling her revenue, thought it neceſſary to recommend the making a further proviſion for the prince to their conſideration." The prince was many years older than the queen, and was troubled with an aſthma, that every year had ill effects upon his health, and had brought him into great danger this winter; yet the queen thought it became her to provide for all events. The commons having taking her meſſage into conſideration, Mr. How moved, that the yearly ſum of one hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be ſettled on the prince, in caſe he ſhould ſurvive the queen; and this was ſeconded by thoſe, who knew how acceptable the motion would be to the queen, though it was the double of what any queen of England ever had in jointure; ſo that it paſſed without any oppoſition. But, while it was paſſing, a motion was made upon a clauſe in the act, that limited the ſucceſſion to the houſe of Hanover, which provided againſt ſtrangers, though naturalized, being capable to hold any employments. This plainly related only to thoſe, who ſhould be naturalized in a future reign, and had no reſpect to ſuch as were already naturalized, or ſhould be naturalized, during the preſent reign. It was, however, propoſed as doubtful, whether, when that family might reign, all, who were naturalized before, ſhould not be incapacitated by that clauſe from ſitting in parliament, or holding employments; and a clauſe was offered to exempt the prince from being comprehended in that incapacity. Againſt this two objections lay; one was, that the lords had reſolved by a vote (as will hereafter appear) to which the greater number had ſet their hands, that they would never paſs any money-bill ſent up to them by the commons, to which any clauſe was tacked, that was foreign to the bill. They had done this, to prevent the commons from joining matters of a different nature to a money-bill, and then pretending, that the lords could not meddle with it; for this was a method to alter the government, and bring it entirely into their own hands; by this means, when money was neceſſary for preſerving the nation, they might force, not only the lords, but even the crown itſelf, to conſent to every thing they propoſed, by tacking it to a money-bill. It was ſaid, that an incapacity for holding employments, and for ſitting in the houſe of lords, were things of a different nature from money; ſo that this clauſe ſeemed to many to be a tack; while others thought it was no tack, becauſe both parts of the act related to the ſame perſon. The other objection was, that this clauſe ſeemed to imply, that perſons already naturalized, and in poſſeſſion of the right of natural born ſubjects, were to be excluded in the next reign; though all people knew, that no ſuch thing was intended, when the act of ſucceſſion paſſed. Great oppoſition was made, for both theſe reaſons, to the paſſing this clauſe; but the queen preſſed it with the greateſt earneſtneſs, that ſhe had ever yet ſhewn in any thing whatever. She thought it became her, as a good wife, to have the act paſſed, in which ſhe might be the more zealous, becauſe it was not thought adviſeable to move for an act, that ſhould take prince George into a partnerſhip of the regal dignity. This matter raiſed a great heat in the houſe of lords. Thoſe, who had been advanced by the late king, and were in his intereſts, did not think it became them to conſent to this, which ſeemed to be a prejudice, or, at leaſt, a diſgrace to thoſe, whom he had raiſed. But the court managed the affair ſo dextrouſly, that the bill paſſed with the clauſe, though it was proteſted againſt by ſeveral lords [x]; and the queen was highly diſpleaſed with thoſe, who oppoſed the clauſe, which had been put into the bill by ſome in the houſe of commons, only becauſe they believed it would be oppoſed by thoſe, againſt whom they intended to irritate the queen.

[u] The commons voted forty thouſand ſeamen, and that the proportion of forces for England, to act in conjunction with thoſe of the allies, be thirty-three thouſand foot, and ſeven thouſand horſe and dragoons; and that three hundred and fifty thouſand pounds be granted for guards and garriſons for the year 1703; they alſo voted ſeventy thouſand nine hundred and ſeventy-three pounds for ordnance, eight hundred and thirty-three thouſand eight hundred and twenty-ſix pounds for the pay of the land-forces, and fifty-one thouſand eight hundred and forty-three pounds for ſubſidies to the allies.

The earl of Marlborough being arrived at London, ſir Edward Seymour, two days, after, at the head of a committee appointed by the commons, waited upon him with the thanks of that houſe for the great and ſignal ſervices performed by him for the nation. The queen likewiſe was pleaſed to declare before a committee of the council, 'That ſhe was ſo ſatisfied of the eminent ſervices of my Lord Marlborough to the public and to herſelf, both in the command of the army, and the entire confidence he had ſettled between her and the States General, that ſhe intended to make him a duke.' Nor did the queen's favour ſtop here, for, to ſupport this new dignity, ſhe ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, importing, 'That ſhe had thought fit to grant the title of a Duke of this kingdom to the earl of Marlborough, and to the heirs male of his body; and alſo a penſion of five thouſand pounds per annum upon the revenue of the Poſt-office, for the ſupport of this honour during her majeſty's natural life. That if it had been in her power, ſhe would have granted the ſame term in the penſion, as in the honour; and that ſhe hoped they would think it ſo reaſonable in this caſe, as to find ſome proper methods of doing it.' This meſſage occaſioned great debates in the houſe; and ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave in particular ſaid, 'That he would not derogate from the duke's eminent ſervices, but inſiſted that he was very well paid for them;' and then took notice of the profitable employments enjoyed by him and his ducheſs. As ſoon as the Duke was informed of this, he waited on her majeſty, and prayed her, 'rather to forego her gracious meſſage on his behalf, than to create any uneaſineſs on his account, ſince it might embarraſs her affairs, and be of ill conſequence to the public.' And, there being no probability, that the commons would comply with the queen's deſire, ſhe ſent another meſſage to acquaint them, that the duke of Marlborough had declined her meſſage to them. However, the ſame day, the commons being in a grand committee, a motion was made for an, 'addreſs, containing the reaſons, why they could not comply with her firſt meſſage.' This motion being agreed to, the addreſs was drawn, and preſented to the queen by the whole houſe in theſe words:

Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"WE your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects the commons in parliament aſſembled, humbly beg leave to declare our unanimous ſatisfaction in the juſt eſteem your majeſty has been pleaſed to expreſs of the eminent ſervices performed by the duke of Marlborough, who has not only by his conduct of the army 'retrieved' the ancient honour and glory of the Engliſh nation, but by his negotiations eſtabliſhed an entire confidence and good correſpondence between your majeſty and the States General, and therein vindicated the gentlemen of England, who had, by the vile practices of deſigning men, been traduced, and induſtriouſly repreſented as falſe to your majeſty's allies, becauſe they were true to the intereſt of their country.

"It is to their inexpreſſible grief, that your majeſty's moſt dutiful commons find any inſtances, where they are unable to comply with what your majeſty propoſes to them; but they beg leave humbly to lay before your majeſty the apprehenſions they have of making a precedent for the alienation of the revenue of the crown, which has been ſo much reduced by the exorbitant grants of the laſt reign, and which has been ſo lately ſettled and ſecured by your majeſty's unparallelled grace and goodneſs.

"We are infinitely pleaſed to obſerve, by your majeſty's late gracious acceptance of the Duke of Marlborough's ſervices, that the only way to obtain your majeſty's favour, is to deſerve well from the public; and we beg leave to aſſure your majeſty, that whenever you ſhall think fit to reward ſuch merit, it will be to the entire ſatisfaction of your people."

To this addreſs, which reflected ſo highly on the late king's perſon and reign, the queen only anſwered, 'That ſhe ſhould always think herſelf much concerned to reward thoſe, who deſerved well of her; and that, on this [x] January the 19, upon a report from the committee of the whole houſe, on the bill 'to enable her majeſty to ſettle a revenue upon the prince of Denmark, in caſe he ſurvived her,' that they had gone through the bill, and had left out one clauſe, which enacted, that, in caſe of the prince's ſurviving, he might be capable to be of the privy-council, a member of this houſe, or to enjoy any office, the grants herein mentioned, or any other, notwithſtanding the act of ſucceſſion in the 12th of the late king. And the queſtion being put, Whether to agree with the committee in leaving out this clauſe? It was reſolved in the negative.

Diſſentient'.

1. We do diſſent from this clauſe, becauſe we conceive this is a bill of aid and ſupply; and that this clauſe is altogether foreign to, and different from the matter of the ſaid bill: and that the paſſing of ſuch a clauſe is therefore unparliamentary, and tends to the deſtruction of the conſtitution of this government.

2. Becauſe we conceive, that a parliamentary expedient might have been found, whereby his royal highneſs might, by an unanimous conſent, have all the advantages deſigned him by this bill, without the lords being obliged to depart from what we conceive to be their undoubted right.

3. Becauſe we conceive, that this clauſe was not neceſſary to inable his royal highneſs to enjoy the benefit of the ſaid grants.

4. Becauſe that the clauſe, which pretends to capacitate his royal highneſs to enjoy his peerage, notwithſtanding the 'act for the further limitation of the crown, and better ſecuring the rights and liberties of the ſubject,' and which makes no proviſion for other peers, under the ſame circumſtances, may tend much to their prejudice.

As

account, she had bestowed some favours on the duke of Marlborough, and was glad to find they thought them well placed.' However, great liberty was taken of reflecting upon the queen as well as the duke for this transaction; and a satirical piece was handed about, wherein among other things, it was affirmed, 'That her majesty designed to give one duke all the gold, which the other had brought home from Vigo[y].'

In the beginning of January, the queen sent a message to the commons, 'That the States General had renewed their applications to her majesty, to assist them in this time of danger with an augmentation of her forces[z], as the only means to disappoint the great and early preparations of the French.' Upon which it was resolved, 'That ten thousand men be hired for an augmentation of the forces to act in conjunction with the allies, but upon condition, that there be an immediate stop put to all commerce and correspondence with France and Spain on the part of the States General.' This resolution being formed into an address, and laid before the queen, her majesty answered, 'That she made no doubt but that condition would be approved, since it was so absolutely necessary for the good of the whole alliance; and that she would send that night directions to her ministers in Holland, to concur with the States in providing the troops accordingly.' The lords also addressed the queen on the same subject, and to the same effect; to which her majesty returned the like answer. The chief reason, why both houses insisted upon an immediate prohibition of all commerce and correspondence with France and Spain, was the great difficulty, under which the court of France laboured at this juncture, to make remittances of money to their forces in Italy, and to the elector of Bavaria in Germany; which indeed the French could not do without the assistance of the English, Dutch, and Geneva merchants, as appeared by a discovery made about this time by the earl of Nottingham, on an unlawful intercourse of bills of exchange between some French bankers at Paris and some London merchants. However, though the insisting upon this prohibition was a thing reasonable in itself, yet the manner, in which it was managed, shewed an ill disposition to the Dutch, who, in the debate concerning it in the house of commons, were treated very indecently; and the imposing it upon them, in the way in which it was pressed, carried in it too high a strain of authority over them. Theirs is a country, which does not subsist by any intrinsic wealth of their own, but by their trade; and therefore some seemed to hope, that the opposition, which would be raised on that head, might force a peace, which many persons in England were driving at so indecently, that they took little care to conceal it. The States resolved to comply with England in every thing; and, though they did not like the manner of demanding this, yet they readily consented to it; and accordingly the prohibition of all commerce with France and Spain was published by them, commencing from the 1st of June, 1703.

The toleration-act, passed in the first year of the late reign in favour of the protestant dissenters, was looked upon with

[y] As this proceeding of the queen demonstrates the great influence the duke and duchess of Marlborough had then over her, so it is thought, the refusal of the commons, to comply with the queen's desire, began to alienate the duke from the tories. It is remarkable, that this circumstance is mentioned neither by bishop Burnet, in his History, nor by the duchess of Marlborough, in the Vindication of her conduct.

[z] The States had represented the necessity of this augmentation to the earl of Marlborough, before he left Holland, in order that some resolution might be taken for that purpose in England. The earl acknowledged the necessity of such a resolution, and promised, that, at his return to London, he would use his utmost endeavours in that respect. It was observed to his lordship, that at least it was better to augment the land-forces, than to have forty thousand seamen voted by the house of commons; since that sixty English ships would be sufficient, with thirty Dutch, to command the seas, twenty or five and twenty thousand seamen would be enough to man them, and the rest of the expence might be employed in land-forces. Upon these heads, the States-General ordered their embassadors to present a memorial to the queen, importing, that the ill success at Cadiz did not discourage them, but that they were ready to redouble their efforts, if her majesty should think proper: and, at the same time, congratulating her upon the success of the fleet at Vigo, and thanking her for the assistance, which she had given them, by her troops under the command of the earl of Marlborough, and representing to her the necessity of augmenting them, especially, as they were informed, that France would augment their troops by the addition of eighty thousand men. This memorial had no effect; but her majesty's envoy presented to the States General the following memorial, in answer to that of their embassadors:

'High and Mighty Lords,

'The under-written envoy extraordinary of the queen of Great-Britain is ordered to represent to your high mightinesses, That her majesty, having seen and considered the memorial of your embassadors and envoy extraordinary, dated the 27th of November, wherein they thank her majesty, in the name of your high mightinesses, for the assistance, which has been given you by her majesty's troops, under the command of the earl of Marlborough; and, at the same time, congratulate her majesty upon the success of the fleet and her troops, in conjunction with those of her allies, in the happy attempt upon Vigo; desiring that the troops in Flanders may be compleated, augmented, and early in the field next year. Her majesty has ordered the said envoy to acquaint your high mightinesses, that her majesty thanks you sincerely for your obliging acknowledgments towards her, on occasion of the assistance under the command of the said earl of Marlborough; and that she is extremely well satisfied, that their success has been so considerably to the advantage of your high mightinesses, by extending and fortifying your frontier. That her majesty congratulates you likewise on account of the share, which your fleet and troops had in the glorious action at Vigo. That she will take care, that the troops in the Low Countries be effectually recruited, and provided with all things necessary, in order that they may take the field early the next year. That the measures relating to the number of her majesty's troops, which ought to be employed in conjunction with those of your high mightinesses in the Low Countries, having been taken into consideration in the parliament, before any mention was made of augmenting them, that affair, according to the rules and method of their proceedings, could not be laid before them; but that all possible care should be taken, that the rest of her majesty's forces, both by sea and land, should be employed in such a manner, as should appear to be most proper for making the greatest diversion to the enemy, in other parts, and for obtaining the end that your high mightinesses propose. And, for that purpose, her majesty is desirous, that the most proper methods may be concerted between her and your high mightinesses; and that you will please to give instructions to some persons for regulating the operations of such expedients, as may most annoy the enemy, and be of most advantage to the common cause.'

Hague, Decemb. 5, 1702. STANHOPE.

The envoy presented this memorial at the persuasion of the pensionary, in order that the States General might take occasion, from thence, to renew their instances; which they accordingly did, by their embassadors. But the queen persisted in refusing to lay the proposal for the augmentation of the troops before the house of commons, upon pretence, that the true course of parliaments did not permit the proposing of new levies, after the state of the war had been once settled; and that this could not be done, without proroguing the parliament, which would entirely annul what had been already done, and would cause an irreparable damage. As this excuse did not appear sufficient, especially, as, under the late king, there had been instances contrary to the custom alledged by the queen, the answer, which Mr. secretary Hedges gave, in the name of her majesty, to the Dutch embassadors, was examined with great care and attention. Which answer was as follows:

"The queen, having seen and considered the memorial of your excellencies, dated the 11th of this month, has ordered, that the following answer be given it: "That her majesty has nothing more at heart, than to do every thing that depends upon her to support the interests of the States-General, which she will always consider as her own. And though, by the forms of parliament, no effect can be hoped for from proposing to them the raising of new troops to serve in the Low-Countries, without a prorogation of the parliament, which will entirely destroy all that has been done, and cause an irreparable damage; yet her majesty has thought of such other expedients as may effectually support them, or convince them, that nothing shall be wanting on her part, to assure them of her real concern and care for their security and prosperity. And, for this purpose, her majesty being assured of the concurrence of her parliament, in maintaining such new alliances as she shall make for her own interest and that of her allies, she ardently wishes, that the States-General would immediately concur with her, in sending ministers to the king of Sweden, to induce him to agree to a peace; in which case her majesty, in conjunction with the said States, will take into her pay 12000 Swedes and 8000 Saxons. And, considering the present situation of the king of Sweden, her majesty hopes, that this negociation may be finished with such expedition that the said troops may be in Holland as soon as shall be necessary for the ensuing campaign. Her majesty next proposes, that all kinds of means ought to be used, to recover the elector of Bavaria by an amicable accommodation; and, for this purpose, to persuade the emperor to gratify him with those things which may probably give him satisfaction. And her majesty is very desirous, in concert with her allies, to contribute to the necessary subsidies for enabling that duke to employ his troops in the service of the allies, in order, by that means, to make such a diversion to France, as may effectually break their designs against the States. And besides, as the success of such negociations is uncertain, as well as that of Portugal, though her majesty has reason to hope, that the latter is in a good train of being happily concluded, her majesty instantly desires the States-General to join, with all possible expedition, such a number of their ships to those of her majesty, in order to send a squadron to the Mediterranean, her majesty being disposed to embark on board those ships all the troops which she can spare in England, which, in conjunction with some of the States-General, may make such attempts as shall be agreed upon, as the most proper for making the greatest diversion to France, and most effectually preventing the superiority of that kingdom in the Low-Countries. And, if there be any other expedient, which the States can think of, and is practicable for her majesty to join in it, she will receive it with joy, being resolved to omit nothing that can contribute to their security and satisfaction."

Whitehall, Decemb. 3-14, 1702. CH. HEDGES.

In the examination of this answer, it seemed, as if the queen had conceived in her mind some prejudice of the States-General; which might perhaps arise from their not having given the command of the armies to prince George, as she had wished might be done. Others were of opinion, that this answer was suggested by the earl of Rochester, who, being ambitious of having the ascendant in the administration of affairs, looked with a jealous eye upon the glory which the earl of Marlborough had gained in the last campaign, and which had induced the commons, in their address, to stile him the 'Retriever' of the honour of the nation. They imagined, therefore, that, to prevent him from gaining new laurels, the earl of Rochester had insinuated into the queen so far, as to persuade her to give the answer above-mentioned to the Dutch embassadors. But others had no manner of doubt, that the queen's design in that answer was only to captivate the esteem of her subjects, by shewing how zealous she was for their ease, and how averse to the laying new burdens on them. It is not improbable, that all these three reasons might have more or less influence in this answer.

The

regret by many churchmen. King William was no ſooner dead, than the diſſenters felt the effects of the change. They that bore them ill will before, and were ready to reflect on them upon all occaſions, now openly triumphed. Sermons were preached, and pamphlets diſperſed, to blacken them as much as poſſible, and ſuch a violent temper diſcovered itſelf on a ſudden, and ſuch an inclination to heat and fury, as plainly ſhewed the parties affected to have been kept under a ſort of reſtraint. The debate about 'occaſional conformity,' which had been raiſed in the foregoing reign, was now received with great warmth. Before the new parliament met, a pamphlet came out with this title, 'The eſtabliſhment of the church, the preſervation of the ſtate,' ſhewing the reaſonableneſs of a bill againſt occaſional conformity: In which the author undertook to prove, that a civil diſcouragement of diſſenters would be highly agreeable to religion: That their objections, as to cruelty, and with reſpect to conſcience, had nothing in them: And that the countenancing them would be as little politic as pious. This was ſoon followed by another, called, 'The caſe of toleration recognized;' in which, a ſtrenuous motion was read for the adding farther conditions to the toleration, and eſpecially, that of incapacitating ſuch, as had benefit by it, for all civil employments. It was dedicated to the earl of Marlborough, who, as has been obſerved, was looked upon as a tory, and, conſequently, as one of unſuſpected zeal for the church. Matters being thus prepared without doors, the indiſcretion of a lord-mayor, in the late reign, was made the pretence of bringing in a bill in parliament, againſt occaſional conformity. It ſeems, ſir Humphry Edwin, who was a diſſenter, being a lord-mayor in the year 1697, carried the city-ſword with him once to a meeting at Pinners-hall. As this was exclaimed againſt at the time it was done, ſo now it was urged as a reaſon to prevent the like for the future. Accordingly, on the 4th of November, Mr. Bromley, Mr. St. John (afterwards lord Bolinbroke) and Mr. Anneſley (afterwards earl of Angleſey) were ordered to bring in a bill for preventing 'Occaſional conformity.' It was read a ſecond time, the 17th of November, and, a motion being made for exempting proteſtant diſſenters from ſuch offices, as cannot by law be executed, without receiving the ſacrament according to the uſage of the church of England, it was carried in the negative. In the preamble of the bill, the toleration was aſſerted, and all perſecution for conſcience-ſake condemned, in a high ſtrain. But, how the enacting part could be reconciled with this preamble, is hard to conceive [a]. For by this bill all thoſe, who took the ſacrament and teſt (which, by the act paſſed in 1673, was made neceſſary to thoſe, who held offices of truſt, or were magiſtrates in corporations, but was only to be taken once by them) and did, after that, go to the meetings of diſſenters, or any meeting for religious worſhip, that was not according to the liturgy or practice of the church of England, where five perſons were preſent more than the family, were diſabled from holding their employments, and were to be fined one hundred pounds, and five pounds a day for every day, in which they continued to act in their employments, after their having been at any ſuch meeting. They were alſo made incapable to hold any other employment, till after one whole year's conformity to the church, which was to be proved at the quarter-ſeſſions. Upon a relapſe, the penalties and time of incapacity were doubled. No limitation of time was put in the bill, nor of the way, in which the offence was to be proved. But, whereas the teſt-act only included the magiſtrates in corporations, all the inferior officers or freemen in corporations, who were found to have ſome intereſts in the elections, were now comprehended in this bill. Some thought the bill of no conſequence, and that, if it ſhould paſs into a law, it would be of no effect: But that the occaſional conformiſts would become conſtant ones. Others thought, that this was ſuch a breaking in upon the toleration, as would undermine it, and that it would have a great effect on corporations; as, indeed, the intent of it was believed to be the modelling elections, and, conſequently, of the houſe of commons.

On behalf of the bill, it was ſaid, the deſign of the Teſt-Act was, that all in office ſhould continue in the communion of the church; that coming only once to the ſacrament for an office, and going afterwards to the meetings of diſſenters, was both an eluding the intent of the law, and a profanation of the ſacrament, which gave great ſcandal, and was abhorred by the better ſort of diſſenters. Thoſe, who were againſt the bill, ſaid, the nation had been quiet ever ſince the Toleration, the diſſenters had loſt more ground and ſtrength by it than the church: the nation was now engaged in a great war; it ſeemed therefore unreaſonable to raiſe animoſities at home, on matters of religion, at ſuch a time; and to encourage a tribe of informers, who were the worſt ſort of men: the fines were exceſſive, higher than any laid on papiſts by law; and, ſince no limitation of time, nor concurrence of witneſſes, was provided for in the bill, men would be for ever expoſed to the malice of a bold ſwearer or wicked ſervant: It was moved, ſince the greateſt danger of all was from atheiſts and papiſts, that all ſuch, as received the ſacrament for an office, ſhould be obliged to receive it three times a year, which all were by law required to do; and to keep to their pariſh-church, at leaſt one Sunday a month; but this was not admitted. All, who pleaded for the bill, did in words declare for the continuance of the Toleration, yet the ſharpneſs, with which they treated the diſſenters in all their ſpeeches, ſhewed as if they deſigned their extirpation. The bill, on the 28th of November, paſſed the houſe of commons by a great majority, and was carried up by Mr. Bromley, on the 2d of December, to the lords. That houſe being apprehenſive that the commons might (as they had done on ſeveral occaſions) tack their bill to ſome money-bill, made a vote: 'That the annexing any clauſe to a money-bill was contrary to the conſtitution of the Engliſh government, and the uſage of parliament;' and ordered this vote to be added to the roll of the ſtanding order of the houſe. The debates upon the occaſional bill held longer in the houſe of peers than they had done in the houſe of commons. Many were againſt it, becauſe of the high penalties: ſome remembered the practices of informers in the end of king Charles's reign, and would not conſent to the reviving ſuch infamous methods; all believed, that the chief deſign of this bill was, to model corporations, and to caſt out of them all thoſe who would not vote in elections for tories. The Toleration itſelf was viſibly aimed at, and this was only a ſtep to break in upon it. Some thought the deſign went yet further, to raiſe ſuch quarrels and diſtractions among us, as would ſo embroil us at home, that our allies might ſee they could not depend upon us; and that we, being weakened by the diſorders occaſioned by thoſe proſecutions, might be diſabled from carrying on the war, which was the chief thing driven at by the promoters of the bill. So that many of the lords, as well as the biſhops, agreed in oppoſing this bill, though upon different views: yet they conſented to ſome parts of it; chiefly, that ſuch as went to meetings, after they had received the ſacrament, ſhould be diſabled from holding any employments, and be fined twenty pounds; many went into this, though they were againſt every part of the bill, becauſe they thought this the moſt plauſible way of loſing it: ſince the houſe of commons had of late ſet it up for a maxim, that the lords could not alter the fines, that they ſhould fix in a bill, this being meddling with money, which they thought was ſo peculiar to them, that they would not let the lords, on any pretence, break in upon it.

The lords, hereupon, appointed a very exact ſearch to be made into all the rolls that lay in the clerk of the parliament's office, from the middle of king Henry's the Seventh's reign, down to the preſent time: and they found, by ſome hundreds of precedents, that in ſome bills the lords began the clauſes, that ſet the fines; and that, when fines were ſet by the commons, ſometimes they altered the fines, and, at other times, they changed the uſe to which they were applied: the report made of this was ſo full and clear, that there was no poſſibility of replying to it, and the lords ordered it to be entered into their books. But the commons were reſolved to maintain their point, without entering into any debate upon it. The amendments of the lords were moſtly alterations of words and expreſſions, except this of the alteration of the penalties; and another by which they diſowned, that it was the intention of the law, when it provided, that every perſon to be admitted to office ſhould receive the ſacrament, that ſuch perſon was obliged to be entirely conformable to the church. To which amendment the commons diſagreed, as well as to the alterations of the penalties. The lords alſo added, five clauſes, by the firſt of which information was to be given of the offence within ten days, and the profecution to be within three months, and the conviction upon the oath of at leaſt two credible witneſſes. To this the commons agreed, but to the other four clauſes they would not conſent, that diſſenters ſhould not be compelled to hold any office, for which they could not be legally qualified without taking the ſacrament: that the univerſity-churches might be exempted, where ſermons were preached without prayers: that ſuch as went to the French and Dutch churches might be excepted: and that governors of hoſpitals, and aſſiſtants of corporations and workhouſes for the poor, might alſo be exempted. The affair depended long between the two houſes, and both ſides took pains to bring up the lords that would vote with them, by which means there were above a hundred and thirty lords in the houſe, the greateſt number that ever had been brought together.

[a] The bill began thus: 'As nothing is more contrary to the profeſſion of the Chriſtian religion, and particularly to the doctrine of the Church of England, than perſecution for conſcience only; and, in due conſideration of it, an act paſſed in the firſt year of king William and queen Mary, for the exempting their majeſties proteſtant ſubjects, diſſenting from the Church of England, from the penalties of certain laws; which act ought inviolably to be obſerved, and eaſe given to conſciences truly ſcrupulous.' How this is reconcileable with an excluſion from all offices and places of truſt, purely on a religious account, cannot eaſily be made appear.

It

The court put their whole ſtrength to carry this bill; prince George came and voted for it, though he was himſelf an occaſional conformiſt. For he had received the ſacrament as lord high admiral, and yet kept his chapel in the Lutheran way [b]. The earl of Marlborough and the lord Godolphin alſo were for the bill. After ſome conferences, wherein each houſe had yielded ſome ſmaller differences to the other, it came to a free conference, on the 16th of January, in the painted chamber, which was more crowded upon that occaſion than had ever been known; ſo much weight was laid on this matter on both ſides. The managers, on the part of the commons, were Mr. Bromley, Mr. St. John, Mr. Finch, Mr. Solicitor-General, and ſir Thomas Powis. On the part of the lords, the duke of Devonſhire, the earl of Peterborough, the biſhop of Sarum, the lord Sommers, and the lord Hallifax [c].

When the conference was over, the commons left the bill with the lords, and ſaid, that they hoped they would not let the public loſe the benefit of ſo good a law. Then the managers returned to their reſpective houſes. When it came to the final vote of 'adhering', the lords were ſo equally divided, that, in three queſtions put upon different heads, the 'adhering' was carried but by one vote in every one of them, and it was a different perſon that gave it in all the three diviſions. Upon this, the bill was delivered to the commons according to form, at a free conference, and they were told, that the lords adhered to their amendments. As the commons likewiſe adhered to their diſagreement with the lords amendments, the bill was loſt for this time. The lords ordered their proceedings in this affair to be publiſhed, and the commons followed their example. This bill ſeemed to favour the intereſts of the church, and therefore the warm men were for it. The greater number of the biſhops being againſt it, they were cenſured, as cold in the concerns of the church: a reproach, that all moderate men muſt expect, when they oppoſe violent motions. Great part of this cenſure fell upon the biſhop of Sarum; for he bore a large ſhare in the debates, both in the houſe of lords and at the free conference. Angry men took occaſion, from the loſs of this bill, to charge the biſhops as enemies to the church, and betrayers of its intereſts, becauſe they would not run blindfold into the paſſions and deſigns of ill-tempered men; whereas they thought they faithfully purſued the true intereſts of the church, and zealouſly applied themſelves to the duties of their function.

While the occaſional conformity-bill was depending, Daniel de Foe, who had been a hoſier in the city of London, and, ſome years before publiſhed a ſevere ſatire, intitled, 'The true-born Engliſhman,' now undertook to ridicule the immoderate zeal of the church party, in a pamphlet, called, 'The ſhorteſt way with the Diſſenters: or, Propoſals for the Eſtabliſhment of the church.' Some, on both ſides, were at firſt amuſed with it, as queſtioning what was the deſign of it; but it was not long before the author's real intention was diſcovered. He began with ſuch bitter reflections on the diſſenters, and their principles, that it was taken for the work of a violent churchman for ſome time, and met with applauſe from ſome of that party in the two univerſities. The author, after his reflections, proceeds to tell the world, that the repreſentatives of the nation had now an opportunity, and perhaps the only one they ſhould ever have, to ſecure the church of England, and deſtroy her enemies, under the favour and protection of a 'true Engliſh queen.' That this was the time to pull up this heretical weed of ſedition, that had ſo long diſturbed the peace of the church, and poiſoned the good corn: That, if it ſhould be objected, that this renewing fire and faggot would be cruelty, and accounted barbarous, he anſwered, that it is cruelty to kill a ſnake or a toad in cold blood; but the poiſon of their nature makes it a charity to our neighbours to deſtroy thoſe creatures, not for any perſonal injury received, but for prevention; Not for the evil they have done, but the evil they may do. And that, as ſerpents, toads, and vipers are noxious to the body, and poiſon the ſenſitive life, ſo the diſſenters poiſon the ſoul, corrupt our poſterity, inſnare our children, deſtroy the vitals of our happineſs, our future felicity, and contaminate the whole maſs; and therefore they are to be rooted out of this nation, if ever we would live in peace, ſerve God, and enjoy our own.

The commons, after the author and his deſign was diſcovered, ordered the pamphlet to be burnt by the common hangman, and De Foe to be proſecuted. He pleaded for himſelf, that he gave the violent churchmen but their language, or, at leaſt, the ſenſe of their own expreſſions, when they talked 'of hanging out bloody colours and banners of defiance;' and ſhewed what many of their pamphlets and ſermons, as well as their converſation tended to. But De Foe was fined two hundred pounds, and put in the pillory. The earl of Nottingham is ſaid to offer him mercy

[b] It was reported, the prince ſhould ſay to the lord Wharton, when he was about to divide againſt him, 'My heart is vid you.'

[c] The ſubſtance of what paſſed at this free conference, was as follows:

The managers for the commons alledged, "That the intent of this bill was only to reſtrain a ſcandalous practice, which was a reproach to religion, and gave offence to all good Chriſtians, and to the beſt among the diſſenters themſelves. That it enacted nothing NEW, and was only intended to make the laws in being more effectual. That this bill appeared to the commons abſolutely neceſſary for the preventing thoſe miſchiefs which muſt prove deſtructive to the church and monarchy. That an eſtabliſhed religion and a national church are abſolutely neceſſary, when ſo many ill men pretended to inſpiration, and when there were ſo many weak men to follow them. That the only effectual way to preſerve this national church, was by keeping the civil power in the hands of thoſe whoſe principles and practices are conformable to it. That the parliament, by the corporation and teſt acts, thought they had ſecured our eſtabliſhment, and provided a ſufficient barrier to diſappoint any attempts againſt them, by enacting, that all in offices ſhould receive the Sacrament, according to the uſage of the Church of England, and never imagined a ſet of men could at any time riſe up, 'whoſe conſciences were too tender to obey the laws, but hardened enough to break them.' That, as the laſt reign began with an act in favour of the diſſenters, ſo the commons did deſire, that in the beginning of her majeſty's auſpicious reign, an act might paſs in favour of the Church of England, 'That thoſe men will be kept out of offices, who have ſhewn they never wanted the will when they had the power, to deſtroy the church.' And that this bill did not in any reſpect intrench on the act of toleration, or take from the diſſenters any one privilege they have by law, or give any one privilege to the Church of England, which was not at leaſt intended her by the laws as they then ſtood.

"As to the ſeveral particular amendments made by the lords, the managers for the commons inſiſted upon it, That, if the laws provided, that they that had offices ſhould receive the Sacrament, and by that intended a conformity; then whoſoever breaks the intentions of the law, breaks the law, or at leaſt, evades it; and that it was fit to provide againſt ſuch a practice. That if the intention of the teſt act was the reaſon to provide againſt ſuch evaders of it, the like intention in the corporation act would ſerve for a reaſon to provide againſt the evaders of that. That, by occaſional conformity, the diſſenters might let themſelves into the government of all corporations: and that it was obvious how far that would influence the government of the kingdom. That to ſeparate from a church, which has nothing in it againſt a man's conſcience to conform to, is ſchiſm: and that that is a ſpiritual ſin, without the ſuperadding a temporal law to make it an offence. That occaſional conformity declares a man's conſcience will let him conform; and in ſuch a man non-conformity is a wilfull ſin. And why ſhould occaſional conformity be allowed in corporations, when the lords agreed, that out of corporations it ought not to be allowed? That, in laying penalties, the commons would always endeavour to make them ſuch as ſhould neither tempt to perjury, nor totally diſcourage informations and proſecutions; which they thought the lords amendment would do, ſhould they agree to it. That the puniſhment of incapacity, the recapacitating, and the increaſe of puniſhment for a ſecond offence, are warranted by many precedents of the like nature in other penal laws. That an incapacity is a very proper puniſhment; and that a ſecond offence is a relapſe and apoſtacy, which makes it more heinous than the firſt offence, and therefore deſerves an increaſe of puniſhment. That he is indeed reduced to a very unhappy condition, who is made incapable of ſerving his prince and country. But in the preſent caſe both prince and country would be in a more unhappy condition, to be ſerved by ſuch, whoſe principles are inconſiſtent with the good and welfare of the eſtabliſhment. That the toleration was intended only for the caſe of tender and ſcrupulous conſciences, and not to give a licence for occaſional conformity. That conforming and non-conforming are contradictions; nothing but a firm perſuaſion, that the terms of communion required are ſinful and unlawful, could juſtify the one, and that that plainly condemns the other. That the exempting diſſenters from ſerving offices would rather eſtabliſh occaſional non-conformity, than prevent occaſional conformity; and therefore increaſe and not cure the evil the bill was intended to remedy. That the Act of Uniformity had provided for the ſermons or lectures in the Univerſities; and that therefore the acts againſt conventicles in the 16 and 22 Car. II. made no particular exceptions for them, and yet they were never taken to be conventicles. That the exempting ſuch, as ſhould be preſent at the foreign reformed churches, would be to open a door to evade this law. And that the places of governors of ſome hoſpitals are very conſiderable preferments, and given as ſuch to the clergy of the Church of England; and that the commons could never conſent by any law, to let in the diſſenters to the enjoyment of them."

The managers for the lords on the other hand declared, that. "By agreeing ſo far as they had done to this bill, they had gone a great way for preventing the evil it was intended to remedy; and owned it to be a ſcandal to religion, that perſons ſhould conform only for a place. That they did not think going to a meeting to be 'malum in ſe,' for that the diſſenters are proteſtants, and differ from the Church of England only in ſome little forms, and whilſt in Newgate, if he would diſcover who ſet him to write this pamphlet.

The commons had now paſſed a bill in favour of thoſe, who had not taken the oath abjuring the pretended prince of Wales, by the day, that was named; granting them a year longer to conſider of it; for it was ſaid, that the whole party was now come entirely into the queen's intereſts; though, on the other hand, it was given out, that agents were come from France, on deſign to perſuade all perſons to take the abjuration, that they might become capable of employments, and ſo might in time be a majority in parliament; and by that means the act of ſucceſſion, and the oath impoſed by it might be repealed. When the bill for thus prolonging the time was brought up to the lords, a clauſe was added, qualifying thoſe perſons, who ſhould, in the new extent of time, take the oaths, to return to their benefices or employments, unleſs they were already legally filled. When this was agreed, two clauſes of much greater conſequence were added to the bill. One was, declaring it high-treaſon to endeavour to defeat the ſucceſſion to the crown, as it was now limited by law, or to ſet aſide the next ſucceſſion. This had a precedent in the former reign, and therefore it could not be denied now. It ſeemed the more neceſſary, becauſe there was another perſon who openly claimed the crown; ſo that a farther ſecurity might well be inſiſted upon. This was a great ſurprize to many, who were viſibly uneaſy at the motion, but were not prepared for it, and did not ſee how it could be reſiſted. The other clauſe was, for ſending the abjuration to Ireland, and obliging all there (in the ſame manner as in England) to take it. This ſeemed the more reaſonable, conſidering the ſtrength of the popiſh intereſt there. Both clauſes paſſed in the houſe of lords, without any oppoſition; but it was apprehended, that the commons would not be ſo eaſy; yet, when it was ſent to them, they ſtruggled only againſt the firſt clauſe, that barred the return of perſons, upon the taking the oaths, into places, that were already filled. The party tried their ſtrength upon this, and, upon their ſucceſs in it, they ſeemed reſolved to diſpute the other clauſe; but it was carried, though only by one voice, to agree with the lords. When the clauſe relating to the ſucceſſion was read, ſir Chriſtopher Muſgrave tried, if it might not be made a bill by itſelf, and not put as a clauſe in another bill; but, ſeeing the houſe was reſolved to receive both clauſes, he did not inſiſt on his motion. Every body was ſurprized to ſee a bill, that was begun in favour of the jacobites, turned ſo terribly upon them; ſince by it a new ſecurity was given, both in England and Ireland, for a proteſtant ſucceſſor.

At this time, the earl of Rocheſter quitted his place of lord-lieutenant of Ireland[d]. He was uneaſy at the preference, which the duke of Marlborough had in the queen's confidence, and at the lord Godolphin's being made lord-treaſurer. It was generally believed, that he was endeavouring to embroil affairs, and laying a train of oppoſition in the houſe of commons. The queen ſent a meſſage to him, ordering him to make ready to go to Ireland; for it ſeemed very ſtrange, eſpecially in time of a war, that a perſon, in ſo great a poſt, ſhould not attend upon it. But he, after ſome days adviſing about it, went to the queen, and deſired to be excuſed from that employment. This was readily accepted, and upon that he withdrew from the councils; and his poſt of lord-lieutenant was (as hath been ſaid) conferred on the duke of Ormond.

The report of the commiſſioners, appointed to take the public accounts, was a buſineſs that took up much time in and therefore they thought loſs of office a ſufficient puniſhment without an incapacity. That it could never be thought thoſe of the better ſort would be guilty of this offence: if they were, they ſhould loſe their offices. That in inferior officers of the cuſtoms and exciſe, who had little elſe to ſubſiſt on, loſs of office was ſevere enough, ſince thereby they would be undone. And that this was yet more conſiderable in patent places, which by a common cuſtom are bought and ſold, and are of the nature of freeholds. That incapacity was too great a penalty; and that it is hard to imagine any offence, that is not capital, can deſerve it. That there is no more reaſon to puniſh this offence with incapacity, than to make it felony. That the diſſenters are not obnoxious to the government, as when the corporation act was made; the moſt conſiderable perſons amongſt them being well affected to the preſent conſtitution, and hearty enemies to the queen's and the kingdom's enemies. That in ſome corporations they took the election of members to ſerve in parliament to be only in ſuch as are concerned in the government of them, as at Buckingham; and the lords would not by this bill deprive men of their birth-rights, neither did they think fit to bring any greater hardſhips upon the diſſenters, ſince great advantages have accrued from the act of toleration. That the lords did equally deſire a good correſpondence betwixt the two houſes, and were ſo ſatisfied of the neceſſity of union at this time, that they thought all meaſures fatal, that might create diviſions amongſt proteſtants at home, or check the neceſſary union of the allies abroad. That in a time of war they thought alterations unneceſſary and dangerous, and were unwilling to bring any real hardſhips upon the diſſenters at this time, or give them any cauſe of jealouſies and fears. That the toleration had had ſuch good effects, contributed ſo much to the ſecurity and reputation of the church of England, and produced ſo good a temper among diſſenters, That the lords were unwilling to give the leaſt diſcredit to that act; liberty of conſcience and gentle meaſures being moſt proper, and having been found moſt effectual towards increaſing the church, and diminiſhing the number of diſſenters. That ſome parts of the bill had an air of ſeverity not proper for this ſeaſon; that a proper time ought to be taken to apply remedies, the attempting too haſty cures having often proved fatal. That, if there had been ſuch danger and neceſſity, this remedy would have been propoſed before. That, if this bill did enact nothing NEW, there would not be ſuch a conteſt about it. That they did conſent to a puniſhment, but would proportion the penalty to the offence. That they hoped their deſires of ſecuring the toleration-act, the peace and quiet of the kingdom at home, and the intereſt of the nation abroad, would meet with a fair conſtruction. That they thought the only conteſt between the two houſes was, which ſhould moſt befriend and take care of the church; the one would procure a haſty ſettled ſubmiſſion, not ſo much to be depended on; the other would obtain for her a more gradual but ſafer advantage over diſſenters. That they conceived both the laſt reign and this began upon the ſame bottom and foundation; and that, as in this reign her majeſty has been pleaſed to give gracious aſſurances as to liberty of conſcience, ſo in the laſt the church ever met with protection and ſupport. That it is hard, as well as untrue, to ſay of the diſſenters, they 'never wanted the will, when they had the power, to deſtroy the church and ſtate;' ſince, in the laſt and greateſt danger the church was expoſed to, they joined with her with all imaginable zeal and ſincerity againſt the papiſts, their common enemies; and that ever ſince they have continued to ſhew all the ſigns of friendſhip and ſubmiſſion to the government of church and ſtate. That toleration and tenderneſs had never miſſed of procuring peace and union, as perſecution had never failed of producing the contrary effects. That the lords could not think the diſſenters could properly be called ſchiſmatics; that ſuch an opinion allowed would bring an heavy charge upon the church of England, who by a law tolerated ſuch a ſchiſm: And that, the church-men having allowed communion with the reformed churches abroad, it muſt follow they hold them not guilty of ſchiſm, or could not allow communion with them. That this bill would inflict a ſecond puniſhment on them, who fled from France for their religion. That this might be uſed as an argument to juſtify even the perſecution in France. That they could not depart from the clauſe relating to the Dutch and Walloon churches ſo long eſtabliſhed among us, leſt it ſhould give great diſguſt and offence to the allies abroad, and at the ſame time forfeit the greateſt character can be given a church, that of tenderneſs and charity to fellow-chriſtians, &c. That, as to workhouſes, they could not conceive, that the diſtributing of ſome 'preſbyterian bread to the poor, and diſſenting water-gruel to the ſick,' could ever bring any prejudice to the church of England: And that they were of opinion, that the diſſenters were coming into the church, and that nothing but terrifying meaſures and ſeverity could prevent the happy union.

"It was further added, That a papiſt convict, as ſoon as he conforms himſelf, and receives the ſacrament, is immediately cleared; no incapacity lies upon him. But this act would carry the matter farther to a year's incapacity. A papiſt, that ſhall relapſe and fall under a ſecond conviction is only convicted over again, without any aggravation of the cenſure; which by this bill would be much heightened upon a ſecond offence: So that the penalties of this bill are higher than any the law has laid on papiſts for aſſiſting at the ſolemneſt act of their religion. Before the act of toleration paſſed, while conventicles were illegal and criminal aſſemblies, a man in office, that was preſent at them, was only liable to a fine of 10l. Whereas by this bill he would be liable to a fine of an 100l. for being preſent at them, though they have an impunity by law: It does not ſeem ſo very ſuitable, that the ſame action ſhould be made ten times more penal, after ſuch an impunity is granted, than it was before the paſſing that law, while ſuch aſſemblies were illegal. It ſeems inſnaring, and unbecoming ſo mild a government as ours, to lay ſo heavy a penalty on a crime ſo dubiouſly expreſſed: Nor is it proper, that the ſums raiſed by the bill ſhould all go to the informer, which might give encouragement to falſe accuſations and perjury. This occaſional conformity has been both the principle and practice of ſome of the moſt eminent among the diſſenters ever ſince St. Bartholomew's in 1662. Nor is it a certain inference, that, becauſe a man receives the ſacrament in the church, he can therefore conform in every other particular. Occaſional conformity was a ſtep that carried many much further: And it was intimated, that the lords were not willing to ruin perſons utterly on account of a practice, that many well-meaning men have been and may be led into, and which they think naturally tends to bring them over entirely to the church, &c. &c."

The managers, on the behalf of the commons, replied, "that ſeveral arguments, urged by the managers for the lords, were againſt the bill, which they had ſeemed to agree to. That no time could be more ſeaſonable for this bill than the preſent, becauſe good laws may be obtained moſt eaſily in the beſt reigns. That, ſhould any by this bill be turned out of their employments, and conſequently loſe their votes in elections, yet it cannot be ſaid they loſe their birth-rights, becauſe no man is born a magiſtrate. That ſome of the lords arguments had been ſo irregular as to defend occaſional conformity. And that they were ſurprized to hear a prelate ſpeak in defence of ſuch a practice.'

[d] The ducheſs of Marlborough, in the 'Account of her Conduct, p. 142, tells us, that this earl was the firſt of the tory leaders, who diſcovered a deep diſcontent with the queen and the adminiſtration; and reſigned the lieutenancy of Ireland in great wrath, upon her majeſty's being ſo unreaſonable, as to preſs him to go thither to attend the affairs of that kingdom, which greatly needed his preſence. For, as the revenue, which had been formerly granted, was out, it was neceſſary to call a parliament, in order to another ſupply; and a parliament could not be held without a lord-lieutenant. But, when the queen repreſented theſe things to him, he told her, with great inſolence, 'That he would not go to Ireland, though ſhe would give the country to him and his ſon;' ſo that he ſeemed to have accepted the poſt, only that he might reign in Ireland by the miniſtry of his brother Keightley, as he hoped to do in England in perſon. Nor could he, after his reſignation, overcome his anger ſo far, as to wait upon the queen, or go to council; which ſhe obſerving, ordered, after ſome time, that he ſhould no more be ſummoned, ſaying, 'That it was not reaſonable he ſhould come to council only when he pleaſed.' It was generally thought, and with good reaſon, that the true ſource of his diſſatisfaction was the queen's not making him her ſole governor and director, and lord Godolphin's being preferred before him for the treaſury.

this ſeſſion, and occaſioned many debates. They pretended that they had made great diſcoveries. They began with the earl of Ranelagh as pay-maſter general of the army, and drew up a narrative, wherein they charged him with great miſmanagements. The earl had been pay-maſter of the army in king James's time; and, being very fit for the poſt, he had been continued all the laſt reign: He had lived high, and ſo it was believed, his appointments could not ſupport ſo great an expence: He had an account of one and twenty millions lay upon him. It was given out, that a great deal of the money, lodged in his office, for the pay of the army, was diverted to other uſes, diſtributed among favourites, or given to corrupt members of parliament; and that ſome millions had been ſent over to Holland: It had been often ſaid, that great diſcoveries would be made, whenſoever his accounts were looked into: And that he, to ſave himſelf, would lay open ill practices of the former regn. But now, when all was brought under a ſtrict examination, a few inconſiderable articles, of ſome hundreds of pounds, was all that could be found to be objected to him: And, even to theſe, he gave clear and full anſwers. At laſt they found, that, upon the breaking of a regiment, a ſum, which he had iſſued out for it's pay, had been returned to his office, the regiment being broke ſooner, than that pay was exhauſted: And that no entry of this was made in his accounts. To this he anſwered, that his officer, who received the money, was, within three days after after, taken ſo ill of a confirmed ſtone, that he never came again to the office, but died in great miſery: And, during thoſe three days, he had not entered that ſum in the books. Lord Ranelagh acknowledged, that he was liable to account for all the money that was received by his under-officers; but here was no crime or fraud deſigned; yet this was ſo aggravated, that he ſaw his good poſt was his greateſt guilt: He therefore quitted his place, which being divided, Mr. Howe was appointed pay-maſter of the guards and garriſons at home, as being the more laſting poſt; and ſir Stephen Fox, pay-maſter of the forces beyond ſea. Upon this, all the clamour raiſed againſt the earl of Ranelagh ceaſed; however, the commons vindicated the report of the commiſſioners by a vote, and, to make a ſhow of ſeverity, expelled the earl the houſe, on the 7th of February, 'for a high crime and miſdemeanor, in miſapplying ſeveral ſums of the public money.' But, upon all this canvaſſing, he appeared much more innocent that even his friends had believed him.

The clamour that had been long kept up againſt the former miniſtry, as devourers of the public treaſure, was of ſuch uſe to the prevailing party, that they reſolved to continue it, by all poſſible methods: So a committee of the houſe of commons prepared a long addreſs to the queen, reflecting on the ill management of the funds upon which they laid the great debt of the nation, and not upon the deficiencies. This was branched out into many particulars, which were all heavily aggravated. Yet, though a great part of the outcry had been formerly made againſt Ruſſel, treaſurer of the navy, and his office, they found not ſo much as a colour to fix a complaint there: Nor could they charge any thing on the chancery, the treaſury, and the adminiſtration of juſtice. Great complaints were made of ſome accounts that ſtood long out, and they inſiſted on ſome pretended neglects, the old methods of the exchequer not having been exactly followed: Though it did not appear that the public ſuffered in any ſort by theſe failures. They kept up a clamour likewiſe againſt the commiſſioners of the prizes, though they had paſt their accounts as the law directed, and no objection was made to them. The addreſs was full of ſevere reflections and ſpiteful inſinuations, and it was thus carried to the queen, and publiſhed to the nation, as the ſenſe of the commons of England.

The Lords, to prevent the ill impreſſions this might make, appointed a committee, to examine all the obſervations that the commiſſioners of accounts had offered to both houſes. They ſearched all the public offices, and were amazed to find that there was not one article of any importance in thoſe obſervations, or in all the commons addreſs to the queen, but what was falſe in fact. They found, that the deficiencies in the former reign were of two ſorts: the one was of ſums that the commons had voted, but for which they had made no ſort of proviſion: the other was, where the ſupply, that was given, fell ſhort of the ſum at which it was eſtimated; and between theſe two the deficiencies amounted to fourteen millions. This was the root of all the great debt that lay on the nation. They examined into all the pretended miſmanagement, and found, that what the commons had ſtated ſo invidiouſly was miſtaken; ſince king William and his miniſters had been ſo far from miſapplying the money, that was given for public occaſions, that the king had applied three millions to the public ſervice, which by law was his own money, of which they made up the account. They found alſo, that ſome ſmall omiſſions, in ſome of the forms of the exchequer, were of no conſequence, and neither had nor could have any ill effect: and whereas a vaſt clamour was raiſed againſt paſſing accounts by privy-ſeals, they put an end to that effectually, when it appeared on what ground this was done. By the ancient methods of the exchequer, every account was to be carried on, ſo that the new officer was to begin his account with the balance of the former account. Sir Edward Seymour, who had been treaſurer of the navy, owed by his laſt account an hundred and eighty thouſand pounds; and he had received, after that, an hundred and forty thouſand pounds, for which the accounts were never made up. As it was not poſſible therefore for thoſe, who came after him, to be liable for his accounts, the treaſury of the navy, in the laſt reign, were obliged to take out privy-ſeals for making up their accounts. Theſe imported no more, than that they were to account only for the money which they themſelves had received; for, in all other reſpects, their accounts were to paſs according to the ordinary methods of the exchequer. Complaints had alſo been made of the remiſſneſs of the lords of the treaſury, or their officers, appointed to account with the receivers of counties for the aids that had been given. But when this was examined, it appeared, that this had been done with ſuch exactneſs, that, of the ſum of twenty-four millions, for which they had accounted, there was not owing above ſixty thouſand pounds, and that was, for the moſt part, in Wales, where it was not thought adviſable to uſe too much rigour in raiſing it; and of that ſum, there was not above fourteen thouſand pounds that was reckoned as loſt. The collectors of the cuſtoms likewiſe anſwered all the obſervations made on their accounts ſo fully, that the houſe of commons was ſatisfied with their anſwers, and diſmiſſed them without ſo much as a reprimand. All this was reported to the houſe of lords, and they laid it before the queen in an addreſs, which was afterwards printed with the vouchers to every particular. By this means it was made out, to the ſatisfaction of the whole nation, how falſe thoſe reports were, which had been ſo induſtriouſly ſpread, and were ſo eaſily believed by the greater part; for the bulk of mankind will be always apt to think, that courts and miniſters ſerve their own ends, and ſtudy to enrich themſelves at the public coſt. The examination held long, and was proſecuted with great exactneſs, and had all the effects that could be deſired from it; for it ſilenced that noiſe which king William's enemies had raiſed, to aſperſe him and his miniſters[e].

[e] Thoſe readers, who deſire a fuller account of theſe matters, will find it in the following extract:

On the 18th of January, Mr. St. John, from the commiſſioners of the public accounts, preſented to the houſe of commons a general ſtate of receipts and iſſues of the public revenue, between the feaſt of St. Michael, 1700, 1701, and 1702, with obſervations thereupon. This having been taken into conſideration the following days, and, Mr. Bridges, one of the commiſſioners, having, on the 25th preſented to the houſe an account of both the loans and payments on the votes of that houſe, in February 1700, and of the produce of twenty-five per cent. on French goods, and the application of the ſame, it was then reſolved, 'That the borrowing of money, and ſtriking tallies with intereſt unneceſſarily, before the public occaſions required the ſame, had been one reaſon of the great debt which lay upon the nation: and that the applying of the public money to the uſe of the civil liſt, which was otherwiſe provided for, was another cauſe of that great debt.' The next day, colonel Bierley, from the commiſſioners, preſented to the houſe their report, purſuant to an order of the houſe, by which they were directed to examine the auditor and other officers of the exchequer, relating to the paſſing of the accounts of the public money, and to lay before the houſe what they ſhould find to be the cauſe, that the accounts were not annually and duly paſſed, according to the laws in that caſe, and through whoſe default it had happened. This report, and ſeveral paragraphs of the commiſſioners obſervations, being read, the houſe reſolved, '1. That Charles lord Hallifax, auditor of the receipt of the exchequer, had neglected his duty, and was guilty of a breach of truſt, in not tranſmitting the impreſt-rolls half-yearly to the king's remembrancer, according to the act made in the ſeſſion of parliament, held in the 8th and 9th years of his late majeſty's reign, intitled, 'An act for the better obſervation of the courſe anciently uſed in the receipts of Exchequer.' 2. That the allowing accountants the charges of law-ſuits, to determine the right of their officers, was a miſapplication of the public money. 3. That the auditors of the impreſt had been guilty of a great neglect of their duty, in not certifying to the king's remembrancer the neglect of the ſeveral annual accounts, that the proceſs might go out againſt them. And, 4. That there had been a general miſmanagement of the public money, by not obliging accountants to make up their accounts, and by continuing receivers in ſeveral counties, contrary to law, who had neglected to make up their accounts in due time, which had been a great abuſe of the public, and another cauſe of the great debt that lay upon the nation.' On the 27th, the commons, having proceeded in the further conſideration of the obſervation of the commiſſioners of public accounts, reſolved, 1. 'That the money, impreſt out of the exchequer for the ſervice of the public, ought to be kept by the reſpective officers in their own cuſtody, until the ſame ſhall be paid to the uſes for which it was directed. 2. That Charles lord Hallifax, auditor of the receipt of the exchequer, had been guilty of a breach of truſt, in not examining every three months the tellers vouchers for the payments upon the annuities, which he allowed in his weekly certificates, according to the forementioned act of parliament.

With this the ſeſſion ended, and the queen, on the 27th of February, after having given the royal aſſent to all the bills that were ready, made the following ſpeech to both houſes:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I RETURN you my hearty thanks for the great diſpatch you have given to the public affairs in this ſeſſion, which is an advantage extremely material at all times, and I hope we ſhall find the fruits of it this year, in the forwardneſs of our preparations.

"I am to thank you, Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons, in particular, for the ſupplies, with which you enable me to carry on the war. It ſhall be my care to have them ſtrictly applied to the uſes for which you have deſigned them, and to the beſt advantage for the public ſervice. You have repoſed great confidence in me, by allowing ſo unuſual a latitude as you have in the clauſe of Appropriations. I ſhall improve all opportunities in the uſe of it, for the honour and true intereſt of the nation.

"I muſt further take notice to you, that the readineſs you have ſhewn, in the proviſion made for the prince, is a very ſenſible obligation to me.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I deſire and expect from you, that you make it your buſineſs in your ſeveral counties to continue and preſerve the quiet and ſatisfaction of my ſubjects. I hope ſuch of them as have the misfortune to diſſent from the Church of England, will reſt ſecure and ſatisfied in the act of Toleration, which I am reſolved to maintain; and that all thoſe, who have the happineſs and advantage to be of the Church of England, will conſider, that I have had my education in it, and that I have been willing to run great hazards for its preſervation; and therefore they may be very ſure, I ſhall always make it my own particular care to encourage and maintain this Church as by law eſtabliſhed, and every the leaſt member of it, in all their juſt rights and privileges; and, upon all occaſions of promotions to any eccleſiaſtical dignity, I ſhall have a very juſt regard to ſuch, as are eminent and remarkable for their piety, learning, and conſtant zeal for the Church; that by this, and all other methods, which ſhall be thought proper, I may tranſmit it ſecurely ſettled to poſterity.

"I think it might have been for the public ſervice to have had ſome further laws for reſtraining the great licence which is aſſumed, of publiſhing and ſpreading ſcandalous pamphlets and libels: but, as far as the preſent laws will extend, I hope you will all do your duty in your reſpective ſtations to prevent and puniſh ſuch pernicious practices. Above all other things, I do recommend to you peace and union among ourſelves, as the moſt effectual means, that can be deviſed to diſcourage and defeat the deſigns of our enemies.

"I muſt not conclude without acquainting you, I have given directions, that my part of all the prizes, which have been or ſhall be taken during this war, be applied entirely to the public ſervice; and I hope my own revenue will not fall ſo ſhort, but that I may be able, as I deſire, to contribute yet further to the eaſe of my people."

After which the lord-keeper, by her majeſty's command, prorogued the parliament to Thurſday the 22d of April following.

Several bills had been moved this ſeſſion, (ſome of which paſſed the commons) but were not finiſhed. On the 23d of December, ſir Edward Seymour moved for leave to bring in a bill "to reſume all the grants made in king William's reign, and applying them to the uſe of the public." This was carried by a majority of one hundred and eighty againſt ſeventy-eight, though the bill was afterwards dropped by the commons themſelves. At the ſame time it was moved by Mr. Walpole, "that all the grants made in the reign of the late king James, ſhould alſo be reſumed." But this by the ſame commons was paſſed in the negative. Sir John Holland then made a motion to bring in a bill, "for the more free and impartial proceedings in parliament, by providing, That no perſon whatſoever in office or employment ſhould be capable of ſitting in parliament," which alſo paſſed in the negative. Howe, Muſgrave, Seymour, &c. who had ſo vehemently puſhed the like bill in king William's reign, parliament. 3. That the reſolutions relating to the lord Hallifax be laid before her majeſty. And 4. That an addreſs be preſented to her majeſty, that ſhe would be pleaſed to give directions to the attorney-general to proſecute him for the ſaid offences.' On the 7th of February, colonel Granville acquainted the houſe, that the queen had been pleaſed to ſay, 'That ſhe would ſend to the attorney-general, and give him her directions purſuant to this addreſs.'

On the other hand, the lords, before whom Mr. Gregory King, ſecretary to the commiſſioners of accounts, had, on the 15th of January, laid an account of the general ſtate of the receipts and iſſues of the public revenue, from the feaſt of St. Michael 1700, to the ſame feaſt in 1702, with their obſervations thereupon, ordered, on the 1ſt of February, that the commiſſioners of accounts ſhould lay before their lordſhips what further obſervations they had made in relation to the ſaid accounts. The next day the lords took the book of public accounts into conſideration, and read the firſt paragraph of the commiſſioners obſervations; which, relating to the lord Hallifax, his lordſhip was heard thereto. Then Mr. King delivered at the bar the commiſſioners of accounts further obſervations; and at the ſame time the queen's remembrancer laid before their lordſhips the impreſt-rolls tranſmitted to him ſince November 1699. This being done, a committee was appointed to conſider of the obſervations delivered firſt to their lordſhips from the commiſſioners of accounts; and it was ordered, 'That the queen's remembrancer ſhould, the next day, bring before the ſaid committee the impreſt-rolls tranſmitted to him ſince the 20th of April 1697, being the time from which the act commenced: and, ſecondly, That the commiſſioners for public accounts ſhould have notice, that their lordſhips had appointed a committee to conſider of their obſervations.' On the 3d of February, Mr. Barker, deputy to her majeſty's remembrancer, brought the other impreſt-rolls, as ordered the day before; which were delivered to the committee, and the duke of Somerſet reported from the ſaid committee, that they had taken the firſt obſervation into conſideration, in relation to the auditor of the exchequer: That, though the commiſſioners of accounts had notice of the committee's ſitting, yet none of them attended; and therefore the committee was of opinion, that a meſſage be ſent to the houſe of commons, that they might have leave to attend; which meſſage was, on the 4th of February, ſent accordingly. On the 5th, the commons, having taken the ſaid meſſage into conſideration, appointed a committee to inſpect the journals, and to ſearch precedents relating to what had been done upon the lords deſiring members of the houſe of commons to attend the houſe of lords, and in relation to the lords inſpecting and examining accounts. And the ſame day the duke of Somerſet made the following report: "The committee, appointed to conſider of the obſervations in the book of accounts delivered into this houſe, have made ſome progreſs in conſidering the ſaid obſervations, and take leave to acquaint this houſe, that they have examined into the firſt of theſe obſervations; and alſo the further obſervations delivered into this houſe the 2d inſtant, relating to the tranſmitting the ordinary impreſt-rolls to the queen's remembrancer. They have inſpected ſeveral of the original impreſt-rolls delivered into the houſe by Mr. Barker, deputy to her majeſty's remembrancer. They have alſo examined divers officers of the exchequer, and others, upon oath, and do find, that, by the ancient and uninterrupted courſe of the exchequer, two impreſt-rolls are to be made out for each year; the one comprehending all ſuch ſums impreſt from the end of Trinity term to the end of Hilary Term; the other containing all ſuch ſums from that time to the end of Trinity Term; which rolls are commonly called 'half yearly rolls;' though improperly. They find, that, by the ancient courſe of the Exchequer, theſe impreſt-rolls, being made out by the auditor of the receipt, are to be delivered by him to the clerk of the pells, whoſe duty it is to examine and ſign them; and, this being done, the clerk of the pells delivers them to the remembrancer. This uſage was by degrees diſcontinued in the reign of king Charles the Second; and the remembrancer, or his agent, uſed to come to the office of the auditor of the receipt, and take away the impreſt-rolls from thence immediately. But in the time, when the earl of Rocheſter was treaſurer, the ancient uſage was reſtored, and he did order, that the impreſt-rolls ſhould be carefully examined and ſigned by the clerk of the pells, before they ſhould be tranſmitted to the remembrancer; and accordingly, ſince that time, the ancient cuſtom has been obſerved, as well before as ſince the act of parliament made in the 8th and 9th years of his late majeſty, 'for the better obſervation of the courſe anciently uſed in the receipt of the exchequer;' that is to ſay, the ſaid half-yearly rolls, when made out and ſigned by the auditor, have been tranſmitted to the clerk of the pells; and when the clerk of the pells has examined and ſigned them, he or his deputy, has delivered them to the remembrancer; and this appears by the remembrancer's indorſement upon the rolls. The committee finds, that Charles lord Hallifax has been auditor of the receipt from the end of November 1699, ſince which time ſix impreſt-rolls have been tranſmitted to the remembrancer; and there is a ſeventh roll now under examination of the office of the pells, and no other roll can be prepared till after the 12th of this inſtant February. Upon the whole matter, the committee are humbly of opinion, that Charles lord Hallifax, auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, hath performed the duty of his office, in tranſmitting the ordinary impreſt-rolls to the queen's remembrancer, according to the ancient cuſtom of the Exchequer, and the directions of the act of the 8th and 9th Gulielm. III. and that he hath not been guilty of any neglect or breach of truſt upon that account."

This report being read, as alſo the examination taken upon oath by the committee, and the dates and indorſements of the ſeveral impreſt-rolls delivered by Mr. Barker, the queſtion was put, "Whether this houſe would agree to the opinion of the committee in this report?" Which being carried in the affirmative, it was reſolved and declared by the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, "That Charles lord Hallifax, auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, hath performed the duty of his office, in tranſmitting the ordinary impreſt-rolls to the queen's remembrancer, according to the ancient cuſtom of the Exchequer, and the direction of the act 8th and 9th Gulielmi III Regis, intitled, 'An act for the better obſervation of the courſe anciently uſed in the receipt of the Exchequer;' and that he hath not been guilty of any neglect or breach of truſt upon that account." At the ſame time the lords ordered their proceedings in this affair to be immediately printed and publiſhed.'

This vindication of the lord Hallifax gave great offence to the houſe of commons, who, on the 12th of February, ordered their committee to ſearch the journals of the houſe of lords, and report their lordſhips proceedings in relation to the 'obſervations of the commiſſioners of accounts.' Purſuant to his order, colonel Granville the next day reported to the houſe what the committee had found both in the lords journals relating to this affair, and in the journals of the houſe of commons relating to what had been done upon the lords deſiring members of the ſaid houſe to attend the houſe of lords; and in relation 'to the lords inſpecting and examining public accounts.' This report being read, the commons ordered the ſame committee to draw up what was proper to be offered to the lords at a conference upon the ſubject matter of their lordſhips meſſage of the 4th inſtant, which the committee did accordingly in this manner: "The commons cannot comply with your lordſhips deſires contained in your meſſage of the 4th inſtant, becauſe the commons are were now as warm in oppoſing this, and inſtead of it carried a bill, "for the more free and impartial proceedings in parliament, by providing, that no perſon ſhall be choſen a member, but ſuch as have a ſufficient real eſtate." This bill was rejected by the lords, on the 22d of February.

In this ſeſſion the lords had rendered themſelves very conſiderable, and had gained an univerſal reputation over the nation. It is true, thoſe who had oppoſed the perſons, that had carried matters before them in this ſeſſion, were ſo near them in number, that things of the greateſt conſequence were carried only by one or two voices; and therefore, as it was intended to have a clear majority in both houſes in the next ſeſſion, the queen was prevailed with, ſoon after the prorogation, to create four new peers, who had been the moſt violent of the whole party. Accordingly John Granville was made baron Granville of Potheridge in the county of Devon; Heneage Finch, baron of Guernſey in the county of Southampton; ſir John Leviſon Gower, baron Gower of Sittenham in the county of York; and Francis Seymour Conway, youngeſt ſon of ſir Edward Seymour, baron Conway of Ragley, in the county of Warwick, with a remainder to his brother, Charles Seymour. Great reflections were made upon theſe promotions. When ſome ſevere things had been thrown out in the houſe of commons upon the oppoſition, that they met with from the lords, it was inſinuated that it would be eaſy to find men of merit and eſtate to make a clear majority in that houſe. This was an open declaration of a deſign to put every thing into the hands and power of that party. It was alſo an incroachment on one of the tendereſt points of the prerogative, to make motions of creating peers in the houſe of commons. However, at the ſame time, John Harvey, who was of the oppoſite party, was created baron of Ickworth in the county of Suffolk, by the intereſt of the ducheſs of Marlborough with the queen[f]. The marquis of Normanby was created duke of the ſame name, to are ſtill of the ſame opinion, as was delivered to your lordſhips in February 1691, at a free conference upon the ſubject matter of the amendments made by the lords to the additional bill, for the appointing and enabling commiſſioners to examine, take, and ſtate the public accounts of the kingdom, when they deſired to know the end your lordſhips would propoſe to yourſelves by an enquiry into the public accounts. For, ſhould any miſapplication of money, or default of diſtribution, appear in the accounts, your lordſhips cannot take cognizance thereof originally, or otherwiſe, even in your judicial capacity, than at the complaint of the commons. And, ſhould a failure or want of money appear, it is not in your lordſhips power to redreſs it, for the grant of all aids is in the commons only; or, if there be any ſurpluſage, the commons only can apply it to the charge of the enſuing year. But ſhould the commons give leave to the commiſſioners to attend your lordſhips, no information, they can give againſt any perſon whatſoever, can entitle your lordſhips either to acquit or condemn. Yet, ſince this meſſage, the commons find in your lordſhips journals a reſolution, declaring, 'That Charles lord Hallifax, auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, has performed the duty of his office, &c.' which looks to the commons, as if your lordſhips pretended to give a judgment of acquittal, without any accuſation brought before your lordſhips, and conſequently without any trial. And that, which makes your lordſhips proceedings yet more irregular, it tends to prejudging a cauſe which might regularly have come before you, either originally by impeachment, or by writ of error from the courts below. And therefore the commons can ſee no uſe of their reſolution, unleſs it be either to intimidate the judges, or prepoſſeſs a jury. But, if your lordſhips could have judged in this matter, it does not appear by your lordſhips journals, that you have had under your examination the reſpective times of tranſmitting the ſeveral impreſt-rolls to the queen's remembrancer; without which it is impoſſible to know whether the auditor of the receipt has done his duty according to the late act of parliament." Theſe reaſons being reported, on the 16th of February, by colonel Granville, and afterwards read and approved by the houſe, a meſſage was immediately ſent to the lords, to deſire a conference: to which the lords having the next day agreed, the managers for the commons delivered the ſaid reaſons to their lordſhips. The lords upon this, on the 18th, came to the following reſolutions: Firſt, "That the lords have an undoubted right (which they can never ſuffer to be conteſted) to take cognizance originally of all public accounts, and to enquire into any miſapplication or default in the diſtribution of public monies, or into any other miſmanagement whatſoever. Secondly, That the lords, in their enquiry into, and examination of the obſervations of the commiſſioners of accounts, in relation to Charles lord Hallifax, and in their reſolution thereupon, had proceeded according to the rules of juſtice, and the evidence, that was before them. And, Thirdly, That the commons, in their reaſons delivered at the laſt conference, had uſed ſeveral expreſſions and arguments highly reflecting, and altogether unparliamentary, tending to deſtroy all good correſpondence between the two houſes, and to the ſubverſion of the conſtitution."

The queen being apprehenſive of the conſequences of theſe differences between the two houſes, ſent a meſſage to the lords, on the 22d of February, by the earl of Nottingham, to make a quick diſpatch with the buſineſs before them; and the ſame day their lordſhips communicated the abovementioned reſolution to the commons at a conference which their lordſhips had deſired and appointed. The commons, having the next day taken the ſame into conſideration, reſolved, That a free conference be deſired with the lords upon the ſubject matter of the two laſt conferences; and ordered their managers to conſider of what heads were fit to be urged at the ſaid free conference, which they accordingly did, and the ſaid heads were as follow: 1. "That no cognizance, the lords can take of the public accounts, can enable them to ſupply any deficiency, or apply any ſurpluſage of the public money. 2. That the lords can neither acquit or condemn any perſon whatſoever, upon any enquiry ariſing originally in their own houſe. 3. That the attempt the lords have made, to acquit Charles lord Hallifax, auditor of the receipt of the Exchequer, is unparliamentary, and not warranted by any precedent: And the reſolution thereupon plainly contrary to what appears on the records themſelves. 4. That the conference, deſired by the commons, was in order to preſerve a good correſpondence between both houſes, by offering reaſons to prevent the lords from proceeding in a caſe, which they had no precedent to warrant; and the commons expreſſing the conſequences they apprehend might follow from that reſolution, was neither reflecting nor unparliamentary, nor tending to deſtroy the good correſpondence between the two houſes; and much leſs to the ſubverſion of the conſtitution: And, 5. That the lords delivering at a conference their reſolutions, inſtead of reaſons, in anſwer to the reaſons of the commons, is not agreeable to the ancient rules and methods of parliament obſerved in the conferences between the two houſes." Theſe heads being reported by colonel Granville on the 25th, and then read, and approved by the houſe, a meſſage was ſent to the lords, to deſire a free conference with their lordſhips, who appointed the ſame immediately in the Painted chamber, and named the lord Steward, the earl of Carliſle, and the lords Herbert, Hallifax, and Ferrers, to be their managers.

The managers for the commons, at the head of whom was Mr. Finch, opened the particulars, which they had in direction to inſiſt on; adding, "That, when they acquainted their lordſhips that the expreſſing the conſequences, which they apprehended might follow from their lordſhips reſolutions, it was not a charge upon their lordſhips, that they intended that conſequence, but they would have been pleaſed to have let them know what uſe was to be made of it, or what they intended by it:" And concluded, "That, if their lordſhips did controvert any of theſe points, they were ready to maintain them." The lords made no anſwer to any of theſe particulars, except to the matter of the reſolution relating to the lord Hallifax, upon which they acknowledged, "That they were no court of enquiry to form any accuſation. That their proceeding in relation to that lord was no trial, nor was their reſolution any judgment or acquittal; but that he might ſtill be proſecuted as before. But that, which gave occaſion to that proceeding, was the reſolution of the houſe of commons, which they found in the printed votes, reflecting upon a member of their houſe; and thereupon they thought fit to give their opinion, which they did in their legiſlative authority."

The managers for the commons replied, "That their lordſhips having in their reſolutions declared, that they had proceeded according to the rules of juſtice, and the evidence, that was before them, the commons could put no other interpretation upon it, than that it was intended as a 'judgment:' And no 'judgment' could be made, where there was no 'accuſation;' and, if it was not a judgment, they could not imagine what it did tend to. As to their lordſhips delivering their opinion, that it was againſt the rules of any court, that any judge whatſoever ſhould deliver his opinion in a cauſe, that might come before him; and that this matter might hereafter come judicially before their lordſhips. That there was a great difference between the vote of the commons and the reſolution of the lords. That the vote of the houſe of commons was but in order to a proſecution, which they can never vote without declaring the crime, and they can never come to be judges of it. That the houſe of commons is the grand inqueſt of the nation, and every grand-jury, that finds 'bills vera' upon an indictment, does by that declare the man guilty. But that the lords have a judicial capacity, and their reſolution, before an accuſation brought, is prejudging the cauſe, that may come regularly before them. As to the obſervation the commons made, that the lords had not examined the reſpective times of tranſmitting the impreſt-rolls to the queen's remembrancer, the commons managers ſaid, That, as their lordſhips reſolution was no judgment, ſo this conference was no trial. But, to ſhew the miſtake of their lordſhips reſolution, they obſerved, the date upon the ſeveral impreſt-rolls, that had been tranſmitted to the remembrancer; and that they apprehend there were ſtill two wanting: That the three laſt, that were tranſmitted, came not to the remembrancer till January laſt; the two firſt on the 23d, the laſt on the 27th; and that the firſt of theſe three impreſt-rolls was money impreſt to the 21ſt of February 1700, and ſaid to be in the firſt year of queen Anne; which ſhewed, that the roll was ſo far from being examined or tranſmitted in time, that it was not made up till ſince her majeſty came to the crown. That, as the cuſtom formerly had been to ſet down the time of the examination of thoſe rolls, ſince Mr. Charles Montague came to be the auditor, he ſet down the month, but not the day: And, ſince the lord Hallifax was auditor, he had ſet down neither month nor day; and that by his example, on the three laſt intereſt-rolls, the clerk of the pells had put no time at all."

To this the lord Hallifax, in his own defence, replied, "That the lords reſolution was well founded, ſince they had the rolls themſelves before them, and proof upon oath. That, by the words of the act, the auditor was to tranſmit the impreſt-rolls to the remembrancer half-yearly, according to the uſual courſe of the exchequer; which is eight months and four months. That it was not his duty to tranſmit them immediately to the remembrancer, becauſe he was to ſend them to the clerk of the pells, who is to examine and ſign them. That it could not be imagined, that the auditor ſhould be tied to a certain time to tranſmit the rolls to the remembrancer, becauſe they muſt firſt go through another hand; and he never took it, there was any occaſion to put down the time he examined them, for that would appear from the time of the delivery and date of the roll. That there was one examined by the clerk of the rolls, the 4th of July, which he did not take to be the auditor's fault, but to be the duty of the clerk of the pells to deliver them. That every body knew the great trouble, that had been given in his, as well as other offices, by the commiſſioners of accounts; and that no loſs had happened by not tranſmitting theſe rolls, no proceſs having been iſſued forth for many years upon them."

The managers for the commons, ſaid, "That, though half-yearly ſhould be taken for eight months and four months, yet by that they muſt be tranſmitted twice a year and ſo he had failed in his duty in that reſpect. That to conſtrue the antient courſe of the exchequer in the act of parliament, to be meant, that the clerk of the pells ſhould tranſmit the rolls, was a direct contradiction to the act, that ſays, 'the auditor ſhall do it.' That the antient courſe of the exchequer having not been obſerved, was the occaſion of making that law: and that they thought laws were to be obſerved. That indeed no proceſs could iſſue till the rolls were tranſmitted, and poſſibly might be the ground the accounts had been ſo long unpaſſed, to the prejudice of the public. And that, in his lordſhip's apprehenſion, there was no loſs to the public by not tranſmitting the rolls, might probably be the reaſon of his lordſhip's neglecting his duty."

Here the free conference broke up; and, the members being returned to their reſpective houſes, the commons ordered their managers to draw up a report of the ſaid free conference; and then a motion was made, "That the votes of the houſe ſhould not be printed; and that this might be a ſtanding order;" which was carried in the affirmative. The lords, on the contrary, ordered their proceedings, in relation to the public accounts, to be immediately printed; whereupon the commons reſolved to publiſh their proceedings likewiſe.

which the title of duke of Buckinghamſhire was afterwards added [g].

After the proceedings in the parliament, thoſe of the convocation, which was called with the parliament, are next to be related. Dr. Aldrich, dean of Chriſt-church, was choſen prolocutor. At the firſt opening, there was a conteſt between the two houſes, that laſted ſome days, concerning an addreſs to the queen. The lower-houſe intended to caſt ſome reflections on the late reign, in imitation of what the houſe of commons had done, and the reflections were ſo worded, as moſt of the biſhops were pointed at by them; but, the upper houſe refuſing to concur, the lower houſe receded; and both agreed at laſt in another addreſs, which was preſented to the queen, and in which they expreſſed their "great ſenſe of the favour and goodneſs of God, in ſetting her majeſty on the throne of her anceſtors, and making her the defender of that faith, of which ſhe had been ſo glorious an ornament. They thanked her majeſty for her many gracious aſſurances of her unmoveable reſolution to ſupport and protect the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, and to continue it to future ages, by maintaining the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line." And told her majeſty, "That they promiſed themſelves, that, whatever might be wanting to reſtore the church to it's due rights and privileges, her majeſty would have the glory of doing it, and of ſecuring it to poſterity." She told them in anſwer, "That their concurrence, in this dutiful addreſs, was a good preſage of their union in all other matters, which was very deſirable for her ſervice, and the good of the church." But they did not anſwer her majeſty's expectations. The former conteſt was ſoon revived. Many days were not paſſed, before the lower-houſe applied to the archbiſhop of Canterbury and his ſuffragans, begging, that the matters in diſpute, about which there had been differences in two late convocations, concerning the manner of ſynodical proceedings, and the right of the lower houſe to hold intermediate aſſemblies, might be taken into conſideration, and ſpeedily determined, that ſo buſineſs might not be hindered, nor the order and peace of the church diſturbed.

The biſhops reſolved to offer them all that they could without giving up their character and authority. They propoſed, that, in the intervals of ſeſſions, the lower houſe might appoint committees to prepare matters, and, when buſineſs was brought regularly before them, the archbiſhop would ſo order the prorogations, that they might have ſufficient time to ſit and deliberate about it. This fully ſatisfied many of that body: But the majority ſtill inſiſted on the right to hold aſſemblies, and continue to act as an houſe in the intervals of prorogations, and therefore renewed their requeſt, that ſomething might be offered more effectual to the purpoſe intended.
